
SIGILL. SCHOLÆ RELIGIONIS PACIFICÆ
COND. A.D. 1866.
PRO
VERITATE
ET REGNO
DEI
CHARLES HOLBROOK LIBRARY
Pacific School of Religion

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2023 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

https://archive.org/details/gtu_32400002520603

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

HOLBROOK LIBRARY
SODALITATIS B. M. V.
PACIFIC SCHOOL
OF RELIGION

APRIL 14, 1917

BIBLIOTHECA
HOLBROOK LIBRARY
SODALITATIS B. M. V.
PACIFIC SCHOOL
OF RELIGION

VOLUME SIXTEEN

1916-17

From October 14, 1916 to April 7, 1917, Inclusive

HOLBROOK LIBRARY
PACIFIC SCHOOL
OF RELIGION

Section Two

NEW YORK

THE AMERICA PRESS

80773

v.16
1916/17

INDEX

VOLUME XVI—OCTOBER 14, 1916 TO APRIL 7, 1917, INCLUSIVE

PAGE

Adam, Cords of (Catholic Devotion)..... 56
Advent (Ed.)..... 206
Aquinas, A Second (Ed.)..... 522
Alcohol, the Argument for (Ed.)..... 328
All, What Becomes of Them?..... 29
Allium Cepa, The Fall of (Ed.)..... 521
American, The Little (Ed.)..... 449
AMERICA'S Sixteenth Volume (Ed.)..... 14
Anarchists, The Obedient (Ed.)..... 473
Anarchy, Encouraging (Ed.)..... 181
Anglican Church, Feminism in the..... 248
Animals, Environment and Adaptations.... 562
"Animalaria," American..... 320
Anointed, Touch Not Mine (Ed.)..... 62
Atlantic, the Jesuitical (Ed.)..... 627

Barroom Vision (Ed.)..... 183
Belief in God, Citizenship and..... 490
Benson, An Unpublished Interview with.... 443
"Bestiae et Universa Pecora"..... 251
Bethlehem, The Lesson of..... 247
Bigamist, The Philosophical..... 221
Birth-Control, The Bench and (Ed.) 38; from the Pulpit, 233; N. Y. Physicians and (Ed.) 304; Poor Arguments for, 348; Judicious, 109; Cats, Church-Property and (Ed.) 449; Birth-Controller Convicted (Ed.) 448
Birth-Rate among Harvard and Yale Graduates (Ed.)..... 330
Book, The Writing of a..... 591
Books for Breakfast (Ed.)..... 599
Boston's Catholicism and Art..... 415
Boys, The Game of Raising..... 566
Brawlers against Decency (Ed.)..... 424
Brigid's Day in Ireland, St..... 420
British Church, Origin of the Early..... 488
Buildings and Health, New York's Business.. 102

Cacophony, The Cult of (Ed.)..... 306
Calumny by Cartoon (Ed.)..... 184
Carolina, North, Club, The (Ed.)..... 306
Carranza, the Scourge of God..... 561
Catholics, and N. Y. Regents' Examinations (Ed.) 402; Professional (Ed.)..... 599
Catholicism, and Happiness, 130; and Courtesy, 153; A New View of (Ed.)..... 305
Catts, Gov., of Florida (Ed.) 353; Bigotry of (Ed.) 353-629
Censorship, Again the (Ed.)..... 14
Ceremonies, Are Two Allowed? (Weddings) (Ed.) 62
Cinema Actors, The, and the People, 298; and the Sixth Commandment (Ed.)..... 424
Civilization in Europe, The Origin of, 53; The Break in Christian..... 620
Chalice of Antioch, The Great..... 396
Christmas, Message, A (Ed.) 256; Day (Ed.) 256; in Gaelic Lore, 250; Tree, The Synthetic 280
Child Labor Law, The New (Ed.)..... 328
Child, Pays The (Ed.) (Children and Divorce) 111
Childhood, Whisperings about Eternal..... 271
Children's Protectors, The (Ed.)..... 16
Christ, The Shavian..... 78
Christian, Brothers of St. Louis, The (Ed.) 38; Warrior, A True (Ed.)..... 39
Colleges, Catholic (Ed.)..... 378
College Man in Business, The (Ed.)..... 403
Color in Life..... 541
Colored Folk, An Exodus of..... 319
Confessional, The State and the (Ed.)..... 472
Confidence, The Tabernacle of (Easter).... 618
Canon Law, The Code of (Ed.)..... 233
Consciousness, The Unity of..... 442
Conservatives' Triumph, The (Ed.)..... 425
Co-operation Without Compromise..... 125
Cowardice or Caution?..... 439
Crime, Youthful, and Divorce (Ed.) 87; Sanctifying (Ed.)..... 135
Cross, A Protestant Way of the (Ed.)..... 546

Dance and Health, The Modern..... 295
Daughters, Parents of Catholic (Ed.)..... 598
Dawn Man and Modern Man..... 487
Debts, Amusing and Protestant..... 322
Democracy and Morality (Ed.)..... 110
Despot and Demon (Mexico)..... 368
Dictographs and "the Leak"..... 515
Divorced Non-Catholics and the Church.... 201
Doggy Dialogue, A..... 367
Dominic, St. and His Brethren (Ed.)..... 182
Drama, The American, 132; Diagnosing the. 445
Drug Evil, The (Ed.)..... 234
Dynamite and Wages (Ed.)..... 573

Easter (The Tabernacle of Confidence)..... 618
"Ecclesia Militans" (Ed.)..... 449
Education, English under War Conditions.. 101
Electors, Our Indiscreet..... 151

PAGE

England's Closet, The Skeleton in (Ed.).... 136
Entomology as a Profession..... 200
Episcopalians' Historical Pageant, The..... 83
Eugenics and Old Clothes..... 77
Essays, The Gentle Art of Reading..... 539

Facts, and a Contrast, Two (Ed.)..... 600
Faith, Ashamed of His (Ed.)..... 521
Families, Large and Holy (Ed.)..... 496
Fanatics, Reflections on..... 6
Flippancy, The Cult of..... 587
Flying, He Kept It. (Ed.) (Capt. Duffy of the Chemung)..... 208
Food Problem, A Crisis in the (Ed.)..... 207
Foundations, Investigating the (Ed.)..... 574
Foundlings, Catholic, Case of (Ed.)..... 352
France and the War, The Women of..... 301
Francis Joseph, Emperor and King (Ed.).... 182
Free Speech, Attacking (Ed.) 474; and the Agitator (Ed.)..... 520
Future, The Food of the (Ed.)..... 206

Generation, The Chaste (Ed.) (Fire in Canadian Convent) 330; Spontaneous, History of..... 511
God, A Modern Conception of (Ed.)..... 40
Geological Time, Early Man and..... 460
Georgia Bigotry (Ed.)..... 598

Harvard and Yale Graduates (Ed.)..... 330
Head, On Losing One's..... 11
High Prices, and Near Riots (Ed.) 497; in the Middle Ages, 538; The Government and 547
History, No Interest in Catholic, 324; Made and Unmade (Ed.) (Regents' Examinations) 402
Human Nature and Civilization..... 594

Imagination, The..... 343
Industrial Engineering, The Value of..... 273
Industry and Education..... 440
Inquisition, Worse Than the (Ed.)..... 158
Instruction League, The Catholic (Ed.).... 426
Intellect and Its Faculties, The..... 394
"Irae, Dies"..... 79
Issue, Obscuring the (Anglican Continuity).. 59
"Jesse, O Radix"..... 281
Jesuits, Those Lying (Ed.)..... 521
Jimmy's First Whisky (Ed.)..... 304
Jungle to Prevail? Is the Law of the..... 9
Just Prices, The Ethics of..... 590

Kinsman, Bishop and the Jesuits..... 564

Language, The American (Ed.)..... 110
Last Page, The..... 280
Latins, Enlightening the (Ed.)..... 450
Law and Order, A Triumph of (Ed.)..... 134
Letter, A "Sacred" and a "Profane" (Ed.) 160
Lie, Is a, Justifiable (Ed.)..... 427
Life, When Does Human, End? 7; the Origin of 225
Literacy Tests, Two (Ed.)..... 427
"Literary" That Now Discredited Word (Ed.) 258
Living Creatures, Arrangement in, 615; The Study of..... 419
London's "Popish" Shrines (Ed.)..... 134
Lord, Make Straight the Way of the (Ed.). 232
Loss is Gain (Ed.)..... 305
Luther, at Worms (Ed.) 88; and Reunion (Ed.) 401; Himself Is to Blame (Ed.)... 628
Lynching (Ed.)..... 377

Malden Educational Plan, The (Ed.)..... 598
Man and an Occasion, A (Ed.) 257; The Ordinary (Ed.)..... 573
Manning, Cardinal, as I knew Him..... 346
Masonic Light and Jesuit Morality (Ed.)... 497
McKenna, Missioner, Father..... 514
Medievalism, The Return to..... 198
Memory 370
Mental Reservation and Jesuits..... 564
"Merry" and "Happy," The Question of.. 222
Mexico, Religious Liberty in (Ed.) 425; Bereaved and Outraged (Ed.) 496; Editors and (Ed.) 496; The Evangelists and (Ed.). 626
Mexican, Masonry and the Mexican Orgy (Ed.) 88; Truth and American Falsehood (Ed.) 112; American Commission, The (Ed.) 376
Mind and Its Faculties, The Human..... 323
Missions, How to Support Our (Ed.) 109; Literature Fund, A (Ed.)..... 376
Missionary Agencies, Centralization of.... 30
"Mitchel, This Young Fellow"..... 5
Mockus, Michael and the Mammal (Ed.).... 232
Modernism, The Synthesis of..... 512

PAGE

Monkeys, Children of Men..... 391
Mothers, Why Do Women Become? (Ed.) 63; The Progeny of New England..... 535
"Moving-Picture" Liberty (Ed.)..... 38
Municipal Reform (Ed.)..... 520
Murder in Chicago and Elsewhere (Ed.)... 329

Newspapers a Luxury or a Nuisance? (Ed.). 522
Norfolk, The Duke of..... 467

Olive Branch, An (Ed.) (Methodist Overtures) 207
Optimist, The..... 281

Pacifism, Mad (Ed.)..... 497
Palm Sunday (Ed.)..... 600
Patches, Purple..... 32
Patrick, and the Kingdom Dolorous, St.... 517
Peace Plan, An Effective..... 296
Personalities, Three Great..... 299
Philippines, Manners and Morals in the.... 176
Physician, Choosing a (Ed.)..... 498
Pillotherium, The Venerable (Ed.)..... 135
Plunkett, Papers Concerning Oliver.....203-227
Policy, A Good Insurance (Ed.)..... 474
Potamian Brother, Death of (Ed.)..... 400
President, Who Elects the?..... 128
Preternatural Revelations, Lodge and..... 463
Prices, Morality of Monopolistic..... 616
Priest, A Martyred (Ed.) 257; What the, Said (Ed.)..... 498
Probation, Jimmy on (Ed.)..... 354
Prohibition and the Mass (Ed.)..... 355
Prude, and His Morality, The Abused..... 395

Quackery and Religion, Phases of..... 149

Read, Would They but..... 349
Realists, A Word to (Ed.)..... 159
Regeneration by Mail (Ed.)..... 352
Relief Fund, The Irish (Ed.)..... 14
Religious Liberty, The World and (Ed.).... 158
Restitution, A Chicago Journalist and..... 150
Retribution, Divine and Otherwise (Ed.).... 627
Right, Two Wrongs Make a (Ed.) (Wilson and Mexico)..... 64
Rockefeller School, The Proposed (Ed.).... 472
"Romanists" and Politics (Ed.)..... 62
Rosary, The Neophyte and the..... 465
Roses or Regrets..... 126

Saints, The Humor of the..... 275
"Sanctus Franciscus," The Oratorio..... 12
Sanitary Engineering, The Young Man and.. 106
Santa Claus, Exit? (Ed.)..... 184
Sea, in Ships, Down to the..... 468
Secretary, with a Secret (Ed.) (Mexico and Wilson) 86
Secular Life, Catholic Ideals in..... 278
Sentimentality and Charity (Ed.) 39; and Ethics (Ed.)..... 572
Scandal, A Trader in (Ed.) (Divorce and Church) 64
School Centers and Rows (Ed.)..... 400
Schoolma'am, The Superior (Ed.)..... 234
Science in the School Program (Ed.)..... 137
"Scientists" and Immortality (Ed.)..... 329
Shakespeare, The Democracy of..... 276
Shavian Christianity..... 58
Shylock, The Truth about..... 491
Spanish Pioneers, The (Ed.)..... 16
Socialism in 1922? (Ed.) 159; after the War, 282; and the Protestant Episcopal Church (Ed.) 401
Socialist, Nemesis, The (Ed.) (Bouck White). 378
Soul, The Weight of the, 35; A Discord of the (Ed.)..... 574
Souls, The Food of Our (Ed.)..... 15
South America, Benighted..... 223
Southern Cross, Our Brethren under the.... 536
Speer, Robert, on Chiniquy and "Cardinal" Liguori (Ed.) 548; 572; and Two Lotteries 613
Spiritism (Ed.) 377; Against Christianity.. 588
Stars, The Winter..... 249
Strong's Conclusions, Mr. (Charities Investigation) 81
Sunday, Mr. and the Unitarians..... 173
Superstition among British Soldiers..... 392
Sure, Why Not Be? (Ed.) (Mistakes of Non-Catholic Writers)..... 86
Surgeons Instead of Cells (Ed.)..... 159

Taxing Institutions (Ed.)..... 546
Teacher, An Old-Fashioned..... 154
Theater, Censorship and the (Ed.), 547; Catholics and the..... 373
"Theological Standpatism" (Ed.)..... 628
Theology, Some Shavian..... 104
Torborg, The Late Mr. (Ed.)..... 353
Towns, The Lost..... 174

PAGE

Boy, Nobody's ... 310
Boy Scout Movement Applied by the Church, The ... 186
Boy and His Training, Your ... 140
Brontës and Their Circle, The ... 602
Bridge, Pirate ... 603
Britling Sees it Through, Mr ... 66
Burglary, A Medieval ... 633
Calinga, The Taming of ... 262
Came, And Thus He ... 141
Camping ... 20
Campion, Cupid of ... 92
Cardinali, Coram ... 186
Caterpillar, The Life of the ... 139
Catholic Church from Within, The ... 501
Captains, Fellow ... 430
Celt and the World, The ... 632
Century, The Eighteenth ... 18
Charles XII, King of Sweden ... 478
Chaste Wife, The ... 632
Chemistry in the Service of Man ... 309
Child, Socializing the ... 382
Children, The Sins of the ... 68
Christ, The Syrian ... 285
Christian Science, The Truth About ... 91
Christianity, Cradle of ... 431
Christianity, Catholic, 602; and the Modern World ... 633
Christmas Card, The Romance of a ... 93
Chronicle, A Country ... 334
Church and Politics, 358; Holiness of the, in the Nineteenth Century ... 578
Cicero: A Sketch of His Life and Works, 162; Selected Letters of ... 359
Circuit Rider's Wife, A ... 164
Circus, and Other Essays, The ... 284
Civilization, Ancient ... 382
Clover and Blue Grass ... 92
College Girl, A ... 44
Communion Catechism, First ... 430
Conflict, From Convent to ... 164
Connie, Lady ... 139
Connor, The Romance of Martin ... 164
Conrad, Joseph ... 20
Consumptives, Home Care for ... 262
Cook Book, The Myrtle Reed ... 262
Country Chronicle, A ... 334
Court, The Man in ... 632
Crane, Enoch ... 116
Crèvecoeur, St. Jean de ... 359
Cuba, The Early History of ... 500
Custer ... 452
Cycle's Rim, The ... 286
Cyclopedia of American Biography ... 380
Damaris ... 42
Dante ... 477
Dease, Life and Letters of Rev. Mother Teresa ... 429
Defoe, Daniel: How to Know Him ... 43
De Lacey's Daughter, Gerald ... 406
Delight, In the Garden of ... 163
Democracy, The War of ... 524
Desmond's Daughter ... 67
Dog, Only a ... 526
Dominic and the Order of Preachers, St ... 284
Door, Open That ... 116
Dot Mystery, The Great ... 93
Dragon, The Breath of the ... 44
Dutch Navigators, The Golden Book of the ... 187
Earth, Wild, and Other Poems ... 236
East o' the Sun and West o' the Moon ... 525
Ecclesiastical Control in Quebec, The Rise of ... 381
Economics, An Introduction to ... 186
Education, The Essentials of Religious ... 357
Education, State Policy in Irish ... 602
Envelope, The Blue ... 632
Europe, A Political and Social History of Modern ... 380
Fabian Society, The History of the ... 260
Fiction, Stranger Than ... 358
Finance, High, 453; International ... 453
Fire, The Ordeal by ... 430
Fires, Refining ... 187
Foolishness, Further ... 603
France, La Belle, 140; The People and Her Spirit ... 237
Franklin, Printer, Benjamin ... 526
Franks, History of the ... 429
French Garden, Told in a ... 164
French Perspectives ... 139
Friendship, The Sacrament of ... 551
Fruit Gathering ... 212
Future, Living for the ... 261
Gálvez, José de ... 332
Garden Plans, Book of, 20; My ... 260
Georgina of the Rainbows ... 116
Gilder, Letters of R. Watson ... 162
Girls, A Comparative Study of Delinquent ... 66
God and Man ... 261
Goose, The Real Mother ... 93
Gospel, Brief Discourses on the ... 478
Government, Form and Functions of American ... 236
Grail Fire ... 631
Grant, Ulysses S ... 577
Greek Grammar for Schools and Colleges, A ... 359
Harzreise, Die ... 359
Hated Man, The Mystery of the ... 20
Hawaii: Scenes and Impressions ... 115
Head Winds ... 92
Heart Songs and Home Songs ... 19

PAGE

Heaven Open to Souls ... 211
Historical Records and Studies ... 525
History, Nationality in Modern, 19; Prolegomena to ... 115
Home, Speaking of ... 67
Horse, The Cab of the Sleeping ... 430
Hours, After, 93; The Sunlit ... 551
House, 1000 Ways Around the ... 262
Housekeeper, Letters to a Young ... 603
Ideals, The Young Folks' Book of ... 550
Imbecile, The Criminal ... 66
Immigration, The Tide of ... 187
Inspirers, Great ... 577
Insurrection in Dublin, The ... 114
Interval, Mountain ... 551
Involution, Creative ... 237
Ireland, Literature in ... 91
Irish Republic, Six Days of the, 210; Rebellion of 1916 ... 210
Irish Verse, A Little Book of ... 42
Ishodad of Merv, The Commentaries of ... 476
Israel, The Lily of ... 431
Jack, Letters to ... 452
Jerry ... 478
Jesus, Christ, The Divinity of, 359; The Conflict of, 357; The Persecution of, 357; La Compagnie de, en France ... 428
Jim—Unclassified ... 20
Johnson, The Religious Poems of Lionel ... 552
Jones, John Paul ... 452
Journey, The Long, 501; The Ancient ... 602
Justice, Distributive ... 452
Kitchener, The Boys' Life of Lord ... 67
Labor in America, Organized ... 211
Land of Don't-Want-To, The ... 93
Landlord, The Pleasures of an Absentee ... 334
Legend, The Growth of a ... 552
Lerins, The Commonitorium of St. Vincent of ... 308
Life, The Three Gifts of ... 477
Lights and Shadows ... 260
Limpy, the Boy Who Felt Neglected ... 525
Literature, The Social Criticism of ... 309
London, More Wanderings in ... 237
Love, A Story of ... 164
Love and Lucy ... 20
Lydia of the Pines ... 604
Lyric, The ... 430
Luther, The Facts about ... 163
Maids, An Apology for Old ... 381
Man, The Fall of ... 430
Morse, The Brown ... 164
Marillac, Life of the Venerable Louise de ... 576
Marriage, The Adornment of the Spiritual ... 66
Marshall, The Life of John ... 405
Mary Be Careful! ... 478
Mary, Uncle Frank's ... 211
Mass for Every Day in the Year ... 358
Master's Portrait, The Divine ... 359
Maxims of the Viscountess de Bonnault ... 212
"Me," The Melancholy Tale of ... 91
Medicine, A Layman's Handbook of ... 525
Men, Women and Ghosts ... 262
Memory, The Long Road of Woman's ... 211
Mexico, A Daughter of, 430; Did Wilson's Administration Interfere in ?, 44; Our First War with, 141; The Whole Truth About ... 18
Michael ... 551
Minute, To the ... 92
Missal, Sunday ... 212
Matchmakers, The ... 551
Moloch ... 237
Money and Banking, Principles of ... 453
Moon, The Harvest, 551; The Wishing ... 164
Morning Face, Her Book ... 164
Multitude and Solitude ... 188
Music and Bad Manners ... 430
Mystery, Aspects of the Infinite ... 116
Norbert, St., History of ... 43
Northwest, Early Narratives of the ... 630
Novel, The Advance of the English ... 333
O'Brien, Reminiscences of the Right Hon. Lord ... 334
Omniana, the Autobiography of an Irish Octogenarian ... 262
Painters of Florence, The ... 210
Pampas, Tales of the ... 92
Party, For the Good of the ... 310
Pass, It Came to ... 116
Pédagogigue, Psychologie ... 452
People, The White ... 501
Pencraft, a Plea for the Older Way ... 382
Penitent of Brent, The ... 187
Penrod and Sam ... 115
Perfection Chrétienne et Religieuse ... 478
Personality, Development of ... 332
Philosophy, an Autobiographical Fragment ... 381
Physics and Chemistry for Nurses ... 20
Pilgrimage, A Spiritual ... 382
Pinocchio ... 164
Pip, a Romance of Youth ... 604
Play, The Practical Conduct of, 140; A Juvenile Catalogue ... 140
Plays, Three ... 236
Poetry and the Renascence of Wonder ... 524
Poilu, A Volunteer ... 188
Poland, A Brief History of ... 308
Politics, Undercurrents in American ... 236
Popes, The Book of the ... 429
Portugallia, The Emperor of ... 68

PAGE

Prayer: Its Necessity, Its Power, Its Conditions ... 20
Princess of Let's Pretend, The, 604; Marie José's Book ... 604
Prohibition, Its Supreme Folly, National ... 310
Purchase, The New ... 309
Read, How to ... 359
Red Gap, Somewhere in ... 19
Religion, Problems of ... 260
Responsibilities ... 188
Retrogression and Other Poems ... 478
Retrospect of Fifty Years, A ... 476
Revolution and Napoleon, The French ... 631
Rings for the Finger ... 500
Romance ... 429
Rome, Ancient, Subterranean and Modern ... 114
Russia in 1916 ... 604
Salle, La ... 67
Sacred Scriptures, the Westminster Version ... 42
Saints, and Their Emblems, 42; Legends ... 114
Scientific Thought, A Century of ... 382
School Days, Robert Kane's ... 44
Scotch, The Story of ... 44
Self-Reliance ... 359
Seminarian, His Character and Work, The ... 187
Sermons, on Various Occasions, 187; and Sermon Notes, 428; Illustrations for, and Instructions ... 525
Seton's Daughters, The History of Mother ... 550
Seven Vagabonds, The ... 44
Shakespeare: Macbeth, The Merchant of Venice, Hamlet, Julius Cæsar, 67; on the Stage, 358; Our Fellow ... 477
Share, The Lion's ... 310
Sheaf, A ... 213
Shepherd, Who Watched by Night, The ... 44
Silence, The Further Side of, 92; The Empire of ... 406
Siwash, Petey Simmons at ... 19
Slavery in Germanic Society During the Middle Ages ... 333
Snow, A Fire in the ... 262
Socialism in America ... 261
Songs, High School ... 526
Soul, The Progress of a ... 602
Southwest, Our Hispanic ... 260
Spanish America, The Literary History of ... 65
Spiritual Life, Master of the ... 334
Spiritistic Phenomena and Their Interpretation ... 140
Spring Song, The ... 478
Stars, in Their Courses, The ... 604
Stevenson, Robert Louis—How to Know Him ... 333
Story of Love, A ... 164
Story, The Short ... 116
Sulpicians, in the United States, The ... 259
Supremo, El ... 285
Tales, Fifty-One ... 578
Talks, Father Tim's ... 525
Thirty-one Days with Our Blessed Lady ... 604
Tide, The Rising ... 68
Tim, The Triumph of ... 141
Times, In Spacious ... 238
Transcendentalisme Du ... 405
Turks in Palestine, With the ... 141
Tutor's Story, The ... 42
Vernon, Mount, Washington's Home and the Nation's Shrine ... 163
Vision, the Valley of ... 261
Vocal Exercises, Melodious ... 526
Voyages, The Earliest Round the World ... 525
War, 237; and Humanity, 430; A Woman and the, 430; My Second Year of the, 524; The Elements of the Great ... 138
Warfare, Sea ... 603
Washington, 452; Booker T ... 357
Water and the Spirit, Of ... 358
Watermeads ... 92
Wave, The ... 501
Way, The More Excellent ... 67
Wedlock, Songs of ... 212
Whale and the Grasshopper, The ... 334
Whirlpool, The ... 262
Wind's Will ... 20
Witchcraft in Salem Village ... 477
Woman, Gives, The, 20; The Leopard, 44; Suffrage by Constitutional Enactment ... 262
Women, Portraits of, 286; Conferences for Young ... 633
Wonder Tales Retold ... 93
Working Classes in France, History of the ... 333
Work, Joseph Pennell's Pictures of the Wonder of ... 210
World for Sale, The, 44; The Ancient ... 501 Wreath, An Altar ... 187
Year, The Wonderful ... 93
Youth, Years of My ... 162

EDUCATION

Alcuin of York ... 553
Ashton, Jane, Goes to School ... 21
Boy, What School for Your? ... 165
Boys, On the Education of ... 45
Christ in the School ... 263
Christian Doctrine Hour, The ... 141
Christian Education, A War for ... 431
Dramatics, College ... 117
Education by Vagary ... 93

PAGE

Elementary Schools, Commercial Classes in.. 528
Freshman English..... 479
Grade School, History in the..... 579
Julianne, a Type, Is? 69; Speaks for Herself, 213; Without Its Julianne..... 335
La Salle, Another..... 189
Monastic Schools, The..... 383
Oligarchy, Our Oleaginous..... 455
Parochial School, Americanism and the.... 504
Reading and Your Child, 239; in the Grades. 605
Rockefeller's New Education..... 408
Sleeping, Have We Been?..... 633
Spanish, Commercial..... 287
Standardizer, The Day of the..... 311
Teacher-Mother, The..... 361

SOCIOLOGY

Apostolate, The Rural: Catholic Literature, 634; A Suggestion, 214; The Situation.. 360
Blame, Who's to? (Catholic Education).... 527
Bosco, The Widow..... 456
Boy Problem Again, The..... 311
Boy, Saving the..... 190
Charities, The Answer to the State Board of. 336
Christ in the Lowly..... 264
Comfort, A Certain Amount of..... 288
Country Problems..... 22
Dependent Child, The, and Archbishop Mundelein 480
Employer and Employee..... 46
Fordham! Ave..... 95
Humanity, The Gospel of..... 142
Kingsbury's Conversion, Mr. (Charities Investigation) 554
Lay Mission Workers..... 240
Settlements Social, A Plea for..... 118
Sociology, A Page of Modern..... 503
Supermen and Superwomen..... 166
Toledo Conference Evenings, The..... 606
Welfare League, A San Francisco..... 70

ECONOMICS

Single Tax: A Reply, 407; Pope Leo XIII and 432

NOTE AND COMMENT

A. F. of L. is Organized, How the..... 120
Africa, Church, The in South..... 386
Agriculture, A New School of..... 167
Alcohol and Cigarettes..... 433
Alcoholism, Effects of..... 24
Alumnæ, Catholic, in Convention.....71-215
Apostolate, The New York..... 582
Babies, People or Bundles, Are?..... 362
Birth-Control in Cleveland, 290; Hunger Strikes, 458; Birth-Controllers, The..... 580
Belgium and Mexico, Comparison Between.. 434
Benson, Admiral Gets Laetare Medal..... 636
Birds, Protecting the..... 410
Blessed Sacrament, A Little Hero of the.... 434
Blind, New Catholic Home for the..... 95
Bread, War Prices for..... 23

PAGE

Brewers, Advising the..... 266
Buffalo Bill, The Baptism of..... 386
Butler, the Rev. Theobold, Death of..... 241
Cancer Hereditary and Contagious, Is?..... 506
Catholic Directory, The, 47; Priests, Tribute to, 313; Interests, Promotion of..... 338
Catholics, Intolerant, 23; and the Public Library 506
Chant, Gregorian..... 120
Chinese Orphan Babies..... 24
Christian Social Ideal, The Modern..... 608
Christmas Saint, A..... 265
Christ Child Mission Circle, 289; Society.... 265
Charity, What the Church Does for..... 290
Cities and Babies..... 71
College Meals, I. W. W. Appetizer at..... 361
Columbia and the Y. M. C. A..... 482
Commandments, The Ten, in Public Schools. 191
Commodities, The Rising Price of..... 482
Company-Keeping, Advice about..... 266
Compensation Law Applied to Child..... 143
Congresses, Indian, and an Indian Artist.. 120
Correctional Institutions, Girls in..... 71
Daily Paper, The Chinese Catholic..... 72
Dance Halls, Public..... 636
Danish Islands, Catholics and the..... 505
Deaths, Violent..... 96
Deeds, The Eloquence of..... 581
Disease, A Dread..... 120
Divorce in Chicago, 191; A Record, 216; The Philippine Law, 530; An Incredible Law. 555
Drink Evil, The..... 505
Ecclesiastics in French Army..... 481
Education, Protestant Eulogy of Catholic, 529; Rockefellerized..... 582
Educational, Catholic Association, Report of the, 168; Fashionable, Practice..... 215
Falconio, Cardinal, Death of..... 458
Farm Wages..... 71
Feminist, The First..... 362
Film Censorship, The New Zealand..... 48
Fire Laws and the Catholic Conscience.... 458
Fire Losses, American..... 506
Florida Bigotry..... 635
Foreign Mission Funds..... 530
Forests of Arizona, Petrified..... 96
Franciscan Sisters' New Foundation in Toledo 290
Freemasonry, a Political Society..... 242
Gallagher's Pastoral, Bishop..... 434
Gary Plan in New York..... 23
Georgia Bigots, 481; and Bishop Keiley, 556; and Tom Watson..... 289
Grayfish 386
Indian Missions, Gifts for..... 241
Invocation, A Timely..... 529
Idolatry in U. S..... 529
Illiteracy and Crime..... 410
Jaegle, C. J., a Knight of St. Gregory..... 265
Jesuit Students..... 215
Jonah and the Whale Controversy..... 72
Jürgens, Death of Archbishop..... 143
Labor and the Christmas Season..... 314
Laetare Medal to Dr. Walsh..... 95
Literacy Bill Now Law, The..... 457
Living, The High Cost of..... 216
Longevity, Missionary Work and..... 482
Luther Centenary and Church Unity Octave, The 313
Lyceum Bureau, A Catholic..... 314
Manning, Cardinal, Literary Style of..... 529

PAGE

Meat, Reasons for the High Price of..... 48
Mexican, Revolution, A. F. L.'s Endorsement of, 289; Justice, The Comedy of, 385; Clothing the Poor People, 505; Refugees.. 581
Mexico, Catholic Education in..... 48
Mission, Ruined Center of a Great, 144; Funds 385
Milton and His Dutch Prototype..... 482
Mixed Marriages, Chicago Judge on..... 289
Mothers, Daughters, Books..... 216
Moving-Pictures, French Boys and..... 266
Negroes, Mission Work among American.... 23
Norfolk, The Duke of..... 607
Nurses in War Hospitals, Amateur..... 47
Oblates of Mary Immaculate..... 168
Parents, Good Advice to..... 482
Parish Schools in Newark..... 96
Patrick, St., Need of a Twentieth-Century... 608
Paul, The Eclipse of St..... 215
Peace, A Reason for..... 314
Philippines, Our Duty in the..... 265
Pictures, Stopping Single-Day..... 481
Poet Victim of the War, Another..... 144
Political Party, Is the Catholic Church a?... 530
Population Statistics..... 338
Postal Savings, Safety of..... 506
Potato Bread..... 119
Preparedness, Special Tax..... 607
Press in Danger, The Religious..... 338
Priests, Heroism of..... 289
Profit Sharing in U. S..... 636
Propagation of the Faith, Donations for the. 555
Religious Apathy in Brooklyn..... 192
"Reservations," Anglican Memorial on..... 635
"Revolutionists, Fellow" (I. W. W.).... 192
Rosary at the Front, Our Lady's..... 48
Rossetti, Dante Gabriel..... 410
Russell, "Pastor," A Methodist Comment on. 192
Russia, Modern..... 119
Schools, The, of the U. S..... 433
Seawell, Death of M. E..... 168
Sienkiewicz, Henryk, Death of..... 168
Single Taxers, Can Catholics Be?..... 96
Socialist Vote, The, 313; Socialists, Catholic Woman Rebukes..... 505
Sociology, Loyola University School..... 71
Statistics, U. S. Catholic..... 556
Study Circle, The Windthorst..... 386
Sacred Heart, College of the..... 608
Success, What Are the Ways to?..... 433
Suffrage, Cardinal Gibbons on Woman.... 242
Sulpician Anniversary, St. Mary's Seminary. 216
Sunday's, N. Y. Campaign, Billy..... 556
Surinow, Leper Colony of..... 72
Swiss President, The New..... 410
Tagore's Lectures..... 338
Telephone Manners..... 607
Theater Movement, The Catholic..... 71
Trade Unionists, Wise Counsel to..... 24
Treatment of Natives, Spanish and American. 144
Turkish Courtesy to the Vatican..... 313
"Uplifters" and Chicago Good Shepherd House, The..... 457
Vincentian Work..... 555
War, a Grim Tale of, 191; Music, Charity and the, 242; Debt, The Payers of the, 529; Letters, Catholic..... 582
"Water," Millions of..... 191
Xavier College, Activities of..... 362
Y. M. C. A. and Religion..... 47
Youth, The War of..... 143

Bank of France is said to have declined to 24.5 per cent by October 5. Though cut off from gold importation, Germany has conserved a vast gold reserve. The amount of coined gold in currency is estimated at 500,000,000 marks to which must be added the possessions in gold of private citizens.

Great Britain.—From notable English Catholic families, death has lately exacted a heavy toll. A recent number of the Tablet chronicles the death in action on September 13, of Mr. Kenelm Vaughan, son of Mr. Reginald Vaughan, nephew of the late Cardinal, and of Dr. John S. Vaughan, Bishop of Sebastopolis. "I do not ask to be spared," the young man had recently written Dr. Vaughan, "but only that I may do my duty. Please pray for that one intention." "If the very essence of sanctity" writes the Bishop, in comment, "be absolute conformity to God's will, in life and in death, he was surely ripe for his reward." God's Providence will make all well, but the loss to the Church and to the State of this generation, of so many young men of position, ability and splendid Catholic faith, brings home the fearful and inevitable price of conflict. News has also been received of the death on September 11, of Brigadier-General Henry Frederick Hugh Clifford, D.S.O., and of Major Cedric Charles Dickens, grandson of the famous novelist. Born in 1867, General Clifford was educated at Woburn under Monsignor, Lord Petre, and entered the army in 1888. He won the Queen's and King's medals with five clasps in the South African campaign, and served in the present war with great distinction, receiving the D.S.O. in February, 1915, and the command of a brigade in the following June. He also received the Order of St. Stanislaus from the Emperor of Russia for distinguished conduct in the field. Major Dickens, who was but twenty-seven years of age, joined the London Regiment in 1910, and until the opening of the war, was a solicitor in a London firm. Reported wounded in February, 1915, he subsequently attained the rank of Major.

The Price of Conflict

Major-General Lord Ralph Drury Kerr, K.C.B., died at his residence in Dalkeith on September 18. The third son of the seventh Marquis of Lothian, born in 1837, he followed the example of his mother and became a Catholic in 1853. He entered the army in 1857, and in 1878 married Lady Anne Fitzalan Howard, sister of the Duke of Norfolk. "Few men" comments the Tablet, "have gone through life commanding such universal respect." Lord Kerr for many years was President of the Scottish Catholic Truth Society, was a founder of a Home for Working Boys in Edinburgh, patron of many Catholic charities, and a devout member of St. David's church, Dalkeith, built by his mother in 1854. His last public act was to take part in a gild procession of the Blessed Sacrament.

Death of Lord Kerr

Ireland.—In an address to his constituents at Waterford on October 6, Mr. John Redmond declared that despite the recent uprising "with all its inevitable aftermath of brutalities, stupidities and inflamed passions," Home Rule for Ireland is safe if Ireland remains sane. He also declared that conscription could never be forced upon Ireland, adding that he could not bring himself to believe that the Government would be insane enough to challenge a conflict with Ireland on the subject, for conscription for Ireland, far from helping Ireland and the war, would, in his opinion, be the most fatal thing that could happen. "It would be resisted," he said, "in every village in Ireland. Its attempted enforcement would be a scandal which would ring round the world. It would produce no additional men." Continuing, Mr. Redmond said:

Mr. Redmond's Waterford Speech

> The mere threat is paralyzing recruiting, which, mark you, is not dead, as some people say. The latest figures, indeed, show that from the date of the rising, Easter Sunday, until September, 6,000 recruits were received. This demand for conscription is not a genuine military demand. It is a base political device put forward by men who want to injure and discredit Ireland's political future and revive by any and every means bad blood between the two countries in the wicked hope that when the war is over the British people may tolerate some attempt to repeal the Home Rule act. On these lines the Government may succeed in recruiting even after all that has happened. But as for conscription, in that way lies madness, ruin and disaster.

The Irish leader then declared that it was absolutely false that he or his colleagues ever devised a scheme providing for a permanent division of the ancient nation. He stated the case of Home Rule by saying that the Act was on the statute book and that the Act which suspends its operation provides that if it is not put into operation before the war ends, then it comes into operation automatically at the end of the war, and that nothing had altered or could alter that except a new act of Parliament. For his own part, he said, he desired a friendly and peaceful settlement with Ulster.

Japan.—Early this month came the news that Count Okuma, had resigned as Prime Minister of Japan and that the Emperor had requested Lieutenant-General Count Seiki Terauchi, formerly Minister of War and also formerly Resident General in Korea, to organize a Cabinet. The choice of Count Terauchi is considered a victory for the army party and for the bureaucratic forces in Japan, which have long been urging a more aggressive foreign policy than that of the peace-loving Count Okuma. As the retiring Prime Minister was popularly considered the champion of democratic progress the appointment of Count Terauchi seems to be regarded as a step toward a gradual return to clan government.

A New Premier

In diplomatic circles it is expected that the new Premier's appointment will be followed by a more vigorous attitude on Japan's part toward China. An Associated-Press letter from Tokyo, dated September 12, explained, for the enlightenment of suspicious Americans that in accordance with the treaty signed at Peking in May, 1915:

"Pacific Ascendency" in China

Japan merely desires at this time to consolidate the position and influence she has already obtained in China. Concretely this would take the form of obtaining certain police rights in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia which Japan regards as special Japanese zones of influence. It might also include the right to secure the appointment of Japanese advisers for these districts.

These "police rights," the correspondent hastens to add, "would not involve a change in the status quo in China." They would merely be "a desirable extension of Japanese influence" which "will work for the best interests of China." The Japanese Government, moreover, has "officially assured" the United States that the Mikado's recent alliance with the Czar "in no way affects" China's future. Meanwhile, however, Japan will quietly go on, she asserts, developing her "pacific ascendency in China by affirming her position and sphere of influence in Eastern Inner Mongolia and South Manchuria." With this object in view, General Nobuzumi Aoki, of the Japanese army, has received the post of military adviser to the Chinese Government, and Kinichi Kawakami, a well-known financier, it is reported, will be appointed financial adviser to China. Washington will watch with keen interest, no doubt, what attitude the new Premier will take regarding California's Japanese exclusion law, for he is suspected of favoring a more aggressive stand on that matter also.

Mexico.—The news about Mexico is far from reassuring. Apparently the Commission, sitting at Atlantic City, has made little or no progress, while the internal affairs of the unhappy republic are still in a tangle. Revolution is rife, trade and commerce are all but paralyzed. The following figures, dealing with the output of metal, illustrate one phase of the country's condition. In 1912 the output of silver was 33,000,000 ounces; of gold, 245,000 ounces; of copper, 74,000 tons; of zinc, 46,000 tons; of lead, 68,000 tons. In the first six months of 1916 the output was: Silver, 6,000,000 ounces; gold, 38,000 ounces; copper, 23,000 tons; zinc, 11,000 tons; lead, 3,000 tons. A more general view of conditions can be had from the subjoined extract from a letter written in Mexico City on September 27:

General Conditions

. . . The indolence of the masses is keeping the capital comparatively quiet. In spite of the great misery there are no riots, but hunger is driving the people to theft and robbery. Never has the city been so unsafe. The other day, two street cars were attacked at seven o'clock in the evening. Besides this a young man of my acquaintance was wounded and robbed on a fashionable street at four o'clock in the afternoon. On account of the danger the streets are deserted after nine o'clock at night. There is no police protection; the police are aiding the robbers, who are mostly Carranzista soldiers. Meantime the interior is infested by bandits. Traveling is entirely unsafe. Trains are attacked and people are killed. The Zapatistas are still quite close to Mexico City. In fact, just at present they are threatening to attack the city. However, the newspapers say that Carranza is in a fair way to establish peace and order. The bombastic phrases about the wonderful benefit of this revolution are fairly nauseating. Meantime the financial situation is growing worse. Although the Government guaranteed the peso of the last unifying paper-money issue, at ten cents, American money, its value has already dropped to two and one half cents, American money. Of course, the reason of this is obvious. The financial state of the country is hopeless. There is an entire lack of gold-reserve. As usual the Government accuses the banks and foreign commerce of causing the depreciation and hurls at the people decree after decree, one more arbitrary and foolish than the other. The only effect of this will be to precipitate Carranza's fall. You have heard of course about the difficulty which our two great banks are having. The Government decreed that they should, within sixty days, put their metal-reserve at par with their entire note-issue or be liquidated. This of course was robbery. The banks were not in a position to comply with the decree. The consequence will be that the Government will simply lay hands on the metal-reserve. There is much talk here about the "Joint Commission." There are rumors that the United States wishes to gain time to equip its forces better before entering Mexico. Of course, as I say, this is a mere rumor. Much more might be said along this line, but I refrain. . . .

An earlier letter, written by a German resident in Mexico, says:

I have had no news of you for some time. This is owing to the bad means of communication, for it is six weeks since we have had a mail from the coast. . . . The Felicista movement is making progress. There are actually more than 5,000 men concentrated here, all well armed and equipped. The advance guard has reached the village of Yajalon. The inhabitants of the State receive the Felicistas as saviors and it is only a matter of a few weeks when the whole State of Chiapas will be brought under the new regime. The movement is progressing with much order and prudence. Last week there was an encounter between the Carranzistas and the Felicistas, not far from Ococingo. The Carranzistas were completely routed; sixty killed and the rest were scattered in all directions. It is rumored here that the Carranzista Governor of the State has fled to the Isthmus. It is calculated that not over 800 Carranzistas remain in the State. The "First Chief" has lost out entirely here; the people are tired of him. Nobody will accept his paper money.

From the foregoing letters it would appear that the throne of the First Chief, who sends such imperious messages to his Atlantic City Commissioners, has begun to totter.

A recent book, "The Whole Truth About Mexico," by Francisco Bulnes, one of Mexico's best informed and most representative citizens, contains some interesting statements about the Mexican priesthood. The author denies that priests have been guilty of any unconstitutional acts and declares that their accusers are incensed.

The best proof of the insincerity of the accusers of the Catholic clergy, who intentionally confuse personal with corporation rights, is the fact that many Mexican Protestant ministers have exercised political rights and have violated the Constitution by running for office, and even succeeded in having themselves elected representatives, senators and governors. Señor Nicholas Islas y Bustamente, a lawyer, was a Protestant bishop and advanced his candidacy for the Senate without having renounced his ministerial office. It was only when he was elected that he renounced the episcopacy to take his seat in the Senate. There have been Mexican Protestant ministers who have renounced their ministerial calling to run for the House of Representatives and after the expiration of their first term, having collected their salaries, have gone back to the ministry, when they failed to be reelected to the House. As no proof has even been established that the Mexican Catholic clergy have as a body or corporation ever mixed in politics all charges brought against them, whether true or false are absolutely null.

Thus the truth is gradually leaking out, in spite of the prudent reticence of the daily press.

Rome.—Cardinal Gasparri lately gave an interview to the representative of the Journal, a well-known Parisian newspaper. Rome publishes an account of it, and there seems to be little doubt now as to the substantial accuracy of the report. Asked among other things what he thought of the possibility after the war, of the renewal of diplomatic relations between France and the Holy See, his Eminence replied, according to Rome:

The Gasparri Interview

. . . When peace is restored all the belligerent nations will have a profound need of repose and tranquillity which will hush at least for a certain number of years, many internal questions. France, in particular, after admiring in this war the magnificent conduct of her secular and regular clergy, will desire, I think, no more religious persecutions. Will it happen, for instance, that the religious, who returned to France in answer to the appeal of their country in danger, will be expelled again from French territory after the war? I do not think so. No French government will do that, and France as I know it, chivalrous France, will not permit it. Now religious peace with you will never be complete without a renewal of diplomatic relations with the Holy See. After the war too the points of contact between the civil power in France and the ecclesiastical authority will not only not disappear but will rather continue to increase; and a government truly solicitous for the interests of the French Republic, will be unwilling to sacrifice them to an anti-clericalism that is no longer the fashion. These are, I think, some of the reasons which allow Catholics to hope.

These remarks of the Papal Secretary of State gave rise to many comments in the French press. The Temps and the Radical naturally were not slow to conclude that the Cardinal showed a lack of diplomatic penetration when he exposed so frankly his ideas on the internal religious conditions of France and the possibility of future diplomatic relations with the Holy See. But according to the Corriere d'Italia, quoted by Rome, the socialist Humanité after giving a long resumé of the interview without any hostile criticism and in most respectful terms, went so far as to call the Cardinal "a good diplomat." And the solid and authoritative Journal des Débats expressed in very forcible words its approval of his opinions and affirmed that his viewpoint was the true and correct one. From many and well-informed sources it can be judged that the impression produced by the Cardinal's views has been most favorable among all classes in France. Certain political and Masonic circles, relatively small, must of course be excepted. And Catholics throughout the world, will gladly share the hopes expressed by the Papal Secretary of State.

Spain.—The Prelates of the Ecclesiastical Province of Zaragoza, voicing the general sentiments of the Spanish clergy, have directed to the Cortes an address in which they give a deplorable picture of the present condition of the clergy and demand immediate relief and improvement. The document states that the obligation of maintaining public worship and its ministers, recognized by the eleventh article of the Constitution, may be truly said not to be complied with at the present time. For the number of the clergy who can maintain themselves with the allowance given them by the State and without being obliged to have recourse to the alms of the Faithful, the charity of their families or a private income, is inconsiderable. Even when in 1856, the Concordat with the Holy See was sanctioned, it was well recognized that the endowments assigned in it to the clergy were insufficient, and an increase was respectfully hinted at. Since then the cost of living has gone up enormously and money has decreased in value. While the State has increased the sums allotted to other purposes, it has added nothing to the meager allowances of ecclesiastics. But this is not all. According to the thirty-first article of the Concordat ecclesiastical endowments were not to suffer any discount. But in paying them the State ruthlessly discounts a percentage which in some instances reaches the figure of 14 and even 20 per cent. The list of other grievances is a long and cruel one. "From all which it follows that the clergy, especially in the rural districts, finds itself in a plight as sad as it is shameful for the nation, which officially calling itself Catholic, consents to it."

A Poor but Devoted Clergy

The priests of today, says the document, despite their miserable struggle for existence, will faithfully continue in their posts, working for God and country. The prospects for tomorrow are darker, for tomorrow priests cannot be found. For owing to the conditions described, the number of those who enter the seminaries is every year smaller. It requires an extraordinary vocation to study for the priesthood in the face of such discouragement. The writers of the address remind the Government that if some remedy is not applied, the Faithful will lack all spiritual aid and the village population, held in check up to the present by the preaching of the priest, will quickly add their forces to the enemies of private property and the existing order, now found in such numbers in the large cities. The address concludes by requesting the Cortes to agree to the following improvements, when passing the new budget: Suppression of the discount alluded to in the stipends of the clergy; increase of the endowment of the rural clergy at least by decreeing that in future their stipends shall not fall below $200 a year; and, lastly, the assignment in the estimates of the sum necessary to provide pensions for retired parish priests and other clergy who shall have earned in justice a right to such a provision. The request made in the address is most just.

"This Young Fellow Mitchel"

Paul L. Blakely, S. J.

PERSONALLY, I do not fancy the phrase. It sounds like a fling. But it is not mine. It was chosen by a friend of Mayor Mitchel, Mr. Albert Loring Paine, to head an article in the October issue of a monthly magazine. I do not name the magazine, which is a pretentions affair, because in my judgment it contains articles and illustrations in violation of Section 1140a of the Penal Law.

In my opinion, the article is the explosion of a small-bore gun in an organized, nation-wide attempt to justify the "criticisms" which have been leveled against the private child-caring institutions of New York for the past six months. A somewhat similar paper was contributed to the September number of a thoroughly reputable magazine, the World's Work, by Mr. Burton J. Hendrick. Mr. Hendrick labors to prove that a strained situation arose when Mr. Mitchel's "passion for honesty and intelligent transaction of public business" clashed with the passion of the average private institution for filth, ignorance, and general incompetency. Insisting that religious considerations did not prompt any action of the city administration, he is at pains to emphasize, through paragraph and illustration, Mr. Mitchel's devotion to the Catholic Church. The inference, that the Catholic institutions were so shockingly bad, that even a Catholic Mayor was forced to protest, is fairly plain. All this is an old story. Mr. Hendrick is at perfect liberty to state his belief in the substantial accuracy of the charges made against the Protestant and Catholic institutions by the Kingsbury-Doherty investigators. His belief, however, scarcely entitles him to argue from these charges as though they were facts beyond all cavil, much less to write himself down as "an impartial critic." If any defense has been made of the institutions, Mr. Hendrick has, apparently, never heard of it. For him the case is closed, and this "impartial critic" finds that the Mayor has been completely sustained. He has fought the good fight, and the crown is his.

Surely, Mr. Mitchel is perfectly within his rights in seeking this justification, should he think, as he may not, that he stands in need of it. But that the halo of sanctity, merited by a "brave defense of helpless children in private institutions," should be placed about the brow of New York's Mayor, is quite another matter. This raising to the altars lends a certain sanction to the legend, that Mayor Mitchel is the valiant St. George who slew the fell institutional dragon, drunk with the blood of dependent children. No one can, or does, object to any truth urged either by Mr. Arthur Loring Paine, or by any one else who believes that in this "controversy," Mayor Mitchel has borne himself as a knight sans peur et sans reproche. But all of us who are interested, not in getting the upper hand but in getting at the truth, are equally within our rights, in demanding that the basis of the defense be fact and not romance.

Mr. Paine stands up for his friend like a man; but he lacks the critical faculty necessary to the historian. He is too easily satisfied; he does not subject his documents, if indeed he has any, to dispassionate analysis. Thus, for instance, he relates that "recently," which I take to mean within the last six months, the Mayor came into sharp conflict with "certain organizations as to whether needy children in public institutions were being properly cared for." Mr. Paine does not seem to grasp the distinction between "public" and "private" institutions. It is said that Mr. Mitchel, since he became Mayor, once visited a home for children conducted by the city; but the "recent controversy" raged exclusively around the private institutions. While showing, perhaps, his worth as a panegyrist, this serious error at the outset also indicates Mr. Paine's ability as an historian. This indication is strengthened by the following romantic paragraph:

> As soon as the question [that children in institutions were mistreated] was presented to him, he took a boat, eighteen or twenty secretaries, and six or seven stenographers, and visited the public institutions in which children were being cared for. . . . His personal investigation—that is to say, his own eyes—showed him that the children were not clean and were not well-clothed. His ears quickly told him that the children were no better than half fed.

I have already noted Mr. Paine's confusion of "public" with "private" institutions; I may here remark his excellent eye for the color and pomp of pageant. He pictures the Mayor, embarking like another Lohengrin in the Swan Boat, to visit, perchance, St. Joseph's Home in the heart of Manhattan, or the Dominican Convent in the Nyack Hills. With him is a gorgeous retinue of more secretaries than Suarez could dictate to, or Napoleon; but the number of stenographers seems, in proportion, meager. More important, perhaps, is the fact that this boat on perilous voyage bent, bore up under the weight of not a single investigator.

It would be bootless to follow the navigators, for, so far as the Catholic institutions are concerned, Mr. Paine has only given us a drab brother to "The Hunting of the Snark." The log book seems to have vanished. The date is "recently," but the course remains unknown. However, the Reverend James J. Higgins, D.D., Supervisor of Catholic Charities in the Diocese of Brooklyn, informs me that this trusty vessel touched at no institution along the shores of Brooklyn. Its path sinks yet deeper into the misty unknown, when similar testimony is borne by the Reverend William A. Courtney and the Reverend Samuel A. Ludlow, General Supervisors of Charities in the Diocese of New York. In fact, it would be somewhat difficult for a "boat," of the nature described by Mr. Paine, to drop anchor off any New York Catholic institution, without the circumstance becoming, as it were, publici juris. Had this alleged investigation with eighteen or twenty secretaries and six or seven stenographers been made, the authorities of the institutions surely would have heard of it. But, iconoclasts as they are, they aver that this "boat" investigation story is a legend.

Mr. Paine is even more unhappy in describing the present status of the "controversy." After the inevitable reference to the Mayor's "coreligionists," he announces that "the Mayor won at every point of attack." True, no one knows precisely what Mr. Mitchel has, or has not attacked. But if facts of legal record are of any value, it may be mentioned that the Doherty-Mitchel charges of libel and conspiracy against Mgr. Dunn and Father Farrell were dismissed by Judge Greenbaum. A few more victories of this sort and the Mayor's harness will be undone. "Offensively," continues Mr. Paine, "he fought alone." He did; very much alone. In point of fact, he never "called on the Governor to use his powers to discover who was at fault," as Mr. Paine seems to think. The call was issued by Acting Mayor McAneny, and it was for an investigation of the State Board of Charities, not of the private institutions. Finally, Mayor Mitchel was so much alone in the offensive, that he did not even sign the complaints in his famous "conspiracy" case. That was done by a Second Deputy Commissioner of Charities. But Mr. Paine's final paragraph is a masterpiece:

> Defensively, he was supported by a host of men and organizations, not on account of their knowledge of the issues involved. . . .

Some of the men who supported Mayor Mitchel are Messrs. E. A. Moree, Homer Folks, John A. Kingsbury, and William H. Hotchkiss. Among the organizations, one may discern the Committee of One Hundred, the Committee of Twenty-Nine, a committee of ladies, whose number I have forgotten, the Survey, and the shrinking form of the Evening Post. Does Mr. Paine wish to intimate that none of these men, not one of these ladies, no organization, and not even the Evening Post, had any "knowledge of the issues involved"? It is a bold statement. Perhaps it is true, but I am glad that I did not make it myself.

> . . . but on account of their absolute belief in the Mayor's ability to see things clearly, and in his courage to do things fearlessly.

It does take courage, I admit, to try to float on Madison Avenue's asphalt, or to climb the Nyack Hills in a "boat," but I do not see why I should be asked to praise a man who attempts these feats. I am inclined to think that he needs attention from the medical man. At any rate, we can thank Mr. Paine for a very picturesque legend, worthy of inclusion in some Wagnerian cycle. I hope, however, that his next excursion into the pleasing realms of fancy will be recorded in a magazine, which does not seem to suggest that Section 1140a of the Penal Law is rusting for want of needed application.

Reflections on Fanatics

G. M. Godden.

THE human mind, as psychology reveals it to us, is a strange and wonderful organism. Thoughts, often wild and curiously disconnected, sometimes almost supernaturally clear and coherent in the rare inspiration of genius, flit through it from the dim and vast sub-consciousness that lies beyond the threshold of all conceivable being, uplifting saint and poet to the Divine on the wings of imagination, but driving the unimaginative materialist, if he cannot break free from them, into the frenzied fancies of heretical fanaticism. For the basis of all heresies and the motive power of all fanaticisms is a mental obsession; the mind by long dwelling upon an isolated truth, gradually over-emphasizes its importance and loses sight of its proper relation to the whole body of Catholic doctrine. Heresies in many cases, as G. K. Chesterton has suggested, are often lonely virtues gone mad from solitude. Frequently this religious obsession is associated with a morbid spiritual vanity that amounts to moral perversion.

It was Sunday evening and a grey fog hung over the city, saturating everything with its moisture and obscuring, as with a thick veil, the familiar landmarks. Groping my way through a network of narrow streets, I reached an open square, a favorite haunt of loafers out-of-work and itinerant evangelists. I paused for a moment, uncertain of my direction, when, from somewhere in the center, came the sound of a man's voice, the voice of a raucous Boanerges, whose tongue of triple brass was denouncing the terrors of hell upon all and sundry who should refuse to accept the message of this self-appointed prophet. Guided by the hubbub—for there were frequent interruptions—I crossed over and joined the outskirts of a small crowd surrounding the central arc-lamp which dimly illumined the upturned faces and the wet asphalt beyond. The preacher, a short, dark man, with a heavy moustache and a mass of tangled brown hair, the grime of many days upon his collar, and a tattered Bible in his hand, was gesticulating wildly, amid the scarcely concealed mirth of the bystanders, as he thundered impartially against society and Socialism, Catholic and Presbyterian, in short, against everyone except a few like-minded fanatics whose election to salvation had apparently set them above the moral standard exacted of publicans and sinners.

A tirade against Catholicism, containing few facts but much slander, provoked one of the crowd to retaliate, and a duel of words ensued, the preacher, heated and abusive, aspersing his opponent's morals and consigning him to the bottomless pit; his opponent, cool and argumentative, pray forgive the conceit—it was none other than myself—stolidly indifferent to the other's personalities, and cynically enquiring whether they might be taken as fair samples of the charity of the "Christianity" which the man preached.

Disgusted finally with the altercation, I was about to pass on, when physical exhaustion compelled the preacher to stop, and my attention was drawn to his comrade, who now took up his parable and prayed. A tall, gaunt man, with iron-grey hair, wearing a threadbare overcoat that may once have been black but had become a curious nondescript shade of green, on his head a round felt hat, much battered, and in his eyes the far-away glint that betokens a visionary, a vision in himself that reminded me for some reason of a picture I had once seen of Cromwell's "Fifth Monarchy Men." In marked contrast to his predecessor, he spoke throughout in a quiet, even tone; volcanic fire and energy had given place to a glacierlike coldness; yet here, too, there was no attempt at argument, but crass ignorance and unqualified denunciation: for these men rely blindly on the fantastic promptings of a disordered subconsciousness and believe their emotions direct inspirations from God. They alone are the elect of God; the rest of us are marked with the sign of the Beast. A distinguished scientist, a prominent theologian, and a Socialist leader are all linked together in a Trinity of Evil, representing "No Bible, No Blood, and No God." And the unemployed were exhorted to pray for work and then —sit down and wait patiently till it comes to their very doors!

I recognized the man. I had heard and seen him before, and had his career from a friendly publican on the corner. He was a carpenter by trade, he preferred to loaf around the square babbling of the mysteries that are beyond the ken of him and all his kind, while his poor, suffering wife toiled all day as a charwoman, and his children lacked bread to eat. She had tried remonstrances; she had begged him to stick to his trade; she had told him that a man's wife and children should be his first care; but she had only been beaten for her pains. One night, when she had broken down and cried, he had clutched her by the throat and threatened to choke her if ever she interfered with him again. Since then she had not dared expostulate with her lazy and irascible lord and master lest he should keep his threat.

This was the man who expounded the Scriptures in the square, and exhorted sinners to wash themselves in the Blood of the Lamb and be clean! It is the old Antinomian heresy; an exclusive obsession of the doctrine of justification by faith—the elect can do no wrong. Like a noxious weed, this error takes root and flourishes in the congenial soil of Puritanism to bring forth its fruit in due season, hypocrisy and uncleanness and all manner of corruption. But it is to these that the Apostle applied the proverb: "For the dog is turned to his vomit again; and the sow that was washed, to her wallowing in the mire."

The preacher had finished, and the little crowd of men, like the prodigal son with "the husks that the swine did eat," were slowly swallowed up in the fog. As I turned away there arose before my eyes a vision of my country after Luther's own heart, a country of "simple Bible teaching," where every child was left to interpret the Divine mysteries according to the darkness of his own ignorance, and false prophets thundered at every street corner, blind leaders of the blind into the ditch of heresy and schism; where "the saints" multiplied and sinned exceedingly, and the gospel of hypocrisy and ugliness brooded over the land. Then faint and low came the rise and fall of a chant from a church hard by, as the choir sang the Clamavi in toto corde meo. I stood beneath the chancel window and listened; the Psalm had struck a sympathetic chord; it words were strangely in harmony with my mood. For they sang the concord of words and deeds, of faith and works, which makes the lives of those who have it a veritable symphony of celestial music, bringing to all who hearken to its strains the greatest of God's gifts—His peace.

When Does Human Life End?

Austin O'Malley, M. D.

In recording a death we commonly say the person died at just a certain number of minutes before or after some hour, but there is no method known to science which determines exactly the moment when the soul leaves the body. It is extremely probable that no one dies at the exact moment of apparent death; the heart may beat a half-hour after all palpable pulse beat has ceased. Daily throughout the world the priest reaches a person who has just died, the heart and lungs are still, and everyone thinks there is no chance to administer the Sacraments; nevertheless the man may be alive. The probability that we do not die just as soon as consciousness, respiration, and palpable pulsation of the blood cease, is so strong that all moralists now maintain the last Sacraments should be given conditionally up to at least an hour after apparent death.

In the hospital of the Rockefeller Institute at New York, Dr. G. Canby Robinson, in 1912, made records from eight patients before and during the actual stopping of the heart, using the electrocardiograph which can be employed without the patient's knowledge. He thus found, only in one case, however, that the heart continued to beat for half an hour after all vascular and circulatory sounds could be heard. Dr. Crile's experiments upon dogs show that it is possible to resuscitate these animals after they have been apparently dead for periods of time up to seven and a half minutes. The cessation of the blood circulation causes degeneration in the nerve cells and fibers and these lesions may last even if the animal has been resuscitated. Crile thinks the human respiratory center may survive anemia, from 30 to 50 minutes; the cardiac centers, from 20 to 30 minutes; the spinal cord, from 8 to 10 minutes; the portion of the brain used in conscious activity, from 6 to 7 minutes. The higher neurons, important parts of the nervous system, have been stimulated into reflex activity 25 minutes after complete clinical cessation of cardiac activity.

In experiments on rabbits poisoned by chloroform and apparently dead, Gunn and Martin found [Journal of Pharmacology and Experimental Therapeutics, July, 1915] that they could resuscitate 70 per cent of the animals if treatment was begun within 10 minutes after the heart ceased beating. They started artificial respiration through a tube in the trachea, then injected epinephrin into the pericardium, and afterwards massaged the heart through an opening in the abdomen. The rhythm of compression of the heart in this massage is about half that of the normal beat, and at short intervals the massage is interrupted to allow the spontaneous beats to develop. There are various methods of heart massage but that through an opening in the thorax is the most efficient. Epinephrin is to be used as an adjuvant to the massage and the artificial respiration.

In "Essays in Pastoral Medicine" I mentioned several cases of resuscitation after what had appeared to be certain death. Two of these people had been "dead" 45 minutes before they were revived temporarily. Dr. W. Wayne Babcock ["Proceedings of the American Therapeutic Society," 1912] reported a number of other cases. One was a resuscitation which began 25 minutes after respiration had ended, and which lasted for 43 hours before real death. The patient was a negress poisoned by scopolamine. A man whose arm had been avulsed "died" from shock. After 15 minutes of artificial respiration the circulation started again, and he was kept alive for 6 hours in this manner, but he died as soon as the artificial respiration was discontinued. Another man in a similar condition was kept alive for 7 hours. One of Babcock's cases was that of a woman 87 years of age who "died" on the operating table. After 10 minutes of cardiac and respiratory cessation she was revived. She died 4 days later of peritonitis. A man 56 years of age "died" on the operating table, that is, his heart and lungs quit work. He was resuscitated and completely cured. An infant born apparently dead may be resuscitated after a delay much longer than would be possible in an older person provided always the infant had not begun to breathe. In such attempts to resuscitate the maintenance of the blood-circulation is the chief aim. If, however, the blood is not oxygenated the circulation will not go on automatically. When the heart has stopped in diastole, that is when distended with blood, this distention must be relieved by cardiac massage, sometimes through an opening in the thoracic wall.

Old writers speak of cessation of the pulse for long periods, but these cases are evidently cataleptic. Ferreres ["La Muerta Real y Aparente"], to whom is due the credit of drawing the attention of moralists to the necessity of giving the Last Sacraments to persons apparently dead, gives several examples of suspended animation which are cataleptic. St. Augustine tells of a priest named Rutilutus who had the power of suspending his heart action at will so that no pulsation could be felt; Caillé [New Orleans Medical and Surgical Journal, xvi] reported a like case; and Cheyne tells of a Colonel Townsend who could apparently die whenever he pleased. His longest suspension of the pulse lasted for 30 minutes.

The fakirs of India carry this power to great lengths. Braid ["Treatise on Human Hibernation," 1850] on the authority of a Sir Claude Wade, says a fakir was buried unconscious at Lahore in 1837 and the grave was guarded day and night by sentinels from an English regiment. Six weeks after the burial the man was dug up and he presented all the appearance of a corpse. The legs and arms were shrunken and stiff, and the head reclined on the shoulder as happens in corpses. There was no perceptible circulation anywhere, yet he was revived. Honigberer, a German physician in the service of Runjeet Singh, described ["Medical Times and Gazette." London, 1870, vol. i] a case where a fakir of Punjaub was put into a sealed vault for 40 days, and the seal of Runjeet Singh was placed on the coffin. Grain was sown above the vault and it was well above the ground when the man was taken out of the vault and resuscitated. Honigberer says the chin of this fakir was shaved before the burial, and the beard did not grow while he was in the vault.

In keeping with these stories are many curious accounts of recovery after hanging. These are frequent in writings of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries when hanging was almost an every-day occurrence. Such narratives are more authentic than the anecdotes told of recovery after premature burial, which are as old as humanity. The stock story in these premature burial cases is that of the woman who is revived by a thief who cuts her finger in an effort to steal the rings buried with her. Zacchias ["Quaestiones Medico-Legales". 1701] tells of a young man who "died" of a plague, and was set out with the corpses for burial. He revived and was taken back to the pest house. He "died" again and was again prepared for the grave, but he came to a second time. His vitality was almost feline in its persistency. Very embarrassing legal and social complications must have been caused by his refusal to remain dead.

The important fact, however, is that in any case of death the exact moment in which the soul leaves the body is not knowable, and where there is question of giving the Sacraments the person apparently dead should have the benefit of the doubt. He is to receive conditional Baptism, Absolution or Extreme Unction, if these Sacraments are required. The human respiratory system can survive anemia for 30 to 50 minutes. How long after the hour a priest may administer the Sacraments is not known, but a second hour, or even a third are not unreasonable intervals of time during which the Sacraments may be administered conditionally. The Sacraments are for man, and there is no irreverence if they are administered conditionally.

Is the Law of the Jungle to Prevail?

Joseph Husslein, S. J.

TYPICAL of our times are the three great economic conflicts which have rapidly followed one another in the past weeks: the threatened national strike of the railway Brotherhoods, the New York carmen's strike with its menace of a general sympathetic walk-out, and lastly the struggle between the Dairymen's League and the milk distributors of the same city. While serious enough in itself, each of these gigantic movements was only a suggestion of what may at any moment come to pass in any of our cities or over all the country, unless due provision is made for the protection of the rights and lives of our citizens.

Referring to New York alone, we find this metropolis, with its 5,500,000 inhabitants, three times threatened with famine during the brief period of a few weeks. Infant life was to be hazarded and hardship and suffering imposed upon millions of unoffending citizens should the chances of victory dictate such a course for one of the contending parties in the great economic struggles.

The first event to which allusion has just been made is the averted national strike of the four great Brotherhoods, which was to have blocked the very veins and arteries through which our healthy national life courses. Yet it was not a strike of labor in general, or even of the majority of the railway employees, but only of the best-paid section of the workers. Not the slightest interest was shown at any stage of the controversy in the fate of the inferior workmen whose wages were perhaps but one-third of the pay received by the trainmen. The former were merely identified with the public, so far as the intended strike was concerned, and would finally help in making good the deficit resulting to the company. Such was the nature of this menaced national strike, aside from the specific economic demands with which we are not concerned.

A particularly interesting feature was the fact that capital, placed in a serious predicament, was anxious for arbitration. Accession to this demand on the part of labor would instantly have removed the sword hanging over the head of the nation. The universal cessation of commerce and transportation, such as the strike threatened, might readily have had as its consequence the death of hundreds of infants and would certainly have entailed inconvenience or positive suffering to a hundred million people. But the trainmen, who controlled the situation, refused to arbitrate.

Writing with the best interests of the laboring man at heart, it is impossible to find any justification, from a Christian point of view, for this attitude of the Brotherhoods. There was no proportion between the suffering they were willing to impose upon the nation and the advantage that a refusal to arbitrate their claims fairly could have brought them.

The argument advanced by the trainmen's advocates is perfectly familiar. They assert that arbitration always favors capitalism, at least unconsciously. The force of this argument was completely negatived by what immediately happened in the carmen's strike which followed.

In this strike it was organized labor which had been taken at a disadvantage. Individual contracts were being prepared for the men with the evident intention of striking a deadly blow at the existing trade unions. The trade unionists themselves were not to blame in seeking to avert what, from their point of view, was the supreme disaster, namely, unionization by their employers. But they were too few in number to achieve success, then too their case was not entirely clear and they were not prepared for action. Their strike was lost on the morning it began. The tables were now turned, and organized labor pleaded for the principle of arbitration which had been indignantly rejected in the trainmen's threatened strike. But capital, which had then sought refuge in this means of a fair settlement, now found itself in possession of the field and could see no reason for arbitration in the entire dispute. The Public Service Commission, which offered its aid, was of a different opinion; but capital was relentless. The case was not arbitrable from its point of view, since arbitration would have been an injustice to the many thousands of men who had signed the individual contract. Such was the argument. There was at least one merit in this: the principle of arbitration was not flatly rejected, but was simply said to have no application in the present instance. The strike was declared practically non-existent.

The service in Manhattan was soon almost normal, but in the Bronx the public was exposed to no slight inconvenience. Cars were given into the hands of irresponsible men who followed any route that promised the best returns, since the receipts were divided between motorman and conductor. These men determined for themselves the law of the game. Thus, in particular instances, change was refused to passengers, a second payment was demanded by the banditti, passengers were kept waiting while the amiable pair divided the earnings or consulted about ejecting their patrons and reversing the route of the car. But the strike was not arbitrable, and the public must "grin and bear it."

The climax was reached when, in view of the evident failure of the car strike, the labor organizers determined upon a general sympathetic strike. This was to have called out 800,000 men in an attempt to paralyze all the industries of the city, to starve the 5,500,000 inhabitants, and thus afford a lesson to the car owners that the strike was indeed an arbitrable problem. Unionism itself was said to be at stake. Such, however, was hardly the case, as the unions made plain by using their good judgment and leaving unheeded the call of the organizers and agitators.

Labor showed its discretion, but the State and the municipal government found themselves utterly helpless to coerce either capital or labor in order to save the city.

Much as the striking carmen arouse our sympathy, there is no consideration to be shown for organizers who use language such as that attributed to one of these leaders, in reference to the intended general sympathetic strike: "Let the public starve; it will do them good." This shows a callous disregard for those whose interests can never be ruthlessly set aside. It recalls a similar remark accredited to a foremost American financier, who briefly assigned the public to a warm place in the nether world. There is little choice between radical capital and radical labor, except that the former is likely to be the more dangerous of the two evils.

But no less characteristic of our times than the two events already described is the farmers' strike, if we may so call it, which followed before interest in the carmen's efforts had entirely subsided. The patience of citizens was to be still more severely tried and they were again to be made the playball between two contending parties, the Dairymen's League and the large distributing companies of New York City. A penny more for each quart of milk was the demand of the farmers, who claimed that the distributors received more than their share of the cost of milk to the consumer.

A milk famine now threatened the city. The normal supply required for its population is 2,400,000 quarts. This was to be cut off at one blow by the League until its demands were granted. Immense quantities of milk, on their way to the creameries, were intercepted and poured out on the road. Battles ensued to prevent shipments. The farmers were willing to supply "raw" milk to the city directly, but this was not permitted by the health authorities because of the danger of typhoid and other diseases. The pasteurizing plants, however, were all in the hands of the great distributors. To prevent danger to infant life and to the sick, the farmers were willing to supply the milk free for these purposes, provided the city itself would pasteurize it. There was in these concessions some regard at least for the welfare of the public that deserves credit. The distributors likewise sought to provide for hospitals, institutions, and families with children before all other customers. This kindly act was no less in their favor. Yet it was not long before a real famine threatened which might well have endangered the lives of children and of the sick. However, in this stress the Mayor, after futile efforts at conciliation, threw up his hands with the exclamation: "I'm through. I can do nothing more!" Is a large municipality then reduced to such a stage of helplessness?

From the very beginning of the strike grocers and small dealers received only sparing supplies of milk, or none at all. Seeking for a pot of milk in the stores of Manhattan at any time after half-past seven in the morning, was said to be like hunting for the proverbial pot of gold at the rainbow's end. But the contestants were left to fight out their quarrel at the public expense. The deadlock was finally broken when twelve of the smaller dealers signed the terms laid down by the Dairymen's League. The principle of arbitration now likewise received a belated recognition in the appointment of a committee to decide an important point still at issue.

The farmers' complaints were justified in so far as higher wages for labor, higher prices for supplies, and the introduction of modern equipments had greatly increased their expenses. The statement of one of their number, that with very great care he could make about three per cent. on his business, may be accepted as correct. The spokesman of one of the largest of the four great milk-distributing companies immediately declared that the public would have to pay the difference if the dairymen's demands were complied with.

Without inquiring farther into the ability of this firm to pay the difference and still realize a fair return, or making reflections upon any party, the principle must be briefly laid down that it is the duty of the State to safeguard the common good of its citizens. It may not stand idly by should the public be forced to the wall and ordered to surrender, in modern highway fashion, merely that dividends may be kept at a high-water level.

The special peculiarity of this strike was that it did not represent a struggle between capital and labor, but between large capital and small, between the middle-class farmer and the great distributor who was said to absorb the profits. In his possession was the necessary machinery without which the milk could not be admitted to the market. The farmer therefore found himself no less dependent upon the big distributing company than the laborer upon his employer, who likewise possesses the wealth and machinery. In such circumstances it is the duty of the State to secure for both labor and the farmer

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

OCTOBER 14, 1916

VOLUME FIFTEEN

1916

From April 15 to October 7, 1916, Inclusive

Section Two

NEW YORK

THE AMERICA PRESS

INDEX

VOLUME XV—APRIL 15 TO OCTOBER 7, 1916, INCLUSIVE

PAGE

Acknowledgment, A Brave (Ed.), Religious Education 428
Advertisers, The Veracious (Ed.) 63
"Agenics" 249
All's Well 589
Anne, St., A Candle to 563
"Anti-Americans," Native Born (Ed.) 404
Anti-Catholicism, Data on, 369; The Philosophy of 346
Apologetics in Fiction Form (Ed.) 212
"As Those Who Won't See" 614
Attendance at Church (Ed.) 355

Baptists' Queen of Whistlers, The (Ed.) .. 38
Barclay Street, The Genesis of 420
Beam and the Mote, The (Ed.) 40
Belloc, Hilaire: A Little Appreciation 11
Bible Society, The American Centenary (Ed.) 136
Birth-Control, Concerning 418
Body and Mind: Some Contrasts 252
Bored, Enter the 590
Boys of Our City: Cincinnati, 7; Boston, 54; St. Louis, 128; San Francisco 251
Boys, Our (Ed.) 331
Boy Problem, A Solution for the 321
Brindle, Bishop Robert 315
Business Man, A Catholic (Ed.), (Patrick T. Walsh) 16

Caliban by the Yellow Sands, Shakespeare Masque 184
Carránza, Mr. (Ed.) 210
Casement's Execution (Ed.) 426
Cathedrals to Pray In (Ed.) 499
Catholic, A "Practical" (Ed.), 187; Landmarks of Cincinnati, 207; Hospital Conference (Ed.), 86; History, A Crisis in (Ed.), 260; Lawyers and Reading, 275; Physicians and Reading, 397; The End Seat (Ed.), 112; Week and Federation Convention, 490; Trade Unionists Surrender, Will? (Ed.) 547
Charity of a Catholic Monarch, The 255
Censorship, Do We Need a? (Ed.) 597
Centenary, A Great Sodality's 155
Chancellor and the Dublin Weaver, The 466
Character and Temperament 469
Charities Investigation, 77; Inspiration of the, 101; The Hearings, 125; The Testimony, 149; Bishop Burgess and the Investigators (Ed.), 159; A Mayor, a Church, a Conspiracy, 173; An Oliver Twist School, 179; (Ed.), 282; A Dominican Convent, A School for Drudges, 225; Pigs, Pans, Children (Ed.), 354; Leaks, Dangerous (Ed.), 355; How to Malign an Institution, 386; Some Notable Facts (Ed.), 402; Mr. Kingsbury's Child Placing Bureau, 409; New York Immortals, 40; Mayor Mitchel's "Conspiracy" Collapses 565
Child Labor Bill, The (Ed.) 452
Children, Base Use of (Charities Investigation, Ed.) 380
Chicago, The Gay Rule in (Ed.) 308
Children and Dangers (Ed.) 260
"Christianity," Modern 112
Church, Music, A Venture in, 129; Terms, Old Irish 576
Churches Closed in Summer (Ed.) 379
City Brides (Ed.) 187
Civil Engineering, The Young Man and 348
Cleverness, The Cult of 465
Commandments Shortened, The (Ed.) 547
Criminology, The New (Ed) 111
"Cur" of the North, The (Ed., Mexico) .. 405
"Cold Light" (Ed.) 356
College Indictment, A 274
Colleges, The Following (Ed.) 594
Coloe, Private, S. J. (Ed.) 476
Colors, Call to the 302
Concession, A, Indeed (Church and Sensationalism, Ed.) 426 Conference Evenings, People's (Ed.) 595
Contrast, A Study in 301

Damien, Father, Latest Champion of (Ed.) . 306
Davises, The Eye of the (Ed.) 236
Daylight Life, More 613
Decadence in America 561
Decency, Adventures in 493
Defense, The Line of (Militarv Training) .. 394
Devil and His Friends, The (Ed. Charities Investigation) 354
Devout, The Audibly (Ed,) 135

PAGE

Divorce, The Battle Against 178
Duffy, Charles Gavan, Centenary of 5
Duties to Things (Ed.) 111
Duty, Our (Ed.), (Foreign Missions) 450
Dogs and Disease 395
Don't 441
Drama League of America, The 32
Drink Traffic in England 519

Easter Laughter 54
Editor, The Cruelly Slandered (Ed.) .. 88
Electrical Engineering, The Young Man and. 447
English Labor Market, The War and the 612
Episcopalianism from Within 351
Episcopalian, What Is an (Ed.) 451
"Epistolegraphameleia" 403

Faith, A Lay Apostle of the 59
Faith or Tooth-Brushes (Panama Congress), (Ed.) 110
Fair Play (Indian Schools), (Ed.) 158
Fair Play (Ed. Anti-Catholic Legislation) .. 452
Father's Eye, For a 548
Federation, Catholic (Ed.), 474; Catholic Week 490
Flag, The Burned (Ed.) 211
Fear as an Immoral Issue 541
Fordham University, Diamond Jubilee, 205; School of Sociology (Ed.) 548
France Is Not Mad (Ed. Expatriating War Orphans) 14
French Prisoners of War, The 304
French Wounded Soldiers, Among the 231

Galileo Again (Ed.) 595
Glorious Fourth, The, in a Convent ... 324
Godliness and Persecution (Ed.) 403
Good Friday for Peace (Ed.) 14
Gospel at Atlantic City, The (Ed.) 186
Government by Rebellion (Ed.) 187
Graduate, The Sweet Girl 278
Great is Diana of the Ephesians (Efficiency Fad) 181
Greenbaum Decision, Notes on the (Ed.) ... 594
"Grinds," The Fate of (Ed.) 523

Haeckel as a Consoler (Ed.) 571
Hagiology and Spoon River (Ed.) 572
Hard, It's Too (Ed.) 160
Harpies and Their Traffic (Ed.) 474
Heaven, The Geography of 445
Herbermann, Charles George (Ed.) 498
"History Fabulous" (South America Slanders. Ed.) 86
Humor, Wit and Comedy 513

Individuality, Cultivating Their (Ed.) 618
Ignorance or Malice? (Ed.) 620
Infantile Paralysis 370
Ireland, May Days in (Ed.) 158
Irish Priests and Their Flocks 107-130
Irish Children, Appeal for (Ed.) 330
Immorality, Never "Beautiful" (Ed.) 499
Indian, The American (Ed.) 15
Infantile Paralysis (Ed.) 330
Infectious Diseases, Artificial Immunity Against 153
Investigators and Persecutors (Ed. Good Shepherd Convents) 134

Jews, The Popes and the 227
Journal, The New York, on Hell (Ed.) . 234
Just Seven! (Ed. America Birthday) 14
Justice, Modern (Ed.) 307

Labor and the Flag (Ed.), 39; Market, The War and the, 562; Revolt (Ed.) .. 571
Landmarks, Catholic, of St. Louis, 83; Pittsburgh, 279; New Orleans 400
Language, Our Misleading (Ed.) 307
Latin, Saying My Prayers in 277
Laws, Man Made (Ed.) 87
Large Families in France, Movement for ... 585
Las Casas, B. de 374
Lawlessness and the Courts (Ed.) 258
Leaks, Stopping the 489-514
Lecture Tour, My Last (Socialists) 371
Letters, American Men of (Ed.) 256
Life, Simplicity of 81
Light Eater's Self-Righteousness, The (Ed.) . 211
Little Things and Health 203
Log-Cabin of Hodgenville, The (Ed.) 546
Logopathy (Ed.) 186
Long-Sighted, The Vice of Being 468
Loot, This Way for (Mexico) 152
Luther, From, to Marx 610

PAGE

Magazines, Infected (Ed.) 188
Manuscripts and Printed Books, An Exhibition of 566
Marriage by Proxy (Ed.) 307
Mass, Sunday and Infantile Paralysis (Ed.). 475
Messenger's Golden Jubilee (Ed.) 40
Mexican Commission, The (Ed.) 499
Mexico, A Voice from (Ed.) 619
Mining Engineering, The Young Man and .. 587
Missionary Association, The Catholic Women's (Ed.) 524
"Modern School," Dr. Flexner's (Ed.) 15
Monsters and the Middle Ages 230
Motherhood, A School for (Ed.) 474
Murphy, Dr. John B. (Ed.) 452-470
Mysticism and a Wooden Post 300

Nature or Nurture? (Ed.) 356
New York, Godless (Ed.), 64; Saving (Ed.), 427; "Near-Thought" in (Ed.) .. 570
Novel Reading, A Plea for 126
Nuns, Newspapers and Restaurants 282

Obscenity Laws (Ed.) 428
Outlook, The, and the Dunphy Case (Ed.) 259
Optimism, In Defense of (Ed.) 110

Paganizing the Child in New York 393
Paschal Message, The 29
"Patent Insides" 254
Patriotism, Comparative (Ed.) 570
Paths, Tangled (Ed.) 87
Panama Commisions, Findings of the (Ed.) . 188
Peace and the Sword (Ed.) 134
Peasant Women of France, The 543
"Personal, Practical Work" (Ed.), (Film Censorship) 62
Philippine Bill and New York Post (Ed.) .. 135
Plutocrats, The Song of the (Ed.) 331
Poor, Understanding the 322
Pope, The, and American Jews 25
Popes and Peace, The 53-80-103
Prayer, A Comprehensive (Ed.) 284
Preach, Shall Women? (Ed.) 522
Preparedness and the Scriptures 204
Press Association, The Catholic (Ed.), 499; The Freedom of the (Ed.) 282
Progress, The Truth About, 373; and Decadence 537
Public Schools, Saving the (Ed.) 380
Purity, The Guardian of (Ed.) 378

Quixote, If Don, Came Back! 491

Railway Problem, The 517
Ratan Devi: An Impression 58
Reformation, Buying a (Movie Censorship), (Ed.) 159
Religion, On Modern 495
Religious Tests for Office Holders (Ed.) 331
Republican Government in Georgia (Ed.) ... 572
Roman Holiday, A (Modern Degeneracy) .. 10

"Sacred Fund," Our (Ed.) 259
Safe, Who is? (Ed.) 522
Safety First? (Ed.) 63
Salt, The Neglect of 424
Seas, Sweeping the 417
Sermon, His Most Eloquent (Ed.) 39
Schoener, Father G. A. (Rose Culture) 105
Science Autocratic 443
Shakespeare, Age and Stage of 8; Religion. 31
Sholem Aleichem (Ed.) 159
"Silly Season," Indications of the (Ed.) ... 356
Slime from the Dragon, The 398
Sobriety by Conviction (Ed.) 498
Social Service, A New School of (Ed.) 619
Social, Warfare, Catholic Young Men in the (Ed.), 596; Notes, A Novelty in 524
Socialists, Irish-American 540
Soldier, The (Ed.) 282
Soldiers' Letters, Our 496
Soul, The, and the Solar Plexus (Ed.) 597
Souls, Hunting, on the Border (Ed.) 619
Souls, Their, Shall Meet 517
Spanish Elections, The 156
Speak Up! (Ed) 618
"Spectric Poet," Enter the (Ed.) 235
Spiritist, Open Letter to a 325
Spring and the Story of God 79
Stage and the Clergy, The (Ed.) 546
Stained Glass, A Triumph in 277
Standard, The Wrong (Ed.) 451

PAGE

Strike, The New York and the Oppressed (Ed.) ... 450
Strikes and Lockouts, An Era of (Ed.), 210; The Morality of, 422; Some Reflections on ... 538
Suicides and the Cult of Minerva (Ed.) ... 235
Sun, The New York (Ed.) ... 330
"Superstition Ridden Barracks" (Ed.) ... 306

TEXAS Lynching, The (Ed.) ... 160
Theology, The New ... 586
Thomas, St., and the Chicago Tribune (Ed.) ... 62
Thought, The Thrift of ... 34
Treason, Preaching (Ed.) ... 403
Turk and the Armenian, The (Ed.) ... 211
Twilight Musings (Ed.) ... 523
Twist, The Witness of Oliver ... 273
Type, Far Beyond the (Holy Eucharist) (Ed.) 234

UNCLE Sam Sighs (Unpreparedness) ... 326
Unity Conference, The (Ed.) ... 86
"Unionizing" Authorship (Ed.) ... 258
Unity of the Human Race, The ... 350

VACATIONS ... 299
Villa, Lind and the Mexican Church (Ed.) ... 378
Vivisection, Human (Ed.) ... 38

WAR, The Growing Toll of (Ed.) ... 475
War, Two Years of the (Ed.) ... 381
Ward, Wilfrid Philip: Victorian ... 35
Waters, The Toll of the (Ed.) ... 427
Wedding Ring, The Silver, 105; The Iron ... 442
Winona's Enterprising Catholics (Ed.) ... 284
"Wire-Tappers," The ... 609
Working Conditions and Accidents (Ed.) ... 136
Woman Suffrage and Allied Problems ... 297
Wonder Grows, The (Ed.) ... 235

YOUNG Man, The, and Fruit-Growing, 30; Chemistry, 151; Mechanical Engineering, 229; Civil Engineering, 348; Mining Engineering ... 587
Yourself, Feeling Sorry for (Ed.) ... 64
Youth, Suggestions in ... 54

AUTHORS

Abernathy, Julian W.: English Literature ... 504
Antony, C. M.: Saint Catherine of Siena ... 286
Anstey, F.: In Brief Authority ... 456
Ashley, R. L.: Medieval History ... 116
Bacon, Charles W.: The American Plan of Government ... 156
Badé, William Fred: The Old Testament in the Light of Today ... 91
Baker, J. H.: American University Progress ... 479
Barker, Elsa: The Songs of a Vagrom Angel 432
Barraud, C. W.: Meditations on the Mysteries of Our Holy Faith ... 139
Barrett, E. Boyd: Strength of Will ... 42
Bates, S. C.: The Geranium Lady ... 335
Battifol, Louis: The Century of the Renaissance in France ... 526
Baxter, W. S.: Seventeen ... 67
Beard, Dan: The American Boy's Book of Bugs, Butterflies and Beetles ... 381
Beegle, M. P.: Community Drama and Pageantry ... 406
Beresford, J. D.: Dickie ... 432
Bevir, Grace E.: A French Mother in War Time ... 624
Blackwood, A.: Julius le Vallon ... 600
Blanche, Sister: Idyls and Sketches ... 239
Bonger, William A.: Criminality and Modern Economic Conditions ... 622
Bossaert, M.: Short Sermons on Gospel Texts ... 503
Boucard, L.: The Chief Catholic Devotions ... 407
Bowers, Claude C.: The Irish Orators ... 213
Bowman, Isaiah: South America, a Geography Reader ... 430
Bradford, Gamaliel: Union Portraits ... 239
Brewer, John M.: Oral English ... 192
Brooks, A. M.: Dante: How to Know Him ... 358
Brown, Alice: The Prisoner ... 431
Bruce, H. A.; The Riddle of Personality ... 263
Bruno, J. F.: Rosmini's Contribution to Ethical Philosophy ... 479
Burgess, Gelett: The Romance of the Commonplace ... 239
Burnett, T. J.: The Essentials of Teaching ... 624
Burr, A. J.: Life and Living ... 574
Burroughs, John: Under the Apple Trees ... 287
Butler, Samuel: The Way of All Flesh ... 263
Cadman, S. Parker: The Three Religious Leaders of Oxford and their Movements: Wycliffe, Wesley, Newman ... 622
Calippe, Charles: La Guerre en Picardie ... 431
Cannon, Gilbert: Three Sons and a Mother 432
Cannon, Mary Agnes: The Education of Women During the Renaissance ... 573
Carpenter, J. E.: Phases of Early Christianity ... 478
Carroll, Rev. Edmund: Sermon Plans on the Sunday Epistles ... 116
Castle, A. and E.: A Little House in War-Time ... 600
Chapman, F. M.: The Travels of Birds ... 456
Chapman, Chas. E.: The Founding of Spanish California ... 502
Chase, Beatrice: Gorse Blossoms and Dartmoor ... 574
Child, R. W.: Potential Russia ... 576
Cianain, Tadh G. O.: The Flight of the Earls 310
Clarke, Isabel C.: Only Anne ... 90
Cobb, Irvin S.: Old Judge Priest ... 262
Coghlan, Philip: The Passion and Death of Jesus ... 116
Corwin, Edward: French Policy and American Alliance ... 550
Cox, Eleanor R.: Singing Fires of Erin ... 66
Crane, Dr. Frank: Common Sense, Adventures In ... 191
Crespigny, Capt. Charles de: Where the Path Breaks ... 19
Cropsey, Adelaide: Verse ... 139
Curtis, Felicia: A More Excellent Way ... 432
Dell, Ethel M.: Bars of Iron ... 90
Dewey, John: Democracy and Education ... 599
Ditchfield, P. H.: The Cathedrals of Great Britain ... 359
Drake, Maurice: The Ocean Sleuth ... 19
Drive, Augustus: The Sodality of Our Lady 384
Duffy, F. G. D.: Yonder? ... 264
Dumas, R. P.: Introduction à l'Union intime avec Dieu ... 624
Duncan, Frances: Roberta of Roseberry Gardens ... 140
Dunham, E. M.: How to Know Mosses ... 335
Durand, André: The Life of Pére Joyard ... 215
Dwight, H. G.: Stamboul Nights ... 19
Dwight, H. O.: The Centennial History of the American Bible Society ... 180
Eckenrode, H. J.; The Revolution in Virginia 43
Ellerker, M. St. S.: Master, Where Dwellest Thou? ... 360
Emerson, Walter: The Latchstring ... 311
Fillion, L. C.: The New Psalter of the Roman Breviary ... 44
Fitzgerald, T. A.; A Good Third ... 360
Fletcher, J. Butler: Dante ... 238
Fletcher, Margaret: Christian Feminism ... 190
Franck, Harry A.: Tramping Through Mexico, Guatemala and Honduras ... 623
Freeman, F. L.: God's Golden Gifts ... 455
Forbes, Madame: The Life of St. Paul ... 215
Foster, John: The Bright Eyes of Danger ... 335
Foulke, D.: Lyrics of War and Peace ... 407
Gaell, Réné: Priests in the Firing Line ... 527
Gardner, E. G.: (Ed.) The Book of St Bernard on the Love of God ... 382
Garraghan, G. J.: (Ed.) Prose Types in Newman ... 502
Garrold, R. P.: The Onion Peelers ... 139
Gautt, H. L.: Industrial Leadership ... 478
Gibson, Wilfrid Wilson: Battle and Other Poems ... 192
Girardy, Rev. Ferreol, C.SS.R.: The Mother of My Lord ... 116
Gladden, Washington: A Book for Graduates ... 192
Graham, S.: Through Russian Central Asia ... 179
Gray, Maxwell: The World Mender ... 431
Griffith, A.: Meagher of the Sword ... 311
Guenther, Louis: Investments and Speculation 43
Guinet, Jeanne le: Letters from France ... 600
Hagar, George J.: Plain Facts About Mexico 502
Hall, James A.: Kitchener's Mob ... 191
Hall, Jennie: Our Ancestors in Europe ... 623
Hamilton, Captain Ernest: The First Seven Divisions ... 214
Harbin, R. W.: Paradoxical Pain ... 264
Hazlitt, Henry: Thinking as a Science ... 311
Heft, Louis: Holders of Railroad Notes and Bonds ... 116
Helps, E. A.: Songs and Ballads from Over the Seas ... 623
Hickey, J. S.: Summula Philosophiae Scholasticae ... 238
Hielscher, H. H.: Songs of the Son of Isai ... 18
Hind, C. L.: The Soldier Boy ... 287
Hirsch-Davies, J. E. de: Catholicism in Medieval Wales ... 116
Hough, Emerson: The Magnificent Adventure 575
Howe, Sonia E.: A Thousand Years of Russian History ... 191
Howells, W. D.: The Daughter of the Storage 240
Johnson, R. A.: Poems of War and Peace ... 407
Jones, Rev. Edward: (Ed.) The Beauty and Truth of the Catholic Church ... 91
Jusserand, J. J.: With Americans of Past and Present Days ... 334
Kittredge, G. L.: Shakespeare ... 264
Klein, Henry H.: Bankrupting a Great City 116
Koren, John: Alcohol and Society ... 383
Kunz, George F.: The Magic of Jewels and Charms ... 239
Laun, F.: The Chief Points of Difference between the Catholic and Protestant Creeds. 67
Lapp, John A.: Learning to Earn ... 110
Leecock, Stephen: Essays and Literary Studies ... 130
Lee, G. S.: We ... 240
Leete, F. Deland: The Church in the City ... 191
Leslie, Shane: The End of the Chapter ... 115
Levering, J. H.: Historic Indiana ... 430
Lindsay, Vachel: Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty ... 92
Locke, W. J.: Viviette ... 140
Lucy, Sir Henry: Nearing Jordan ... 600
MacBrayne, L. E.: One More Chance ... 501
MacDonald, Mina: Some Experiences in Hungary ... 576
Mackaye, Percy: Caliban by the Yellow Sands ... 115
Macpherson, S.: The Musical Education of the Child ... 430
Madden, R. R.: United Irishmen, Their Lives and Times ... 406
Madelin, Louis: The French Revolution ... 599
Maguire, Edward: Is Schism Lawful? ... 18
Manners, J. Hartley: Wreckage ... 91
Mallet, Christian: Impressions and Experiences of a French Trooper ... 214
Margaret Duchess of Newcastle, The Life of the First Duke of Newcastle and other writings ... 190
Martin, Mr. and Mrs. John: Feminism: Its Fallacies and Follies ... 190
Marvin, Eleanor: Mary Allen ... 19
Masters, Edgar Lee: Songs and Satires ... 139
Maurel, André: A Month in Rome ... 359
McCabe, Joseph: Crises in the History of the Papacy ... 42-108
McFaul, Rt. Rev. James A.: Pastoral Letters, Addresses and Other Writings ... 66
McFee, William: Casuals of the Sea ... 502
McGill, Patrick: The Red Horizon ... 92
McGlinchey, Joseph F.: A Catechism on Catholic Foreign Missions ... 624
McKay, Helen: London, One November ... 139
McMullan, J. A.: A Retreat for Women in Business ... 503
McNabb, Vincent: The Wayside ... 429
McSorley, J.: Italian Confessions: How to Hear Them ... 432
Mendel, L. B.: Changes in the Food Supply 478
Mereness, N. D. (Ed.): Travels in the American Colonies ... 214
Meyer, Arnold Oskar: England and the Catholic Church under Elizabeth ... 114
Millard, Thomas F.: Our Eastern Question ... 623
Moeslein, Mark: Mechanism of Discourses ... 19
Monroe, A. S.: Happy Valley ... 384
Moore, George: The Brook Kerith ... 550
Morgan, I. H.: German Atrocities ... 214
Mulholland, Rosa: O'Loughlin of Clare ... 431
Murphy, Joseph A.: An Unknown Master ... 240
Neill, A. S.: A Dominie's Log ... 455
Neilson, F.: How Diplomats Make War ... 264
Olcott, Charles S.: The Life of Wm. McKinley ... 238
O'Brien, E. J.: The Best Short Stories of 1915 ... 140
O'Brien, Seumas: Duty and Other Irish Comedies ... 622
O'Connor, John: Of the Chivalry of Christ ... 624
Osborne, Thomas Mott: Society and Prisons 501
O'Shaughnessy, Mrs. N.: A Diplomat's Wife in Mexico ... 237
Oxenham, John: My Lady of the Moore ... 116
Pallen, Condé B.: The Education of Boys ... 66
Pègues, Thomas: Saint Thomas d'Aquin et la Guerre ... 504
Pennell, E. R.: Nights ... 42
Phelps, W. L.: Browning, How to Know Him 502
Philipps, W. A.: Poland ... 383
Plummer, Charles: Devotions from Ancient and Mediaeval Sources ... 192
Potter, M. K.: Ten Beautiful Years ... 456
Quiller-Couch, Sir Arthur: On the Art of Writing ... 163
Radin, Max: The Jews among the Greeks and Romans ... 92
Rahilly, Alfred: A Guide to Social Students and Workers ... 600
Rannie, David W.: The Elements of Style ... 310
Reeve, Arthur B.: The Social Gangster ... 575
Repplier, Agnes: Counter-Currents ... 138
Rhinehart, M. R.: Through Glacier Park, 335; Tish ... 502
Richards, Laura E.: Julia Ward Howe 1819-1910 ... 90
Robert, A.: Histoire de la Philosophie, 138; Leçons de Logique; de Morale; de Psychologie, et de Theodicée ... 138
Robinson, A. Van Dyke: Commercial Geography ... 430
Rolland, Romain: Michelangelo ... 89
Roosevelt, Theodore: A Booklover's Holidays in the Open ... 90
Ross, Estelle: Oliver Cromwell ... 139
Rousseau, Henry: William Joseph Chaminars 162
Ruhl, Arthur: Antwerp to Gallipoli ... 67
Ryan, John A.: Family Limitation ... 600
Schäfers, Johannes: Abriss der Ländlichen Wohlfahrtspflage ... 140
Schultz, James Willard: Blackfeet Tales of Glacier National Park ... 216
Scroggs, W. O.: Filibusters and Financiers. 286
Sharp, Dallas Lore: Hills of Hingham ... 93
Shirrill, C. H.: Modernizing the Monroe Doctrine ... 68
Sihler, E. G.: M. Tullius Cicero of Arpinum 455
Simonds, J. H.: They Shall Not Pass ... 214
Slater, John R.: Freshmen Rhetoric ... 288
Slattery, C. L.: The Gift of Immortality ... 480
Smith, Joseph: Paul Mary Packenham, Passionist ... 263
Smith, Lewis W.: The Mechanism of English Style ... 310
Smith, R. W.: Benighted Mexico ... 454

PAGE

Spearman, Frank H.: Nan of Music Mountain 43
Stacpoole, H. D.: The Gold Trail..... 384
Staniforth, Edith: Our Home in Heaven.... 92
Stecher, W. A.: Games and Dances..... 456
Stehle, Aurelius: Manual of Episcopal Ceremonies 19
Stephens, Kate: The Mastering of Mexico.. 20
Symons, Arthur: Studies in Seven Arts.... 162
Thompson, A. L.: Catechism of Patriotism.. 502
Thorndike, Ashley H.: Shakespeare's Theater 114
Thornton, M. F.: When Pan Pipes..... 264
Thurean-Dangin, Paul: The English Catholic Revival in the 19th Century..... 162
Thurston, H.: The Memory of Our Dead... 262
Tighe, Francis O'Sullivan: The Portion of a Champion 43
Tissier, Mgr.: Pour la Victoire..... 431
Tixeront, J.: History of Dogmas..... 18
Tomlinson, E. T.: Scouting with Kit Carson. 287
Velimirovic, Nicholas: Serbia in Light and Darkness 576
Wallis, H. Parker: American Banking..... 43
Ward, Mrs. Humphrey: A Great Success.... 163
Warfield, W.: The Gate of Asia..... 431
Washburn, Stanley: Victory in Defeat..... 240
Watts, Mary: The Rudder..... 92
Webster, Nesta H.: The Chevalier de Boufflers 600
Wedewer, Herman: A Short History of the Catholic Church..... 574
Wells, H. G.: What is Coming?..... 264
Wells, P. W.: The Martyr's Return..... 312
Welman, Walter: The German Republic.... 312
Wemyss, Mrs. George: Jaunty in Charge... 216
West, Julius: G. K. Chesterton..... 262
Wheeler, D.: Abraham Lincoln..... 502
Whitman, Stephen: Children of Hope..... 163
Williams, J. H.: The New Pelagianism.... 18
Williamson, C. N. and A. M.: The Lightning Conductor Discovers America..... 239
Wilson, Woodrow: On Being Human..... 164
Winchester, C. T.: William Wordsworth; How to Know Him..... 92
Wright, C H. C.: A History of the Third French Republic..... 383
Wright, F. A.: The House on the Hill..... 574
Wright, H. B.: When a Man's a Man..... 503
Wright, H. F.: Francisci de Victoria de Jure Belli Relectio..... 456
Yeats, W. B.: Reveries over Childhood and Youth 263
Young, G. P.: East and West Through Fifteen Centuries 431

EDUCATION

"Biology" in the Secular School..... 409
Boy and the Boarding School, The..... 21
Catholic, The Educational Convention, 313; Parents, A Word to, 336; The Apologetic 433
Cliff Haven..... 241
College, Going to, 133, 141..... 165
De La Salle and Popular Education..... 289
Julianne and the Valedictory..... 577
Kindergarten, The 117
Law School, The Catholic..... 553
Little Ones, Scandalizing the..... 457
Medical School, The Catholic..... 529
Naturalistic Aptitudes..... 504
Parochial School, The, a National Bulwark, 481; and the Conscience of the Child, 601; The Winona Plan for..... 625
School-Picking 385
Secular Education, Dangers of..... 45
Secular Universities, Dangers of..... 69
Times, A Thought for Our..... 217
Vacation Time 265
Vaudeville against Intellect..... 361

ECONOMICS

Democratic State, Could a, Endure?..... 482
Economic Socialism, What is?..... 217
Farmer, Giving the, a Chance..... 458

LITERATURE

Apologetics Old and New..... 525
Benson, Robert Hugh..... 137
Brownson, Orestes A..... 549
Catholic Authors in Training Schools..... 93
Cervantes 17
Chesterton, Gilbert, K., Poetry of..... 189
Children, Poetry for..... 64
Father Prout 113
Francis de Sales, St..... 405
Francis Thompson..... 285
Goldsmith, The Genius of Oliver..... 500
Guiding the Stream..... 309
Hotel Piazza, On the..... 428
Irish Insurrectionary Poets, The..... 219
John Ruskin..... 333
Johnson, Lionel..... 65
Man of the Mask, The..... 41
March Phillips, The Works of..... 598
Mother Juliana's "Sixteen Revelations"... 236
PAGE

Norris, Kathleen..... 573
O'Donnell, Rev. Charles L., Poems of..... 381
Perilous Light, The..... 476
"Risus Filiorum Dei"..... 261
Silvio Pellico 161
Stars, the Fragrant..... 89
Traherne, Felicitous..... 453
Yeats, Mr., and the Cosmic Moth..... 357

COMMUNICATIONS

"Androcles and the Lion," 85; and "Marie Odile" 132
Apathy and Indifference..... 617
Badé's, Dr. Book.....133-157-209-329-592
Barclay Street, The Genesis of, 568; Publishers 593
Biology in the Schools..... 473
Blame, Who is to?..... 544
"Blest" or "Blessed".....449-473-521-569-593
Body and Mind..... 305
Books, First American..... 329
Boulanger, Who was Father?..... 257
Boy Scout Movement, The..... 185
Canvasser, A Forceful..... 617
Catholic, Work of Art, A, 85; School Agencies Needed..... 568
Catholics in Protestant Schools, 157; and Public Libraries, 133; in Prisons..... 133
Censors, National Board of..... 13
Censorship for Movies..... 109
Central-American Women, Minister-Slanderer 521
Chaplain, A Chance for a Volunteer..... 449
"Character and Temperament"..... 544
Child, The Dependent, 280; Labor Bill..... 520
Christian Brothers, A Tribute to the..... 448
Custom, A Good Old..... 131
Colors, A Call to the..... 185
Conditions among the Afflicted Syrians..... 305
Consumers' League Garments..... 133
Convent-School Training..... 592
Correspondent, Not the..... 448
Damien, Father, Leprosy, 108; Latest Champion of..... 425
Defense, A Legion of.....157-233-329
Devout, The Audibly.....544-569
"Don't" 521
Ecclesiastical Titles, Correct....12-61-85-133-157
English Undefiled, Where Is Today's Well of? 545
Episcopalian, What is an?.....472-617
Error, An, Corrected..... 281
Errors, Occasional..... 401
Expediency of Principle..... 209
Fray Junipero's Habit..... 281
Grammar, Rules of..... 13
Grave, The Story of a Neglected..... 233
German Grammar..... 61
High Schools, Public..... 449
Hoboken and "Devout" Catholics..... 545
Infantile Paralysis, and Catholic Institutions 376
Liturgy, The, 449; Our School's and..... 376
Madonna, The Morgan (Mistaken Titles)... 109
Magazines for a Poor Mission..... 545
Marking Time, Stop..... 401
Marriages, Mixed..... 60
Mass, Indistinct Celebrants of..... 353
Myth, Another, 37; Another Historical..... 281
National Greatness..... 132
"Near-Thought" in New York..... 593
Neutral Flag, The Ever..... 256
New Orleans, Catholic Landmarks of..... 473
New York Car Strike, The..... 616
New York's Latin Quarter..... 591
Open Shop, The..... 592
Ordinance, A Mythical..... 280
Osler Child, The..... 376
Patrick St., The First Church of..... 133
Physicians, Catholic, and Reading..... 497
Proselyting Scheme, A..... 60
Priestly Ministrations in France..... 305
Pussyfooting 280
Shakespeare, Tencentenary, The..... 61
Shaw on Ireland, 37; Plays..... 233
"Sobriety by Conviction"..... 545
Social Workers, A School for..... 209
Socialist Call, The..... 593
Suggestion, A Good (Leo XIII. Encyclical) 185
Sumner, The Need of Mr. (Indecent Books) 13
Teacher, A Great (P. S. Casserly)..... 425
Theater, The Lure of the..... 401
Thrift and Extravagance..... 109
Vacation Schools..... 281
Vivisection, Human..... 84
War Orphans, French, The.109-256-327-376-425
Washington's Hint to Irate Subscribers.... 569
Waste, Woful (Catholic Hymns)..... 497
West's, Professor, History..... 617
Work, Not Talk, but..... 281

NOTE AND COMMENT

Advertising, Censorship for, 292; and Church Attendance 316
Age, the Superficial..... 532
America, For God and..... 364
Americanism Exaggerated..... 507
PAGE

Ammunition Sent to Mexico..... 316
Amusements, The Regulation of..... 292
Anti-Catholic Animus in Prohibition Party.. 507
Architecture, Ecclesiastical..... 95
Asquith, Mr., and the Pope..... 47
Assassination Justified in Congress..... 120
Bacteria, A Museum of Living..... 507
Bible in the Schools, The..... 460
Bigotry, Over-reaching Itself in Florida.... 244
Binet-Simon Test, The..... 388
Birth Control Popularized..... 119
Birth Rate, Britain's Declining..... 411
Blind, Publications for the..... 48
Browne Rev. H., Educational Tour of..... 72
Catholic, Statistics for 1916, 24; Journals in Catholic Schools, 143; Schools, Discriminating Against, 243; Hospital, Growth of a, 168; Schools, Trophies for, 195; Children, Saving the, in India, 268; Education in Mexico, 339; Missions Help for, 484; Club House, A Model, 579; Piety in American Camps, 508; Charities, National Conference 603
Catholics and the Stage, 387; Worshiping over a Clothing Store..... 95
Capital and Labor, Relations between..... 315
Carmen's Wage Scale..... 483
Caughnawaga's Second Centenary..... 555
Charities, National Conference of Catholic.. 219
"Charity-Trust," Is it Feasible?..... 316
Chesterton on the Rich and Divorce..... 291
Child Fad Suggested, A..... 531
Children and Labor..... 387
"Christian" Filipinos..... 363
Christian Schools a Necessity..... 436
Chivalry, The Passing of..... 579
Church, Running a, Like a Grocery Store, 168; A Natural, 412; Music, Summer Course in..... 167
Citizenship, The Duty-Phase of..... 340
Civil Marriage Law, Panama..... 579
Classical Studies in the U. S..... 267
Clothes, Real Stone..... 267
Colored Missions, the Work of the..... 268
Columbus Cadets, The..... 556
Converts, During 1915, 268; in Boston.... 315
Conscience Fund, The Treasury..... 459
Crown Prince, Casualties of the..... 48
Crime and the Film Drama..... 532
Diet and Cancer 315
Divorce, Growth of..... 48
Dust from Books Dangerous, Is the?..... 120
Ecclesiastical Vaudeville..... 267
Education, à la Carte, 531; Convention, The Catholic, 144; Religious and the "National" Conscience..... 436
Empty Pew Problem, The..... 483
England's School Problem..... 507
Exports for May..... 316
Feminism in the Orient..... 604
Fixed Stars, The Vatican Catalogue of..... 220
Flags on Public Buildings..... 412
Florida Bigot, Rebuke for a..... 292
Financial Theories and the War..... 315
Ford Motor Profits..... 603
Game Preservation..... 340
Georgia Convent Inspection Bill, 556; Legislature and Lynching..... 555
Hahn, Mission Labors of Father..... 507
Harvard's "System" Charles F. Adams on, 24; Athletic Future..... 72
Healthfulness of City and Country, Relative. 144
Height of Buildings, Limiting the..... 531
High Living, The Cost of..... 507
Hill, James J., Admiration for the Church.. 340
Holy Childhood, The Association of the.... 363
Honor System in Penitentiaries, The..... 339
Human Wastage from the Battle Fields, 195; Life and Fireworks, 579; Document, An Interesting 531
India, Salvation for..... 435
Indian Names, The Ancient..... 168
Irish Relief Fund Committee, The..... 219
Immigrant Problem Solved, The..... 219
Jewish View of Catholic Work A..... 555
Killing of Wounded Men..... 507
Knights of Columbus, National Convention, 47; Growth of the..... 579
Kappens, Rev. F., Death of..... 47
Labor Laws, 93; New..... 556
Laundry Workers, Women..... 459
Law-Making Mania, The..... 411
Lesson of '98, The..... 364
Lies and Calumny Masked as Authority.... 340
Literature, Undenominational..... 484
Longevity of Women..... 196
Love Me, Love My Dog..... 143
Loyola University Medical Graduates..... 220
Lynching Record, Our..... 412
Lyons, Mgr. John A., Death of..... 23
Memory, Diurnal Variations in..... 220
Merchant Marine Plans for a..... 72
Methodist View of Labor Unions, a..... 532
Mission Spirit, The Rising..... 72
Molokai, Heroic Work at..... 340
Moral Atmosphere of Theaters, The..... 339
Mosquito Week for New York..... 72
Motion-Picture Industry..... 387
"Movies," The Appeal of the..... 436
Moving-Picture Censorship..... 484
Murphy, Memorial to Dr. John B..... 579

PAGE

Negro Year Book, The ... 579
Newspapers, Statistics Concerning ... 604
Nilan, Bishop and Hartford Diocese ... 119
Nomination by Acclamation ... 291
Nugget, A Valuable ... 291
Official, A Faithful ... 315
Operatic Music in Church ... 95-119
Otis, Mrs. A. B., Death of ... 47
Our Lady Honored by Protestants ... 220
Ozanam Association, T. M. Mulry on the ... 244
Patriotism and the Flag ... 287
Patriotic Citizens, The ... 435
Penalty, A Proper ... 604
Pedagogics, Efficiency of Modern ... 72
Pool-Room Dangers ... 412
Polish War Relief ... 268
Publishing, High Cost of ... 95
Purgatory, Protestant Theologians on ... 144
Printed Page, Where Responsibility for the, Belongs ... 292
Prison Reform, True ... 363
Prohibition and Religion, 144; Cheating Laws ... 460
Protestant Missions in South America ... 244
Red Wine, The Vineyard of ... 506
Religion, Texas Style ... 316
Religious Instruction for Children ... 388
René, Rev. J. B., Death of ... 95
Reserve, A Real Army of ... 339
Retreats for Laymen and Women ... 243
Rural Credit Bill ... 167
Russian Idea of America, A ... 531
School, Savings Bank System, The, 436; Population, 459; England's Problem ... 507
Shakespeare, Not a Moralist, 95; Commemoration at Catholic Colleges ... 120
Sister, A, Writes a Play ... 364
Sister, Catholic, Imprisoned ... 120
Social Unrest, The Root of Our, 460; Problems, Catholic Women and ... 160
Socialist Views of Marriage ... 47
Socialism, Demands of Advanced, 95; Inculcated in Public Schools, 508; and the War ... 388
Sociological Church of Today, The ... 196
Sodalists and the Press ... 388
Soul-Saving, The Business of ... 411
Spalding, Death of Archbishop ... 508
"Star-Spangled Banner," Monument to Author of the ... 219
Strikes and Lockouts ... 387
Sunday Observance in Philadelphia ... 436
Teaching, Aims and Objects of American ... 291
Tenement Children, Mothering the ... 195
Texas, Need of Catholic Schools in ... 24
Theology, The New ... 292
Time Loss in Trade ... 484
Total Abstinence Argument, A ... 579
Trappist Abbey in Kentucky, The ... 196
Trinity Church Year Book ... 364
University Professors, Strictures on ... 484
U. S. Steel and Carnegie Pension Fund ... 167
Vincentian Superior Council, New President of ... 603
Verdi's Requiem, Open Air Production of ... 243
Verdun, At ... 47
Waco Horrors, The ... 435
War, Correspondent Indoor, 95; Cost of World, 95; Debts Stupendous, 143; Financial Strain of the ... 604
Washington, The "Dull" ... 243
Workmen's Compensation ... 531
World-Mission Church for U. S. ... 555
Wheat Crop Prospects ... 339
Yiddish, The Meaning of ... 267
Y. M. C. A. Activities at the Front ... 412
Jewish Charities Campaign ... 627
Li Yuan-Hung, Is He a Catholic? ... 627
Nuisance, Anti League ... 627
Food Cost, Minimum of ... 627
Simplicity, Evangelical ... 628
Strength of Man and Insects, Proportional ... 628
Widows' Pensions ... 628

BOOKS

Abriss der Ländlichen Wohlfahrtspflege ... 140
Adelicia of Louvaine, The Rose of Brabant ... 503
Adventures in Common Sense ... 191
Adventure, The Magnificent ... 574
Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty ... 92
Alcohol and Society ... 383
Algebra, Intermediate ... 528
Alice Devine ... 163
AMERICA in the Classroom ... 551
American Banking ... 43
Americans of Past and Present Days, With ... 334
American Plan of Government, The ... 456
Angel, the Songs of a Vagrom ... 432
Anna, Good Old ... 384
Authority, In Brief ... 456
Antwerp to Gallipoli, From ... 67
Apostle, The ... 310
Apple-Trees, Under the ... 287
Artois, La Guerre en ... 503
Asia, The Gate of ... 431
Augustine's Abbey, The Register of St ... 527
Babette ... 45
Baby, Catechism ... 552

PAGE

Ballads and Lyrics ... 574
Bankrupting a Great City ... 116
Bars of Iron ... 90
Battle and Other Poems ... 192
Beautiful Years, Ten ... 456
Beef, Iron and Wine ... 600
Beggars on Horseback ... 68
Belfry, The ... 45
Bernard, St., The Book of, on the Love of God ... 382
Best Short Stories of 1915, The ... 140
Bible Society, Centennial History of the American ... 480
Bird House Man, The ... 552
Birds, The Travels of ... 456
Bit, Doing Their ... 503
Blackfeet Tales ... 216
Blades, The Curved ... 68
Blaize, David ... 408
Booklover's Holidays in the Open, A ... 90
Boufflers, The Chevalier de ... 600
Boy, The Human, and the War ... 312
Boys, The Education of ... 66
Brant, The Strange Cases of Mason ... 163
Breviary, The New Psalter of the Roman ... 44
Bride, The Fairy ... 44
Bright Eyes of Danger, The ... 335
Brook Kerith, The ... 550
Browning; How to Know Him ... 502
Bugs, Butterflies, and Beetles, The American Boy's Book of ... 384
Bunner, Stories of H. C. ... 262
Business of Being a Friend, The ... 528
Cassidy, Sergeant Michael ... 552
Casuals of the Sea ... 502
Cathedral of Great Britain, The ... 359
Catholic and Protestant Creeds, The Chief Points of Difference Between the ... 67
Catholic Church, The Beauty and Truth of the ... 91
Catholic Life, Essays on ... 480
Catéchisme de la Profession Religieuse ... 503
Catherine of Siena, St ... 286
Catholicism in Medieval Wales ... 116
California, The Founding of Spanish ... 502
Caliban by the Yellow Sands ... 115
Central Asia, Through Russian ... 479
Cicero, M. Tullius, of Arpinum ... 455
Champion, The Portion of a ... 43
Chance, One More ... 501
Chapel ... 216
Chapter, The End of a ... 115
Chesterton, G. K. ... 262
Child, How to Know Your ... 312
Child, The Musical Education of the ... 430
Children of Hope ... 163
Chivalry of Christ, Of the ... 624
Christian Feminism ... 190
Christian Armour for Youth ... 92
Christianity and Infallibility: Both or Neither ... 481
Christianity, Phases of Early ... 478
Chorus, The ... 503
Church, A Short History of the Catholic ... 574
Church in the City, The ... 191
Clarke, Cam ... 45
Coming, The Second ... 68
Commercial Geography ... 430
Commonplace, The Romance of the ... 239
Community Drama and Pageantry ... 406
Confessions, Italian: How to Hear Them ... 432
Conquered, I ... 44
Conquest, The ... 216
Counter-Currents ... 138
Country Sky, Under the ... 164
Criminality and Modern Economic Conditions ... 622
Cross, The Way of the ... 67
Dante ... 238
Dante: How to Know Him ... 358
Davenport ... 408
Daughter of the Storage, The ... 240
Democracy and Education ... 599
Devotions from Ancient and Medieval Sources ... 192
Devotions, The Chief Catholic ... 407
Diplomats Make War, How ... 264
Discourses, Mechanism of ... 19
Dogmas, History of ... 18
Dominie's Log, A ... 455
Duncarron, The Heir of ... 19
Duty and Other Irish Comedies ... 622
Earls, The Flight of the ... 310
East and West through Fifteen Centuries ... 431
Eastern Question, Our ... 623
Eggs and Poultry, A Living from ... 312
Encyclopedia, The New International ... 478
England, For ... 335
England and the Catholic Church under Elizabeth ... 114
English Catholic Revival in the Nineteenth Century, The ... 162
English Grammar Simplified ... 20
Episcopal Ceremonies, Manual of ... 19
Erin, Singing Fires of ... 66
Essays and Literary Studies ... 139
Essentials of Teaching, The ... 624
Ethica ... 575
Ethical Philosophy, Rosmini's Contribution to ... 479
Everyman Militant, a Modern Morality ... 480
Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries ... 183
Family Limitation ... 600

PAGE

Farrar, Geraldine ... 20
Father Bernard's Parish ... 264
Fear, The House of ... 552
Feminism: Its Fallacies and Follies ... 190
Filibusters and Financiers ... 286
First Seven Divisions ... 214
Flesh, The Way of All ... 263
Food Supply, Changes in the ... 478
Foreign Missions, A Catechism on Catholic ... 624
Forest, The Dark ... 216
France, Letters from ... 600
French Mother, A, in War Time ... 624
French Policy and American Alliance ... 550
French Republic, A History of the Third ... 383
French Revolution, The ... 599
Freshman Rhetoric ... 288
Games and Dances ... 456
Geranium Lady, The ... 335
German Atrocities ... 214
German, Because I Am A ... 214
German Culture, Catholicism and the World War ... 454
Germany, Modern, in Relation to the Great War ... 310
German Republic, The ... 312
Gerontius, Cardinal Newman's Dream of ... 43
Gibby of Clamshell Alley ... 68
Glacier Park, Through ... 335
Gold Trail, The ... 384
Golden Gifts, God's ... 455
Golden Glory ... 68
Gorse Blossoms and Dartmoor ... 574
Gospel Texts, Short Sermons on ... 503
Graduates, A Book for ... 192
Grammar, High School Exercises in ... 20
Graymouse Family, The ... 552
Gregorian Poetry ... 19
Grizzly King, The ... 552
Guerre, en Artois, La ... 504
Guerre en Picardie, La ... 431
Halt! Who's There? ... 239
Happy Valley ... 384
Hausfrau Rampant, The ... 551
Heimatgrusse an unsere Krieger ... 140
Hermit and the King, The ... 551
High Tide ... 19
Hingham, Hills of ... 93
Histoire de la Philosophie ... 138
History, Medieval ... 116
Holders of Railroad Bonds and Notes ... 116
Holy Trinity, The Mystery of the, in Oldest Judaism ... 480
Hound of Heaven, The ... 43
House on the Hill, The ... 574
Howe, Julia Ward, 1819-1910 ... 90
Human, On Being ... 164
Hunchback Zia, The Little ... 528
Hungary, Some Experiences in ... 576
Hymnal, Parish ... 92
Idyls and Sketches ... 239
Immortality, The Gift of ... 480
Impressions and Experiences of a French Trooper ... 214
Indiana, Historic ... 430
Industrial Leadership ... 478
Investments and Speculations ... 43
Irish Orators, The ... 213
Irish Regiments, What the, Have Done ... 503
Irish Saints, An Alphabet of ... 552
Irish Songs, Sweet Olde ... 528
Jasper B, The Cruise of the ... 312
Jasper Holt, The Finding of ... 216
Jaunty in Charge ... 216
Jewels and Charms, The Magic of ... 239
Jews among the Greeks and Romans, The ... 92
Joyard, The Life of Père ... 215
Jordan, Nearing ... 600
June ... 551
Khaki, for the King, In ... 407
Kiahlik Iksanana-Aiyimmika i Katikisma ... 359
Kitchen, Come Out of the ... 216
Kitchener's Mob ... 191
Latchstring, The ... 311
Learning to Earn ... 140
Leçons de Logique; de Morale; de Psychologie et de Theodicée ... 138
Life and Living ... 574
Lightning Conductor Discovers America, The ... 239
Lincoln, Abraham ... 502
Literature, English ... 504
London One November ... 139
Louise and Barnavaux ... 312
Lynnekers, These ... 432
Mackinac Island, Names of Places on ... 384
Man, When a Man's a ... 503
Martyr's Return, The ... 312
Mary Allen ... 19
Mary of Mercy of Kéruel, Memoirs of Sister ... 215
Mary Rose of Mifflin ... 68
Master, An Unknown ... 240
Master, Where Dwellest Thou? ... 360
May, Bonnie ... 528
Meagher of the Sword ... 311
Medard, The Pleasant Ways of St ... 550
Medieval History ... 116
Meditations for Every Day in the Year ... 407
Meditations on the Mysteries of Our Holy Faith ... 139
Memory of Our Dead, The ... 262
Memory, The Rational ... 528
Mender, The World ... 431

PAGE

Mexico, A Diplomat's Wife in 237
Mexico, Benighted 454
Mexico, Guatemala and Honduras, Tramping Through 623
Mexico, Plain Facts about 502
Mexico, The Mastering of 20
Michelangelo 89
Mission Field, Heroes of the 503
McKinley, The Life of William 238
My Lady of the Moor 116
My Lady's Dress 310
Monroe Doctrine, Modernizing the 68
Moreno, Garcia 480
Moor, My Lady of the 116
Mother of My Lord, The 116
Mothers, The 310
Mosses, How to Know the 335
Nan of Music Mountain 43
Newcastle, The Life of the First Duke of ... 190
Newman, Prose Type in 502
New Wars for Old 264
Nicolet, John 384
Nights 12
Ocean Sleuth, The 19
Old Judge Priest 262
Old Testament in the Light of Today, The .. 91
Oliver Cromwell 139
O'Loughlin of Clare 431
One More Chance 501
Onion Peelers, The 139
Only Anne 90
Oral English 192
Orbis Catholicus 360
Our Ancestors in Europe 623
Our Home in Heaven 92
Packenham, Paul Mary, C. P. 263
Papacy, Crises in the History of the 42
Paradoxical Pain 264
Passion and Death of Jesus, The 116
Patriotism, Catechism of 502
Pastoral Letters, Addresses and Other Writings 66
Paul, Life of St 215
Pelagianism, The New 18
Perk, The Unspeakable 384
Personality, The Riddle of 263
Phil, My Friend 44
Philosophiæ Scholasticæ Summula 238
Phyllis McPhilemy 108
Poems of the Irish Revolutionary Brotherhood 334
Poland 383
Priests in the Firing Line 527
Prisoner, The 431
Progressive Music Series, The 130
Psalms, Commentary on the 480
Pudding, The Proof of the 163
Purple Land, The 107
Push, The Great 552
Quinneys 11
Records and Studies, Historical 454
Red Horizon, The 92
Religious Leaders of Oxford and Their Movements: Wycliffe, Wesley, Newman, The Three 622
Renaissance in France, The Century of the 526
Retreat for Women in Business, A 503
Retrospect 406
Reveries over Childhood and Youth 233
Roberta of Roseberry Gardens 140
Rome, A Month in 359
Rosechild, The 552
Rudder, The 92
Russia, Potential 576
Russian History, A Thousand Years of 191
Sailor, The 551
Saint, A False 310
Saranac, The Penny Piper of 552
Sea, Casuals of the 502
Serbia in Light and Darkness 576
Sermons, Plain, by Practical Preachers 432
Sermon Plans on the Sunday Epistles 116
Sermons, Short, on Gospel Texts 503
Seventeen 67
Schism, Lawful, Is? 18
Shakspere 264
Shakespearean Studies 215
Shakespeare's Theater 114
Ship, A Tall, and Other Naval Occasions .. 93
Ships in Port 503
Sober Life, Discourses on the 312
Social Gangster, The 575
Social Students and Workers 600
Society and Prisons 501
Sodality of Our Lady, The 384
Soldier Boy, The 287
Songs and Ballads from Over the Seas 623
Songs and Satires 139
Songs of the Son of Isai 18
Sons, Three, and a Mother 432
South America: A Geography Reader 430
Success, A Great 163
Stage Direction for Amateurs, Practical 67
Stamboul Nights 19
Studies in Seven Arts 162
Style, The Elements of 310
Style, The Mechanism of English 310
Tennis for Women 361
They Shall Not Pass 214
Thinking as a Science 311
Third, A Good 360

PAGE

Thomas d'Aquin et la Guerre 504
Thorn, Instead of the 44
Tish 502
Transmigration, A Controversy on 92
Travels in the American Colonies 214
Union intime avec Dieu, Introduction à l' ... 624
Union Portraits 239
United Irishmen, The, Their Lives and Times 406
University Progress, American 479
Vallon, Julius Le 600
Verse, Adelaide Cropsey 139
Verse, A Book of Princeton 288
Victoire, Pour la 451
Victoria de, Francisci, de Jure Belli Relectio 156
Victory in Defeat 240
Virginia, The Revolution in 43
Woman, Behold the 19
Woman's Diary of the War, A 552
Women in Business, A Retreat for 503
Women, The Education of, During the Renaissance 573
Wordsworth, William: How to Know Him .. 92
Wreckage 91
Writing, On the Art of 163
Yonder? 264
Viviette 140
War and Peace, Poems of 407
War and Peace, Lyries of 407
Way, A More Excellent 432
War Time, A Little House in 600
Wayside, The 429
We 240
Wild Animal Ways 287
Will, Strength of 42
William Joseph Chaminade 162
Willow Weaver, The 528
What is Coming? 264
When Pan Pipes 264
Where the Path Breaks 19

SOCIOLOGY

Brownson House: Los Angeles 166
Catholic Social Work: Boston 530
Central Verein and the Pillars of Hercules .. 505
Charity Work, Is it a Sinecure? 194
Criminal Responsibility, The Test of 241
Dorr, Mrs. and the Den 554
Doty, Miss, Writes a Book 626
East Side, On the (New York Settlement Work) 22
Ezechiel, Thirty-Four, Six 578
Fag-Ends of the Charities' Investigation 266
Good Shepherd, The Way of the 142
Guardian Angel Settlement of St. Louis, The 314
In Praise of Folly and Crime 290
Institution, How to Malign an (Charities Investigation) 386
Kingsbury's Child-Placing Bureau 409
Miss Sue Prasia 434
Nuns, With, for Targets 337
Paganizing Charity 117
Place in the World, Her 70
Santa Maria Institute Cincinnati, The 94
Settlement Work in Philadelphia 362
Social Workers, The Training of 46
Sympathetic Strike, Is the, Justifiable? 602

CHRONICLE

Armenia Acute Distress in 605
Austria Hungary: Emperor's Birthday, 462; Peace, Premonitions of, 169; Russian Barbarities 198
China: Japan's New Demands, 534; Money, the Lack of, 367; New Cabinet, 295; Peace, Patching Up a 50
France: Anti-clericalism Rebuked, 98; Anti-clericals and Charitable Works, 170; Army Orphanage, 247; M. Barrès and the Clergy, 414; Casualties of War, 415; Catholic Admirals, The, 319; Catholic Loyalty, 558; Catholic Senator and Deputies, 122; Combes and a Sister of Charity, 198; Depopulation Peril, The, 534; Godless Education, 463; Mass for Members of Paris Bar, Killed, 222; Nativity Prize, A, 199; Patriotic Record of Clergy, 510; President and Cardinal at Paris Requiem Mass, 223; Priests, Slandered, 26; Red Cross Societies, 1; Religious Conditions, 367; Renaudel Bill, Defeat of the, 439; Vote of Confidence in the Government, 271; War Credits, The, 582; War-Cripples, Helping the, 146; War Orphans, Rights of 50
Germany: Chancellor and Peace, 247; Alliance with Austria, 295; Allies' Economic Compact, 391; Anti-American Policy, No, 2; Appeal to Peasant Women, 486; Bavarian Soldiers Recalled, 146; Chancellor a Storm Center, 342; Changes in Ministry, 170; Conquests in War, 390; Delbrueck's Resignation, 122; Deutschland Home Safe, 486; Emperor, The, at Mass, 27; Food Problem, The, 439; Prices, Fall in, 588; German Aims, 2; Rule in Poland, 98; Germany and the U. S., 146; Goltz, Death of Baron von der, 51; Merchant Marine, The, 558; Navy Honored, 199; Peace or the Sword, 223; Peasant Women, An Appeal to, 486; Press Censorship, 463; Prisoners in Russia, 511; Rumano-Servian Treaty, 27; Socialism Divided, 415; Trade and Finance, 319; Von Hindenburg Promoted, 511; War Loan, 535; Chancellor's Speech, 606; Reserve Troops 606
Great Britain: Agriculture in England and Wales, 416; American Sympathy, Alienating, 464; Birth-Rate, 343; Casement's Sentence, 295; Catholic Education, 583; Charitable Funds, Private, 512; Children in Factories, 440; Churchill's Criticisms, 199; Conscription, 27; 74; 99; 122; 146; 171; Educational Reform, 511; Finances, 3; Intemperance, Decrease of, 535; Kitchener's Death, 223; Lloyd George, The Career of, 319; Military Expenditures, 171; A Useless Campaign and the Navy, 368; Taxation Increased, Direct, 147; Vatican, New Minister at the, 463; Whiteside, Archbishop, Letter of, 51; Women Workers, 487; A Catholic Lord Mayor, 606; Cost of the War 607
Holland: Queen Wilhelmina's Throne Speech 583
Home News: Appropriations, 390; Car Strike, The New York, 557; Congress Adjourns, 533; Danish West Indies, 389; 414; 437; Democratic Convention, The, 245; Eight-Hour Railway Bill, 486; Mexican Affair, The, 293; 317; 438; Withdrawal Correspondence, 365; Carranza's Reply, 413; Commission, 485; Villa at Chihuahua, 581; Hughes, Charles E., Nominated for President, 221; States the Issues, 413; Railway Difficulty, The, 486; Strike, 509; Trainmen's Difficulties, 461; Wilson, President, and Carranza, 269; Speech on Mexico, 294; 341; Notified of Nomination 510
Hungary: Friendship for U. S., 583; Rumania's Action, 535; Tisza, Opposition to Premier 558
Ireland: Belfast Conference, The, 271; Bishop O'Dwyer and General Maxwell, 247; Casement's Execution, 416; Crimeless Assizes, 3; Conference, An Irish, 487; Emigration Statistics, 559; Four Courts Inquiry, The, 487; Gaelic Language, Interest in the, 27; Harmony, A Plea for, 512; Home Rule Debate, 391; A Convert to, 536; Infant Mortality and Housing Problems, 584; Irish Party, Statement by the, 199; Irish Conference, An, 487; Lloyd George's Position, 171; Plan, 296; Proposals, 320; Maxwell, General, Charges against, 440; National Feeling, 368; Provisional Government, 344; Repressive Measures, 75; Self-Government Plan, 3; Sinn Fein Revolt, 74; 99; 123; 147; Skeffington, Shooting of F. S., 224; Inquiry into, 487; Irish Nation League 607
Italy: Boselli Cabinet, 248; Campagna, The Wastes of the, 559; Census Figures, 75; Masonic Propaganda 188
Japan: Russo-Japanese Alliance, 320; New Policy 607
Mexico: Attitude Towards Americans, 28; Carranza Note, Estimate of, 200; Lawlessness, 560; Internal Affairs, 392; 608; International Relations, 124; 248; Mexican-American Peace Commission, 389; 559; 608; Nation, A Rotting, 224; Persecution of Clergy, 536; Press and the Church, 248; Religion, Attacks on, 124; Religious Liberty, 3; 76; Villa, Pursuit of, 4; War, Morals, Religion, 52; Yucatan, Conditions in, 101; Persecutions 148
Rome: Catholics and the Cabinet, 392; Centenaries of Pope St. Leo III and Innocent III, 148; Jogues', Father, Cause of Beatification, 512; Pope's Hospital Plans Successful, 172; the Ambassadors of the Pope, 272; and War Prisoners, 296; 584; and the Ladies of Denmark, 320; and the Peace Congress, 464; 536; Vatican Council, Will it be Reopened? 121
Spain: Catholic Noblemen's Association, 52; Press Campaign, 272; Cervantes Institute, 52; High Cost of Living, 52; La Cierva's Politics, 272; Martial Law, 344; Mella and Maura, 172; Merchant Marine, 560; Dato Betrays Maura, 464; Elections, The, 76; Railway, Strike, The, 488; Regionalism and Catalonia, 296; Riots in Madrid, 4; Societies, Catechetical, 344; University, A New 584 War: Allies Gain in Picardy, 510; American Note to Germany, 49; Austrian Offensive in Alps, 145; in Trentino 169; 197; Appam Case, 390; British, Blockade, 318; in Picardy, 294; 582; Blacklist, British, 366; 390; Deutschland, The, 318; French Victories on Meuse, 414; German Note to U. S., 26; 97; 121; Goritz Captured, 438; Greece Yields to Allies, 271; Italy Declares War on Germany, 486; Kut, Surrender of, 73; Lemberg, 366; 390; Russian Offensive, 246; 270; 318; 414; 439; 462; 510; Sea-Fight, 198; Somme, Battle of, 318; 342; 462; Trebizond, Capture of, 49; U. S. Note to Austria, 294; Verdun, 1; 26; 169; 197; Wilhelmina Case 342 the proper conditions and to eliminate so far as possible the causes of such disputes.

Capital and labor, moreover, must be given opportunities of obtaining justice without imperiling the rights and the lives of citizens. Where these opportunities are not accepted and public necessity demands it, legal action must be taken to enforce a settlement of difficulties. Recourse to the barbaric method of throttling and starving the public in order to obtain a private end must be banished forever from civilized and Christian life.

On Losing One's Head

Gilbert K. Chesterton

WHEN I was a little boy I had an imagination, though this has long been washed away out of me by the wordy abstractions of politics and journalism. For imagination, real imagination, is never a vague thing of vistas. Real imagination is always materialistic; for imagination consists of images, generally graven images. There is a mad literalism about imagination; and when I had it I turned everything that any one mentioned into a concrete body and a staring shape. Thus, I would hear grown-up people using ordinary proverbs and figures of speech; pale, worn-out proverbs, battered and colorless figures of speech. But every one of these phrases sprang out for me as fierce and vivid as a motto written in fireworks. For some reason I had a particularly graphic visual concept in the case of nautical metaphors. Thus, when I heard that my uncle on a sea voyage "had got his sea-legs" I pictured the most horrible bodily transformations in my uncle. Had my uncle now got four legs? Or had it been necessary for his two original and, to my eyes, unobjectionable legs to be amputated by the ship's doctor? Did the new legs arrive as a sort of extra luggage; or did they loathesomely grow upon him with an awful unnaturalness of nature? I pictured my uncle's sea-legs as two green and glistening members, covered with scales like fishes, and bearing some resemblance to the two fishy tails with which exuberant Renaissance artists provided Tritons and mermaids. Again when I heard, in some such sea-faring connection, that "the Captain kept his weather eye open," I assumed with faultless infantile logic that he kept the other one quite shut. And in some dreams I pictured the Captain's weather eye as being some separate and eccentric kind of eye, like that of a Cyclops; an eye of blue sky or lightning that opened suddenly in his hat or his coat-tails and blazed through black fantastic tempests; a strange star of the storm.

But there were many cases, even among more terrestrial and commonplace metaphors, where the material metaphor photographed itself on my fancy. One of them was the phrase about a man "losing his heart." A man, considered as a material envelope, seemed so securely done up that how the heart could get out of the body was a problem analogous to that of how the apple could get into the dumpling. Perhaps, I mused, the phrase about a man having his heart in his mouth might throw some light on the somewhat odd method of its accomplishment. But that again was darkened with doubt by the other phrase, which spoke of a man with his heart in his boots; where there was clearly no thoroughfare. From this my childish taste turned with a certain relief to the easier and more popular taste of a man losing his head; which seemed the sort of thing that might happen to anybody. Indeed, by this dream of symbolic decapitation I was much haunted in infancy and am not infrequently inspired and comforted even to this day. Whatever other metaphors may mean, this metaphor of the lost head has some primary and poetic meaning; and I have written many bad poems, bad fairy tales, and bad apologues in my industrious attempt to find it out and declare it. The connection between the animal and intellectual meaning of it became close and even confused. I vaguely thought of Charles I having lost his head equally in both senses; which was not perhaps wholly untrue. When I read of the miracle of St. Denis, who carried his head in his hand, it seemed to me quite a soothing and graceful proceeding. St. Denis did not lose his head; he carried it in his hand so as not to lose it.

And, indeed, this drifting and dancing dream of decapitation, in which saints and kings figured with Gothic fantasticality, had a kind of allegory in the core of it. The separation of body and head is a sort of symbol of that separation of body and soul which is made by all the heresies and the sophistries, which are the nightmares of the mind. The mere materialist is a body that has lost its head; the mere spiritualist is a head that has mislaid its body. Under the same symbol can be found the old distinction between the sinner and the heretic about which theology has uttered many paradoxes, more profitable to study than some modern people fancy. For there is one kind of man who takes off his head and throws it in the gutter, who dethrones and forgets the reason that should be his ruler and witness; and the horrible headless body strides away over cities and sanctuaries, breaking them down and treading them into mire and mud. He is the criminal; but there is another figure equally sinister and strange. This man forgets his body, with all its instinctive honesties and recurrent sanities and laws of God; he leaves his body working in the fields like a slave; and the head goes away to think alone. The head, detached and dehumanized, thinks faster and faster like a clock gone mad; it is never heated by any generous blood, never softened by any healthy fatigue, never checked or warned by any of the terrible tocsins of instinct. The head thinks because it cannot do anything else; because it cannot feel or doubt or know. This man is the heretic; and in this way all the heresies were made. The anarchist goes off his head and the sophist off his body; I will not renew the old dispute about which is the worse amputation; but I should recommend the prudent reader to avoid either.

THE ORATORIO "SANCTUS FRANCISCUS"

H. C. Watts

THE oratorio seems to have been monopolized by the idea that it is something peculiar to the English language, and something peculiar to Protestantism. In modern times this idea was upset to a considerable extent by Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius," and now Signor Ariani has accomplished something that, in a large measure, has helped to restore the oratorio to its proper place in the economy of present-day music. "Sanctus Franciscus," his latest composition, is an oratorio that is at once Catholic in theme and in expression. That is to say, its theme is certain outstanding features in the life of St. Francis of Assisi, expressed through the medium of ecclesiastical Latin: a medium that imparts to the work a warmth and intensity which it would undoubtedly lack were it rendered in English, a language that is very suitable for private devotions and folk-songs.

The title of Signor Ariani's oratorio is somewhat epigrammatic in style: Sanctus Franciscus oratorium ab Adriano Ariani super verba R. P. Sixti Lagorio compositum recurrente quinquagesimo anniversario ab erectione Ecclesiae S. Antonii Patavini in civitate Neo-eboracensi per Patres Franciscales ab Italia. The libretto, which Father Lagorio has chosen from liturgical, Scriptural, and other sources, covers four periods in the life of the Saint. An invitatory and prologue precedes the first part. The prologue itself is an admirable example of medieval hymnology, in accentual sapphics:

In rudi caula, monitu superno,
Nascitur mundo, quia sorte mira
Ferre debebat nova amoris arte
Stigmata Christi. . . .

The first part expresses the fight between the citizens of Perugia and Assisi. Francis Bernardone leads his fellow-townsmen against the Perugians, and he is overcome and thrown in prison. In the second part the historian relates events in the life of St. Francis, and the Voice of Christ calls him to the life of renunciation, while the chorus chants of the founding of the three Orders that sprang from the response of the Saint to the Voice. The third part is largely a mystical conversation between St. Francis and St. Clare, in which a chorus of friars and nuns joins in celebrating the praises of the religious life. The fourth part commemorates the stigmata and death of St. Francis, but strangely enough, does not introduce the "Song of the Sun," which would have contributed a sense of fullness to the libretto and have given the composer an opportunity for some exceptional solo music.

The general impression of Signor Ariani's latest work is singularly involved in the subject and its treatment. It is an interpretation of certain underlying qualities in the life of St. Francis, a revelation of the tragedy of Assisi. For behind all the joyousness of that life there was the great and irrevocable sacrifice of renunciation. It is not the St. Francis of the twentieth-century sentimentalists, but the man who stood at the door of his father's house stripped of everything, even of his very garments, who literally forsook everything for the Gospel's sake. And the composer has produced this effect, not by a meretricious resorting to an ultra-modernistic chromatic tone coloring, but by the skilful blending of both orchestral and choral media as material in the hands of a conscientious creative artist.

A second characteristic of this oratorio is the composer's skill with massed effects, whether it be in a vivid yet conservative weaving of tone-color into the texture of the orchestration, or the sublimely builded erection of chorus work, which, rising like wave upon wave, sweeps on to some climax that is more than the effect of musical device, it is an artistically chosen vestment for the words which it both clothes and adorns. It is in this respect that Signor Ariani approaches most closely to the Catholic ideal in sacred music; that is, the union of words and music that makes each the complement of the other. There is little or nothing to suggest that the composer has based his style on the ancient church modes, but there is much to suggest the influence of the purest style of polyphonic music in the oratorio.

"Sanctus Franciscus" opens without any overture or orchestral introduction. In massive volume the combined voices and orchestra begin the chorus:

Regi quae fecit opera Christo confiteantur,
Cuius in sancto vulnera Francisco renovantur.

and both in the words and in the music the motif of the whole work is heard. In the first part of the oratorio the note of war is sounded, followed by the lamentations of the women of Assisi, and the sorrowful chant of Francis as he lies in prison, and it ends with a burst of chorus work on the words Vanitas vanitatum et omnia vanitas.

The artistic skill of the composer is, however, best to be judged by reference to the third part of the oratorio, the soliloquies of St. Francis and St. Clare. Fortunately the libretto has been compiled by a priest, and the score composed by a devout musician; in other hands it could very easily have degenerated into the merest banal sentimentality. The vocal part is preceded by a solemn passage in which the clarinets and other wood wind-instruments weave a spell of soft and filmy texture into a background for the scene which is to be enacted. As the moment grows more intense the strings enter, at first lightly, as a warm glow creeping across a gray sky. Then they gather in power and intensity, an atmosphere of great spiritual emotion is evoked, and when the scene is set the voice of St. Francis is heard crying: "My heart has been taken from me; from the hands of divine love I have received a wound. All things are as nothing to me: farewell riches and luxuries. Love is all in all to me."

The voice of St. Clare is heard singing a canticle of mystical love, and then in a passage of extraordinary beauty, in which the combined use of wood wind and strings is employed as a setting for a libretto that bristles with emotional difficulties, St. Francis sings: Veni de Libano, veni; coronaberis.

Here is a pitfall for the musician. It would have been very easy for the composer to have worked up a sugary part for his instruments, perhaps over-coloring it in the effort to impart a sensuousness to the words. But Signor Ariani exercised the counsel of restraint that is one of the marks of the artist; he has subordinated sentimentality to sentiment, and has produced a combination of music and words that is a perfect interpretation of a mystical truth, a laying bare of the soul of Francis in his spiritual colloquy with St. Clare.

The presentation of the oratorio was all that could be desired, not only in the matter of the principals, but also in the augmented orchestra and the full chorus. It is doubtful whether the work can be given with the same amount of technical perfection outside of a great city, but in the interests of sacred music, and in the interests of creative art generally, it is to be hoped that Signor Ariani may have other opportunities to conduct in person this great work which, by its restrained treatment of a somewhat difficult theme, and by its conservative use of modern methods, is an important contribution to the sum of Catholic church music.

In conducting the oratorio Signor Ariani manifested all an artist's intelligence, temperament and sympathy. At times in the massed effects of the choral parts he seemed slightly to overtax the power of instruments and voice. But with catching enthusiasm, a sincerity and spontaneity of emotion responsive to every mood, he never failed to bring out the wealth, harmony and dramatic values of a finely conceived and truly creative work.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Character and Temperament

To the Editor of America:

In America for September 16, under the above caption, there appeared a letter from Mr. J. D. Russell, which took exception to some remarks made by Dr. Austin O'Malley in an article, with the same title, in America for August 26. Among other things, Mr. Russell says: "The good doctor also states that at the end of the sixteenth century Ireland turned to religion in opposition to the enemy, and because of that opposition, continuous on the part of the Irish, religion has become a habit." It would be a gross injustice to the Irish Celtic race to conclude, that it has ever been, even in the state of paganism, deficient in instinctive reverence and spirituality; and in this connection Mr. Russell either misrepresents or misinterprets Dr. O'Malley's purpose and meaning.

That the persecutions of the Irish under Henry VIII and Elizabeth, the people as a whole being Catholic, intensified their devotion to the Faith, will readily be conceded, but that "at the end of the sixteenth century Ireland turned to religion" is historically false. From the fifth to the sixteenth centuries, temples raised to the worship and glory of God, the ruins of which are to be seen all over the land, proclaimed the undying veneration of the race for God and their keen realization of the life beyond the grave. This is fully attested by the preservation of these temples to the present day. No cairn, or rath or lis is defiled by human exploitation, but remains today as in the days of long-ago, when pagan warriors and worshipers assembled to light the fires of Baal. In this connection the grand "pillar towers of Ireland" should not be forgotten. Though pagan in origin, and probably constructed for worship in pagan rites, they have been used for centuries as temples of the true worship. The Cross has supplanted the worship of Baal.

It may be conceded that the ardent love of the Faith, which is characteristic of Irishmen, received an added incentive to withstand Protestantism in the fact that it was propagated by the foreign invader. A proof of this is to be found in the word Sassanach, which in one term combines the name and the religion of the Saxon. More than twenty years ago, in the Dublin Nation, a controversy was carried on between the editor of the paper, the late A. M. Sullivan, M.P., and Father Tom Burke, the justly celebrated Dominican. The former contended that Irish nationality had preserved the religious spirit of the people, the latter held that it was religion that had preserved the distinctive national spirit. Were this controversy to find a publisher at the present day, it would be very interesting reading.

Oakland, Cal. Thomas F. Marshall.

An Open Letter to a Professor

To the Editor of America:

Would you be so good as to publish in your Communications Department the following open letter to a professor of history? It contains a protest which, it seems to me, will have interest for your readers.

Boston. David Goldstein.

Prof. Henry Kallock Rowe, PhD.,
Associate Professor of History and Sociology,
Newton Theological Seminary, Newton, Mass.

Dear Sir:

Looking through your recent volume "Society, Its Origin and Development," I came across a statement which I question. On page seventy-six you say: " . . . the Catholic Church threw about marriage the veil of sanctity, by making it one of the Seven Sacraments. As a sacrament, wedlock was indissoluble, except as money or influence induced the Church to turn back the key which it alone possessed."

Your statement is of especial interest to me at the present time, as I am at work on an address entitled "From Herod to Carranza: The Attack on the Family." As a consequence I have been investigating the subject rather fully. The more I study the matter, the more do I find the conclusion I arrived at before becoming a Catholic, forced home upon me, namely, that in doctrine and in discipline the Catholic Church is the one institution that has maintained the dignity and the sanctity of marriage with uncompromising firmness against wealthy and influential individuals, against nations great and small, and against those bodies that have sought to divert her from her course. I have failed to discover any data on which the contrary opinion might be based. I shall be greatly obliged if you will favor me with citations which bear out your contention.

Again, in my researches into the Catholic Church's attitude toward matrimony, I have found nothing that warrants your assertion that the Catholic Church made marriage a Sacrament. The Council of Trent and preceding Councils defined the meaning of the sacrament, but did not institute it or make it one of the Seven.

Throughout the ages, I have found the Popes maintaining the same position, namely, that a marriage contract once validly made and consummated is dissolved by death alone. I cannot find in history any sanction for your assertion that money and influence are determining factors in the Catholic Church's decisions on questions of wedlock. The evidence is all the other way. A few instances in point are as follows: Pope Nicholas I and King Lothair; Pope Urban II and Philip I of France; Pope Innocent III, who laid the entire kingdom of France under interdict in order to defend the integrity of the marriage of Ingeburga; St. Peter Damian and Henry IV of Germany; Pope Clement VII and the English Bluebeard, Henry VIII; Pope Pius VII and Napoleon Bonaparte; the same Pope's defense of the marriage of Miss Patterson of Baltimore; and the recent refusal of Popes Pius X and Benedict XV to declare null and void the marriage of Count Boni de Castellane to Anna Gould.

With all due courtesy therefore I submit that a professor of history and sociology, in an institution where theological teachers are trained, cannot in conscience afford to make unwarranted charges against the one institution that has sacrificed much property and the friendship of whole kingdoms, in defense of the Sacrament of matrimony, as instituted by Christ.

I shall await with interest your reply to my request for the authority upon which you claim to base your assertions.

Very truly yours,

Boston. David Goldstein.

M. L. S. and Cardinal Gasquet

To the Editor of America:

Permit me to call attention to an error in a statement which occurs in a letter published in your issue of September 9, and signed M. L. S. The writer asserts "Cardinal Gasquet was selected by the Holy Father to be at the head of the Commission for the new English translation of the Vulgate, not only for his learning in ancient languages, but for his eminent knowledge of his own, the English language." This statement contains an error both of fact and inference. The Commission over which the Cardinal so worthily presides has for sole object the establishment of the authentic text of St. Jerome's Vulgate. There is no question of a new translation of the Vulgate, a matter which in any case would primarily concern the English-speaking Episcopate, not the Holy Father. Probably M. L. S. has confused Cardinal Gasquet's Commission with an unofficial enterprise frequently commended in your columns, the new English translation of the Bible from the originals, now in progress, and styled the "Westminster Version."

London. J. K.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

A Word to Subscribers

WITH this issue AMERICA enters upon its sixteenth volume, full of hope and courage. A little over seven years ago the paper began life, firm set in the determination to spare no effort in the defense and propagation of the lofty principles for which the Church is sponsor.

During all this time the paper has been true to its mission, despite difficulties that often appeared well-nigh insurmountable. And now that the days of doubt and grinding struggle have happily passed, it is but fitting to pay tribute to those whose loyalty has bridged the chasm and made smooth the rough way—AMERICA'S subscribers. These men and women, widely scattered throughout the world, constitute a faithful, enthusiastic host that grows larger each day. To them, good friends that they are, is due the paper's success. Their constant support has been a consolation in trial, their kindly advice, a light in darkness. However, they must not think that their work is done. They have accomplished much but more is expected of them. According to their words they have profited by the paper, they have found delight in it.

But they must not be content with this. There are others in need of profit and pleasure, men and women of education and culture who would also be ardent supporters of AMERICA, did they but know the paper. Lawyers and doctors would profit by its articles on ethics, teachers by its articles on pedagogy, sociologists by its articles on sociology, and so on for many kinds of people interested in Catholic thought.

All these folk could easily be brought into the ranks of interested readers by our subscribers. And we feel sure that those who have been so constant in AMERICA'S support will be active in recruiting new friends for the paper. If by Christmas time each subscriber has added but one name to our roster, we shall begin the New Year, not only in renewed and strengthened courage, but with high hopes of achieving great things for the cause of religion and morality. Here is a work of zeal for our many supporters: we are sure that they can and will accomplish the task of adding 25,000 new names to our subscription list, a small work for a large army, but a work which will be fruitful in blessings both for those who accomplish it and for those for whom it is accomplished. For the rest the Editors pledge themselves anew to their high purpose and confidently commit the career of AMERICA, in its new and more practical form, to the care of those who have watched over it with intelligent solicitude from the beginning—its subscribers.

Again the Censorship

SOME weeks ago a film was shown in private to a gathering of New York's most eminent "uplifters." The scenes depicted were shocking in the extreme. In consequence, vigorous protests were lodged with the municipal authorities by many citizens interested in the repression of public disorder.

It so happens that one of the officers of the offending film company is a Catholic, a man of many and varied business activities. His interest in the company he regarded as a financial investment, but he had no reason to believe that his money would be used in the production of improper pictures. Finding that his confidence had been misplaced, his action was instant and to the point. He demanded that the film be destroyed. The demand was refused. The film was good property, and even if condemned in New York, might be profitably exploited outside the city and State. This Catholic gentleman then announced his intention of bringing the matter to the attention of the police, were any attempt made to show the film. Furthermore, he withdrew from the company, although his action will cost him not less than $20,000.

The highest praise that can be given this gentleman is that he acted like a Catholic. The most obvious comment on the refusal of the producers to condemn a film severely arraigned by scores of reputable citizens, is that we need not only a local, but a national censorship of moving-pictures.

This grossly improper film may yet be publicly exhibited in New York. As in the case of a similar film, finally condemned by Judge Cohalan on September 22, legal suppression can be secured only after a contest in the courts. In the meantime, as the District Attorney remarked on that occasion, the "vice mongers" who produce the film reap a harvest by advertising the legal action against their immoral picture. Furthermore, the latter film is now being shown in other cities. A sane, efficient local censorship would have forbidden it at the point of origin. A national censorship would have prevented its transportation into other States. But, under the present system, the "vice mongers" are able to base an appeal to salacity on the fact that the film was legally suppressed in the metropolis.

"This new traffic" comments the Los Angeles Times, "is not to be induced by crude plays about the gutter. In real life we do not care for dives, and we do not care for the companionship of those who inhabit dives." Perhaps not; but too large a portion of the populace is willing to consort with the scum of humanity in novels, on the stage, and particularly in the moving-picture. Purveyors of public amusement are fully alive to this fact. Money is their goal, not "art" or "education." It is high time that these rapacious harpies, the "white slavers" of the film world, be made to feel that liberty is not license, and that even in a land of near-license the law has power to forbid and punish public violations of decency.

The Irish Relief Fund

IT is a familiar saying, often spoken in jest and lightly, but for all that rooted in truth, that God loves the Irish. His affection is writ large over every page of their history. The chastening that Scripture assures us is the sign of God's favor has been theirs in abundance, and the measure of it has been in accord with their courage, pressed down and overflowing. Their sorrows, which have tinged their national disposition, the most buoyant in the world, with an abiding melancholy and have made their women's eyes, laughing Irish eyes, ever misty with repressed but remembered tears, have been borne for justice's sake, and have had their promised reward. As a race, and in their representative individuals, the Irish have never strayed far from the Kingdom of God. At home the blood of their martyrs has been the seed of a steadfast Christianity; and abroad, for they too have had their diaspora, they have carried out the clear design of Divine Providence and made known to the Gentiles that there is no other God besides him.

Nor have the Irish been able to forget, in their dispersion, the home of their ancestors. They have acquired wealth and prominence and influence in many lands; they have seen their children and their children's children gather round the family hearth; they have enjoyed much of the world's good things; but it is a rare Irish heart that does not often go out in yearning to the green grass, in which alone the shamrock, the symbol of the Triune God, loves to grow; it is a rare Irish heart that does not brood at times with active, munificent sympathy over the poverty and suffering that still overshadow the "old sod."

No shield in all the books of heraldry has a greater right to the device, and no banner in the halls of fame has a greater claim to the motto, Deo et Patriae, than the Irish. It sums up all Irish history. Wherever they have gone the Irish have raised churches and cathedrals to God; and when their country has asked for sacrifice, they have been prodigal both of their purses' store and their hearts' blood. With courage therefore may the Irish Relief Fund open its great bazaar in Madison Square Garden, New York, on October 14, confident that this new appeal to charity will find a ready answer.

Ireland, at present, is in sore need of assistance. Her homes are desolate; widows are grieving for their husbands, mothers for their sons, sisters for their brothers, maidens for those who have plighted them their troth; the men who have hitherto kept the wolf from the door have either gone down into the silent city of the dead or else are lying helpless on beds of pain. Ireland's great heart has sent out a cry for help, and the answer, phrased in money, is being prepared in New York, the city of charity, that ever hearkens to all in distress. Ireland is calling from over the sea. With Deo et Patriae as a motive, what Irishman can harden his heart?

The Food of Our Souls

IN a recent number of a magazine, edited in the interests of "the Catholic party" of the Protestant Episcopal Church, a layman pleads for the introduction "into the Church of the Reserved Sacrament." The temper of the writer is devout, his spirit genuinely reverent. To him the "Reserved Sacrament" is a channel of grace. He cannot understand why this channel should be closed to him and to his brethren, when sickness prevents attendance at church, or when death, from some sudden accident, is imminent. He does not dare propose "daily celebrations of the Holy Eucharist," though he thinks this desirable.

It is not easy to follow the mind of this devout layman. He hungers for the Blessed Sacrament; he insists upon "reverence before the Reserved Sacrament"; he sharply criticizes the Bishop of Vermont, who holds that the "Reserved Sacrament" will be an impossibility, so long as "reservation for the purposes of adoration is practised and widely advocated." Yet in spite of this position, he "has no desire to see introduced a practice 'which the House of Bishops has wisely condemned.'" The condemned rite, referred to by this writer, who, if words count for anything, is a true lover of Our Eucharistic Lord, is "Benediction"!

"Devotions" introduced by zealous but callow Anglican curates, by tolerance of complaisant rectors, and in the absence of any authoritative guide, may often be fantastic or even blasphemous. Quite possibly, this pious layman has some such incongruity in mind. He can hardly be acquainted with the beautiful, touching ceremony which all Catholics know and love. For that is a function which filled the heart and soul of a man like Newman, with a devotion which has issued forth in one of the noblest paragraphs in English literature. It has a special message for the poor. It lightens the yoke of the ignorant laborer, gives solace and rest to those that suffer; and, as in the silence, Christ is lifted up before His people, the souls of the adoring multitude are brought back to that bitter yet happy day, when on Calvary He was spent for our salvation.

Only in Christ's true Church can this Gift of Gifts, this Food of our souls, be valued at its true worth. For only on her altars is offered throughout every moment of the day and night, the unbloody Sacrifice in propitiation for the sins of the world. Under her roof alone are gathered fittingly and with dignity, all God's gifts of silver and gold and fine linen, and flowers and incense, and music and poetry, to do honor to the Body of His Son given for us. Only at her Table is set the great Banquet, the Bread that maketh fat, the Wine springing forth virgins, the Body and Blood, Soul and Divinity, of Jesus Christ.

The Spanish Pioneers

AMERICA can never forget the debt of gratitude which she owes to the Discoverer of the New World. But, side by side with Columbus, or closely following in the wake of his caravels, there rise before us the chivalrous figures of the men who, building on the corner-stone he had laid, reared the mighty fabric of a new empire in the West. They are the Spanish pioneers, and Columbus Day is a fitting occasion to recall the memory of their epic achievements.

Guided by the banners of Spain, her indomitable soldiery mustered from Castile and Leon, cradled on the heights of the Asturias or in the sunny Andalusian vales, discovered the whole of the great South American continent. Northward, the clank of their martial footsteps reechoed under the palms of Florida and through the primeval silences of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado. Wherever they went they carved out empires, built cities that were almost unrivaled in population or wealth, in the Europe of their day, substituted Christianity and civilization for the horrors of pagan rites, and introduced law and order. Almost a hundred years before the Anglo-Saxon had settled on the shores of Virginia or New England, the pioneers of Cortez had conquered Mexico, while a few years after, Pizarro had presented Peru and the wealth of the Incas to the Kings of Spain. Jamestown and Plymouth were unknown and undreamt of when the war horses of De Soto slaked their thirst in the waters of the Mississippi. More than half a century before the sails of Hawkins or Drake flecked with their shadows the waves of the Pacific, Balboa had gazed in wonder on that mighty expanse and Spanish galleons were bearing across its waters the gold, the commerce, the teeming wealth of the New World.

The Spanish pioneers were conquerors, explorers, statesmen. Pinzon discovered Brazil, Almagro and Valdivia conquered Chile, Orellana sailed down the Amazon from the Andes to the sea, Ordaz explored the Orinoco, Magellan's ship, the "Victoria," manned by a Spanish crew and captained by a Spaniard, Sebastiano del Cano, was the first to circumnavigate the globe. In Mexico Mendoza became the model of viceroys, Las Casas the type and pattern of the apostle and the priest.

But the knights of Spain were not only the discoverers, the explorers, and the colonizers of kingdoms, they were their civilizers and first educators. They opened the first schools in the New World. There were Spanish schools for Indians in Mexico in 1524. In 1575, more than half a century before a single book had been published in the English colonies, many books in twelve Indian languages had been printed in the City of Mexico. In 1551, "fifty-six years before the English settlers landed in Jamestown, fifty-eight years before Hudson sailed into the Bay of New York, and sixty-nine years before the Mayflower touched the shores of New England," the oldest university in the New World, that of San Marcos, was founded by Spaniards in Lima, while her sister university, that of the City of Mexico, was founded and endowed two years after.

These dim outlines only suggest the fine story of Spain's epoch-making achievements in the New World. Impartial history cannot forget or dwarf its importance. And while Americans fittingly dedicate the twelfth of October to the memory of the great pathfinder and discoverer, they will give that festival a larger and a truer meaning, if they link with the name of Columbus, the names of his pupils and followers, the explorers and civilizers of the two Americas, the Spanish Catholic pioneers.

The Children's Protectors

"WOE to him that is alone." But if the man who by himself is weak and helpless can only secure the protecting friendship of the strong, he need fear no harm. The Evangelist St. Matthew records that, on a certain occasion, just after Our Saviour had expounded His uncompromising doctrine regarding the sin of scandal and particularly the necessity of taking the most drastic measures to avoid scandalizing children, He ended His exhortation with this solemn warning: "See that you despise not one of these little ones: for I say to you, that their angels in heaven always see the face of my Father who is in heaven." The Prophet Daniel beheld in a vision these throngs of radiant spirits about God's throne: "Thousands of thousands ministered to him, and ten thousand times a hundred thousand stood before him." Nor is Scripture silent about the wondrous power and beauty of these Guardian Angels who are "sent to minister to them who shall receive the inheritance of salvation." They are constantly passing from heaven to earth on errands of justice and mercy. It was an Angel that led Lot from Sodom and Peter from prison. It was an Angel that protected the avenging Judith and that gave healing power to the Pool of Probatica. It was an Angel that brought the pestilence on David's people and that threw back the stone of Our Saviour's sepulcher. It was an Angel too whose beauty was so dazzling that St. John took him to be God Himself.

This is the month in which the Church especially reminds the Faithful of the existence, nature, and office of these strong, bright spirits in order that we may better realize the worth and dignity of the souls committed to the Angels' care. For of every child of Adam it is written: "He hath given his angels charge over thee; to keep thee in all thy ways. In their hands they shall bear thee up, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone." But particularly dear to these heavenly guardians are the souls of little children which they unweariedly strive to keep innocent and pure. When they stand before God's throne they offer Him like fragrant incense the prayers that every mother makes for her little ones, and these watchful spirits also do their utmost to protect their beloved charges from moral peril and bodily harm. But the Guardian Angels would grieve bitterly, if grieve they could, to see how often all their efforts to protect boys and girls are rendered ineffective by careless Catholics who unconcernedly neglect to give their little ones a religious education or who exercise no supervision over their children's companions, reading, amusements, and recreations. Such parents would show a true and solid devotion to the Holy Angels just by giving those watchful guardians a little help in protecting the young.

LITERATURE

The Troubled Standard

THE famous author sank gracefully—he did everything gracefully—into the deep office chair, and took a manuscript from its fine leather case. "The serial is done at last," he said casually, "and I am willing to give you first option on it, as you asked."

"Very kind of you indeed," said the editor of the Cosmopolite, rubbing his hands. Editors, be it noted, are always rubbing something; when it isn't their hands, it's the public's fur or the best-loved sections out of one's favorite copy.

"The theme," went on the author, spreading the manuscript over his ample knee, "is a phase of the modern ethical problem of the sexes."

"Ah," commented the editor, beaming as hard as a Cheshire cat, "the eternal triangle, I presume?"

"No," corrected the author, "the single standard of morality."

"Even better," said the editor, beaming as hard as several Cheshire cats, "and eminently in keeping with the progressive tone of the Cosmopolite. The single standard of morality for men and women has been one of the Cosmopolite's proudest battles.

"So I have noticed." There was a peculiar glint in the author's eye as it lifted for a moment to the cold, masterful man in fashion's most recent raiment, who sat imperially at his glossy mahogany desk. Literary gossip had it that more than one clever young author had auctioned off his soul to the bidding of this skilful master of magazines. They had gone from him with fat checks near their hearts and a stock of fine moral cant on their lips; but their muse had trailed her robes in the mire.

"My heroine," went on the author, "is, of course, charming in every sense."

"Good! I shall get Mr. Kristie to do the illustrations. His heads are really remarkable. And the public so takes to a heroine who has personal charm."

"Precisely," the author agreed. "Consequently, my heroine is a woman of spotless virtue at the beginning—"

"Of course!"

"At the middle—"

"And at the conclusion."

A momentary hiatus in the conversation followed. The editor moved a delicate ivory Japanese paper-knife from one side of his desk to the other. Then he said: "Perhaps you will be willing to read a section or two from your work before we get to further details."

"Delighted! Let me take the passage where Dorothy lays down her ideas on the double standard. She is talking to a chum of her boarding-school days who has decided to marry a man to reform him. The chum pleads that she had no right to blame her lover, for after all not so much can be expected of a man's virtue as of a woman's; for one does not ask the same moral standard for both. Dorothy speaks."

The author began to read with all the delicate perception of emphasis and shading that a man can throw about a treasured composition.

"Grace," Dorothy spoke with an intense conviction which tightened the hands that lay clasped in her lap and brightened the color in her cheek, "don't you see that just that way of looking at men is responsible for half the world's moral ills? We girls let a man know that we expect him to sow his wretched wild oats. We pet him fresh from his follies, and mother him when unrepenting he comes to us with sin befouling his very breath. We set ourselves lofty standards of virtue, and then we set no standards at all for our men. Can we expect a man to be clean for our sakes when he knows we ourselves do not expect it? In the palms of your hand and mine, Grace, lies the destiny of some man; let him know that you expect your knight to be sans reproche. The same standard you set for yourself you must set for him; and if he wants your love, force him to reach your heights.

"Oh, no! Grace; there aren't Ten Commandments for women and none for men. Sin is not unpardonable in women and a bit of foolish thoughtlessness in men. Women must wipe out their sins with blood and tears; men cannot cancel theirs with a laugh. I believe in the single standard of morality, and the man I marry must prove that he can climb up to the standards which I have set myself. I may never marry. But at least, I shall not spoil some man's life by making sin negligible in his eyes."

The author paused and glanced from his paper. In the editor's hands, the paper-cutter was swaying gently to and fro with a sort of hypnotic motion which seemed to fascinate him. Suddenly, as if just conscious of the pause, he dropped the knife. "Ah?" he inquired. "You were going to read another section?"

"Yes," said the author. "A suitor comes, and with him, love. Idyllic days follow, and then the heart-rending discovery of a moral lapse in the lover's past. She asks quite calmly about it; he admits the fault, but pleads youthful levity, the thoughtlessness of ebullient manhood, and finally, as she grows cold, he blurts out that she cannot expect the same virtue from a man that she demands of a woman. Let me read:

> Dorothy's fingers had been turning her ring, his engagement ring, slowly, meditatively. She was silent, and the ring was a tangible thing to which she seemed to cling. Then she spoke quietly.
>
> "If you had not said that, I might have forgiven you. If you had come to me with tears in your heart and said: 'It was a crime; may God forgive me!' I might have forgiven you too. But can I trust a man who has one standard of virtue for himself and another for me? I had rather a thousand times never marry! Man and woman stand in equal scales of God's balance. Yes, I could hope for a man who knew his sin and hated it; I cannot hope for one who forgets his sin and apologizes for it. Here is your ring." Though her hand was steady, her heart beat wildly. "Good-by!"
>
> A mad protest leaped to his lips. "You cannot mean good-by. I have sinned; but I did as others do, and they have found forgiveness in the hearts of those who loved them."
>
> "And, because they know that those who love them forgive, they sin with a light heart and a giddy mind. We women are all too often to blame. We let you fancy we hold sin cheap and forgiveness light. If I have lived to teach one man that virtue is priceless in a man and in a woman, I shall rest content with my life. Good-by."
>
> The editor pitched the cutter from him sharply. "She's a bit of a prig, don't you think?"
>
> "Meaning a stickler for purity? Ah, I see you don't fancy my story."
>
> "Well, to be perfectly frank, it's a little bit 'preachy.'"
>
> "So are all problem novels; so is every ethical novel you have published for the past five years."
>
> "Perhaps; but this is a rather unpopular viewpoint."
>
> "Not with the Creator, I should fancy."
>
> The editor spreads his fingers deprecatingly. "If I may be pardoned a slight irreverence, the Creator does not buy popular magazines."
>
> "True," assented the author, "but I thought that the single standard of morality was one of the Cosmopolite's proudest battles."
>
> "Not precisely from that angle; you see ——"
>
> The author carefully opened his case and placed his manuscript within. "Really, I've taken up enough of your time. But do you know, it had often occurred to me that the Cosmopolite believes not so much in a single standard of morality as a single standard of immorality? Its heroes are not trying to be as good as its heroines; but its women are trying to gain the right to be as bad as its men. Frankly, I'm very glad that you have not been able to accept my story. Now I can allow my children to read my views on the double standard of morality. And you know, even with my story in it, I could not allow the Cosmopolite to be put into the hands of my daughters. For I want their single standard to be the single standard of virtue, not of vice."

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

REVIEWS

The Whole Truth About Mexico: President Wilson's Responsibility. By FRANCISCO BULNES. Authorized translation by Dora Scott. New York, 810 Broadway: The Bulnes Book Co. $1.50.

The writer of this book, as the "author's biography," inserted before the preface, states, was "Representative and Senator in the Mexican Congress for thirty years; chairman at various times of the Senate and House of Representatives," besides being a civil and mining engineer, editor of La Libertad, author of "Las Grandes Mentiras de Nuestra Historia," and discharging many other legislative and educational offices. So it can be safely presumed that Mr. Bulnes knows Mexico well, and his history of the revolution that is still raging there, his sketches of prominent Mexicans, and his graphic description of the country's wretched condition at this moment, should have great weight with fair-minded Americans who are eager to know the truth about Mexico.

The author believes that his country's sorrows are largely due to its climate. The infertility of vast tracts of Mexico's soil makes famine a constant danger. But a small portion of the largest estates can be cultivated. Out of 6,000,000 hectares of land on one large plantation, only 4,000 hectares are arable. Mr. Bulnes has important disclosures to make about the character of Mexican Masonry, and attests that the Mexican Protestant minister is looked upon by society "as a hungry beggar unable to earn his living in a more fitting way than by exploiting religion, or as a knave . . . who tries this as a last resort to keep his social standing." The author does not belong to the Catholic party, but this is what he told Madero about its members:

> They are educated and intelligent; they accept the Constitution and the separation of Church and State. . . . The Catholic clergy has no end in view but that of introducing religious instruction into the schools, and would be satisfied even if this instruction were not to be made obligatory.

Mr. Bulnes says that there is no proof that the Mexican Catholic clergy has, as a body, ever mixed in politics, though priests have, of course, exercised the right to vote which the Constitution gives Mexican citizens. The "politicians'" opposition to the Church, in his opinion, is their realization that "they cannot be the controlling power in a real, or even in a corrupt, democracy so long as the majority of the Mexicans are Catholics, and this explains their anxiety to destroy Catholicism among the popular classes by any and every means." The author makes it clear that he holds President Wilson chiefly responsible for the condition of Mexico today, and does not mince words when he points out the mistakes the Administration has made. More temperate language than that Mr. Bulnes sometimes uses would, no doubt, be better, but it must be remembered that he is a patriotic Mexican, who is writing the sad story of his country's ruin.

W. D.

The Eighteenth Century. By CASIMIR STRYIENSKI. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

AMERICA has already reviewed two volumes of the series "The National History of France" to which this book also belongs. The praise which has been accorded the preceding works on the Renaissance and the French Revolution, we must also give to this fine historical study of M. Stryienski. To the biographer and the historian who would learn how to make the dry facts of history throb with life under his pen and bring the actors of the great drama of the past, not as puppets or manikins, but living personalities before the reader, and thus breathe life and interest into what too often is a mere catalogue of dry-as-dust facts, a preliminary reading of M. Stryienski's "Eighteenth Century" is recommended.

The author is not a Frenchman by birth, but he is a master of all the delicate arts of French style, and an adept in the soundest methods of the best school of French history. He is clear, brief, dramatic and picturesque. He has everywhere tried to be impartial and by hewing close to the line marked out to him by the stirring facts he records, he has on the whole succeeded. Catholic readers would not subscribe to all the author's verdicts on the men and the movements whom he studies but it is evident from the tone of sincerity and truth felt throughout, that he has made an effort to be objective.

Readers of this splendid work will feel as if they were treading the mazes of some fairy and gorgeous palace of the eighteenth century glittering with overwrought ornament, ceiling and wall flashing back unsubstantial beauty and semi-pagan art, all giving the impression of an empty mockery and a coming tragedy. The rumblings of the terrible storm which was to break at the end of the century are felt throughout the book. The "deluge" to which Louis XV so cynically referred was soon to pour its waters over the land and in its mad rush sweep away the throne. M. Stryienski does not deal very much in abstract historical soliloquy. In picture, reflection, analysis, he is pithy and brief. But he knows how to connect events and movements with their underlying causes. There can be no doubt that the unfortunate Louis XV was to a great extent responsible for some, at least, of the crimes which followed his shameless reign. He was a well-head of corruption for the whole kingdom.

The "Eighteenth Century," like M. Battifol's book on the "Renaissance," has been crowned by the "Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques". The book deserves that high approval. It is serious in tone and treatment. God, immortality, the soul, are not meaningless words for the author; men, in his eyes are not the mere puppets of fate, but responsible beings amenable to law, reason and faith. M. Stryienski has seen the eighteenth century, the century of Voltaire, J. J. Rousseau, the Encyclopédie, Beaumarchais, Watteau, Fragonard and Gluck, from the true historical angle and has reflected with rare skill and trained craftsmanship its many-sided activities, its good and evil, its tinsel glamor and deepening gloom. J. C. R.

Somewhere in Red Gap. By Harry Leon Wilson. Garden City: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.35.

Petey Simmons at Siwash. By George Fitch. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $1.25.

American humor, or what now passes for it, demands a large stage on which to display its antics. There is nothing restrained about it, or crepuscular, nor does it deal in faint, deft nuances. On the contrary, it is dynamic, kinetic, and rises to the height of its art, when grandfather falls down a flight of stairs to collide with a piano which, with a musical crash, promptly flattens him. But it is all in the open, happily, and if not delicately artistic, it is rarely artistically indelicate. Which in these days of voracious printing-presses, is a blessing beyond price.

Mr. Wilson's collection of short stories concerning many of the individuals introduced to the world last year in "Ruggles of Red Gap," will please all who favor humor of the slap-stick variety. The average reader, however, will probably retire from the struggle before reaching the terminal, page 408. Life is short, and Mr. Wilson's art is too long. "Ma Pettengill is never idly facetious," says the author. It is a true bill. "Ma" labors at her humor; conscientiously, but heavily, and when the overworked pinions droop, "Ma" drops to a plane of staleness, not untouched with coarseness. "Cousin Egbert" too, would be the better for a brief vacation.

"Petey Simmons at Siwash" is above the average of college stories. "Petey" is not always a young unwashed barbarian at play. He has his sober moments from time to time, and realizing that a college education has its advantages, delivers himself of such sentiments as these:

> It did a lot for all of us, too. There is nothing in college that can touch the literary society for teaching a man to get up and slam a few choice, handpicked sentiments into the other fellow at a moment's warning. . . . If I were a boy again and wanted to start out for the President's chair, I'd join a good literary society in a small college, and bang away for four years. It's the best recipe I know.

The setting may displease the fastidious, but the sentiment is genuine. "Petey" also realizes that it is not a bad plan to force even "a college man" to study, whether he likes the process or not. In this realization, he is centuries beyond, or behind, the opinion of his age. P. L. B.

Nationality in Modern History. By J. Holland Rose. New York. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

As the author of this book says very well in his preface: "A careful study of past and present conditions is the first requisite for success in the construction of the healthier European polity which ought to emerge from the present conflict". It is to be regretted, however, that Mr. J. Holland Rose, when collecting the material for these lectures, omitted to lay sufficient stress on the full meaning of the word "careful". That he should fail somewhat in impartiality when judging of more recent conditions can be easily understood in view of the supreme test to which his spirit of patriotism as an Englishman is now being put. But to offer, in explanation of the reason why the binding influences of Christianity did not group together in a solid polity the barbarous tribes that over-ran Europe, the statement that "the Successors of St. Peter contended for supremacy with the heirs of the Caesars, with results fatal both to the Papacy and to the Holy Roman Empire" is merely to give us an old Protestant legendary account instead of history. One result of the bias displayed in this instance is that no notice is taken in the whole book of the specious appeal made by princes at the time of the Reformation to the spirit of nationalism for the purpose of rending the unity of Christendom which previous to that event was far nearer complete reality than it has ever been since. The book will be found full of good suggestions for one who already knows history, but it could scarcely be recommended as a safe source of information for one not equipped with a pretty wide and thorough knowledge of past events. M. I. X. M.

Heart Songs and Home Songs. By Denis A. McCarthy. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $1.00.

Two former volumes by Mr. McCarthy have already assured him of a sympathetic audience for his muse; and this book of verse will be welcomed by his world of readers. Simplicity in structure, and the plain homeliness of tender emotions and moral observations characterize this new collection. America is the theme of many of the pieces; and Ireland is sung of with the full charm of rhythm and rhyme. Children, too, will find the poet has remembered them, if not in lines that glow with the iridescent splendor of Francis Thompson's child songs, surely with the naiveté and simple measures of Whitcomb Riley and Eugene Field. While the didactic moralizations about country and citizenship are worthy and timely, Mr. McCarthy seems happiest in his flowing Irish meters and sentiment. Intimate and lovable pictures look out from many of the pages, like this from the "Little Town of Carrick":

> An' the ould Main Street o' Carrick, sure, it isn't like Broadway;
> 'Tisn't choked with trucks of thraffic an' with limousines of pride;
> You can cross it at your leisure,
> An' you'll always find with pleasure
> That, whichever way you cross it, there's a friend on aither side. M. E.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"Atlantic Classics" (Atlantic Monthly Co., $1.25) is an attractive volume containing sixteen well-chosen essays contributed by as many authors during the past few years to the Atlantic Monthly. Agnes Repplier is here with her excellent paper "Our Lady Poverty," Cornelia A. P. Comer on "Intensive Living," Simeon Strunsky on "The Street," and Meredith Nicholson on "The Provincial American." "The Other Side" is a sane protest against the "muck-raker," while "Fiddlers Errant" and "Turtle Eggs for Agassiz" are in a lighter vein. The contributors to the volume seldom go very deeply into a subject, but they write with wit, charm and distinction.

"Prayer: Its Necessity, Its Power, Its Conditions" (Herder, $1.00), the latest volume of Father Ferreol Girardery, C. SS. R., explains persuasively the Church's doctrine on prayer, takes from the Gospel a dozen practical lessons in prayer, and gives some selections from Father Bronchain's meditations. The author proves that those who pray with faith, wisdom, attention, humility, earnestness, confidence, perseverance, and with a pure heart, are sure to have their petitions granted. Father Thomas P. Brown, the Provincial of the St. Louis Redemptorists, contributes the preface and deservedly praises the venerable author for the ascetical works he has written.

Maurice Hewlett's "Love and Lucy" (Dodd, Mead, $1.35) is a well-written, leisurely, psychological narrative of how a cold, supercilious lawyer lost his heart to his own wife. But as their renewal of affection is brought about through another man's guilty passion for Lucy, the author leaves himself open to the charge of using a well-known "Jesuitical" principle.——"Jim—Unclassified" (Dodd, Mead, $1.35) by Robert J. Kelly, is a romance dedicated to Jeffrey Farnol and partaking somewhat of his method. The plot is based on the efforts of Jim, the supposed son of an inn-keeper, to attain fame as an artist, and to uncover the secret of his parentage. The characters, especially Doctor Redcar, though perhaps overdrawn, are well executed. While melodramatic in tone, the situations and incidents turn more on chance happenings than on logical developments.

"Joseph Conrad; a Biography and a Critical Estimate of His Works" (Holt, $0.50) by Hugh Walpole is a little book that will doubtless satisfy the many admirers of that gifted Polish-English novelist whose own life reads so much like a novel. Mr. Walpole considers Conrad the great exponent today of "romantic realism," points out with discernment the characteristics of his style and method, and advises those who would become enthusiastic readers of the novelist to begin with "The Nigger of the Narcissus," "Lord Jim" or "Nostromo." Simplicity, fidelity, sobriety, and hatred of self-satisfaction, in Mr. Walpole's opinion, are Joseph Conrad's chief literary virtues, and he quotes approvingly from the novelist's "Reminiscences" the words, "Even before the most seductive reveries, I have remained mindful of that sobriety of interior life, that asceticism of sentiment, in which alone the naked form of truth, such as one conceives it, such as one feels it, can be rendered without shame."

In the studies of their training school, nurses constantly meet with references to important physical and chemical principles, and in the performance of their hospital and sick-room duties, have frequent need of the practical application of these principles. In "Physics and Chemistry for Nurses," (Putnam, $1.75), Amy Elizabeth Pope has compiled from various sources the fundamental knowledge of these sciences which should be part of every nurse's equipment, enabling her to perform her routine duties more intelligently from the insight afforded of the forces at work. Housekeepers, as well as nurses, might profitably read the chapters on the chemistry of cleaning, where the effect of detergents on different kinds of material is somewhat fully treated, and stains are classified and rational methods for their removal are suggested. Careful perusal and application by housewives of the chapters on the nature and nutritive values of common foods and on the simple chemical principles underlying cooking, would lessen the need for nurses and confer the boon of good digestion on many a household.

"Wind's Will" (Appleton, $1.35) is the latest novel to come from the pens of those industrious collaborators, Agnes and Egerton Castle. Geoffrey Swifte, a British officer, went to France when the Napoleonic wars were over and lost his heart to Colinetti Nordi, a flower-girl of surpassing loveliness, who was most devout to Our Lady but was not at all averse to marrying a heretical milor. Thereupon the groom's noble relatives, particularly his cousin Augusta, who wanted him for herself, give the newly wedded pair no end of trouble. Many of the occurrences narrated take place, of course, only in books, but "Wind's Will" is a pleasant story. ——"The Mystery of the Hated Man and Then Some," (Doran, $1.25) "authored by the artist" James Montgomery Flagg, contains clever parodies of contemporary fictionists, interspersed with humorous sketches. When gathered into a book, magazine articles of this kind sometimes pall a little, but the excellent pictures help to carry the text.——"The Woman Gives" (Little, Brown, $1.40) by Owen Johnson professes to teach "a high moral lesson," but the book, a vulgar, salacious and insufferably dull performance, is not worth considering seriously.

Mr. Stephen F. Hamblin's finely illustrated and diagramed "Book of Garden Plans" (Doubleday, Page, $2.00) contains a wealth of practical suggestions for the ambitious suburbanite who wishes to beautify a five-acre farm, a small lot, a pool of water, a mass of rock or who meditates a rose garden, a vine arbor or a poppy bed. There are twenty blueprint plans, each of which is furnished with a complete planting list of trees, shrubs and flowers, and the book is filled with garden-lore.—— Mr. Horace Kephart did well to revise, enlarge and bring up to date his "Book of Camping and Woodcraft," which went through seven editions in ten years, and now comes out in a two-volume edition, of which the first, "Camping," (Outing Publishing Company, $1.50) is at hand. No item of interest or use to campers has been omitted and yet the book is very far from being a mere catalogue or list of articles, the text at times rises almost to poetry, and stories of personal adventure enliven bits of experienced counsel. The book indicates that Mr. Kephart himself must be the happiest, healthiest and most helpful of campfellows.

In "The Seven Wonders of the Ancient World" (Putnam, $1.50) Edgar J. Banks recounts in a popular way the rise and fall of antiquity's greatest achievements. There are many things of which the ancients might well be proud, but the author, on the authority of Antipater limits the number to seven. Few people, today, could name them; yet they compare favorably with the modern skyscraper, while in art they have scarcely been equaled. The Pyramid of Khufu, with its sides measuring about ten city blocks, rose to twice the height of the Flatiron Building. The Pharos of Alexandria, a lighthouse, would overtop the Washington Monument, Washington. The Colossus of Rhodes, a figure in brass, was almost the size of the Statue of Liberty. The Temple of Diana at Ephesus covered more ground than St. Patrick's Cathedral, while its architecture was a marvel to the art-loving Greeks. The treatment is, in the main, clear and interesting.

The finest poem in "A Little Book of Irish Verse" (Dutton, $0.60), which Albert C. White has edited, are the following stanzas by Katharine Tynan entitled "A Girl's Song":

The Meuse and Marne have little waves;
  The slender poplars o'er them lean.
One day they will forget the graves
  That give the grass its living green.

Some brown French girl the rose will wear
  That springs above his comely head;
Will twine it in her russet hair,
  Nor wonder why it is so red.

His blood is in the rose's veins,
  His hair is in the yellow corn:
My grief is in the weeping rains
  And in the keening wind forlorn.

Flow softly, softly, Marne and Meuse;
  Tread lightly, all ye browsing sheep;
Fall tenderly, O silver dews,
  For here my dear Love lies asleep.

The earth is on his sealed eyes,
  The beauty marred that was my pride;
Would I were lying where he lies,
  And sleeping sweetly by his side.

The spring will come by Meuse and Marne,
  The birds be blithesome in the tree.
I heap the stones to make his cairn
  Where many sleep as sound as he.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Benziger Brothers, New York:
Roma: Ancient, Subterranean, and Modern Rome, in Word and Picture. By Rev. Albert Kuhn, O.S.B., D.D., with a Preface by his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop of Baltimore. With 744 Illustrations in the Text, 48 Full-Page Inserts, and 3 Plans of Rome. $10.00; Roma: Ancient, Subterranean, and Modern Rome, in Word and Picture. By Rev. Albert Kuhn, with Preface by his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons. Parts XVII and XVIII. $0.35 each.

Britton Publishing Co., New York:
Georgina of the Rainbows. By Annie Fellows Johnston. $1.25.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
Damaris. By Lucas Malet. $1.40; Watermeads. By Archibald Marshall. $1.50; The Tutor's Story. By Charles Kingsley. $1.35.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
The History of the Fabian Society. By Edward R. Pease. Illustrated. $1.75; The Painters of Florence. By Julia Cartwright. Illustrated. $1.50; The Cradle of Christianity; or, Some Account of the Times of Christ. By S. P. T. Prideaux, B.D., with a Foreword by Rev. John Vaughan. $1.00.

Harper & Brothers, New York:
The World for Sale. By Gilbert Parker. $1.35; The Rising Tide, a Novel. By Margaret Deland. Illustrated. $1.35.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
The Romance of the Martin Connor. By Oswald Kendall. $1.25; Living for the Future, a Study in the Ethics of Immortality. By John Rothwell Slater, Ph.D. $1.00; Bonnie Scotland and What We Owe Her. By William Elliot Griffis. $1.25; Skinner's Dress Suit. Illustrations. By Henry Irving Dodge. $1.00; Bird Friends, a Complete Bird Book for Americans. By Gilbert H. Trafton. Illustrated. $2.00.

Little, Brown & Co., Boston:
Clover and Blue Grass. By Eliza Calvert Hall. $1.25.

The Macmillan Company, New York:
Mr. Britling Sees It Through. By H. G. Wells. $1.50; La Salle. By Louise Seymour Hasbrouck. $0.50; The Ideal Catholic Fifth Reader. By a Sister of St. Joseph. $0.50.

Princeton University Press, Princeton:
The New Purchase. Edited by James A. Woodburn. $2.00.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
The More Excellent Way. By Cyrus Townsend Brady. $1.35; A College Girl. By Mrs. George De Horne Vaizey. Illustrated. $1.25; To the Minute. By Anna Katharine Green. $1.00; The Breath of the Dragon. By A. H. Fitch. $1.35; The Golden Apple. By Lady Gregory. Illustrated by Margaret Gregory. $1.75.

Scott, Foresman & Co., Chicago:
Shakespeare, with Introduction, Notes, and Questions for Review: Macbeth, The Merchant of Venice, Hamlet, Julius Caesar. By F. A. Purcell, D.D., and L. M. Somers, M.A. $0.35 each.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
Our First War in Mexico. By Farnham Bishop. Illustrated. $1.25.

The Truth Seeker Company, New York:
Eternity, World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution. By Ernst Haeckel. $1.25.

Union and Times Press, Buffalo:
Robert Kane's Schooldays. By Fred J. Kinney. $1.20.

Yale University Press, New Haven:
The Tidings Brought to Mary. By Paul Claudel. Translated from the French by Louise Morgan Sill. $1.50.

EDUCATION

Jane Ashton Goes to School.

THESE are the sere October days when young Jane Ashton sets her matutinal course schoolwards. Jane Ashton, if subjected to cross-examination, would yield the information that her mental culture has reached the stage usually designated in our syllabi as "2A." She is, then, but a tender novice in this great game of education; in Rossetti's happy phrase, the wonder has not quite gone out from those still eyes of hers. For each day brings new marvels or new reefs, particularly reefs, and sometimes, squalls. To continue the nautical figure, Jane Ashton is no idle shallop with silken sails faintly drooping in the languid air. Rather, since she has attained the fractious age when one's first teeth begin provokingly to fall out, she may more fitly be likened to a frail bark, beating against the unruly winds of elementary arithmetic and school discipline. "Sister" is still her friend; but even under the gentle rule of "Sister," discipline is discipline, and mathematics, while robbed of half its horror, is sufficiently terrifying in the residue.

The "Educationist"

FOR I am supposing that Jane Ashton is where a Catholic child ought to be: in a school pervaded by the spirit of the Eternal Lover of children, in a school surmounted by the symbol of our salvation, the Cross of Christ. Here the nature of the child is understood, and training does not yield to weak indulgence. The child is a creature for whose eternal destiny life in time is but a preparation. Training, it is held, means not only the evocation and shaping of capabilities, but a selection among these capabilities, together with the repression of all that will hinder the growth of what is best in the child. The ugly weeds must be pulled up, quietly, gently, yet surely, that the tender flower take no harm. Sister or Brother, the gardener, while ever alert for improved methods, will hold fast to principles sanctioned by experience and authority. Most of all, neither will find an ideal in the "educationist," amusingly described some weeks ago in Punch:

He's great on teaching children the effects of alcohol,
And the superfine significance implicit in the doll;
The cult of barefoot dancing he applauds, and bids us aim
At turning each scholastic task into a cheerful game.

"Cheerful" games will not be wanting, nor a sugar covering, now and then, for the more bitter pills of knowledge. But, after all, some processes in education must needs resemble the probing of a nerve, or the filling of a tooth.

Letting in the Light

FOR the catechism tells us that "darkness in the intellect" is one effect of original sin, and backs the statement by the authority of I don't know how many weighty theologians. The "educationist" described by Punch has as little faith in original sin as he has in theology; but I do not see how he can either deny that the intellect, as teachers usually find it, is dark, or affirm that the letting in of a modicum of light is anything but a struggle. Supreme knowledge, or any knowledge, for that matter, comes hard to myself as well as to most persons, young or old, whom I have encountered. That is why instead of dropping a plummet to the depths of this subject with the easy grace of a Newman, I am but awkwardly skipping uncouth verbal stones across the surface.

The poets who, as Mrs. Browning contends, alone tell the truth, paint life and the quest of knowledge as a battle. No man, I take it, finishes three decades in this vale of darkness, without realizing that the sum of his ignorance grows daily more appalling. I saw a restored Egyptian tomb the other day in the Metropolitan, but I could not read a single sculptured symbol. How could I, never having learned? To get back to Jane Ashton, if this young person is not to stand in ignorance some day before a column of improper fractions, as I did in presence of the Egyptian tomb, she must here and now be resolutely dipped into the chilling subject, by a teacher panoplied against pity. For it is not clear to me that barefoot dancing or raffia-work will ever pour a flood of mathematical knowledge into her darkened brain. Jane Ashton, in the vulgar phrase, must get to work and keep at it, maugre her present belief that work interferes with her individuality.

A PLEA FOR "ROUGH PLACES"

A COMPLETE hater of shams, one Dr. Austin O'Malley informs us that "brighten the corner where y'are" is the fundamental dogma of what passes for religion in this keenly critical age. I think the dogma is not unknown in what this same keenly critical age accepts as "education." True, it requires a heart of flint and a bosom of iron to take one look at Jane Ashton, or "to stand some morning near our school," with the venerable Archbishop of St. Paul, "and feast your eyes on the throngs of little ones hastening to the classrooms," and then to plead for the retention of at least some rough places in the child's life at school. But "brighten the corner where y'are" is bad advice, if the brightness of your light blinds the eye to present needs and future dangers. Job spoke not only from experience but as a prophet, when he compared the life of man on earth to a warfare. Even Jane Ashton, though I fervently pray that she may not invite needless warfare by turning into a militant suffragist, must share in the prophecy. A round of existence in a feather-bed school will result in a shirker, not a soldier.

THE NEED OF RESTRAINT

LIFE to-day, as always, is full of problems that can never be solved except by hard, old-fashioned thinking. We have invented machines that can count and talk, but the only machine that can think was made by God. He leaves the operation to us. Are we preparing our children to operate it properly and to its capacity, by allowing them to avoid every study that is not "interesting," or that does not hold out the promise of a financial reward? And life, particularly in these days when faith and charity have grown cold, has its problems in the moral order which only they can meet successfully, who have been trained from earliest childhood to self-restraint. The Persian boys, says the old copy-book, were taught to ride, to shoot straight, and to tell the truth. No great arts, the first two, but each has in it, as clearly as any masterpiece of Palestrina, the element absolutely necessary for notable achievement—restraint.

Let us then waste no precious vials of pity on young Jane Ashton setting her course schoolward in these crisp October mornings. She is freighted, small, helpless, as she is, with all our hopes. Out of stones can God raise up children to Abraham; but in this school marked by the Cross of Christ, humanly speaking, are the Church and the State of the future. Fathers and mothers who will transmit to their children the heriatge of the Faith; bishops and priests, preaching to the world the message of Jesus Christ crucified: Sisters and Brothers toiling and laboring, and giving to us all the beautiful example of a life hidden with Christ in God: all are here in this flock, small but beyond all price. We wish for them all that can be dictated by love and sympathy and the deepest interest. We look at these children who will carry on our work when we are forgotten dust, with the prayer and the hope that sprang from the Heart of Christ on the night before He died: "Of them whom thou hast given me, I have not lost any one." And pondering on these things, we find a truth of deep educational significance in the words of the great Apostle, who wrote that God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our Father, chastiseth every son whom He receiveth, not for his destruction, but for his upbuilding in the spirit.

P. L. B.

SOCIOLOGY

Country Problems

IN the many efforts made for the amelioration of the evils afflicting the social body, we rarely find that any are directed toward the rural districts. At State and national conferences of charities and corrections, we may hear a lone voice calling attention to the sorry conditions of the country; at religious meetings, another may bewail the fact that the Church is losing its hold upon the rural population; but these Cassandras at the gate find their announcements unheeded, while the needs of the city grip more firmly the attention of social and religious workers.

True, the magnitude of the problems which the city presents, requires this attention; but it should not be forgotten that the country also has its problems: problems that are increasing in proportion as they are neglected. There is a poverty in the country as paralyzing as any presented by the city; there is an immorality whose only check is the silent condemnation of the better element; while disease and the mortality rate are staggering. Let any one who questions these statements but keep in touch with one rural community and the sorrowful truth will be realized.

RURAL CHILD-LABOR

THE evil of child-labor in the cotton mills of the South has been denounced up and down the land, but who lifts a voice in denunciation of child-labor in the fields? Women workers in shops and factories arouse widespread sympathy, and laws for their protection are being put on the statute books of the various States; but the wife of the tenant farmer or struggling small land-owner will work by his side early and late in the field, performing her household duties in intervals, and no hue and cry is raised against this evil equally grave. The country feeds the town as well as itself. It must of necessity be a sturdy, prolific stock to do the double work; and if ten hours at the machine or the counter unfit for motherhood, certainly sixteen hours in field, kitchen and barn-yard constitute a worse menace to the race.

However insufficient the wage of the city toiler, he, at least, receives it; but let a dry or wet season, an early frost, a plague of insects come, and the work of the farmer is brought to naught. When there is no fire on his hearthstone, no food in his larder, he, unlike his city brother, has no public or private charity to appeal to for assistance. At best, he has hardly more than enough to carry him from one season to another; and if early death does not claim him, old age usually finds him an unwanted guest at some relative's fireside, or an inmate of the county poor-house.

RURAL ILLITERACY

THE census of 1910 shows that our native white illiterates number 1,534,272, and these figures are piled up by the rural communities. How can it be otherwise, when work in the fields, poverty too great to allow the parents to buy books and clothing, or sickness, due to exposure and lack of nutrition, keeps the children away from school? When these conditions do not prevail, still there is no one to compel neglectful parents to send their children to school, just as there are no organizations to procure books and clothing for the needy, and no hospitals to care for the sick.

What is true of the schools is also true of the Protestant churches, and, in a measure, of the Catholic Church. Our greatest leakage is in the rural districts, due to insufficient religious instruction and mixed marriages. The Irish or German pioneer who would make any sacrifice for his religion has descendants who never see the inside of a church. Indifferentism has done its work well.

Religious Indifference

THE natural result of this indifference to religion is a growing disregard for law and order and a looseness of life, whose effects will reach out through the generations. There are crimes committed in rural communities which, if they come to light, do not always come to justice, because of the standing in the community of the malefactor, or because of public indifference and lack of initiative. A laxity of life which would call for investigation in more populous centers, is tolerated because a civic conscience is unknown, while the morals of some of the better class would put the barn-yard to shame. Children grow up in homes whose very atmosphere is contamination, but there is no juvenile court to rescue them. Drunken fathers cause untold suffering to their families, but there is no humane society or similar organization to bring them within reach of the law. Then when any of these evils reaches a stage where, in the very nature of things, it must be punished, individuals, singly or in bands, take over the matter, and a deeper affront is rendered the law, while the original offender finds public sentiment inclining to his or her side, as to one who has suffered an injustice.

When family life is not well maintained youths find every avenue open to viciousness. But they must be guilty of crimes before any public cognizance is taken of their misdeeds. The bad boy in the city finds his liberty hedged in by various laws, and their ministers at hand to enforce them. He has friends to help him toward a better life in societies, in the church, in the school, where every effort is made to bring him under good influence. The wayward youth in the country finds his liberty unrestricted. When he becomes too great a menace, his companions are forbidden to associate with him, so he becomes a hanger-on at gatherings of men, daily increasing his knowledge of evil. Ultimately he joins the vagrant class, if his crimes do not send him to the penitentiary.

Problems of Health

VIGOROUS health is usually associated with country life; but the grave-stones in any country cemetery reveal the sad mortality among the young and middle-aged. The flock of anemic children pouring out of the shanty which the land-owner thinks good enough for his tenant, while he builds large and comfortable barns for his cattle and horses, tells of overcrowding and underfeeding; while the odor that rises in villages from back yards, pools of stagnant water, and decaying vegetable matter, heralds the deadly fever which annually claims its victims. There the white plague is accepted as lightning and tempest are accepted, and prevention, if proposed, is unpopular. Modern methods of treating the sick are impossible. There are neither hospitals nor nurses; and the physicians, who, whatever their devotion, are sometimes out of touch with advanced science, and furthermore are handicapped by the ignorance and general dependency of their patients.

A Suggestion

A VENERABLE priest once said to me: "Think of the many little churches that could be built in country places out of the needless and often inartistic ornaments of our big city institutions!" Indeed, the efforts of one city hospital to surpass another, if properly applied in the country, would result in the erection of smaller hospitals in rural centers. The young physician and capable nurse would do more good, though they might not amass much money, if they directed their efforts to rustic communities. Every city shows civic and religious bodies, duplicating work. The shifting of these unneeded efforts to towns and villages would speedily bring about a regeneration, which half a century would fail to accomplish in the city.

A. C. Minogue.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Intolerant Catholics

ATTENTION is called by the Ave Maria to a class of Catholic readers, unfortunately too numerous, who will tolerate almost any insult against their Catholic instincts and faith on the part of the secular press without ever dreaming of canceling their subscription. But in regard to their own press Catholics are often intolerant to the last degree. "For instance, not a line must ever be published that is in the least unfavorable to the political party to which they adhere, or against a leader to whom they have pinned their faith; above all, nothing that is not altogether favorable to the race from which they sprung." Catholic editors are to be veritable weather vanes, and yet we are to have a virile and progressive Catholic press.

Mission Work Among American Negroes

EXCELLENT work has been accomplished in the cause of the American negro through the assistance of the Catholic Board for Mission Work among the Colored People. There are now, according to Our Colored Missions, 160 schools attended by over 16,000 pupils. Twenty-three communities of religious women teach in these schools. The Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament alone number 300 members. Through the generosity of Mother Katherine, their founder, they are able to conduct even an institution of higher learning for colored boys and girls, the St. Francis Xavier University in New Orleans. There are, moreover, three industrial schools for boys. Priests in the poorer districts of the South depend largely upon the Mission Board to keep their churches and schools in existence. The salaries of 125 teachers in parochial schools are paid by Mgr. Burke, the director of the Board. The work deserves hearty encouragement and support.

War Prices for Bread

THAT gold will soon be worth its weight in bread is the happy comment made by the Brooklyn Daily Eagle upon a very unhappy and distressing situation. Bakers' flour is now selling at $8.75 a barrel against $5.35 a year ago, and may have risen still higher by the time these lines reach the reader. How far this is due to foreign shipments or merely to the shortage of the wheat crop is difficult to say. Rumors exist of enormous shipments of wheat to be made to the belligerents, but nothing apparently is known with certainty. One thing, however, which appears to be clear is a nation-wide advance in the price of the country's principal food. Not only will bread go down in weight, the Commissioner of the Bureau of Weights and Measures explains, but likewise everything else manufactured from flour. Fewer or smaller buns will be found in the purchaser's bag for a nickel. The main problem which disturbs the equanimity of the New York bakers is whether the public would rather patronize a ten ounce loaf for five cents or a twelve ounce loaf for six cents. Small choice for the public! A survey of bread prices is to be made by agents of the Federal Trade Commission in cooperation with the Department of Justice.

Gary Plan in New York

A DEBATE in a recent session of the New York Board of Estimate indicates that the effort to "Garyize" the New York schools has degenerated into a game of matching wits. It began with an innocent resolution to equip certain public schools with tool shops and electric wiring. Before the debate came to an end, the resolution appeared to bear some malign, if unknown, connection with the recent $6,000,000 appropriation for "duplicate schools," for the "equipment" called for "machinery and tools for elementary and advanced woodworking, sheet metal, and printing shops." Some months ago, the advocates of the Gary Plan professed to see in the $6,000,000 appropriation, the triumph of Mr. Wirt's theories, but since the session of the Board of Estimate on September 29, the "triumph" seems somewhat clouded. When Borough President Mathewson of the Bronx announced his intention of voting against the resolution if it committed him to an indorsement of the Gary Plan, adding that he did not "believe in the expenditure of $6,000,000 for something that is still in the experimental stage," Comptroller Prendergast hastened to affirm that no such commitment was involved. Mayor Mitchel, too, was careful to explain that what the city is about to inaugurate "is not necessarily the Gary Plan, although it includes some of its features." On the other hand, Mr. Tristram Metcalfe, Editor of the education column of the New York Globe, views these statements as at least evasive. The school principals, according to Mr. Metcalfe, have been told that they are to put in shops of a kind and equipment to be determined by Mr. Wirt. "These are the facts. No one in the least familiar with the public schools doubts for a moment that the Gary Plan is being forced upon the school system" in spite of opposition from a large number of parents, as well as of teachers and principals. The debate ended in a request that the Board of Education furnish some definite information on the purpose of the $6,000,000 appropriation.

"They Die So Soon!"

WE read in the Good Work that the Sisters of the House of the Holy Child Jesus, at Ning-po, Che-Kiang, China, have just $1,100 with which to keep in their orphanage for the coming year 430 children of all sizes, besides 250 babies put out to nurse, and thirteen Sisters who with all their great zeal cannot live upon this alone. It would be an interesting schoolroom calculation to find just how long this sum can support the establishment in question, allowing a minimum of expense for food and clothing. But unfortunately the problem is a very practical one for the Sisters, for the children in the orphanage and for the babies, not to mention the many infants who might under more favorable circumstances fall to the care of the Sisters and receive Baptism. It is a problem which the Catholics of America should be able to solve.

> This year the babies have come to us in swarms. Rice has doubled in price, so the Chinese throw the children away because they say they are too poor to keep them! Since August 1 we have received 186. Three or four every day surely—and they die so soon! It is pitiable. But we cannot continue! If present conditions keep up we shall have to shut down on everything so as to be able to buy food for those already in the house. The babies outside must be left to die without Baptism. The smallest offering is acceptable, even twenty cents is enough, sometimes, to save a dying baby.
>
> There is something exceedingly pathetic in those words of Sister Agnes Johnson: "They die so soon!"

Wise Counsel to Trade Unionists

THE Journal of Electrical Workers and Operators, the organ of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, gives timely warning against a class of trouble-breeders in the trade unions, who recklessly seek to plunge the members into strikes that are unnecessary, unjust and detrimental to the workers' interests. It gives as a typical instance a man who had been ejected from his employment for incompetency and who made every effort to give a bad name to the shop, the foreman, the wage-scale and everything connected with the occupation for which he had been found unfit. "Members of this character are dangerous," says the labor journal. "Look out for them!"

> They will get you into difficulty by the direct-action route, as this Brother was pleased to term it. After they have led you into the difficulty they are unable to lead you out of it, so they "beat it" to some other city and let you fight out a hopeless battle. Then they boast of all they have done for the cause of labor and humanity in general. Of course they can afford "to hit the rattlers" every time they take the notion to do so. They have no responsibilities on their shoulders. What do they care if you have a home, wife and babies to look after and provide for? In their opinion you have no right to insist on the law being adhered to before a strike is called. If you do raise a question of law then they accuse you of having "cold feet," not openly, for as a rule they are moral cowards, but through the rumor-route. Do not let such members lead your local unions into unconstitutional difficulty. Watch the fellow that is always "knocking" the job the other fellow is working on, he has a motive behind him and that motive as a general rule is: "If I cannot work on that job I am going to make it so no other member can work on it." While such members are dangerous to their own interests they are also dangerous to the interests of their fellow-men.
>
> This is sane advice. Everyone thoroughly acquainted with labor conditions knows that there is no exaggeration in this picture. The origin of many an unfortunate strike is the resentment of a trouble-breeder who has been justly dismissed. Though such men, as the journal says, are likely to be the most loud-mouthed the honest workingman will wisely turn a deaf ear to them. Neither an incompetent nor a guilty man should be permitted to make of the trade union a tool for his revenge. Local unions are warned to guard equally against manufactured grievance and "grievance based upon rumor."

Effects of Alcoholism

THE Medical Review of Reviews recently printed an article on the effects of alcohol with whose entire substance and spirit we do not profess to be in accord, but which contains practical facts that should not be overlooked. The author is no apologist for Prohibitionists. "Nothing," he says, "could very well be more intemperate than the statements of the professional Prohibitionist. These people are intoxicated with ignorance and drunk with fanaticism." Neither does he consider the gradual victory of the movement to expel alcohol from medicine as a cause for rejoicing, since in many important treatments it plays a useful and conspicuous rôle.

> But, putting exaggerations aside, and saying all the good things we can for aqua vitæ, alcoholism nevertheless remains one of the most difficult problems that the physician of the twentieth century must face. As a human menace only a few other diseases can be compared with alcoholism, notably tuberculosis, pneumonia, syphilis. The tubercle bacillus attacks all of us; where the resistance is strong, it retires and the wounds heal, but where the body defenses are weak, it digs trenches from which it may never be dislodged; and everywhere students of tuberculosis are saying that alcoholism is one of the greatest factors in preparing the field for the invasion of the bacilli, and it has been found that over fifty per cent of tubercular children are the offspring of alcoholics. That is why the International Congress on Tuberculosis, which met in Paris in 1905, passed the resolution, "That, in view of the close connection between alcoholism and tuberculosis, this Congress strongly emphasizes the importance of combining the fight against tuberculosis with the struggle against alcoholism."

As with tuberculosis so with pneumonia, alcoholism is a most potent predisposing factor. Alcoholics are especially prone to die from the latter malady. Besides therefore being a terrible problem in itself, alcoholism complicates other medical difficulties. "We shall never banish from our midst the triple plague of tuberculosis and pneumonia and syphilis, until we control their evil handmaiden." Alcoholism, however, as understood in this connection, does not mean the occasional drinking of a glass of wine or beer, but "a definite pathological entity, characterized by lesions in the viscera and nervous system which can be demonstrated at autopsy." The author warns in particular against the high percentage of alcohol contained in many patent medicines.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVI. No. 3
WHOLE No. 393

OCTOBER 21, 1916

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—Weather conditions have retarded operations on the Somme front, and the consequence has been that very little has been accomplished. The British have advanced a short distance towards Bapaume, Beaulencourt, and le Transloy; and the French have pushed their line forward from the town of Rancourt into the Bois St. Pierre Vaast. South of Peronne the French have made some progress between Berny and Deniecourt; they have also taken Guermont and a part of Ablaincourt, and have surrounded Chaulnes on three sides. In spite of these gains the week has been one of comparative inactivity and the battle line remains almost unchanged. On the Carso Plateau the Italians have been vigorously in the offensive and have made some slight gains southeast of Goritz and south of Oppachiasella, but except for the fact that they may have indirectly impeded the campaign of the Central Powers against Rumania, their efforts have had no appreciable results.

Bulletin, Oct. 10, a.m.-Oct. 16, p.m.

On the Macedonian front the Allies have had some success. The French have occupied the heights east of Monastir, and southeast of the same city the Serbians have taken Brod, lost it, and are now fighting on both banks of the Cerna for possession of the town. East of the Struma River the British have closed in on Seres from both north and south. North of the city they have captured Papalova and Prosenik, and south of it they have reached a point about two miles distant from it on the Surlija Plateau.

In Volhynia, Galicia, and Bukowina matters are at a standstill. The greatest gains of the week have been in Transylvania. The Central Powers have been exerting great pressure on the Rumanians and have forced them back almost throughout the entire eastern battle-line toward the Rumanian frontier. Close to the point where the Russian and Rumanian forces join, the Rumanians are retreating through the Kelemen Mountains and have almost reached their own border. Further south they have abandoned Czik-Szereda and are retiring toward the Gymes Pass. Having retreated from Kesdi-Vasarhely they are making a determined stand in the Oitoz Valley, west of the pass of the same name. East and south of Kronstadt the Rumanians are stubbornly defending the passes that lead into Rumania, but having been defeated at Toerzburg and Guivala, they were obliged to retire into their own territory at Rucar. Further west the Germans have taken Mount Negrului, but have lost Mount Sigleu. West of the Vulkan Pass the Rumanians have held their own. The Central Powers have also captured an island in the Danube, northeast of Sistova, but in Dobrudja neither side has gained much.

China.—A few weeks ago contracts financed by Chinese Government bonds amounting to some $60,000,000 and providing for the construction of about 1,500 miles of railroad were signed by several American firms. But on October 14 Prince Nicholas Koudacheff, the Russian Minister to China, lodged a protest at the Chinese Foreign Office against Americans being allowed to build the 400-mile line running from Fen-Cheng, Shansi province, to Lanchoy-Fu, in Kamsu province. He alleged that the Chinese Minister in Petrograd gave a verbal promise eighteen years ago that Russia should have the privilege of constructing railways in the vicinity of Mongolia. Baron Gonsuke Hayashi, the Japanese Minister, also protested to the Foreign Office at Peking against the Government's agreement with American contractors for the construction of 200 miles of the Grand Canal in Shantung province. He maintains that owing to Japan's conquest of Shantung, all Germany's former claims are now Japan's. The protest entails as yet no diplomatic issue, as the contracts were made with private corporations.

Protests Against American Contracts

Germany.—Two striking events marked the Reichstag's sitting of October 11. The first was the reading of the report of the Budget Committee, which had cast a vote of twenty-four to four against any discussion of the submarine warfare in open session. The report stated that all the aspects of this warfare had been thoroughly investigated and their importance weighed, but that no agreement had been reached. It was therefore deemed advisable to refrain from making any decision, saying:

Report on Submarine Warfare

The Committee recommends that the Reichstag in its deliberations abstain from a discussion of submarine warfare. It bases this attitude upon the standpoint that a thorough discussion of the naval, technical, military, economic and political details is impossible without injury to the interests of the Fatherland, but on the other hand that without such thorough discussion the subject could not be completely cleared up.

The Committee found the war outlook to be everywhere "satisfactory and hopeful," and looked forward "with complete confidence to the future military developments in all the war theaters." The last war loan had proved once more the nation's confidence in the justice of its cause.

The second notable event was the speech of the Socialist Scheidemann, who held that all the nations in reality longed for peace. He pointed to the distress reigning in every one of the belligerent countries: "Bread today is dearer in England than with us. From France the most pitiful complaints are heard. Italy suffers from famine already. Russia had better not be mentioned." Yet peace was nowhere in sight:

Scheidemann's Peace Speech

Since Briand and Lloyd George have preached war until the bitter end the Chancellor is unable to talk peace. But we are free to do so. The nations want peace. If the contrary be said in any country, then it is absolutely untrue. The French nation is kept ignorant by censorial prohibition of the fact that it could see its country as well as Belgium still free today of German troops without shedding one more drop of blood and without losing one more square foot of soil. What do these nations still fight for? What is French shall stay French. What is Belgian shall stay Belgian. What is German shall stay German. This is the main basis upon which the coming peace will be constructed.

His views were, however, vigorously opposed in Die Glocke, an organ of his own party, which maintained that ninety per cent of the party members would vote for annexation, since they had shed their blood in a defensive war forced upon them and did not wish to see its repetition in the future. A similar view was expressed by the Conservative leader, who declared that Germany would hold the territory as long as seemed necessary to assure the future of the nation.

Great Britain.—At the reassembling of Parliament on October 11, a new war credit of $1,500,000,000 was moved by the Premier. This vote of credit, the thirteenth since the outbreak of the war, brings the total to somewhat more than $15,000,000,000. According to the Premier, Parliament was now asked to grant for war purposes, a sum equivalent to the aggregate appropriations during the twenty years preceding the war. Since July, the average daily expenditures have been about $25,000,000, and the funds on hand are sufficient to meet demands at this rate for some time. As the present credit is expected to last only until the end of the year, another request will be necessary before March. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated that there will be no new public borrowing in the form of long-term war loans, since the country's needs are being amply met by short-dated issues, and by revenue from the war taxes. Before moving the vote, the Premier reviewed somewhat at length the French and British operations in the West, the results of which he considered satisfactory. "This is not the moment for faint hearts and wavering counsels," said the Premier. "The Allies are not vindictive, but they will require complete reparation for the past, and security for the future. This war cannot end in a patched up, precarious, dishonoring compromise, masquerading under the name of peace."

A New War-Credit

Speaking in the House of Commons on October 13, Mr. Lloyd George stated that the number of exemptions from military service, running into the millions, was entirely too high. He had no doubt of the country's reserve power, but an unwise policy had brought things to such a pass, that it was not immediately available. Affirming that "we must lay the foundations for a war extending over a long period," the Minister said that the Government were now considering how the exemptions might be lessened. The Times, in commenting on the remarks of Mr. Lloyd George, writes that every young man in the country must now be placed definitely at the disposal of the military authorities or the Minister of Munitions, if the war is to be brought to a successful close.

Military Exemptions

Ireland.—While the country is keenly alive to the vital question of Home Rule and the best measures to be adopted to secure its benefits as speedily as possible, other problems are not neglected. Among these the great question of education stands foremost. On this subject, the Irish correspondent of the London Times, quoted by the Irish Weekly Independent, makes some interesting remarks. So far as higher education is concerned, Ireland has nothing to be ashamed of. Two new universities have been established and a third is desired. The curricula of Trinity College have been modernized and the intermediate schools rendered highly efficient. Secondary education is everywhere quite as good as in English schools. The Times correspondent, however, finds fault with the department of primary education. According to him, the teachers are zealous and efficient, yet the results of their labors are disappointing. The main reason for this is to be found in faulty school attendance. In some localities the authorities are perhaps to blame for not enforcing the compulsory clauses of the Irish Education Act. But the worst foe of primary education in Ireland, says the correspondent, is the apathy of the parents, which is especially noticeable in Dublin. Here, according to a recent estimate, there should be 53,004 children's names on the rolls of the National Schools. The actual number is only 42,652, and the average attendance is 33,354, that is, a little more than three-fifths of what it should be. But a hopeful sign is to be seen in the fact that both the authorities and the public have made serious efforts to improve matters. The Dublin School Attendance Committees have tried to have their powers increased in order to be able to prosecute more easily offending parents for neglect of duty and to increase the maximum fine. But these efforts have not as yet become law. There can be no question, however, that, with the exceptions noted, a serious and steady advance has been noted in the field of education.

Education

Japan.—News came on October 9 that Count Seiki Terauchi, Japan's new Premier, had chosen his Cabinet. It is made up as follows: Prime Minister and Temporary Finance Minister, Count Terauchi; Home, Shimpei Goto; Army, Kenichi Oshimi; Navy, Tomosaburo Kato; Justice, Itasu Matsumuro; Agriculture and Commerce, Kiyoshi Nakashoji; Communications, Kenjiro Den. Premier Terauchi will act as Foreign Minister pending the arrival of Viscount Ichiro Montono, Japanese Ambassador to Russia, who has accepted the portfolio. The Hochi Shimbun says the post of Minister of Finance will be offered to Baron Sakatani, former Finance Minister, on his return from the United States.

Terauchi's Cabinet and Policy

In an interview given on October 10 to a representative of the Associated Press, Premier Terauchi thus outlined the foreign policy he means to adopt:

> Tell the American people that my earnest and constant endeavor shall be to promote the friendly ties which have bound Japan and America for half a century. Your people know my administrative record in Korea. Because I am a successful soldier, shall that prevent my being a prudent Minister of State? Say it, repeat it, that I come as a statesman who is seeking the lasting interests of my people, not as a militarist seeking glorification by the sword. . . So long as Japan's vital interests and dignity are not infringed Japan will take no aggressive step against any nation, especially America. . . . Japan, true to her obligations, naturally will be bound in her future policies by her alliance with Great Britain and Russia, but that does not imply disregard of fostering amity with others, notably America, whose friendship and cooperation we have every reason to cherish. The Empire faces a situation which demands strenuous and unified exertions to procure reforms of the national life, to nourish the strength of her resources and to place the nation on an unshakable foundation of a secure and lasting peace in the Far East. Our supreme efforts abroad should be to maintain faith with foreign Powers and to be strictly fair and upright. Japan's progress as a World-Power, which is inevitable, must be marked with prudence and caution, especially in the period of world-crisis.

Count Terauchi declared that "America's interests in China would be harmed in no wise by Japan" and that he had no intention of "violating China's sovereignty or preventing interested nations from having equal opportunities." As for "closing the door," he said, "that is a complete non possumus." But those who remember that Marshal Terauchi created the police conditions in Korea which enabled him to annex that kingdom to Japan, believe that the hour will soon strike for the Mikado's absorption of South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia, for Japan continues to press her demands at Peking for "police rights" in those districts.

As Baron Sakatani, who according to reports is to be the Minister of Finance in the new Cabinet, remarked in a recent interview that the repeal of the American laws against Japanese immigrants is a matter of "justice and necessity," some misgivings were felt regarding just what the Premier means by the preservation of Japan's "vital interests and dignity." But Count Terauchi disclaimed responsibility for the interview and declared that as Prime Minister he would undertake no new steps in regard to the so-called American problems, including immigration. In this respect, he said, he would follow closely the policies of the outgoing Cabinet. The Premier ridiculed the suspicion that Japan had designs on the Philippines, and regarding the contention that he and his Cabinet would pursue a reactionary and undemocratic policy, Count Terauchi said: "My appointment is in exact accordance with the provisions of the Japanese Constitution. Not revolutionary, not aggressive, not militaristic, but constructive—that is my program."

Mexico.—In "The Mexican Policy of President Woodrow Wilson as It Appears to a Mexican," a remarkably convincing pamphlet from the pen of Manuel Calero, who was Madero's Secretary of Foreign Relations, the events leading up to the present situation south of the Rio Grande are so clearly described and so shrewdly commented on that some excerpts from the book will doubtless interest our readers. After calling attention to the fact that it is commonly assumed in this country that Francisco Madero was actually President when he was assassinated, Mr. Calero shows that prior to that tragedy Huerta had been legally made provisional President with Madero's consent.

Manuel Calero's Testimony

> The following plan was contrived for the purpose, which Mr. Madero accepted: Upon the acceptance by the Chamber of Deputies—which, according to the Mexican Constitution, is competent for the case—of the resignations of the President and Vice-President, the Minister of Foreign Relations, Lascurain, would be converted automatically into provisional President; Lascurain would appoint Huerta to the first post in the Cabinet and thereupon he would resign the Presidency in order that Huerta, at the same time, might remain, also automatically, as provisional President. This plan was executed to the very letter.

Regarding the recognition of Carranza and its results, Mr. Calero writes:

> It is proper to observe that the statement of the American delegates that the Constitutionalists were in numerical majority was a gross untruth, which revealed the profound ignorance that distinguishes the American Government in respect to the elements of the Mexican problem. This ignorance is fully demonstrated by the single noted fact that after two years of triumph of the revolution, in which the Government of Mexico has been in the hands of the first of the Constitutionalist leaders, to-wit: Carranza, "such a man" has not obtained "the confidence and respect of the entire country." . . .

What happened then is something that the American Government has not dared to publish. The few honorable Constitutionalists shudder to recall it. The Department of State has in its archives the official information of the outrages committed by the so-called Constitutionalists in the great capital of Mexico. Never had the city suffered such indignities, not even in the blackest days of our revolutionary life. Even the diplomatic representatives of the foreign Governments were robbed by the Carranza "generals" and by the mob of ravenous politicians that followed Carranza; even the Brazilian Minister, official representative of the United States, was robbed. . . .

His [Carranza's] first act upon triumphing was to close the tribunals of justice. From the few judges whom he has installed, he has exacted the oath of fulfilling and obeying the decrees of the "First Chief." He suspended the individual guaranties of the Constitution and, consequently, there is no recourse in Mexico against attacks upon liberty, life, property or the hearth-stone. He permitted and authorized the most repugnant attacks upon religious liberty. He muzzled the press and permitted only the publication of newspapers that flattered the First Chief and applauded all his acts. He has prohibited, under severe penalties, every political meeting or association. He has issued not less than three decrees which amend the Constitution, itself, of the Republic. He has disorganized the entire mechanism of the Government and has arrogated to himself the right to issue fiduciary money, which has brought economic ruin upon the country and upon thousands of Mexicans and foreigners. This was the character of the "Government" of Mexico in October, 1915, when it was accorded recognition. . . .

It thus appears [from Mr. Lansing's protest] that Carranza was recognized in the precise moment in which his own soldiers were committing sackage, incendiarism and homicides on American territory; when the authors of these outrages were passing thereafter to Mexico and were enjoying immunity and liberty, notwithstanding their being known to the Carranzista authorities; and when the so-called Government de facto and its subordinates not only manifested indifference for these acts, but were encouraging and aiding the bandits. . . .

Neither the generous pains of General Scott nor the efforts of some cultivated officers who, like General Angeles, were commanding in the revolutionary files, produced any results. The "generals" born of the revolution were the first in committing every kind of excesses against honor, life, religion and property. It was explicable that the people in general, above all, the cultivated or wealthy classes, would have more horror for the revolution than for the dictatorship of Huerta.

The struggle between the Carranzistas and the Conventionists (of which latter group Villa was the head) assumed a character of terrible cruelty. Those combatants did not appear to fight against their enemies, but against the immense pacific population. Everyone, who may have followed the changes of this drama, knows the infinite number of attacks upon the honor of women, upon religion, upon property and upon life. A savage struggle in which the Yaquis, barbarous and sanguinary, who formed a part of the hosts of Carranza, the criminals, taken from all the prisons, the Mexican Indian, ignorant and avid for blood and rapine, who formed the bulk of the combatants, satisfied their instincts of bestial ferocity at the expense of 15,000,000 human beings.

Hunger and pestilence increased the ravages of war. The military chiefs made scandalous fortunes, and what they did not appropriate to themselves was sent to the United States to the voracious speculators, who were paid with the bread and tears of the Mexican people for the arms and ammunition which sustained that infernal conflict.

Read the reports of the Red Cross; examine the official data with which the Department of State is stuffed, and it will be seen that while thousands of women and children were dying for lack of food, cargoes of corn, beans, of live stock, and all that could satisfy hunger, went out of the Mexican ports and of the frontier cities to be converted into rifles and cartridges, into instruments of destruction. Had there ever been a more patent case of "domestic violence," sustained by American arms and ammunition?

With regard to the oft-commiserated "submerged eighty-five per cent" of the people of Mexico "who are now struggling toward liberty," Mr. Calero finds that, all told, the revolutionary armies and bands of brigands "never reached 150,000 men; that is to say, one per cent of the total population." When the European war is over, the United States, in Mr. Calero's opinion, will be asked by foreign nations to account for about a thousand million dollars lost in Mexico by the nations of Europe since the revolution began.

Spain.—The speech of Señor Maura, delivered some time ago near Santander, has created a sensation in the country. It is thus summarized by the correspondent of the Irish Catholic:

Maura's Program

All Spaniards should take part in public life and abolish caciquism or bossism. Spain's neutrality must be preserved at any cost; any Government which attempted to bring Spain into the war would be driven from public life. After the war Spain's aloofness should cease, and the country must incline towards one or the other of the belligerent groups. Neither sympathy nor politics but solely the interests of the nation must decide between the two groups. Geographically and racially Spain should naturally incline towards "the Allied Nations." But France and England have for 300 years followed a policy of opposition to everything Spanish, thus making for her decay. If they change this traditional attitude, there is no reason why Spanish interests and those of the Allied Nations should not be worked out in perfect harmony. If France and England do not see their way to reverse their traditional policy with the required guaranties, all Spaniards will have to seek other alliances to defend the existence and prosperity of Spain. Spain does not fear invasion or conquest. A nation does not die because it is invaded. Spain will neither yield to threat nor bend to force and it will not perish.

Señor Maura holds a unique position among Spanish statesmen. Radicals and Republicans fear and hate him because he is a pillar of order and authority and an uncomprising defender of the Constitution. The Liberal party look upon him as an unpractical idealist and dreamer, while many Conservatives have deserted him because of his somewhat stern and rigid rule. Even the Extreme Catholic Right does not entirely trust him because of his Liberal-Conservative views. But all recognize his ability, integrity and absolute sincerity of purpose. For these reasons, therefore, his words have attracted wide attention. The press of all shades of opinion has unanimously praised the fearless and outspoken manner in which Señor Maura has handled a most difficult question. For some time rumors have been rife that the King contemplated the formation of a national Cabinet presided over by Señor Maura.

What Becomes of Them All?

Hilaire Belloc

ONE day I had occasion to travel to the town of Arras, in France, in order to see a manuscript of the epistle which St. Patrick wrote to Coroticus, a Prince upon the Clyde of whom the Saint very properly announced that he would be the guest of devils. There are but five manuscripts in existence so far as I know, and the one at Arras, though perhaps the earliest, is not complete. There is a yet more interesting manuscript at Rouen much damaged, I believe, which I have not yet seen. But that is neither here nor there, nor to the purpose of what is now running through my mind, which is: what becomes of all such things?

Your modern scholar has a way of looking at history as might a blind man who had suddenly been given sight. He enormously exaggerates things near to him. If his senses tell him of but a few things far off and small, he thinks these things far off to be both small and few. If you only think of it, if you only think what Ireland was during all the immense outpouring of the Faith from 500 to 900 A. D.; if you realize how the personality of St. Patrick dominated half that missionary effort even into the Germanies; nay, if you will only be at the pains of picturing to yourself how the acts and writings of even minor Saints were copied and recopied upon every side, you can be perfectly certain that hundreds and hundreds of copies of this epistle were to be found all over the West. What happened to them all?

What happened to the stones of the Roman paved ways in Gaul and Britain? A man told me not long since of a stretch of Roman road in the Forest of Dean where, for some yards, one could see the actual pavement, the stone surfaces of the way, still standing undisturbed. But think of the hundreds upon hundreds of miles, the thousands upon thousands of miles in Britain and Gaul, in Northern Gaul alone. What happened to the pavements? I know that many minor roads may not have been paved. I know that over many of the greater ones the heavy setts of Louis XIV replaced whatever rough surface centuries had allowed to remain. But still I wonder that so much should have wholly disappeared! There was a bridge at Staines. It was repaired right up until Henry III's time and we have record of its repair, or at any rate of the timber used therein. Where are the piles of that bridge? What ruin of the woodwork remains?

The Mediterranean nourished certainly for 2,000 years, for how many thousand years before that no one can tell, fleets upon fleets of galleys. Where is one caught by accident in some preserving soil? These boats had upon them iron work and brass work, and occasionally, I suppose, votive bronze work and even votive stone, chaining the metal of pulleys and blocks, anchors, staples. Where are they now?

When I look at a city like modern London and imagine to myself what its fate might be if or when it came to decay, I see houses growing more and more ruinous because men cannot afford to keep them up, sewers and drains choked, marshes, pestilence, the growth of vegetation and the increasing waste spaces, and all that men see who may attempt to make a guess at how our civilizations sink into an interlude of repose. But I also know very well how long such a process would be. I behold a building like St. Paul's and do not well see why it should not stand for 10,000 years. Yet you may visit the sites of lost cities, which only fools will suppose were less magnificent than ours, and you will find no more than heaps of mud and sand. What is more perplexing and more baffling still, you will sometimes find a vast building of antiquity standing almost untouched by time, while the habitation of the men that built it, and the town for which it existed, have quite vanished away. Such is the enormous amphitheater of El Djim up against the desert in Barbary. It is like the Coliseum for size and for integrity. But there is no town. It stands fantastically as though it had been built by spirits for their revels in a place where no man could live. It does not belong to habitable fields but to the sand.

For seven good hundred years men fought in armor much of one kind, yet we hardly know it save for its last forms. Countless myriads of men fought so armed. To take but one historical instance out of scores and scores, recall that menace of iron which came down over the Alps against Lombardy under Charlemagne, so that his enemy cried from the walls: "What iron!" Of all that armor nothing has remained. Here and there you will find in a museum or in a great house a chance relic of armor as old as the later Crusades, much more rarely a piece of mail a century older. There are remnants of the arms of the Dark Ages; but those learned in such things will tell you how many relics of the kind are known—certainly not one hundred. I know nothing of the matter, but I will bargain that there is not in all Europe one complete iron suit of the millions that men wore between the wars of Syagrius and those of Robert the Devil.

Things of the Altar, things sacred, not to be destroyed, should have survived far more; and far more have survived. But how small a number! In every little village of the West through the long procession of more than 1,000 years Mass was said, and the gilded chalice raised. But go into their churches now and you will not often find that their sacred vessels are old.

What is more astounding still, the things that happen to remain are not of the sort that always should, while the things that are of their nature most enduring entirely disappear. The walls and the colonnades, the libraries and the palaces, of the African Caesarea have gone. How, nobody knows. Carted away or spirited away, they are not there. Even the ruins of them are not there. Antony's daughter and Cleopatra's saw that capital of hers rise. A vast building near by may be her tomb, but the rest is gone. It is so, in that same soil of North Africa, with a whole stone town not unillustrious. Yet, in the sand of Egypt men dig up frail papyrus almost fresh, with words of ink quite decipherable thereon.

The bones of Alfred are scattered. Helen's, the mother of Constantine, may or may not be found under the forgotten ruins of an abbey in the East of France. Henry IV of England lies, some say, at Canterbury, but others, down the river in Erith Reach or the Hope or the Swatch where the sailors heaved him overboard. The heart of Louis XIV was eaten by an English clergyman, or, according to another version of the tale, ground up for mummy-paint that is a pigment made from the tissues of the dead. The tomb of Alfred is empty. That of Napoleon is doubted; that of Cheops gapes; that of Clovis lies under a new and modern street near Paris; that of Caesar is forgotten. But from the Nile comes a succession of insignificant men and women quite preserved and often inscribed, I am told, with a complete record of the events of their hum drum lives.

I do not know if there is any moral to be taken from all this. What becomes of them all? What process has old Earth for the absorption of her children's decay, and of the decay of her children's works? Why does she distinguish between one and another? If the Pyramids stand why have we not a vestige of the Temple? And if the Parthenon is still there why should not Narbonne remain?

I cannot tell, nor can any other man; but there is a significant phrase either in that extraordinary book "The Mirror of Kong-Ho," or that still more admirable book, "The Wallet of Kai Lung" to this effect: The incomparable and really versatile Emperor Tsi-Ho, who flourished some 2,000 years since, filled the earth with his learning and enriched mankind with no less that 432 varied and useful novelties, yet neither does any one of these remain, nor is any action of his whatsoever upon record. Of what consequence therefore will it be in one hundred years if the insignificant one who now addresses you shall suffer the mishap of arriving too late at some place where he may post this manuscript to an expectant editor?

Centralization of Missionary Agencies

Bruno Hagspiel, S.V.D.

THE Catholics of America are becoming more and more conscious of their missionary duty, as the past year especially has given evidence. With this increase of missionary cooperation difficulties and problems arise the proper solution of which is of far-reaching importance. As years ago in Europe, so now in this country, the demand for the centralization of missionary activity is becoming ever more insistent. "Why so many missionary societies?" it is asked. "They only cause confusion and become burdensome. They should all be consolidated into one large missionary collecting agency which would have for its object the care of all the material needs of the various missions and missionary societies." The funds thus obtained for the benefit of the entire missionary field, it is thought, might show much more favorable results than if a number of societies of a more private nature, for the most part aiding in the support of certain definite missionary districts and missionary congregations, should exist side by side with the so-called general missionary associations, such as the Propagation of the Faith and the Holy Childhood.

No objection can be made to a reasonable and moderate consolidation of missionary forces. "In union there is strength." On the other hand, the dangers of a too radical centralization of this kind cannot be overlooked. There is a nimis which would be harmful to the good cause. In the interest of this good cause, I should like to advance several reasons against a too radical consolidation, or rather amalgamation of missionary collecting agencies or of the various kinds of missionary propaganda and activity.

First of all, it is a long established and repeatedly experienced fact that many an individual priest or layman, or even a small missionary circle, cannot be persuaded to join a society however recognized and recommended it may be. Perhaps they do not approve of one or other paragraph of its statutes, or the methods of the society in question do not appeal to them, or they prefer to work for the cause in their own way, or perhaps they are interested in some particular missionary district or in the labors of a certain missionary whom they prefer to aid more directly and correspond with personally.

Such individuals should be given a free hand and allowed to mature their own plans, for should they be forced to give up these and unite with an already existing general association they would, as a rule, decide rather to remain away from all societies. Now the question arises whether, considered in itself, one really renders a service to the good cause by thus thwarting the praiseworthy efforts of these persons or circles. Much depends upon circumstances, to be sure! However, it is advisable to yield occasionally to human nature which is so eager to attain something individual and special, so that the good may at least in some manner be carried into effect instead of being suppressed or buried.

Furthermore, everyone knows that those who belong to but one society, give only one contribution, whereas Catholics who belong to several missionary societies freely contribute to the support of two or three. To illustrate: Let us suppose that Mr. B. belongs only to the Propagation of the Faith. He will then content himself with his regular annual dues and make no further donation. If, however, he belongs, in addition, to the Extension Society, the St. Peter Claver Sodality and the S.V.D. Mission League, it would surely require no heroic act of self-denial to dispatch promptly the stipulated contribution to all these societies. If, besides all this, a missionary from China or India should appeal to Mr. B.'s generosity, it would not impoverish him to give small alms to the good Father. In short, the Propagation of the Faith loses absolutely nothing if Mr. B. is interested in other missionary societies, just as, on the other hand, it would gain nothing if he were only a member of the Propagation of the Faith.

The German St. Boniface Society, which corresponds to our Church Extension Society, offers a striking proof of the correctness of this view. In the spring of 1913 many were clamoring for the centralization of the activities in behalf of the "Diaspora," or home missions. However, after seriously discussing the pros and cons of the situation, it was decided at the general convention of the St. Boniface Society in Cologne, June, 1913, that private collections apart from the St. Boniface Society were indispensable. The management of the Society had intended to concentrate and retain the entire care of the Diaspora in their own hands. But they did not do so, for the simple reason that it is impossible for a general association to gather as many contributions as divers local centers, independent of one another, can hope to receive.

Sometimes the efforts for "centralization" go so far as to attempt the suppression of the work of propaganda of separate missionary congregations which are endeavoring to raise means for the support of the missionary districts entrusted to them. Concerning this, the following may be said:

No doubt the representatives of the general missionary collecting agencies can attain much, but they are not constantly driven by immediate personal need, as are the missionary societies and congregations whose members are active in the various missionary districts. If one should try to eliminate their propaganda and alms, it would mean the exclusion of one of the most powerful factors upon which the missions depend. Would that not be a real calamity? Has it ever occurred to the champions of a radical centralization that the latter would restrain the efficiency and rights of acquisition possessed by the individual and would, if it should gain its end, destroy an endless amount of individual activity?

In this respect Protestants can teach us a lesson. How do they manage to raise such large sums for missionary purposes, especially in this country? The exclusive reason is, not altogether because they are far richer, as a rule, than Catholics, nor that they have no parochial school system, and therefore can devote their strength to the missions. No; after a thorough examination of the missionary methods of the Protestant sects, it seems to me that the main reason of their efficiency, apart from their ecclesiastical organs, is to be found in the fact that their various missionary congregations are allowed to expand without let or hindrance. There are numerous self-supporting, independent centers which, on account of the emulation that naturally results, develop an uncommonly vigorous activity, and achieve enormous success. By radically amalgamating our entire missionary system, there is no doubt that financially we should fall behind the Protestants even more than we have done heretofore. At the present time, especially when Catholics must needs put forth every effort to compete with the enormous pecuniary advantages of American Protestants, a too extensive centralization of the Catholic missionary collecting agencies would spell misfortune.

I should like to refer to another important point: Rome naturally recommends the general missionary collecting agencies in a special manner, and none so emphatically and so frequently as the Society for the Propagation of the Faith and the Association of the Holy Childhood. Nevertheless, we must recognize the fact that Rome recommends, promotes and blesses with indulgences numerous other missionary agencies, such as those of missionary societies and congregations, and even those of certain missionary districts.

It is much to be desired that the officers of the various missionary collecting agencies, general and individual, as well as the superiors of the various missionary congregations and societies confer with one another in regard to ways and means of jointly serving this vital cause of Holy Church instead of obstructing and curtailing the activity of other missionary leagues, societies and agencies. Splendid work might be done at such a meeting, held either annually or semi-annually. It might best perhaps be placed under the auspices of the Propagation of the Faith, leading the foreign mission work, and of the Catholic Church Extension Society, leading the home mission work. The national and diocesan officers of these societies, of the Association of the Holy Childhood, of the Catholic Board for Negro Missions, of the Indian Mission Bureau, of the St. Peter Claver Sodality, of the Catholic Women's Missionary Association, and the Superiors of St. Joseph's Seminary and Epiphany College, Baltimore, of Techny, Maryknoll and Girard, etc., would thus have a good opportunity to discuss matters of common interest and to unite for a systematic mission campaign. They could thus arouse and spread the missionary spirit in general and so benefit every individual society and collecting agency, especially the so-called general missionary agencies. Is such an ideal centralization an impossibility? If the Protestants who are divided into hundreds of sects find it relatively easy to achieve an inter-denominational centralization of missionary propaganda, how much more easily can something similar be accomplished by us, united as we are by the bonds of one Faith? Such a centralization would impart to our missionary endeavors a strength which could be compared to that of the Apostolic Church, which was so largely missionary, and enable us to achieve great things for the spread of Christ's Kingdom on earth.

Purple Patches

M. J. RIORDAN

WHAT a fine world this would be if it could be rid of the purple patches! The other day, for instance, I came upon a crew of workmen with a regiment of teams and a tangle of plows and drags and scrapers, all busy in an attack upon a beautiful slope that God had covered with grass and wild mustard and lichen-covered rocks, and the evident purpose of the attack was to turn the pleasant hillside into a site for a tailor-made home. The flowers were going down before the wreckers like soldiers before machine-guns, the rocks were being tumbled out of the beds made for them in geologic ages, the soft contour of the slope was being shaped into stiff terraces, the glorious work of the Creator was being destroyed at a fancy price per cubic yard; and all to what purpose? Only to sew a purple patch on the fair vesture of nature.

A beautiful site lay ready to hand through untold ages for the home to be built. It was gardened by nature, set with flowers and shrubs, rounded off by wind and rain, sharpened here and there by rock and unevenness of surface, an altogether ideal setting for a home. But the owner had made money fast and had steadily lost in taste and common sense, till now he was so close to omniscience that he could gleefully set about gardening paradise, and reducing the natural lines of beauty to geometric figures.

I went to the theater the other night and a modern Jezebel was tearing off great wisps of false hair from her head and was ranting from one side of the stage to the other like a caged tigress, because an apparently respectable soldier wanted to marry her respectable sister and the sister wanted to marry the soldier, but Jezebel, to all intents and purposes, didn't seem to want anybody ever to marry anybody else. To leave no mistake about her violent feelings on the subject, she threw several attractive stage fits, and clinched the whole argument by swishing behind the flies with a murderous bread-knife in her hand, with which presumably she slitted her expensive larynx.

The audience wept its money's worth, the women-folk renewed their silly vow not "to bring up their boys to be soldiers," the secret of Armageddon had been revealed to all the "feather-heads," and another fancy purple patch was securely fastened on the uplifting drama.

How delightful it would be if one could occasionally spend an evening at the theater and be refreshed by something really human. But latterly the purple patches have been tacked on the drama so recklessly that humanity is all but concealed on the stage, and curious forms of animalism have taken its place. Even a stage murder in these days has more in common with the wolf or the hyena than with Macbeth or Othello, and the thing called love by the playwrights would be shame in the jungle.

I opened my Sunday paper this morning and from its multitudinous folds a sheet smeared with rainbow reds and blues and yellows slipped to the floor. I picked it up and, for a moment before flinging it into the open fireplace, cast my eye over its repulsive composition of color. It was difficult to make head or tail of the splotch, but by following the printed directions it developed that some sort of a being with a head like a weazened rutabaga was supposed to be picnicking at an angle of a rail fence, when an animal with the face of a walrus and the feet of a cow, reached over the fence and began to browse upon the hair spreading out from the rutabaga-like individual's head. The fascinating scene was depicted in twelve equal panels distributed over the sheet. The concoction was, for some mysterious reason, expected to produce uproarious laughter. But the child or man who could look upon the sorry production with mirth could easily find it in his soul to be merry at a funeral. It was just a purple patch tacked to the drapery of art and humor, turning each into foolish harlequins offensive to every instinct of taste and proportion.

God has given Mildred a beautiful face. Her eyes are bright and black and sparkling. Her cheeks are round and full and tinted with the richness of the sunset glow; her brow is pure and clear as alabaster, and a mass of raven hair, "a glory to her," shadows all. Mankind has always sought the perfection of material creation in woman's face; the ultimate type of human beauty will always be the Madonna. The distinguishing note of man is strength, of woman beauty. Mildred is fair among a thousand; she has been given the gift of the charming face. But Mildred is not satisfied. She has learned to paint the lily; in fact, almost every maiden of high-school age, and many younger, has learned this sorry art. So Mildred "getteth her a grievous" pot of rouge and a package of powder and a sheaf of pencils concocted by a Parisian chemist from the by-products of greasy factories, and tries her hand at improving upon the work of her Creator. The result is sad. Mildred has "sicklied o'er" the glow in her cheeks, has dimmed the sparkle in her eye, has flattened the rounded shadow from her eyebrows into a miniature porous plaster. Her beauty is now of Paris: ghastly, manufactured, pitiful; not of heaven: vital, spontaneous, charming. Mildred's fair face has become a mass of purple patches. Again has "wasteful woman spoiled the bread and spilled the wine."

For some reason Pius X's Motu Proprio on Sacred Music was suspended at the church I attended last Sunday. The splendid choir, mostly sopranos with thrilling voices, seemed to be on a musical picnic, a sort of impromptu sängerfest. The organist, "after a manner of speaking" threw things wide open. He started off by himself on a mad excursion, jerking out stops by the handful, and driving eight cylinders abreast smack up against a stone wall. The wreck was frightful: not a groan for a moment, then a wail from out the débris, then a dare-devil run for the doctor, then Amen for a straight mile. The child did not recover consciousness.

The Gloria relieved the tension, or rather switched it on to a heavier wire. Affairs went well till the bonae voluntatis was passed. Then trouble began. The soprano said it was so, the tenor said it was not; the alto was in a flutter over the wrangle, and the bass just plugged along about his business uninterested in the difficulty. Things were finally smoothed out without bloodshed, and the quartette joined by the chorus chatted and laughed in musical language over the unfortunate affair, and by the time the final Amen was reached, they were all reconciled friends who could never again, under any conceivable circumstances, have a misunderstanding. A whole opera had been executed in the space of a Gloria, but it had nothing to do with praise or thanksgiving or repentance or sacrifice or devotion. It would have been desecration at Calvary; it was only a purple patch in a cathedral.

There is a curious feature about the purple patch: it seldom appears alone. It is gregarious by nature. Who, for example, can recall having seen a single purple patch on an urchin's knickerbockers or on a school girl's bib and tucker, or on a poem by Kipling, or on an infallible pronouncement by William Dean Howells? It will be found, I think, that if one such patch be discovered another is sure to be close in the offing, and more than likely, another and another. This is not the case with the black patch or the blue patch or the patch of the same piece with the garment; these, like as not, will be found singly and alone, but your genuine purple patch, never!

It is safe to say then that our home-builder, who finds it pleasant to deface a beautiful landscape, will, when installed in his new home, get into the habit of hanging his hat on the grand piano, or badgering his wife into setting off the roses for the dinner table in an enormous vase decorated with a cubist fantasy in yellow and Robbia blue, and of insisting that the trouble with modern laboring men is that they do not get up as early in the morning as he did before he wore a Swiss watch. It is altogether probable that our violent actress will be found madly devoted to Maeterlinck, an indefatigable slummer, and a strict adherent of the tears-at-any-cost movement. Our newspaper will quite likely revel in scandal, carry a department given over to the development of art in the home, and will have something to say in some corner of its pages about the lack of education in the Dark Ages. Mildred, one may be sure, will not be of serious help to her mother in the kitchen, she will adore Jack London's seamy novels, and will talk with a sigh of the delightful home life of the German Imperial family. And it is a safe wager that the Cathedral of the Heavenly Choir will harbor a fine array of plaster statues, decorated in gold and vermillion, and will have carven frames, such as never were on land or sea, encompassing the Stations of the Cross, and Mass will usually begin fifteen minutes late and the congregation will unanimously begin to move toward the door at the last sweep of the blessing.

Our Lord says that, "No man seweth a piece of raw cloth to an old garment; otherwise the new piecing taketh away from the old, and there is made a greater rent." This is the suggestive way in which the Son of Man tells us to use common sense in everything, which again is to say: "If patches must be used avoid glaring purple and in so far as possible fit the patch to the piece."

It must be observed too, that patches are not without honor, and that they distinguish true worth from snobbery; the gentleman from the cad. A patch in the right place is precisely the right thing, and has somewhat of the nature of an eternal joy. Indeed, if more patches were the fashion there would be measurably fewer chattel mortgages, and the freedom of the conspicuous avenues would be available to many who now stub their toes in rough back ways for fear of the constable or public opinion.

It would be a fearfully dreary world in which to pass through our probation, if in each of the myriad aspects of life—religious, literary, social, political, financial, or just ordinary work-a-day—we could reasonably be expected to be always in the latest style, dandies in our particular stations, for of all human beings the dandy whether in clothes or in mind or in money, is the sorriest specimen of the tribe. Let us have none of him, but let us wear good honest patches wherever and whenever they are needed without apology. But do not let them be purple. The common consent of cultivated mankind regards as incongruous certain combinations of colors, of shapes, of words, of sounds, even of thoughts, and brands them as vulgar and tasteless. The everlasting token of this verdict is the purple patch, just as the sword is the sign of power.

It goes without saying that one may be covered with purple patches and still be a saint. But it is a dangerous habit to cultivate unless through sheer humility, such as Benedict Joseph Labre practised. Once permit a deliberate decline from a high standard of taste, sew on one purple patch, and a corresponding falling away from high ideals is apt to follow in departments of life which seem to be separated by vast chasms. Neglect the proper care of the fingernails, for example, and it will not be a mysterious coincidence if at the next election one voter will have failed to do his duty as a citizen; smear the vivid coloring of the cheeks with corpse-colored powder, and it will not be surprising if in a short time risky novels and questionable dances will take on an astonishing attraction. Bad taste is frightfully infectious and after all is said and done "man is but a patched fool."

Trades Union Customs and War Conditions

A. Hilliard Atteridge

I HAVE already noted that the problem of suddenly finding an enormous amount of new labor for the factories engaged in turning out military equipment of all kinds was solved (1) by bringing in unskilled and female labor, and (2) by temporarily abolishing all trades customs intended to restrict output.

In the highly skilled trades, the first of these changes amounted to a wide-sweeping revolution and the abandonment of a policy which had been steadily pursued for nearly a century. Let us see how it worked out in the case of one of the most highly organized trades in Great Britain. The Engineers Trade Union is one of the most powerful and numerous of our labor organizations. It does not, however, cover the whole ground of the engineering trade. Roughly speaking, this union includes the working engineers, who handle machine tools for the construction and repair of most kinds of machinery and heavy metal work generally. In the making of munitions, it provides the skilled workers for the manufacture of artillery, rifles, gun-mountings and shells. These engineers also work at the building and repair of engines of all kinds. Now it was a fixed principle of the engineers that no one could engage in their work, unless a regular apprenticeship had made him a competent workman, and that even when the work was done by automatic or nearly automatic machinery, the laborer must not be a mere machine-feeder. He must understand his machine-tool, and be able to make all the necessary adjustments, or small repairs.

In American factories it is the custom to put a skilled man in charge of a number of machines, whose business it is to see that the machine and the work are properly adjusted, while the actual feeding of the machine is left to unskilled hands. But the British engineer refused to allow any unskilled hands to be employed unless in the mere laborer's work of moving material.

The result was to produce a highly-skilled class of workers. This was not the point primarily aimed at. The object of the trades union regulations was to keep the engineering trade in the position that skilled trades held in the old craft gilds. The workers were the masters of an "art and mystery." Their numbers were restricted to a certain extent, and this kept up the rate of wages. Many of the engineers were employed on work which, with the help of modern machinery, did not require any high order of skill and could be learned, in some cases, in a few weeks. But until the great war, the system was unassailable. To have put unskilled or partly trained hands to work on a machine in any engineering works in England, would have promptly produced a strike.

A rule of the engineers was that a man specialized in his work, and must not touch work of another kind. Another binding though unwritten rule, was that a man must take care not to work too rapidly. This is sometimes described as a part of the trades union policy of restricting output. It is true that in many trades unions there was a policy of restricting output, which in other words meant endeavoring to increase the number of employees. The theory behind the practice was that there was only a certain amount of work to go round, and if workmen did too much it meant unemployment for others. But this was not the primary object in opposing "speeding-up" and hustling. The practice arose from the fact that engineers are largely paid, not by time, but by piecework, and the feeling was that, if in a given time too much work was produced, there would be a drop in the rate of payment. If an energetic worker turned out too much work, he was likely to get a warning from his comrades, because there was the danger that his rate of production might be made the normal rate of the workshop. This was a mistaken policy. But one must remember that for many years the workmen, even in skilled trades, had an uphill fight to obtain anything like a fair share of the wealth they were helping to produce.

The war has brought revolution in these matters. As in the case of temperance legislation, the considerations that would have been urged against a sweeping change in peace-time were put aside by the imperious necessity of the moment, so in this question of work and wages and trades union rules, all argument and criticism were silenced by the simple statement that, at any cost, munitions and equipment must be produced rapidly, continuously and in enormous quantities. To insist on peace-time standards and rules was described as sheer treachery to the men at the front. At the same time, in most trades, there was no difficulty about the wages question. The Government was ready to pay liberally, in fact, often paid absurdly high prices. Contractors saw the possibility of making rapid fortunes, so wages rose at once. The trades unions agreed to waive their rules during the time of war. Local troubles arose, but opposition soon disappeared, for the workers themselves had the prospect of making exceptionally good profits while the war continued. The greatest of the changes thus accepted was "the dilution of skilled labor." New and only partially trained workers were allowed to handle the mysteries of the engineering trade, with the help of a few skilled workers and skilled foremen. Women crowded the engineering works, and found themselves handling machine-tools and turning out shells and parts of guns and even aeroplane engines: a confession that much of the work that during a hundred years had been marked as the special province of the skilled engineer, could be done by a mere beginner, thanks to the perfection of automatic or semi-automatic machinery.

For the moment, there has been no change in the wage-rate. It was accepted as a principle, and if a woman did work hitherto done by men, she must receive a man's wages. Thousands of women are actually working on material for the armies at extremely low rates. In some cases at unfairly low rates, but in all these cases, they are doing work already done by women before the war. Where women have replaced men, they are drawing a man's wages.

The introduction of women into many trades had been opposed before the war, on the ground mainly that the result would be reduction of wages and diminution of the amount of employment available for men. The exceptional conditions of war-time have so far prevented this. But in the readjustment of labor conditions after the war, results of this kind are very probable, perhaps inevitable. After the war, we are told, there will be a rapid return to normal peace conditions. This is unlikely for the lesson of the great experiment of "labor dilution" will not be forgotten, and the working engineer will find it difficult ever again to reestablish his old privileged position.

The chances are that after the war there will be a period of strikes and labor conflicts. The very right to strike has been waived during the war. The truce will end when international peace returns, and the conflict will be all the more acute, because it will be difficult to avoid the displacement of large numbers of existing workers, when millions of men are released from military service, and have to find work at their old trades. Scores of factories, created solely for the war, will close down. In those which remain open former workers, returning from the war and still fit for work, will have a claim to be reinstated in their old positions. Thus in many ways, the present exceptional prosperity of the working class is a mere temporary condition. The amount of employment must diminish with the end of the war, and the present high rates of wages cannot be maintained. Indeed, how Europe will successfully send back to the pursuits of peace, when this war is over, the millions of men who are now wholly occupied in making or using instruments that destroy life and property, is a problem for consummate statesmen to solve.

At the moment, though wages are nominally as high as ever, they are really falling, because food prices are going up, and the spending power of a pound sterling is considerably less than a year ago. This is producing in several trades an agitation for a further rise in wages, despite the agreement made in the first months of the war that no question of an increase of wages would be raised.

This whole question of labor in war-time is a large one. Two further aspects of it I have still to discuss, namely, the exceptional state of things produced by the new law regulating work in the munition factories, and the important reforms carried out in factories of all kinds for the improvement of labor conditions.

The Weight of the Soul

H. F. KANE

IT is not so very long ago since the intellectual aristocracy of Europe was startled and not a little disturbed by the discovery that the human soul existed. The declaration of this remarkable conclusion, carrying with it as it did the authority of no less a person than Professor Bergson, possessed a weight and a degree of authority which could not in the nature of things attach to previous statements of a similar character. Men may reasonably neglect the mere speculations of an unscientific era such as the Middle Ages. But when a learned professor of Hebrew descent, with a Scandinavian name, residing in Paris, says that we have a soul, well, we have souls, and that's all there is to it. The effect of Professor Bergson's announcement was naturally profound and a degree of emotion not untinged with panic was noticeable among politicians, wealthy ladies of advanced views, and others to whom the news was surprising and not wholly pleasing.

However, science has now dared a step further in her relentless march towards her unknown goal. Another Continental man of science has apparently had time amid the distractions of the war to discover that not only does the soul exist, but that it is possessed of a perceptible weight. The discovery is not altogether an original one; prophets of science have claimed as much before; but this time there can be no doubt. The learned scientist in question made his discovery by the very simple process of placing a dying soldier upon a weighing machine. The experiment was highly successful, and must have been most gratifying to everybody, including, we all hope, the patient—who nevertheless died. Indeed, had he not died the experiment would have been in vain, for, as the last gasp passed his lips, a perceptible movement of the hand on the dial attached to the sensitively accurate machine indicated that, as his immortal soul passed out of this terrestrial world, his body showed a distinct loss of weight.

Then the student of nature's secrets tried the same experiment on a dying cat. But herein was made manifest the fundamental difference between man and those lower animals whom science has taught us to regard as his ancestors. For when the animal died not a tremor passed over the machine, the hand on the dial remained motionless. The cat having no soul lost nothing by death. Its weight was precisely the same dead as alive. Thus we are now able to calculate with mathematical exactitude the difference between man and his four-footed fellow-creatures.

It is also reasonable to presume that we shall be able to calculate with equal exactitude the difference between human beings. For though ths speculations of the past may have spoken of all souls as being of an equal value, we can hardly in the light of modern research presume them to be of equal weight. It would be invidious to give personal examples of the difference that may be presumed to exist in their "specific gravity," but one would certainly expect to find that the soul, for instance, of a scientific writer of caliber would differ materially in this respect from that of an editor—unless, of course, it were the editor of a religious paper. The question of whether the weight of the soul always varies exactly with the income of the possessor is one which science has not yet solved, and in regard to which we must preserve that true humility which she asks of her votaries.

If, however, any one wishes to ascertain the weight of his own soul, his course is clear. He should make a journey to the laboratory of the scientist to whom we owe this epoch-making discovery, and request the eminent man to allow him to be placed upon the weighing machine. It is probable, by the by, that the ordinary weighing machines provided on the platform of our railroad stations are not so delicately adjusted as to be of any use for the purpose, and their use is therefore to be discouraged as likely rather to mislead than to teach. He will then request the distinguished savant to kill him. If he consents—and his kindly and obliging disposition combined with his love of truth will almost certainly lead him to do so—the experiment can proceed. The patient, if still conscious and capable of observation after the termination of his mortal life—and the general truth demonstrated by the example already given leaves us in little doubt that this will be so—will be in a position to know to the exact fraction the true weight of his soul, thus not only satisfying his own curiosity but helping on the march of science and progress.

He will presumably also know whether it is damned. But this information he will probably not be in a position to impart.

Here is a story and a marvel with which to conclude. One day a man was—if the Agnostics will excuse me—dying. It is a thing that happens to man. The hierarch who attended the ceremony adjured him solemnly with the question: "Unfortunate man, do you not believe in the soul?" "Not yet," said the Bohemian—for he was of that persuasion—and died.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Our "Defenders of the Faith"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The communication entitled "Apathy and Indifference" in your issue of October 7 is a strong indictment of Catholic leadership. The writer of the excellent letter neglected to mention, however, the almost universal disgust which is extended to the expeditious chieftains of our interests, and justifiably so, when Catholic principles and practices are replaced by expediency. We have too much political morals; let us have more moral politics.

The Catholic side of almost every public controversy is unworthily represented, owing to the absence of exemplary, consistent living on the part of political leaders who unwarrantedly assume the roles of "Defenders of the Faith." Thousands of young men and women are scandalized by the conduct of those who publicly profess, and privately belie, Catholic morality and practices. Experience seemingly has been powerless to teach us the futility of continuing on a course of defense which has so many vigilant critics, whose protests have worked no change in the order of things.

There is no evil so monstrous that it defies a cure. We lack educated leadership, we lack a proper employment of the best means to a desired end, and our union is weak because we have not as yet started on the work of making progress along the lines of self-capitalization. An educated Catholic man who debauches his talents and manhood by unworthy political practices is a traitor to his Church and his country.

Dorchester, Mass. J. D. RUSSELL.

The Value of Laymen's Retreat

To the Editor of AMERICA:

What can Catholic men do to shape their lives in accordance with the desires of their souls? What can they do to reconstruct them, as it were, and attain to those high standards of right living and right thinking, which every man, who thinks at all, desires to attain? The answer to these important questions is the laymen's retreat. The greatest trouble in the past with the average Catholic has been his lack of interest in religion except in so far as it involved the attendance at Mass and the fulfilment of the ordinary compulsory duties of Catholic life. The cause of this lack of interest is to be traced, so I believe, in almost every case to lack of knowledge; and this lack of knowledge is due in turn to the fact that the average Catholic does not foster the habit of reading good books and periodicals in general, and in particular Catholic books and periodicals. Further, it is becoming very clear to many of our thinking Catholic men that to be a practical Catholic, it is necessary to be a well-informed Catholic on matters affecting the Church. This of course means the necessity of studying the fundamentals of his religion. One of the best and most effective ways of awakening this interest is the growing practice of having men congregate periodically at some retired place, where the atmosphere is such as to bring to mind the spiritual requirements of conduct in a Catholic layman. Retreats are now becoming very popular, and there are few localities which do not offer opportunities to partake of the advantages offered on such occasions.

The diocese of Pittsburgh, for instance, through its Diocesan Union of the Holy Name Society, has been doing a great work along this line, and recently has concluded its fourth yearly laymen's retreat. Four years ago, with a small band of sixty-eight men, the first retreat was held at St. Vincent's Archabbey, Beatty, Pa. Was it a success? The only answer necessary is to take into consideration that each year since, without any advertising, save that given by the men who attended, the number has grown, until the last retreat showed a total of 200 men, and the attendance for next year is expected to be so large, that arrangements have already been made for holding two retreats at the same place during the month of August.

Now what does this indicate? Does it indicate simply curiosity, a desire for recreation or a desire for knowledge? Any one who would take the time to go with these men and observe them during one of these retreats, would quickly come to the conclusion that our thinking Catholic men are awakening. True, the awakening has been slow, but nevertheless it is a certainty, and it is no idle dream to predict that within a very short time, similar retreats will be held in all the large dioceses of the United States.

It should be the aim, therefore, of our Catholic men, who as yet have not attended a laymen's retreat, to avail themselves of the very first opportunity to do so. In places where it has not been the practice to hold them, the Holy Name Society, or the local council of the Knights of Columbus, or the pastor could easily be induced to agitate for them. Once tried they would not be readily abandoned.

It will very soon be realized that the practice of the knowledge obtained at these retreats in the daily lives of our Catholic men, as they mingle with their fellow-men in the offices and workshops of the world, will be an edifying example of what practical Catholicism stands for, and will be a most emphatic challenge to the world that the Catholic, whose rule of life and conduct is governed entirely by the teachings of his religion, far from being a menace to the moral, intellectual and material progress of our country, is a living example of everything that should make a country great, namely, the clean moral life of its citizens, founded and grounded on the teachings of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

New Castle, Pa. P. J. F.

"Blest" or "Blessed"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I see no room for discussion about "Blest" or "Bless-ed." The words convey entirely different meanings. A word is an articulate sound used by common consent to express an idea, not, and this is to be noted, by the consent of "the common." Now the idea expressed by "blest" is that some article, for example, a rosary, has had a blessing conferred upon it from without, usually by a priest. No one would think of calling such an article "bless-ed." But God is bless-ed, the Holy Virgin is bless-ed, the Holy Sacrament of the Altar is bless-ed. Their sanctity is intrinsic, it comes from within, it need not be conferred, indeed it could not be conferred. Hence it is that we do not speak of the "Blest Sacrament." The expression "Blest be God" is equivalent to "May God be praised!"

St. James, Minn. J. D. DURWARD.

Social Work in Parishes

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The article "Ezechiel, Thirty-four, Six," in AMERICA for September 23, interested me greatly, for I have long been concerned for the recreation of young people, and am not without experience in the difficult task of providing it. P. L. B. has certainly touched on a vital question, and many will recognize the justice of much that he says in his paper. The situation he describes is more or less typical. At the same time, when he looks on magnificent piles that do not minister to parish needs in proportion to their cost, he might, I think, abstain from striking at the laity, and ask himself if the right use of creatures is not just what the laity desires. Churches, certainly, cannot be too fine, nor schools too good. But the number of lyceums, theaters and auditoriums, which are idle most of the time, serves to show what a waste of money it is to put up buildings for social purposes, the usefulness of which depends on the entirely accidental attribute in the parish priest of ability for social work. To run a school, to manage a parish, and to pay off a large debt are about sufficient to exhaust the ability of one human being.

I am sure that P. L. B. knows of many instances in which clubs were worked up to a flourishing condition, through the expenditure of brains, money and pious endeavor, only to wilt and die, when the Bishop changed the pastor and the next incumbent was lacking in interest in "that sort of thing." If he does not know of such instances, I can furnish him with a few. I might add that it has been my pleasant experience to find that it was not money that was wanting to such enterprises. What has been wanting is some permanent form of organization, that is not subject to the will, or the whim of a single individual, sometimes the sexton. Training in social work has also been a desideratum.

The first essential to success is some scheme for ensuring stability. Personally I should be very grateful to any one who would suggest ways and means for securing some measure of it. The person who would work out a plan, that would make use, real social use, not use for revenue only, of our lyceums and auditoriums, would be a public benefactor, and, I hope, not a martyr. Courtesy to my own parish priest obliges me to state that I have made no endeavor to do social work in the parish in which I am at present residing.

South Orange. DOLORES DE LEON.

[May I suggest that Acts, vi: 2 and 4 be read in connection with Ezechiel xxxiv: 6? What I wished to recommend was, briefly, this: a social center, as integral a part of the parish system as the parochial school, supervised by the pastor, but administered by thoroughly trained Catholic lay workers. If this is to be no better than an idle dream, we need, first, endowment by our wealthy Catholics, and secondly, the active interest of all Catholics. P. L. B.]

Unfortunate Antagonisms

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I was delighted to learn from the pages of AMERICA that the volume on ancient history by my old friend, Professor Willis M. West, formerly of the University of Minnesota, had been published in a new edition, in the making of which a priest had collaborated. And I was likewise pleased to read in your issue of Sept. 30, Father Donnelly's tribute to the Professor's fairness. Neither of these facts, however, came to me as a surprise. For several years Professor West and myself were rather active in a club in Minneapolis which was devoted to civic and political reforms of a progressive nature. Occasionally we remarked the fact that, although we differed in our religious views almost as widely as the poles,—for I think the Professor is a Unitarian,—although our education had been along very different lines, and although our whole philosophy of life ran in divergent directions, we agreed pretty closely on questions of political, social, and civic reform. And we both noted with regret the fact that many of the Professor's progressive friends looked upon the Catholic Church as fundamentally opposed to social progress, and to movements for the genuine improvement of the condition of the masses, while many of my Catholic friends regarded reform movements such as that in which Professor West and I were engaged as somehow bound up with opposition to religion. We agreed that both these impressions were without sufficient basis, but we wondered whether they would become sufficiently general to bring about in America the unfortunate antagonisms that exist in some countries of Europe.

Washington. JOHN A. RYAN, D.D.

Catholic Art in America

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It was with delight that I read in AMERICA of September 30 that a series of papers under the general heading "Catholic Art in America" will soon appear in coming issues. This is good news for the many interested in this topic. Current literature on this subject is very scarce, and it is a pity that there are no magazines devoted exclusively to Catholic art, architecture, sculpture, painting, music, and literature. What a wealth of material there is in the Catholic Church to draw on! Not only from works of past epochs, but also from contemporaneous achievements. These papers will, no doubt, assist in arousing a lively interest among the clergy and laity in the field of Catholic art.

Cleveland. WILLIAM KOEHL.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

"Moving-Picture" Liberty

ACCORDING to the best authorities, the struggling student of art enjoys an undoubted right to deface his own canvas with his own paint. But, according to equally grave authorities, he has no right whatever to affront the public with the results. His own censorship may consider the daub a masterpiece; but he may not therefore claim a place for it in the Louvre. Indeed, he may not even hang it from a friendly lamp-post, that art may be brought to the poorest. For the honor of the Louvre, the approbation of competent judges is required. In the other case, he must first obtain permission from the police. Even thus is the liberty of artistic creation circumscribed by law and convention.

Similarly, according to the Constitution, the budding orator may assert his right to a free and unlimited coinage of speech. But this assertion confers no right upon him to bar my passage like some Ancient Mariner, for the purpose of assailing my ears with his base mintage. Concededly, his vocal organs are his own; by an equal concession, my ears belong to me. His undoubted liberty to babble or bawl is conditioned by my inalienable freedom to lead a life of untroubled quiet. Courts and convention alike have an annoying habit of interfering with the development of one's individuality. A Georgia jurist, it is said, while allowing the birth-right of every free-born American to take his dinner as he likes, has ruled that no man has a right to place his table at a street corner, and take refreshment there. What is life worth, in face of these grinding, senseless, conventional restrictions?

Liberty, then, properly understood, has very obvious limits. These may be summed up, abstractly, by saying that liberty is conditioned by duties; and in a practical way, by noting that even in the exercise of unquestioned rights, no man may make himself a source of annoyance or of harm to his fellows. Liberty means freedom to do only what is right, whether in art, oratory, or dining. The New York film company which recently denounced all censorship, public or private, as a violation of its "liberty," has evidently confounded liberty with license, a supposition strengthened by the offensive character of some of its productions. No one has a right, natural or constitutional, to do what is wrong. "Liberty" entitles no company of men to stage an exhibition detrimental to public morals. Even if the alleged "right" to produce films, subject only to the maker's censorship, be admitted, the right of the public to be protected against their exhibition must remain supreme. Class legislation is hateful, but something like it may be found necessary, if the proposal of the forces of iniquity to unite for mutual protection, becomes a reality.

The Bench and Birth-Control

IT is extremely unfortunate that Judge Wadhams of New York has put himself on record as favoring the dissemination of instruction on methods of birth-control, for his judicial character gives to his erroneous opinion an adventitious force that will deceive the ignorant, although it will have no weight with those who can think for themselves. It ill becomes a judge, who has been entrusted with the safeguarding of the law, to advocate the legalizing of a thing that is essentially illicit. The Judge must know that positive human law cannot justify an act that is in direct opposition to the two higher laws, the natural law and the positive Divine law. Nature cries out against illicit methods of restricting offspring, and in Holy Writ God by positive prohibition has forbidden them. No legal enactment therefore could make them permissible.

There is one licit method of preventing the increase of the family, and only one. History states that St. Edward the Confessor, King of the English, having been forced into matrimony by his Court, lived with his wife in virginity until his death. The self-restraint which he practised is the remedy for conditions like those the Judge deplores. The tubercular father with no prospect of supporting his family might, by the exercise of self-control, follow the example of the Saint. He is not, however, bound to do so; for to be born, even with a strong probability of future infirmity, is better than not to be born, and the hope of giving a human soul the chance to attain the endless beatitude of the Beatific Vision, might well outweigh even strong reluctance to bring a child into the world predisposed to disease. Catholics at any rate will not be influenced by this ill-considered judicial opinion. For them birth-control, as at present advocated, is grievously sinful; for them the clear prohibition of God overrides any specious pronouncement of man.

The Christian Brothers of St. Louis

THE sympathy of American Catholics goes out to the Christian Brothers of St. Louis. A beautiful college, which from the heights of Cote Brilliant looked down upon the city of the Crusader King for more than thirty years, is today a blackened ruin, the grave of two venerable Brothers, members of the faculty. But with the sympathy will be mingled a large measure of admiration for the undaunted spirit of these tried and approved educators. The flames had not subsided before a suitable classroom structure had been secured, and plans arranged for the erection of a new and even nobler collegiate group. In this "pluck," one may distinguish a mark characteristic of Catholic educators.

Education within the Church seems to partake of the Church's indefectibility. The men and women who devote themselves to this office, today of paramount importance, borrow strength and courage from a promise made directly to the Church. The gates of hell shall never prevail against them. Like the Church, they are of all times, of all countries; like the Church, they are as dying, and yet they live. Always persecuted, openly or by subterfuge, often on the verge of certain destruction, like the Church they have ever drawn new vitality from the very forces ranged against them. Throughout the ages, the violence of nations and the envy of hell have sought to destroy the only Church which, at the opening of the twentieth century, goes out to meet iniquity, rejoicing in the consciousness of invincibility. Not unlike this glorious epic of the Faith, is the story of Christian education.

The past is the pledge of the future. Upon the Catholic teacher of today, God has placed a sublime responsibility. For the omen of the times is evil; the main force of opposition has shifted from the altars of the Church to the schools of the Church. Modern paganism is not greatly interested in altars, but it is deeply interested in education. God therefore asks from our Catholic teachers a renewed vigor, a quickened spirit of sacrifice, love of Him above all else, and of the child, our hope for the future, for His sake. A more open conflict is imminent; and it will be sharp. But the Catholic teacher can, and should, face the future, cheerful and unafraid. God, who has assigned the work, will impart the strength. For He is faithful.

Sentimentality and Charity

"IN swinging away from the brutal," the Governor of New York recently said in a public address, "it is not necessary to swing to the maudlin. It is possible to think of the rights of the prisoner, without forgetting the rights of society."

The Governor has struck the note of justice accurately. Of late, the public has been surfeited with sentimental moonings on the woes of gangsters and gunmen. The inevitable reaction may now be looked for. It would be unfortunate, if the trend towards a sane and tenable view of the purpose of penal law were used to justify the revival of accidental, but undeniable, abuses in prison administration, now long and generally suppressed. Punishment, it should be remembered, is not vindictive, in the sense that society, or its members, is required to gloat over the sufferings of men in prison, or condemned to death. Punishment is called "vindictive," inasmuch as it is intended to repair, with some adequateness, the breach in the moral order caused by crime. Executioners no longer note, if indeed they ever did, each quiver of a condemned prisoner's pain-racked frame. To find pleasure in inflicting pain, even by way of just punishment, belongs only to men and communities that have become brutalized. "Without affection, without pity," writes St. Paul of the vice-loving Romans.

That a prisoner be not mistreated is a matter of strict justice. He is a man, not a beast, even though his conduct be wholly animal. Charity, moreover, counsels that his too often cheerless life be made as bearable as possible. No indignant protest against the replacement of justice by maudlin sentimentality can help society, if it obscures the fact that the convict, however degraded, is a proper object of well-ordered charity. Our Blessed Saviour loved those most who most needed His love, and His great-hearted Apostle bids us "Remember them that are in bands, as if you were bound with them." Neither society nor the individual can afford to forget that to visit the prisoner is among the corporal works of mercy, and that its reward is to look upon Him face to face, beyond the portals of eternity, who for our transgressions, bore a felon's doom.

A True Christian Warrior

AN American statesman said: "There are no Alleghanies in my politics." A German surgeon, made prisoner on one of the battlefields of the Somme, went out under fire to succor the wounded British and French soldiers with these noble words: "All who suffer are my brothers." These men teach a great lesson. If we would be true to the finer dictates of that common humanity which unites us all, we must be large-minded enough to leap over the petty boundaries of party and nationality which keep us separated and estranged. In the presence of chivalry, devotion to duty and self-sacrifice, all should deem it a privilege to bow in a common homage.

If this be the case, every generous soul will give his unstinted admiration to the pure and inspiring figure of a modern Bayard, a knight without fear and without reproach, a pattern and model of the true Christian warrior, the young Italian lieutenant, Giosue Borsi. His story has recently been told in the New York Times. It is one which few can read without emotion.

The son of a well-known anti-Catholic journalist, at twenty-two Giosue Borsi was editor of the Nuovo Giornale of Florence, was distinguished as a poet and critic, and recognized as Italy's foremost commentator on Dante. He had unfortunately inherited his father's anti-Catholic prejudices. But his father's sudden death, the loss of a beloved sister, the friendship, advice and instruction of the great Florentine seismologist, Father Guido Alfani.

brought him back to the Faith. So his mother's prayers were rewarded. When Italy declared war against Austria, the young journalist and writer made a bonfire of all that he had written before his conversion and enlisted.

The young soldier was a patriot. But what patriot ever wrote a prayer more thoughtful and tender for friend and foe than the following:

> God of Hosts, watch, I beseech thee, over the Italian Army and over the soul of every one of its brave little soldiers, so gay, so lively, so intelligent, so resourceful, so frugal. Inspire its leaders, guide them to victory, and grant that they will never abuse Thy protection by being harsh and cruel.

But Borsi was more than a patriot. He was a Christian and a brother to the very men against whom he had drawn his sword. We are sadly mistaken if the stern fighters, whose far-flung lines stretch from the Belgian sand dunes to Switzerland and from Riga to the Black Sea, can read with dry eyes this prayer which seems to have come from the heart of some gallant Crusader of a bygone age:

> I pray also with all my heart for our enemies and brothers, whose dear and precious blood perhaps I will have to shed. Take away from their hearts every sentiment of hatred and rancor. Among so many fighters, there are so many who love Thee, who are good and intelligent, and who love their homes, their parents, their wives, and their little children! Grant me to remember this always, so that I will not rush upon them in cruelty, in barbarity, in ferocity.

The secret of Borsi's nobility of soul was to be found in his Faith. He was a Christian, a fervent Catholic. To be such was to him "the only important duty, the only unfailing happiness, the only infallible good." Struck down by a bullet when leading his platoon on the Isonzo front, he found in that Christian Faith his consolation and his reward. His last thoughts were for his mother and for God. His beloved Dante was not forgotten. The blood-stained pages of the little volume of his cherished poet, which he ever carried with him, he handed to his weeping comrades with the message: "Give it to my mother. May my sacrifice and her sacrifice be acceptable to God."

The chivalry, the Christian spirit of charity and love beating under the uniform of this Italian lieutenant ennoble the blood-stained chronicles of war. They teach that a Christian can be a hero; that a patriot need not be filled with hatred and rancor toward men of other races and other lands. The war has claimed many noble victims, but few whose record is whiter than that of the model Christian warrior, Giosue Borsi.

"A Modern Conception of God"

IN the September issue of the North American Review an article appeared which essayed to describe what moderns think of God. At the very outset the difficulty of such an attempt was freely acknowledged; and the author, evidently with misgivings as to his success, called it "A Modern Conception of God." As a matter of fact it turned out to be not a conception of God at all, but of some creature of imagination, teeming with contradictions. The writer strives to gather together the scattered threads of recent speculation and to fuse them into a consistent whole. The result, as was to be expected, is far from happy. Serious, honest thinkers will not give it a moment's consideration. Only dilettanti, who have exhausted the spiritual possibilities of Theosophy, Christian Science, Spiritism and New Thought, will be satisfied with it, and this not because of any inherent probability in it, but because it offers a new adventure in religious novelties.

A true child of his generation, the author, with sweeping negations, rejects the convictions of the past, gropes his way blindly through the vagaries of the present, and builds his hopes on the promise of the future. He turns his gaze from the clearly defined Christian idea of God which has stood the test of centuries and still shines undimmed for all who have eyes to see, piles obscurity upon obscurity, and then he sighs and tries to console himself and his tired readers with the following conclusion: "The faint light of a new dawn trembles on the horizon. Let us look up and face the East."

With a fine disregard of facts he declares that Trinitarianism "has passed out of the realms of philosophic thought on God," unaware, it would seem, that the doctrine of the Triune Personality in God was never a conclusion of philosophy, being by its essence a mystery strictly so-called. This error might be overlooked if it were not intensified by astonishing ignorance of the fact that there is no civilized country in the world in which the content of Revelation on the Trinity is not studied by countless seminarians according to the strictest philosophic methods, and of the still more compelling fact that the number of those who are irrevocably committed to belief in the Trinity runs up into hundreds of millions.

Having disposed of the Trinity to his own satisfaction, the author goes on to treat of Christ, who to his way of thinking is clearly not God. Christ, he tells us, "needs no apotheosis." The chief service rendered by Jesus to mankind, according to him, was not the Redemption, for he holds that "the piacular atonement" is a theory framed by man, but correct teaching about the benevolent character of God. Had the author read his New Testament with half the assiduity with which he has studied the rationalists and the Modernists, he would have known that the two salient doctrines that Christ taught were His own Divinity and His Redemption of mankind.

And yet Mr. Mozan is presumably a Christian. Certainly he has occupied prominent pulpits in Baptist and Congregationalist churches. But how any one can call himself a Christian who believes neither in the Trinity nor the Incarnation, the two cardinal doctrines of Christianity, or can baptize in the name of the Trinity with Christ's Baptism, which has absolutely no efficacy if Christ is not Divine, simply passes comprehension. It would be interesting to know just what meaning he attaches to the word, "Reverend," which he prefixes to his signature.

Literature

SUPPOSE DICKENS RETURNED!

LIKE Robert Browning, Charles Dickens has suffered much at the hands of the I-love-every-word-he-ever-wrote people. The blind worship of an author is bad for him while he is alive, and bad for his reputation after he has died. No intelligent person can honestly praise everything that Dickens wrote. There are the criticisms of America in "Martin Chuzzlewit" and "American Notes," for example. These are not the records of careful observation and shrewd judgment, they are merely angry outcries. And there is "A Child's History of England" which is a bewildering mass of misstatements and prejudices.

Of course Dickens should not have attempted to write the history of England. He was no more fit for the task than Goldsmith was fit to write his book on natural history. And apparently Dickens was aware of the inappropriateness of his task, and relieved his irritation of mind by writing as vindictively as possible against all those historical personages whom mid-Victorian England regarded with disfavor. Therefore, he was actually savage with the Stuarts and the Jacobites and the great Catholic leaders. He carried his vindictiveness further, so complete was his dislike for his undertaking, and wrote harshly even against the people whom a Protestant historian might be expected to praise. He almost succeeded in being unfair to King Henry VIII, a very difficult thing to do.

But admitting these blemishes, it is not hard to find the qualities that made Dickens the most popular novelist of his time, and give him a hold on our affections stronger today than that of any other English writer. His prejudices arose from ignorance, and such prejudices are the most easily forgiven. When he wrote about the life with which he was familiar, he wrote with engaging sympathy, keen penetration and sound moral judgment. He was a careful student of contemporary life, and he loved humanity without worshiping it and therein is his strength.

It may seem strange to think of Charles Dickens as helping to bring about a Catholic literary renascence. But certainly no one will deny that he helped to break down many firmly established Protestant institutions. To me it is a significant thing that the social evils against which he turned the weapons of his genius are without exception Protestant evils, evils that draw their maleficent life from roots struck deep in the compost of the Reformation.

Take "Hard Times," for example. Was there ever a more crushing indictment of the godless school written than that remorseless study of the terrible place in Coketown where, with the best intentions in the world, the teachers filled the minds of the unhappy boys and girls with great loads of facts, remorselessly eliminating everything that was hopeful and imaginative and spiritual? How thoroughly Protestant was the elder Gradgrind, how thoroughly Protestant was the atmosphere of his dreary home, with its metallurgical cabinet, conchological cabinet, and its mineralogical cabinet, and its utter lack of idealism and love. There was no actual physical cruelty in the Coketown school, and yet Dickens is as severe with it as he is with Dotheboys Hall. The source of the evils in the Coketown school is nothing but materialism, the school is materialistic through and through, and in it human knowledge is blasphemously considered as the sum of all good. This kind of school Dickens unsparingly condemns, and since this kind of school is bad it follows that the opposite kind of school is good. And the opposite kind of school is nothing in the world but the Catholic school.

Materialism is always the object of Dickens's bitter scorn. That modern development of materialism which is called efficiency is curiously anticipated and criticised in "Hard Times," and theories akin to it come in for condemnation in "Dombey and Son." And frivolous materialism, the materialism that makes this world's selfish pleasures mankind's chief concern, is remorselessly exposed in "David Copperfield." It would be good to have Dickens's comments on a modern, efficiently conducted factory, and on a fashionable thé dansant.

But there are so many things that Dickens would comment upon wisely. How well he understood, for instance, the black perils of bigotry! I wish that "Barnaby Rudge" might be distributed free throughout the United States, especially in certain Southern States, so that all might learn that book's terrible lesson. The mad Lord George Gordon is dead, but he has successors as dangerous and less sincere.

Also, Dickens is the only writer who ever lived who could adequately describe the last twelve months of charitable activities, so to call them, in New York City. The forces of Bumbledom and Coketown combined in an assault on the pure spirit of Christian childhood. There is a combat for Charles Dickens's pen to chronicle! No one can doubt what side the author of "David Copperfield" would join. And if only we could send to Dickens, for review, certain issues of the Survey!

It is noteworthy that while Dickens enjoyed attacking the clergy, he always found his targets among the Protestant denominations. He was brought up among Protestants, but from his early religious experience he took nothing beautiful to put into his work. But he did find some useful "copy" in Protestantism; he found Messrs. Stiggins and Chadband!

Dickens is one of the very few true realists in the history of the English novel. He is not a sentimental romanticist, like the authors of some recent saccharine successes, although Mark Tapley, the dullest of all his creations, is, I am afraid, the progenitor of some of our hysterically "glad" heroines. He is not a morbid student of degeneration, like the dismal young English and American imitators of the Russians, who call themselves realists nowadays. He is not blind to the evil that there is in the world, but he gives that evil in its proper proportion, as the background of good. And he was aware, unlike many novelists, of the great and Catholic truth that happiness and poverty often go together.

Perhaps one reason why it is the fashion among those writers who are all for social consciousness and fearless expression and interpretative dancing and New Thought jewelry and all the rest of it, to sneer at Dickens, is that they have a haunting suspicion that he would laugh uproariously at them, and on his mirth-compelling pages hold them up to the ridicule of time. If he could only come back, to hear Mrs. Jellaby talk at the Liberal Club! to hear Harold Skimpole recite free verse! And now that I come to think of it, all the little Jellabys were brought up in strict accordance with the teachings of Madame Montessori!

It is natural that modern novelists of a certain type should dislike Dickens's women. But they do not give their true reason for this dislike. They say that Dickens's heroines are ineffectual, whereas Agnes in "David Copperfield" and Esther in "Bleak House" and, of course, "Little Dorrit" are, in the New England sense of the term, "capable women." They say that Dickens's heroines are commonplace or fantastic or something else that is objectionable, but they never say what they really mean. As a matter of fact, they dislike the women of Dickens because these women are chaste.

To many modern English and American writers, no modest woman can be interesting. To be the heroine of a novel she must be shown as tempting, or as yielding to temptation, or as having sinned largely in the past. Dickens died before this perversion attained its present literary distinction, and were he living today he would fight against it. He had pity for the woman who had sinned, but he did not think that her sin gave her importance and worth. He had none of the contemporary sentimental enthusiasm for soiled women. So it is natural that our devoted chroniclers of immorality should dislike his heroines who were virtuous women with no interesting enthusiasms for other women's husbands, but with an old-fashioned reverence for Christian purity.

Charles Dickens always was loyal to the Catholic ideal of womanhood. Without knowing it he was rendering homage to the Queen of Virgins whenever he wrote of one of his heroines. And now, perhaps as a reward for this very service, he knows that his distinguished son, Henry Fielding Dickens, is a member of the True Church. But there is another Catholic ideal which Dickens upheld, the ideal of childhood. Never can there be the shadow of a suspicion that one of his stories will "scandalize one of these little ones." He loved childhood with a deep and reverent affection; the great Feast of Childhood was in England, largely by his efforts, brought back from the semi-oblivion to which dour Puritanism had consigned it. When he wrote of women, he paid homage to Our Lady, when he wrote of children, he worshiped Him who made childhood Divine.

JOYCE KILMER.

REVIEWS

Saints and Their Emblems. By MAURICE and WILFRID DRAKE. Illustrated. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. $10.00.

It is not hard to believe the statement made by Mr. Aymar Vallance in the foreword to this splendidly printed and finely illustrated work, that it is the result of long and conscientious study. Diligent research into fields but little explored, and sound and accurate scholarship are everywhere evident. The book will prove of the greatest value not only to artists but also to students of church history and biography. There are two parts in the work, the first being drawn up under the names of the Saints, alphabetically arranged, with the emblems usually assigned to them; the second, alphabetically arranged like the first, under the emblems, followed by the Saints to whom they are attributed. The purpose of the authors is to supply means of identification to the thousands who do not recognize the emblems of some even of the most popular Saints, and to furnish artists with accurate and appropriate symbols with which they may adorn their canvas or their glass.

The subject has been treated before. Provost Husenbeth for instance published his "Emblems of the Saints" in 1850, and Dr. Jessopp edited an enlarged edition of the work in 1882. The authors of the present volume follow Dr. Husenbeth's arrangement, but whereas the number of Saints represented in the older book amounted to only 1500, "Saints and Their Emblems" has enlarged the list to 4000. Interest in the Saints and at the same time a livelier devotion should be stirred up among Catholics by a perusal of this exhaustive treatment of a fascinating subject. Not only do the authors accurately describe the symbols used in sacred iconography, but they give in brief space and condensed form welcome details with regard to the Saints themselves. Thus we learn that St. Honorius is the patron of bakers, St. Cosmas of barbers, St. Euseus of cobblers, St. Etto of cowherds, St. Clement of hatters, and that St. Appollonia is invoked for toothache. As a specimen of the author's manner the following passage under the heading "St. Joan of Arc" may be quoted: "Bareheaded in armor with long tunic or kilted skirt embroidered with fleurs-de-lis, banner with Annunciation or the words Jésus, Marie." The Maid of Orleans, however, has no right as yet to the title of "Saint." Officially she is known to Catholics as "Blessed" Joan of Arc. But they are praying for her canonization.

J. C. R.

The Westminster Version of the Sacred Scriptures. The New Testament, Vol. I., Part II. The Gospel According to St. Mark. By the Rev. JOSEPH DEAN, D.D., Ph.D., Professor of Sacred Scripture, St. Joseph's Diocesan College, Upholland. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $0.30.

All lovers of the New Testament will welcome this new version of the Gospel of St. Mark. It was written with one eye on the Rheims translation, and has therefore happily retained much of its archaic flavor and its reminiscence of the Elizabethan days, when priests used to pass over from the college of martyrs to England, there to die for the Gospel they had just seen in the manuscript and which perhaps they had even helped to turn into English. It is nevertheless a new version, and there are few of the changes that have been made which will not meet the approval of discerning critics. The first thing that strikes the reader is the elimination, to a great extent, of the use of the participle, which is so characteristic of the Greek and to a lesser extent of the Latin, but has never been native to the English. This has been replaced by more idiomatic constructions that make very noticeably for clearness. A good example of this will be found in the fifth verse of the third chapter. The narrative in consequence is more natural, more direct, and more telling, and a better subordination of clauses has given to the prominent thought in each sentence its due emphasis. The Eastern coloring of the original has been restored by the substitution of more accurate expressions, such for example as "the strap of whose sandals" for "the latchet of whose shoes;" and a careful selection of the best of the variants, together with a closer adherence to the Greek, has brought it more in accord with the results of modern scholarship. In one or two places a reading has been followed or an interpretation accepted that some will be inclined to regret, for instance in xi:3 and xi:24; but the rendering of ix:23 (Westminster Version), though startling at first, grows on one, and the retention of the familiar wording of the short sayings of Christ and others, which have become, by long usage, a part of most persons' store of ejaculations, will commend itself to everyone. The introduction and the appendices are clear and scholarly, but it is in the translation itself that the main merit of the little volume consists.

J. H. F.

A Little Book of Irish Verse. Edited by ALBERT C. WHITE. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $0.60.

Let a story give point to a criticism of this book of verse. The story relates that a student at Holy Cross College, back in the sixties, wrote a class exercise to this prescription: "Give an example of irony." The Yankee Jesuit, who examined the student's paper, found it, much to his amazement, a grandiloquent encomium of England and her oft-heralded achievements; but at the end of the reading he was set right, when he read, under an emphatic asterisk, "This is irony—and sarcasm." Similarly, to the claim which is embodied in the title, that this is a "Book of Irish verse," that student's footnote should be appended. For the book is not Irish; unless one would say that Spenser's "Faerie Queen" is Irish because the poet lived on the stolen grant of Kilcolman Castle, or that Goldsmith's "Deserted Village" is Irish because lackadaisical Oliver saw deserted villages in Ireland. Of the seventeen contributors to this book, not more than five are qualified to represent the voice of Ireland in the realm of song. One is not surprised to find that, for the most part, aliens in race and creed are selected for this anthology; for the purpose of the book is to pretend that Ireland is a partaker in the struggles and victories of England. Another purpose is professed, namely, that the proceeds will go to a fund for "Irish soldiers of the King." Stephen Gwynn lends his lyrical ability to false sentiment and to historical allusions that are false, when in urging his countrymen to organize new battalions, he says of former Irish Brigades,

They fought for Louis, fought for James, for every despot's throne;
Shall we not fight who may defend a freedom like our own?
To choke the spoiler from his grip on ravaged homes and land,
God, to what nobler enterprise could chivalry set hand?

Reread the second line, and say unreservedly, "This is irony." Mr. Gwynn is not the only offender with these sentimental falsehoods. The truest poem in the book, both artistically and ethically, is "The Seven Dolours of Ireland," by the editor, Albert C. White of the Ulster Guardian. Two verses out of the seven will suffice for an illustration:

There is an isle whose Faith was made a fault,
And penitence and prayer adjudged as crimes;
Where on the mountainside the people sought
Their harassed pastors in the penal times.
The Mass was said while scouts with eager eyes
Kept guard about the Christian privilege,
Lest the most sacred of all mysteries
Should fall to mercenary sacrilege.

There is an isle where men who were denied
The elemental liberties of men,
Gathered, and armed, and tyrant hosts defied,
And pike and musket gleamed in many a glen;
It seemed those stalwart heroes died in vain,
For alien force upkept the alien sway,
But in their sons their spirits lived again,
Have lived, and still are living on today.

M. E.

The Tutor's Story. An Unpublished Novel. By the Late Charles Kingsley. Revised and Completed by His Daughter Lucas Malet (Mrs. Mary St. Leger Harrison) $1.35; Damaris, a Novel. By Lucas Malet. $1.40. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

Lucas Malet's explanation of how "The Tutor's Story" has not made its appearance till this late day is quite interesting. While examining her father's manuscripts some two years ago she found written in his hand 150 foolscap pages of a novel bearing the above title. "The discovery," she writes, "came as an absolute and delightful surprise to me." The first fifty or more pages of the story were fairly consecutive, then followed detached chapters or outlines of chapters, but the plot was there "firmly based though unresolved." Mr. Kingsley's Catholic daughter then completed the story, doubling the length of the original manuscript in the process of developing the characters and disentangling the plot. "I have tried to preserve peculiarities of style and maintain a moral and emotional unity throughout—to maintain further, a certain freshness and simplicity of outlook which has the rather pathetic charm of 'a day that is dead.'" Readers of "The Tutor's Story" who are familiar with Kingsley's other books will agree Lucas Malet has succeeded remarkably well in keeping the book what her father in all probability would have made it. Here and there, however, the hand of the modern woman novelist can be detected and it is doubtful whether Newman's well-known adversary would have made the Anglican clergyman, who is the chief character in the story, remark when an adventuress was murdered: "Regardless of the prohibitions of my Church, I prayed—and how earnestly!—that her sins might be forgiven."

The scene of the story is the England of 1829 and the narrator is a Cambridge graduate who succeeds in reforming a rakish young nobleman whose tutor he becomes. There are excellent descriptions of country life in Yorkshire and striking character sketches of those who are intriguing to ruin Mr. Brownlow's pupil.

With all the literary artistry and keen powers of analysis for which Lucas Malet is renowned, she describes in "Damaris" a few weeks' events in the domestic life of Charles Verity, the "Commissioner Sahib" of a district in India. His five-year-old daughter who gives the novel its title is a remarkably lifelike little thing, and Lugard, a young Irishman, and Mrs. Mackinder, the social arbiter of Bhutpur's English colony, are attractive characters, but the others in the story are more or less despicable, Mrs. Pereira, a silly heartless flirt, being particularly detestable. "The spirit of the Sultan-i-bagh, an intelligence at once sexless and licentious, pander to blind, infructuous impulses and unholy desires," subtly pervades the novel and makes it a book that cannot be recommended. W. D.

History of St. Norbert. Rev. Cornelius J. Kirkfleet, Ord. Praem. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.80.

This, the first detailed English life of St. Norbert, who died in 1134, is a welcome addition to our hagiography. In it promoters of frequent Communion will find the life-story of a man who through evil report and good report ever sought strength and encouragement from his Sacramental Lord. In simple language and with filial pride the author tells of Norbert, nobleman, courtier, cleric and emperor's almoner, penitent, tried and persecuted, founder of the great Premonstratensian Order, favored of heaven, wonder-worker, archbishop, friend of saints, counselor of popes, apostle of the Blessed Sacrament. So wondrous a life will cause the incredulous to smile, yet Blessed Hugh, on whose narrative the present account is partly based, thought to remove all cause for doubt when he wrote: "You all may believe what I have written, for I take God to witness that I am speaking the truth." The Order that St. Norbert founded at Prémontré, near Laon, France, in 1120, is known as the Premonstratensian Canons and is still flourishing. Their five "circaries" or provinces, contain forty-two monasteries which house 1,250 religious. The Norbertine Nuns who compose the Second Order of the Premonstratensians also have a good number of convents, and St. Norbert's Third Order, for lay people, antedates of course those of St. Francis and of St. Dominic. Z. J. M.

Bergson and Religion. By Lucius Hopkins Miller. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $1.50.

The author of this volume writes under the conviction that Bergson's value to religion has never been fully appreciated. He addresses himself, therefore, to selected portions of the savant's philosophy in an endeavor to show how neatly they fit in with religious postulates. In the main Mr. Miller's arguments turn round Bergson's doctrine on freedom, immortality and the correspondence of truth to "the intuition." To those already familiar with the French philosopher and the sources from which he drew, the book will prove interesting, but not altogether instructive. Like many similar volumes, this one labors under the defect of taking Bergson at his face value. Thus the élan vital and the intuition, the purest of assumptions on the Frenchman's part, are taken for granted and discussed in relation to religious truth. Then, too, had Mr. Miller been less enthusiastic over his subject and more critical of his hero's matter and manner, he would have discovered that Bergson's freedom is an illusion, his teleology self-contradictory, his immortality a presumption and his God a blasphemy. Bergson's description of the Deity as a mere "continuiy of shooting out" is hardly a fit basis for a religion of any kind. R. H. T.

Daniel Defoe: How to Know Him. By William P. Trent. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Co. $1.25.

A professor of English was once asked by an aspirant to literary fame what course of study was best calculated to further his ambitions. The answer was couched in two words, "Read Defoe." Those who think this advice salutary, will find in the volume named above a guide in his pursuit of fame. For to thread one's way intelligently through the maze of Defoe's manifold and sporadic lucubrations does indeed call for a guide, and the plan of the volume before us is a convenient one for the purpose. In twelve chapters the author carries us through the depressing record of Defoe's career with as much sympathy as his subject will permit. At the end of each chapter he furnishes extracts from his writings to illustrate the period under treatment. The chapters thus afford the best of commentaries on the selections, and in the selections themselves we have a miniature library of the work of this eighteenth-century harlequin. The book is not entertaining; perhaps no story of Defoe's life could be so. But the student who is not seeking amusement will find it a compendium of useful information.

F. M. C.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"Mexico: Did the Wilson Administration Interfere in the Internal Affairs of Mexico," is a pamphlet which Mr. Paul Bakewell of St. Louis has made up of excerpts from Mrs. Nelson O'Shaughnessy's admirable book "A Diplomat's Wife in Mexico." "That the present Administration has interfered in the internal affairs of Mexico," the compiler maintains, "cannot be successfully contradicted, nor can it be denied that our interference was for the purpose of destroying the real de facto government of Mexico under Huerta and putting in power the so-called 'Constitutionalists.'"——Another strong pamphlet entitled "The Mexican Policy of President Woodrow Wilson as it Appears to a Mexican," is written by Manuel Calero, Secretary of Foreign Relations and later Ambassador to the United States, and published by Smith & Thompson, 58 Broad St., New York. The author describes clearly and convincingly the march of events in Mexico from the fall of Madero till now, and as he goes on, points out how the power of the United States was used by designing men to work the ruin of Mexico. Fair-minded Americans who read these excellent pamphlets thoughtfully can scarcely escape the conviction that we are chiefly to blame for Mexico's present deplorable condition.

———

"The World for Sale" (Harper, $1.35) by Sir Gilbert Parker, "The Breath of the Dragon" (Putnam, $1.35) by A. N. Fitch, and "The Leopard Woman" (Doubleday, Page, $1.35) by W. H. D. Koener are three novels, all of the same general type, with the main interest centering in the action, which is thrilling throughout and well sustained. In each case there is a strong, good man for the principal character, who in spite of apparently insurmountable difficulties triumphs in the end, to the gratification of the reader; in each also there is a thread of romance which supplies the heart element, and ends in marriage. They belong to the lighter class of literature and make no pretense to create characters or to supply more than an hour or two of idle pleasure. The scenes are laid in Canada, China and South Africa and have for their background conditions of primitive civilizations which are well depicted with a good deal of local coloring. All three have the usual regrettable setting or passages, which make one hesitate to recommend them unreservedly for the young; but the moral tone of all alike is on the whole good. Their excellence is probably in the reverse order of their enumeration: "The Leopard Woman," is the most imaginative, "The Breath of the Dragon" is the most delicate in workmanship, and "The World for Sale" is just what one is accustomed to in the writing of Sir Gilbert Parker.

———

"The Green Alleys" (Macmillan, $1.50), Eden Phillpotts' latest novel, is written in an atmosphere redolent with Kentish pastoral charm in the midst of hop-growing and hop-picking, and proves again his remarkable ability to portray English people with a truthfulness that can result solely from long and careful observation. It is a likely comedy and quite pleasant from many a standpoint. Of two brothers, stalwart Nathan, the illegally born, succeeds in winning the hand of Rosa May, in spite of laws and prejudice. Such laws, however, are beneficial to the human family, and God does punish a child for the doings of its parents though Rosa May will not believe it, "whatever the Bible says." What a pity Jenny Crowns did not become a Catholic! Her conversion would have been a highly profitable narrative to follow.——The warmest praise that can be given "A College Girl" (Putnam, $1.25), Mrs. George DeHorne Vaizey's new book, is that the central character is a genuine girl in tastes, aspirations and defects. The story is interesting, refreshing and clean.

———

"Your manuscript doesn't 'quite compel acceptance,'" writes a contributor to the October Atlantic, was the formula used by the editors of ten years ago when rejecting an author's story. "Not enough ginger in it," was their favorite expression a few years later. "Wanting in 'pep,'" then came into vogue, and "without 'punch'" was also widely used by stony-hearted rejectors. "But even 'punch' is obsolescent. This morning an editor returns my offerings with the comment: 'Excellent of their kind, but I prefer stories with more 'kick.'" The writer now looks forward gloomily to the time when a story, to be acceptable, must actually "stab" the reader, and he is even prepared to read in a future letter of rejection: "No magazine can keep on the market today that is not prepared to blow the reader's brains out." "High explosives" will no doubt be demanded in tomorrow's stories. The Sunday supplement and cheap magazine have much to answer for.

———

Nathaniel Hawthorne's "The Seven Vagabonds" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.00), Thomas Nelson Page's "The Shepherd Who Watched by Night" (Scribner, $0.50) and Enos A. Mills's "The Story of Scotch" (Houghton, Mifflin, $0.50) are attractive little holiday books. The first is happily illustrated with drawings by Helen Mason Grose, the second is the story of an amiable old minister's Christmas, and the third is an account of a Rocky Mountain collie's remarkable achievements.—The main charm of Bertha and Ernest Cobb's story of "Arlo" (The Riverdale Press, Brookline, Mass., $1.00) is its simplicity. The characters are well drawn, the pen-pictures are vivid, and Arlo, the hero, is an attractive little chap who will readily win his way to the hearts of young readers.——In "Robert Kane's Schooldays" (Sylvester Pub. Co., Buffalo, $1.20) Frederick J. Kinney has given us the first of four stories depicting the struggle of a typical American college boy to overcome his mischievous nature and to do what he knows to be right. The account of his many escapades, which show him to be a real boy, will make interesting reading for the young.

———

Here are some good text-books from the press of Allyn & Bacon: They have brought out a new edition of Stevenson's "Treasure Island" ($0.45) in their "Academy Classics" series. It is well illustrated and includes a short life of the author, a glossary, a few topics of composition suggested by the story, and a valuable chapter outlining the editor's plan for deriving profit from reading the book in class.——Paul Valentine Bacon's "New German Grammar for Beginners" ($1.25) is an improvement on its predecessor. Though built on the same plan, its easy reading selections in the first part of the book are more modern and practical, while the illustrations, poems, songs set to music, and the large, clear map of the German Empire increase the interest of this part of the book. Helps for German conversation are many, and an additional aid is found in the German questions on the reading matter, which are cleverly worded. In the grammar lessons, (Part II) the oral exercises and themes are all on the reading matter of Part I. A chapter on pronunciation, another on phonetics, a third on word-building and Grimm's law are given, and the book closes with a vocabulary and index.——"The New Chardenal French Course" ($1.25), revised and rewritten by Maro S. Brooks, retains the arrangement and scope of the older grammar, but abundant exercises for oral drill on the forms and idioms have been added, besides a number of new and interesting selections for reading. The attractive and numerous pictures in the book can be utilized as topics for French conversations.

"Voices from the Valley" (Kenedy, $0.75) is the title of F. McKay's well-made selections of short passages from the works of saints and ascetical writers, who describe the utility and beauty of the Christian virtues.——For the use of colleges and academies Father W. B. Sommerhauser, S. J., has prepared a "Student's Mass Book and Hymnal" (Herder, $0.35) which contains, besides the usual devotions, sodality prayers, etc., the words and music of more than ninety hymns arranged by the Rev. Victor Winter, S. J. The little book's completeness and reasonable price should commend it to Catholic educators.——"The Book of the Junior Sodalists of Our Lady" (Kenedy, $0.50) which Father Elder Mullan, S. J., has compiled and arranged, seems to contain all the prayers and instructions that the youthful sodalist needs. Particularly worthy of note are the pages on the "Day of Recollection" and on "Vocation."

The September-October number of the Poetry Review, an excellent bi-monthly magazine published by Erskine MacDonald, London, opens with a paper on "The Mystical Note in Poetry," by Theodore Maynard. "Mysticism as practised by the Blessed," he observes, "was their experimental knowledge of God gained through love of him." The Church's greatest mystics, St. Bernard, St. Catharine of Siena, St. Teresa, etc., are then shown to have been the most well-poised and practical persons that ever lived. Mr. Maynard considers one of the hopeful signs of our day "a very real modern revival of interest in mysticism. When this appears in verse—as it does in the work of so many contemporary poets—it is always the earnest of a renewed literary vigor and originality." As a good example of the new spirit in our poets, he cites Ralph Hodgson's exquisite little lyric, "The Mystery":

He came and took me by the hand
  Up to a red rose tree.
He kept His meaning to Himself
  But gave a rose to me.

I did not pray Him to lay bare
  The mystery to me,
Enough the rose was Heaven to smell,
  And His own face to see.

"The sense of divine domesticity has come back to us," concludes Mr. Maynard, "and the text is always 'It is not too hard for thee, neither is it far aff,'" as Mr. Chesterton has Our Lady say in the "Ballad of the White Horse":

The gates of Heaven are lightly locked,
  We do not guard our gain,
The heaviest hind may easily
Come silently and suddenly
  Upon me in a lane

And any little maid that walks
  In her good thoughts apart,
May break the guard of the three kings
And see the dear and dreadful things
  I hid within my heart.

Every lover of poetry ought to read Sir Herbert Warren's admirable address on "The Appeal of Poetry to Our Day," which appears in this number of the Poetry Review.

EDUCATION

On the Education of Boys

"AND what," asked Dusenbury, "are you going to do with Willibrod?"

"Nothing tonight, thank God!" I replied. "His mother is putting him to bed now."

I should explain that Willibrod is my three-year-old son, and that Dusenbury is a lawyer who was in my class at Metropolitan University ten years ago. He is famous for his broad-mindedness, and smokes my cigars today as freely as he did before I became a black Papist. His own religious beliefs are those of a Wilson Democrat.

"Yes," he said. "But I mean, how are you going to educate him? You are going to send him to Metropolitan University aren't you?"

"No," I replied. "I'm not going to send him to Metropolitan University, or any other institution of the sort."

"I hope," said Dusenbury, in some alarm, "that you are not planning to make a monk out of that unfortunate child."

The Question of Vocation

"AT present," I said, "Willibrod is more like a monkey than a monk. I have never seriously considered the question of whether or not he has a vocation to the religious life. You see, he is only three years old, and according to the most authoritative casuists and ascetical writers, a vocation seldom manifests itself indisputably before the age of three years and six months. However, I am glad that you have brought the question to my attention. I will give it serious consideration, as I know you desire."

"You can't evade the subject by talking nonsense," said Dusenbury, forcefully biting off the end of a cigar. "If you're not going to send your son to the university from which you and I were graduated, why aren't you going to do so? And where will you send him?"

"The chief reason why I am not going to send Willibrod to Metropolitan University," I said, "is that you and I went there. You see, I acquired a somewhat intimate knowledge of the university during my four years there. I had a very good time, and I was graduated with a fairly respectable character and with, I think, sufficient knowledge to justify my Bachelor's degree. But I don't want a son of mine to go there. It's too hard."

"Too hard?" said Dusenbury in amazement. "Why I didn't think you had any difficulty in getting through."

"That isn't it," I answered. "Of course I had no difficulty getting through, and neither did you, and neither did Fred Crackenthorpe who was drunk for the last three months of his senior year, and neither did Schloss who used to carry his Iliad translations copied out on tissue paper in the cuffs of his trousers. Any one who is not a moron can graduate from Metropolitan University. But it's no easy matter to get an education there.

What Does "A. B." Mean?

"YOU see, at Metropolitan University the degree of A.B. doesn't mean that the graduate has studied arts, nor, necessarily, that he is a bachelor! It merely means that he has done four years' time, more or less, that his father has satisfied the bursar's demands. You remember what the elective system meant when we were in college. Well, it means ever so much more now. Of course no one but a few grinds studied Greek when we were in college, and now Latin has been taken off the required list. Two years of Latin used to be the requirement. Now the students in the arts course may select at will the material for the degree that will certify to their classical education. Bookkeeping, photography, the history of Japanese prints, classic dancing, folk-songs, domestic science, efficiency; these are the things that entitle a youth to the degree of A.B. at Metropolitan University.

"It's different at the college where I expect Willibrod to matriculate. There his course of studies will be planned for him not in accordance with his own whim, but in accordance with the soundest traditions of classical scholarship. He will study Latin. He will study Greek, and it will be impossible for him to graduate without what may be truthfully described as a classical education."

"What is the name of this paragon of colleges?" asked Dusenbury.

"Well, there are a great many that answer this description," I said. "But the one I have in mind is named the College of St. Jocundus."

What It May Mean

I HANDED him the catalogue and announcement of this institution of learning. "Look it over," I said, "and see if I am not right in saying that an A.B. from this college really means twenty times as much as one from Metropolitan University. Of course you will say that for a college to be under the control of a religious society is perniciously medieval, and that the favorite indoor sport of the professors at this college is making the end justify the means. But aside from these characteristically intelligent criticisms, what do you think of the curriculum?"

Dusenbury studied the little book. "Yes," he said at length, "this is a sound classical course. And I agree with you that the elective system is wrong. But of the many objections to this college which occur to me, let me state one which is based not on religious grounds, but on those of ordinary common sense. The faculty of the College of St. Jocundus consists, I see, entirely of clergymen. For the sake of argument I will admit that they are very worthy, pious men. But they are not educators, they are not even scholars. None of these men, not even the Rector of the college, has ever taken an academic degree. The only letters after their names are those which indicate the religious society to which they belong."

"In the first place," I said, "the education of boys and young men has been one of the chief purposes of this society since its foundation some centuries ago. It has founded schools, colleges, and universities in all parts of the world. Any history of education will show you the tremendous debt which the science of pedagogy owes to this society. In the second place, the absence of letters indicating degrees after the names of the professors does not indicate what you think it indicates.

Education and Degrees

"MOST, I might say all, of the members of the faculty who are, as you say, members of the religious society, took their degrees as Bachelor or Masters of Arts as a preliminary step to entering the society. After becoming members they spent from ten to fifteen years in most exacting study, traveling about the world to study at the greatest universities. There is no man on the faculty of Metropolitan University who has had such a preparation for teaching. It happens to be the custom of the members of this society to have the education and not use the degrees—which certainly is as legitimate as the more popular custom of using the degrees and not having the education."

"What do you actually know about this college?" asked Dusenbury. "Aren't you just theorizing from the catalogue?"

"No," I answered, "I happen to know this college pretty well. A friend of mine teaches English there, and I have paid him several visits, once spending a week with him. And the thing that impressed me about the College of St. Jocundus was that it is actually difficult for a boy to go there and not be decent and well-educated. Is this true of Metropolitan?"

Life at Metropolitan

"THE seventeen- or eighteen-year-old boy at Metropolitan University is his own master. With a number of other boys belonging to his Greek letter secret society, he lives in a pleasant little house free from faculty supervision. The boys hire their own servants and manage the house to suit themselves. They are now free from home ties and restraints. There is no one to tell them that they must or must not do anything. They attend a certain number of morning lectures, but the afternoon and evening are their own, and the great city is their playground. You know the result. You and I emerged morally and physically sound. But the Metropolitan University was not responsible for that. And as I look back on the drunkenness and vice which made up the chief recreation of fifty per cent of the students at Metropolitan University; when I remember the broken and diseased bodies, the weakened minds and the lost souls that were directly the result of the four years' license that led to a Bachelor of Arts degree; when I remember the atheism, Socialism, anarchism and free love that were openly advocated by some of the professors—then I resolve that my son shall do without the questionable prestige which comes from attendance at Metropolitan University. I do not say that every graduate of a Catholic college is a scholar and a gentleman. But I do say that it is easier to get a real education and lead a decent life at a Catholic college than at a secular college. Indeed, I believe that the young man who is not harmed morally, intellectually or physically by four years at a secular college has most cruelly overworked his Guardian Angel."

Sinclair Barry.

SOCIOLOGY

Employer and Employee

SUDDENLY transported from the cloistral peace of a college laboratory to the turmoil of modern commercial life, my convictions with regard to the problems of labor and capital have undergone radical changes. The change, I think, was inevitable.

In the first place, it has been impressed upon me that cooperation and arbitration would be immeasurably advanced by a more general use of the terms "employer" and "employeé," instead of "labor" and "capital." In the mind of the average uneducated and un-Christian laborer, capital has no significance but money. That it may mean brains combined with industry does not enter into his calculation. Capital is to him a metallic entity only, and the clink of gold is maddening to the envious poor. On the other hand, the drive of the pick and the groan of the loom are too often in the ears of capital nothing more than the inevitable noise of machinery developing wealth. Materialism rules the thought of each.

Ill-Omened Terms

THE terms, "employer" and "employeé," convey a human relationship. To the employed the employer stands for a force more or less tractable, which furnishes employment and pay-envelopes. Employment is a right, while labor implies a wrong. When the capitalist uses the terms "my employeés," rather than "Labor" with a capital "L," you may be almost certain that labor regards him more in the light of an employer than as capital. The human element is present, and it implies, if it does not always display, human obligations on both sides. An employer or an employeé is a person, not a slumbering, volcanic force. The laborer is more interested in paid employment than he is in abstract power; while the employer who does not delegate his power wholly to bosses and subordinates sooner realizes its limitations and responsibilities.

The fruits of higher wages and increased leisure, already so terribly demonstrated in England, are becoming more obvious in the United States. An automobile and the time to use it, are more and more the dream of the American working man. An increase of funds for a decrease of employment certainly has its terrors, for it creates a still wider breach between employer and employed, whose pursuits of pleasure and advantage are rarely in the same direction.

A Training School

IN the somewhat rare instances of superior mind and aims on the part of the employed, I believe it would be a peculiar and almost abnormal employer who would not foster and promote good aspirations. Experimenting upon my new theory, I have of late employed in conversation, in correspondence and in my Catholic work for the secular press, those terms, "employer" and "employeé," rather than "labor" and "capital," with most gratifying results. I am in correspondence with three young guardsmen now in Texas, two of whom were mine workers in the Pennsylvania graphite region, and one a salesman in a decorative shop. Their advancement towards better manhood during their three months of service astonishes me. When they were at home I had no pretext for personal relations, although I had observed with regret some of their mistakes from afar. In the common bond of patriotism, and upon the basic principles of Catholic truth as constituting the true and only brotherhood of man, I have established a growing friendship. All are Protestants, and one a member of the P. S. O.

I have been enabled to instruct them in the democracy of war and service, which wipes out sectarian skirmishing and sniping of the sort indulged in by unoccupied Patriotic Sons of America. Already they are beginning to "see the joke," and are good-naturedly indulgent toward Brigadier-General O'Neill and the "Fighting 69th" of New York. One, the son of a Civil War veteran, has already been twice promoted. He writes: "I am here to stay as long as my President wants me. I am with him as a soldier, but as a civilian I do not like his doings." Is not this the Church's rule of submission to authority?

Another young soldier writes: "I am learning things here that I would not have learned in ten years of college life, and which will be useful to me as long as I live."

Authority and Obedience

IT is obvious that what these boys have learned for the first time in their young lives is the system of obedience to lawful authority, which is the foundation of all government.

For the first time they have realized that all sound civil government rests upon the support of authority and obedience. Take these away, and you have the modern Mexico. They have learned that there are two relationships in every group of society, superiors and subordinates, and that what one thinks about a superior personally does not matter in the least. They understand that they are bound to respect the authority of the office, whether the officer be respected or not. Yet the rank proves that he is a superior, for one or many reasons, and they are bound to respect that, too.

When these young men return to civil life, we like to think that they will recognize and obey a superior officer in the person of an employer. They will salute him respectfully, listen to him attentively, and give him no "back talk." An employer is always superior to an employee, in the sense that he has by some means, either by natural talent, or by industry or thrift, acquired a greater ability to lead.

The Lesson of Camp Life

THE more these young soldiers improve in bearing, address, and respect to their superior officers, whether civil or military, the more surely are they on the road to promotion. These young workmen now in Texas are American-born, but unable to speak or write correctly. One of them was once under civil arrest for insubordination. Yet the first sentence he wrote me was this: "I have learned that the first law of a soldier is obedience." The sentiment fits in well with Macaulay's statement: "The best disciplined army in Europe is the Society of Jesus." At home these young men were disposed to insubordination. Because of their relations with military authorities, they will be far better qualified to weigh more wisely the relations between employer and employee. They have learned that authority and submission have as legitimate a place in the shop as in the military camp.

E. S. Chester.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Religion and the Y. M. C. A.

IF any doubt of the sectarian character of the Y. M. C. A. still exists in the minds of Catholics, it will be expelled by the tabulated statements of Commission VII of the Protestant Panama Congress. The largest proportionate appropriations for Protestant mission work in Latin America, according to its official report, was made by the American Bible Society, the Southern Baptists, the Methodist Episcopal Church South and the Y. M. C. A. The latter has shown more zeal in a financial way for Protestantizing Latin America than the Protestant Episcopal, the Presbyterian and the Methodist Churches and other denominations enumerated in the order of merit for their contributions to this cause. The status of the Y. M. C. A., therefore, could not be more definitely determined than by this report. With such evidence before their eyes Catholics can have no excuse for continuing to delude themselves.

Amateur Nurses in War Hospitals

"TOO sick to be nursed today," read a sign that hung over a wounded territorial's bed in a British hospital. "Shall I bathe your forehead?" asked the sympathetic amateur nurse of another sick "Tommy." "You may, of course, if it will give you any pleasure," answered the patient wearily. "But fifteen other ladies have bathed it already this morning." A third soldier writes: "After a man has served his king and country faithfully for twenty-one months and finally reached that haven of rest, the Canadian General Hospital, he naturally expects a little peace and quietness." Vain hope! He has left the horrors and the trenches only to fall into the hands of fussy nurses. "From sunny morn to dewy eve they tuck, stroke, massage and caress the beds. Their one ambition in life appears to be that of making a long row of beds look as though they contained no legs or bodies beneath the clothes." The French wounded seem to be better off, for their nurses are largely devoted Sisters of Charity who have had long experience in hospitals.

The Catholic Directory

NO little dissatisfaction is annually expressed at the late appearance of the "Official Catholic Directory," which is of no slight importance to many among the laity as well as to priests and bishops. The blame for this delay cannot reasonably be laid at the door of the publishers, for they mail in good season the blanks to be filled out and returned to the Chancellor's office in the various dioceses. But in not a few cases no notice is paid to these requests. The consequence is a delay from day to day in the expectation that belated reports may still appear. The "Directory" finally goes to press with great portions unchanged because no correct data could be gathered. A similar difficulty exists in many other instances where like appeals are made, with the result that statistics often seem to neglect Catholic works or represent them unfairly, whereas the only reason for the false impression given is the neglect of Catholics to interest themselves in the inquiries directed to them.

Reasons for High Price of Meat

THE main reason for the war prices we are paying for meat appears to be evident from a glance at the large increase in our exports. From 455,000,000 pounds in 1914 they have risen to 1,399,000,000 pounds for the fiscal year 1916. The increase in beef alone has been very great. The total exports in 1914 were 33,000,000 pounds. In 1916 they had risen to almost ten times that amount, being no less than 320,000,000 pounds. While we have been frantically exporting available supplies our herds of cattle are decreasing. According to the Portland Oregonian, it was estimated in 1907 that there were 52,566,000 head of beef stock in the country. In 1914 the number had already fallen to 37,067,000, and has doubtless decreased still further. The calamity to the country, expressed in these figures, becomes still more plain by calling attention to the fact that while beef stock has decreased thirty per cent, the population has increased about ten per cent. "The obvious lesson," reasons the Oregonian, "would seem to be to raise more cattle, but this is a practical and not an academic problem, in which high prices obtained for grain without feeding it to stock figure largely." It is thus that war prices for bread are closely connected with war prices for meat. No hope is held out that conditions will be greatly remedied after the war, unless some way is found of encouraging the meat-producing industry at home.

The New Zealand Film Censorship

A GREAT work has been accomplished by the New Zealand Catholic Federation in bringing about a carefully regulated film censorship. Not only are all films to be submitted to such inspection, but a special building and plant have been erected for this purpose. Appeal is allowed to a committee composed of three members, one of whom represents the picture firms, though he must not be directly interested in the business itself. We quote from the bill in the final form in which it has received the Governor's assent, and thus has practically been enacted:

> On and after October 1, 1916, it shall not be lawful to exhibit any cinematograph film unless it has been approved in the manner hereinafter provided. There shall be appointed from time to time by the Governor such fit persons as the Governor deems necessary as censors of cinematograph films, who shall hold office during the Governor's pleasure. (1) It shall be the duty of every person so appointed to examine every cinematograph film submitted to him for approval. (2) Such approval shall be signified by a certificate in the prescribed form. (3) Such approval shall not be given in the case of any film which, in the opinion of the censor, depicts any matter that is against public order and decency, or the exhibition of which for any other reason is, in the opinion of the censor, undesirable in the public interest. (4) Such approval may be given generally, or may be given subject to a condition that the film shall be exhibited only to any specified class or classes of persons.

The clauses which follow demand approval of every new addition to the film; stipulate the payment of prescribed fees for every film submitted for approval; and indicate the fine and forfeiture of the film should exhibitions be held in contravention of the Act. The sore need of strict film censorship for our own country is apparent to every man and woman whose Christian instincts have not been entirely blunted. Even so-called high-class films, prepared at the greatest expense for supposedly educational and ethical purposes, are often filled with lascivious scenes and near-nudities that under the pretence of conveying a "moral lesson" are really meant to appeal to the prurient.

Our Lady's Rosary at the Front

THE important part played by the rosary in the lives of the soldiers at the front is beautifully described in the Rosary Magazine. It is a well-established fact that Bavarian soldiers frequently recite the beads as they march into action. "One who was present writes that the procession seemed more like a pilgrimage than an army on the way to battle." A young reservist from Cologne, reflecting in his letter upon the good results of war, says: "Here many a one learns again to say his beads, which he had in his hands for the last time on the day of his First Communion. It is precisely the rosary which has become our inseparable companion. Five decades each day is the rule; but when I go on watch I often say all of the fifteen mysteries." Where beads were wanting or had been lost the soldiers on both sides often manufactured them, using bits of wood or pebbles or beans, or simply tying knots in a cord, since the Holy Father, Pope Benedict XV, granted to the soldiers the privilege of gaining the indulgences, during the continuance of the war, even upon beads that are not blessed. "Rosaries are very popular here," an Englishman writes from the front. "I think I can safely say that four out of every ten men that one meets wear them around their necks." Even non-Catholics are found thus to carry them in a spirit of religious devotion. "A soldier going into the field," commented a German serving in Champagne, "cannot be given anything better than a rosary. I am glad to be able to tell you that every one of my Catholic comrades carries his beads. Those who did not bring them from home have received a pair."

Catholic Education in Mexico

IT has been in the interest of the enemies of the Church to spread the popular calumny against her that she has neglected the education of the people and has battened upon their ignorance. An excellent historic answer to this falsehood is contained in the two-penny leaflet of the Central Verein, "Catholic Education in Mexico," reprinted from the Catholic Historical Review and written by the Editor of La Revista Catolica. The first school, that of San Francisco el Grande, in Mexico city, was established shortly after 1523 by Brother Pedro de Gante. About 1,000 children were taught there, some receiving instruction in Latin and other higher branches of learning. In 1534 the Franciscan College of Tlaltelolco was founded, and with the coming of the Fathers of the Society of Jesus there was soon no city of importance that did not have its higher institution of learning for lay students, creoles or mestizos. The education of girls was begun in 1525 by the Teresian Sisters and continued, we are told, by the Franciscan Sisters in most of the eighty-five other convents founded in Mexico. Learning continued to progress, until with the expulsion of the Jesuits and the war waged against the Church by the Liberal party, education almost vanished from the land. When at a later date Porfirio Diaz freely accepted the help of Catholics and Religious Orders, "the number of public primary schools was raised from about 4,000 to 42,000." The Government also established colleges and schools, but the elimination of religion from education soon proved sadly detrimental to the general welfare. Religious education itself was still hampered in the most serious way, though we are informed that there were probably from 4,000 to 6,000 Catholic colleges in existence in Mexico. "All these establishments of virtue and learning have been demolished by the vandalism of the past four years."

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVI. No. 3
WHOLE No. 394

OCTOBER 28, 1916

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—The week has been unproductive of important results on the western front. The French have taken Sailly, the British have made further gains near Thiepval, and the Germans have recaptured some ground in the region of the Blaise Wood between Biaches and La Maisonette; but in no case has a serious change in the situation taken place. In the Trentino and the Goritz district no developments have been recorded. In Macedonia the Serbians have recaptured Brod, crossed the Cerna River north of the town, occupied the southern slopes of the Selechka Mountain, taken the village of Velyeseyo, and reached the outskirts of Baldentsi.

Bulletin, Oct. 17, a.m.-Oct. 23, p.m.

In Volhynia the Russians have been making strenuous but unsuccessful efforts to advance on Kovel and Vladimir-Volynski, they have also lost some positions on the Stochod. In Galicia, near Halicz, the Central Powers have driven the Russians from the west bank of the Narayunka River, northwest of Skomorochy. On the eastern boundary of Transylvania, with the exception of the Gyimes Pass, where the Rumanians have suffered reverses and been obliged to fall back about twelve miles into Rumania towards Tergu Ocna, the Central Powers have not only been obliged to halt their progress but have been forced back into Transylvania. Particularly bitter fighting has been in progress in the Tomos Pass, south of Kronstadt, but here the Rumanians have held their own. Further west, near the Rothenthurm Pass, the Rumanians have captured Mount Surul and Mount Robul, and by so doing have effectually stayed the progress of their opponents.

The greatest success of the week has been gained by the Central Powers in Dobrudja. Here the Rumanian line, which ran from Rasovo to Tuzla, has been pierced in a number of places. The Central Powers have taken Tuzla, Constantsa, Cobadin, and Cocargea, have also stormed the heights northwest of Toprai Sari, and have seized a portion of the Constantsa-Cernavoda railroad. These victories have taken place on the Rumanian left wing; in the coastal region about Constantsa, and at the Rumanian center. Along the Danube, where German success would be a serious blow to Rumania, the Rumanians are holding firm near Rasovo.

Austria-Hungary—Count Karl Stürgkh, the Austrian Prime Minister, was assassinated October 21, while dining in a Vienna hotel. The deed was perpetrated by the ultra-radical Socialist, Dr. Friederich Adler. Three shots were fired resulting in immediate death. Count Stürgkh had been a prominent figure in Austrian politics for many years, although comparatively little known in America. The only utterance from him quoted in our press during the war was the statement that he believed both the Berlin Government and the representative citizens of Austria and Germany were in favor of moderate demands to hasten the end of hostilities. He was born at Gratz, 1859, and was educated at the university of that city. In 1881 he entered the service of the State and on February 3, 1892, was elected to the Reichsrath. He was intimately connected with the various measures taken by the State Educational Department and in 1909 entered the Bienerth Cabinet as Minister of Education. In 1911 he was called upon to form a new ministry. This Cabinet he reorganized on November 30, 1915, to meet the exigencies of the war. His death is not likely to cause any crisis in the war situation itself. The Austrian Parliament has not been in session since the war began.

Austrian Prime Minister Slain

The death of Archbishop Szeptycki, Metropolitan of Lemberg, recently occurred in Russia, where he was a captive. He had refused to abandon his flock and was dragged off by the Russians to prevent his interference with their work of proselyting. His crime was that he had warned his people against apostacy by explaining to them the difference between the Russian and the Catholic Church: "The church of our brethren who have come here," he is quoted to have said, "is a synodical, governmental and official church, while ours is the true, authoritative and Divine institution, because of its unity with the Holy Father at Rome." The indignities inflicted upon him have been previously described. He was born August 29, 1865, at Przylbica in Galicia, of a noble and prominent family, and as a young man entered the Basilian Order. In 1899 he was made Bishop of Stanislaus and in 1900 was appointed Metropolitan of Lemberg.

Catholic Archbishop Dies in Captivity

Germany.—Field Marshal von Hindenburg has firmly opposed the ruthless prosecution of the submarine warfare. This announcement was formally made by him through an official envoy delegated to appear before the "Independent Committee for Peace Terms" and ask for the abandonment of all agitation favoring a relentless submarine campaign. General von Ludendorf has expressed himself in the same sense. His views were made public through a letter from him read at a mass-meeting held at Magdeburg. It was no time, he said, to demoralize the army by controversies over the expediency of means and ways to success. The German people must stand united behind their leaders and give them full confidence. "If to outsiders it seems that a program on certain questions is lacking, this does not prove that the program itself is at fault." Referring to the reported intention on the part of England to arm her merchantmen "with heavy guns," the Kriegszeitung remarks:

Restricting Submarine Warfare

> We wonder whether it is not England's precise intention to bring us into difficulties with other Powers, particularly America, by its new measures. America's answer regarding the admissibility of submarines to neutral harbors and waters was, of course, to be expected. America, which in the future intends to give wide play to the submarines in its own navy, could not possibly tie its hands by establishing important precedents.

The paper believes that if Germany should wish to adapt her methods of warfare to the situation which would thus be created by England, it would be necessary to go over all the possibilities of the new warfare with the Government of the United States. It is confident that, "aside from a few jingoes and shouters who would involve America in the war at any price," the American people would dislike to have the submarine question lead to a new dispute between Germany and the United States.

Great Britain—A summary of a Parliamentary paper containing the reports on the internment camps in England, made by attachés of the American Embassy to the Ambassador, was recently published by the Times. The reports, on the whole, are favorable. The food provided for the prisoners is said to be both appetizing and sufficient, and particular praise is given the hospital arrangements and the facilities for work and recreation. It is interesting to note that in most of the camps, a large degree of self-government is allowed the prisoners. At a camp near Peel, where over 20,000 men are interned, the investigators report the organization to be of an elaborate character. Here are found a prisoner's aid society, committees on education, library, music, dramatics, and sports, all organized by the interned men, as well as a sick and burial club to care for the sick in their last illness and to tend the graves in an adjoining churchyard. Teachers are provided, and French, English, German, Italian, Spanish, mathematics, political economy, bookkeeping and gardening, are subjects in which instruction is offered. At this camp, forty-five acres of ground are available for games. At a camp occupied largely by officers, fifty-five courses in languages, engineering, mathematics and drawing were reported. As might be expected, the investigators write that some complaints were laid before them, and the few that seemed to be of a serious nature were taken up either with the commandant of the camp, or with the War Office.

English Internment Camps

Ireland.—In the House of Commons, on October 18, Mr. John Redmond formally accused the Government of having turned the patriotic enthusiasm of Ireland into indifference and finally into rebellion. In what was practically a motion of censure, he demanded the immediate granting of Home Rule, the release of prisoners still untried for their part in the late rising, and the abolition of martial law. In reply, David Lloyd George admitted that "stupidities beyond belief" had been perpetrated in Ireland, and urged all parties to cooperate in removing causes of injustice, distrust and suspicion "before beginning any controversy about recruiting." Mr. Redmond's resolution read as follows:

Mr. Redmond's Speech

> That the system of government at present maintained in Ireland is inconsistent with the principles wherefor the Allies are fighting in Europe, and is, or has been, mainly responsible for the recent unhappy events and for the present state of feeling in that country.

John Rawlinson, Unionist member for Cambridge University, moved the following amendment to the Redmond resolution:

> Having regard for the importance of the United Kingdom and Ireland combining with the rest of the empire in presenting a united front to the enemy, it is not desirable at the present time to discuss controversial matters of domestic politics.

This amendment was adopted by a vote of 303 to 106, thus eliminating the Redmond motion.

In his speech the Irish leader said that the situation was full of menace. In one passage he declared:

> From the very first the efforts of the Nationalist leaders were thwarted and snubbed, and, looking back, I am amazed at the success which under the circumstances attended their efforts. Ireland has 157,000 men in the army, of whom 92,000 are Catholics, and 10,000 in the navy. Some 30,000 Nationalist volunteers have enlisted, and if it had not been for distrust of Ireland in the early phases of the war the number of volunteers would have been trebled.

He stated that the delay in putting the Home Rule bill on the statute book gave the Government's opponents in Ireland an opportunity of saying that they were about to be cheated in their trade. He complained that the promise made by Mr. Asquith to create an Irish army corps had never been fulfilled. He reminded the Government that the new National University was not allowed to organize an officers' training corps, while a number of privileges had been granted to Trinity University. The final blow, he said, came in the formation of the Coalition Government, for the inclusion of Sir Edward Carson in the Cabinet convinced thousands of Irishmen that they had been betrayed. From that day things had gone from bad to worse and finally came the rising in Easter Week. "I am profoundly convinced," he said, "that if the rising had been dealt with in the spirit in which Premier Botha had dealt with the rising in South Africa it would have meant the saving of the situation." He asked for the cessation of martial law in Ireland and the administration of the Defense of the Realm act on the same basis as in England. Above all, he urged that "the Government · · · trust the Irish people once and for all by putting the Home Rule act into operation and on its own responsibility face any problems which that might entail."

Mexico—The Mexican-American Commission which has been sitting eight weeks, has as yet reached no conclusion. The reason for the delay is not known but on October 18 the New York World, an organ of the Administration, published this significant item: "Dispatches from all over Mexico received by the American Commissioners today were generally pessimistic in tone and showed that conditions are not improving as rapidly as has been alleged." Meanwhile the sometime idol of American statesmen, Villa, continues his depredations in the State of Chihuahua. The dispatches of October 18 announced that Chihuahua City is being fortified in anticipation of an attack, and Villa, once a hero, is now pictured as a murderer and a robber by the very papers that a short time since were grooming him for the Presidency. The two Generals, Torres and Robles, who deserted Villa for Carranza, have reaffirmed their allegiance to the former. Torres is active in Tamaulipas and Robles in Oaxaca. According to well-authenticated reports the latter has issued a manifesto restoring all confiscated lands to their owners, promising liberty to all citizens and reform in the currency. It is now certain that José Inez Salazar has inaugurated a new revolution in Puebla and has captured the chief cities of the State, Puebla City, as it appears, excepted. In other words there are now ten or twelve revolutions in progress in Mexico. Carranza is meeting this emergency by decrees, the latest of which provides that summary punishment, without right of appeal, may be inflicted by the military authorities for nearly all offences not covered by the civil code. Among the crimes punishable by death, without the formality of trial, are incendiarism, robbery, assault in its various forms, and grave interference with railway traffic.

General Conditions

On July 18, 1916, 300 American citizens, refugees from Mexico, met in the court-house of San Antonio, Texas, and issued an appeal which is reprinted in the current number of the Observer, published in Ladora, Iowa. The following abstracts are significant:

Appeal of American Citizens

Through misrepresentation which forced its way into a portion of the press of the United States an uprising then restricted to a very small portion of the most illiterate section of northern Mexico and confined to one State, was given aid in its inception by many Americans in the United States. . . . Arms, money, ammunition, and men were furnished against the urgent protest of the Americans of Mexico, who knew conditions and could forecast the inevitable results. Prominent Americans of Mexico, supported by capitalists and laboring Americans of that country, were sent to Washington to protest, but their prayers were unheard by our Government. . . . We have seen [and read] with unparalleled tolerance in American history, the murder of hundreds of our men, women and children by irresponsible bandits on this and the other side of the border; the ravishing and otherwise outraging of our women; the burning of the homes and the bodies of the victims; the destruction of our property; insults to the American flag and people; the ambushing of our soldiers; the raiding of our homes; the theft of our property, and unlimited fiendish outrages that would take volumes to recite. . . .

It is estimated that approximately a million of Mexico's people have sought refuge in the United States during the past five years, and an inestimable number have taken the places of American labor in the various channels on railways, mines, factories, and all kinds of public and private work. Tens of thousands of Mexican children of refugees whose parents have signified no intention of becoming citizens are in the public free schools of our country availing themselves of the school funds left as a heritage to our children. Los Angeles, California, recently sent an appeal asking that immigration of Mexicans to this country be restricted, alleging that they had over five thousand public charges in that city alone. San Antonio, El Paso, and practically every town and city within a hundred and fifty miles of the eighteen hundred miles of border have their hospitals and charity departments burdened with the afflicted unfortunates of that country. Epidemics of smallpox, threatened epidemics of typhus and other kindred diseases have kept the people along the border in constant dread, cost innumerable lives and vast amounts of money. Venereal diseases, which have reached a stage of deplorable magnitude in that country, are being spread by them throughout the land. The burning of eighteen prisoners in the El Paso jail was directly the result of precautions against disease from Mexico. Our jails along the entire area are filled with Mexicans charged with every conceivable crime and the court and jail costs are an immense cost upon our people. The people along the border live in perpetual dread of these murderers and robbers. In Mexico chaotic conditions beggar description. Famine, disease, and pestilence stalk throughout the land and thousands are stricken daily. The suffering is indescribable and inconceivable to those who have not witnessed it. Feudism has prevailed between innumerable irreconcilable factions until crystallization among them for relief is hopeless. Arms and ammunition have been distributed to bandits and feudists practically throughout the entire republic, mainly through agencies in the United States. The best type of citizens who pray for peace are either shot down or forced to join these bands of robbers, who affiliate first with the one side and then with the other. The de facto President and his officers have virtually no control over a large contingent of their army.

The El Paso Morning Times has this to say of conditions:

Despite the word sent out from Washington that conditions are improving, conditions are distinctly not improving. During the almost six years of bloody strife in the neighboring republic conditions never were as hopeless and as horrible as now. Gaunt famine stalks through the land. Men, women and children perish from hunger, thousands are dying of typhus, smallpox and other deadly maladies, and the paper government maintained by Citizen Venustiano Carranza is powerless to afford the slightest relief. While the people starve, while lawless bands sweep through the country, looting and burning, assaulting women and young girls, the First Chief sits in the national palace and issues decrees abolishing bull fighting, changing the divorce laws and instituting other reforms. . . . The country cries for food, the Citizen First Chief decrees a divorce law. The plague-stricken inhabitants of the cities plead for doctors and sanitation, the Citizen First Chief abolishes bull fighting. The people of the rural districts implore protection against piratical marauders and the First Chief issues a decree prescribing the death penalty for such as attend meetings of labor unions. . . . Mexico is no longer a nation, but a collection of starving, miserable, plague-stricken people, the prey to any band of lawless marauders that is able to secure arms and munitions with which to further oppress the helpless. These bands of criminals respect no one. The nurses of the hospitals, the teachers in the schools, the wives and daughters of the peaceful inhabitants are prey to the bestial lusts of the ruffians who have the temerity to call themselves soldiers.

Finally all this is confirmed by a correspondent of AMERICA whose knowledge is first-hand.

Rome.—Some time after the interview granted by Cardinal Gasparri, the Secretary of State to his Holiness, to M. Edouard Helsey, a representative of the Paris Journal, Madame Reisac published in La Belgique another interview with his Eminence. In it she attributed statements and expressions to the Cardinal which were evidently pure inventions. Among them were the following. The Cardinal, in speaking of the aftermath of the war, is reported by Madame Reisac to have said:

The Reisac Interview

The whirlwind of this terrible conflict will draw into its vortex victorious France, if she does not attend to the dangers which the victory of her allies is preparing for her. Is it possible that the republic does not understand the Russian menace? In a few years the Slav will swallow us up.

The Osservatore Romano officially asserted that the Cardinal had made no such declarations. Madame Reisac then replied that she had received them, not directly from the Cardinal, but from M. Helsey. The latter thus accused, promptly telegraphed from Salonica to Cardinal Gasparri, as follows:

I have been profoundly shocked to learn that some Italian and Belgian papers have just published and commented upon declarations which I am supposed to have made to a certain Madame Reisac, after the interview which your Eminence was kind enough to grant me, and which I reproduced in the Journal with scrupulous exactness. I have never, at any time, even heard the name of Madame Reisac. I have made no statement whatever either to her or to anyone else. It is not my business to grant interviews, but to have them granted me. I do not as yet know what fantastic statements may have been attributed to me, but I deem it my duty to protest without delay and as emphatically as I can against this unscrupulous abuse of my name. Obliged as I am, to remain here on the Macedonian front, I beg your Eminence to give to this denial the widest publicity. . . .

There is a moral to this story which Catholics must take to heart. More than ever it is becoming clear that no credence can be given to statements attributed to the Holy Father or the Cardinal Secretary of State unless authenticated beyond the shadow of a doubt.

Spain.—The Official Gazette has just published a royal decree by which the present Bishop of Madrid, Dr. José Maria Salvador y Barrera, has been transferred to the archiepiscopal see of Valencia. The new Archbishop is a figure of national importance. A graduate of the University of Sacro Monte in Granada, he obtained by public concursus in 1878, a canonry in the collegiate church of that famous religious and educational center, and later became rector of the University and professor of its faculty of law. He began at that time to be recognized as one of Spain's best-known authorities on education. On his elevation to the bishopric of Tarrazona in 1901, one of his first steps was to restore and remodel the seminary, and to found a chair of sociology, the first of its kind in Spain. Promoted to the bishopric of Madrid-Alcalá in 1907, he has played a prominent part in recent educational history. A counselor of public instruction and a distinguished figure in Parliament, he has eloquently combated the secularizing attempts and tendencies of the last few years. His forceful speeches on the subject of neutral schools in 1912, and on the obligation of the masters to teach Christian doctrine and sacred history, attracted wide attention. In his recent pastorals, he has treated the same subjects with a logic, eloquence, and learning which have made him the champion of Catholic education. To his zeal and initiative is due the creation of the Catholic University Academy in Madrid. He has likewise been the life and soul of Catholic action in the capital. He has been an incessant parliamentary worker and has managed a splendid campaign in the Senate in behalf of the Religious Orders, the rural clergy, and the rights of the Church. His literary and scientific attainments have won for him his election as a member of the Academies of History and of Moral and Political Sciences.

A Great Archbishop

Catholics could not approve of all the policies or writings of Don José Echegaray. But they will be consoled to know that the statesman, poet, scientist, mathematician, the founder of the modern school of drama in Spain, the most versatile genius the country has produced for many years, died a pious and edifying death, after receiving the Last Sacraments with every sign of faith and devotion and reverently pronouncing the Sacred Name. Echegaray has been frequently compared by his countrymen to the men of the Renaissance, to Leonardo de Vinci and Michael Angelo, whom he seemed to rival in the variety and the perfection of his gifts. In 1904 he received the Nobel prize for literature.

Echegaray's Death

The Origin of Civilization in Europe

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., Ph.D.

THE key-note of the year's science is struck for English-speaking countries at least in the presidential address of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. The address this year was made by Arthur Evans, whose explorations in the Balkans and Crete have made him so well known, and it has just been published in Science. Naturally the speaker dealt with archeology, the science of ancient civilizations, and reviewed the latest publications with regard to paleontology in a way all the more remarkable because for the time being these paleontological results quite overshadow the Cretan discoveries. It is wonderful to find that a thousand years before Greece, Crete possessed a well-developed civilization. The marvelous Minoan civilization just revealed in Crete shows that that Island must unquestionably be regarded as the birthplace, 4000 years ago, of our European civilization in its higher form. But, as Dr. Evans suggests, instead of this bringing us appreciably nearer to the fountain-head, the recent discoveries in the caves go so far back beyond it as to make Crete seem almost of our generation.

President Evans has quoted particularly the books recently published with regard to the Cave Man. Abbé Breuil's work in Anthropologie [Volume XXVI, 1915] and Professor Sollas's "Ancient Hunters" have added so much to previous knowledge of the Cave Man as to make his story even more interesting. It might be expected that after the climax of attention given during the last few years to the men of the old Stone Age there would be a reaction, showing that the significance of the Cave Man's achievements had been exaggerated. These recent details make the story of the earliest ancestors of man in Europe more astounding than ever. Here is no beast just become human and struggling upward, but an artist and a social being, an inventor and a discoverer.

According to Dr. Evans, "A very high level of artistic attainment in Southwestern Europe was attained then, at a modest estimate, some 10,000 years earlier than the most ancient monuments of Egypt or Chaldea." Nor was art an isolated phenomenon of high development in the Cave Man. There is no doubt, for instance, that these earliest ancestors of man in Europe firmly believed in a life after death, and as far as possible, by their burial customs and rites took care to prepare their dead for it. Flint knives and bone javelins were placed within reach of the hands of the departed and their most valued ornaments decked their persons. Such ornaments were highly prized, yet they were willingly sacrificed. Lumps of iron peroxide, the red stains of which colored the skulls and bones, so that the dead might make a brave show in the after life, were buried with them. I believe that it is sometimes the fashion now for the undertaker to rouge the cheeks of dead ladies. Verily in some ways we are reverting to the customs of our gifted ancestors, the cave-dwellers.

Discoveries of the art-work of the Cave Men of the old Stone Age have gone on apace in recent years and with surprising results. As investigation has proceeded, the height of achievement which the men of "the Reindeer Age" reached in France and Spain is ever rising in the estimation of paleontologists and the caves become veritable museums, yet the objects found were only accidentally preserved from the vicissitudes of time because they were buried in the bowels of the earth. Anyone who thinks that perhaps the special students of this age have been exaggerating the significance of such art-remains needs but read one of President Evans's paragraphs to be assured that what has been said so far is below rather than above the reality. Dr. Evans says:

> "In their most developed stage . . . these primeval frescoes display not only a consummate mastery of natural design but an extraordinary technical resource. Apart from the charcoal used in certain outlines, the chief coloring matter was red and yellow ochre. . . . In single animals the tints are varied from black to dark and ruddy brown or brilliant orange, and so, by fine gradations, to paler nuances, obtained by scraping and washing. Outlines and details are brought out by white incised lines, and the artists availed themselves with great skill of the reliefs afforded by convexities of the rock surface."

And the Cave Man was an inventor as well as an artist. He had evidently used fire for every purpose; he also used lights to advantage, for his caves were dark. Fire is one of man's greatest discoveries. The man who discovered it wrested from nature one of its most effective sources of energy, if not absolutely its most effective. The Greeks even attributed the discovery to the gods, and one of their best-known legends describes how, out of pity for men, Prometheus had stolen fire from heaven. Now the Cave Man used fire and then applied for illuminating purposes the natural agent thus secured. As President Evans says:

> But the greatest marvel of all is that such polychrome masterpieces as the bisons, standing and couchant, or with limbs huddled together, of the Altamira Cave, were executed on the ceilings of inner vaults and galleries where the light of day has never penetrated. Nowhere is there any trace of smoke, and it is clear that great progress in the art of artificial illumination had already been made. We now know that stone lamps, decorated in one case with the engraved head of an ibex, were already in existence.

Recent investigations clearly show that figures of various kinds and symbols suggestive of writing, or at least of hieroglyphics, were carved on the walls and entrances of these caves. In some cases there are distinct groups of signs which, according to President Evans, occur together so as to resemble "regular inscriptions." "It is not surprising," he adds, "that in some quarters they should have been regarded as evidence that the art of writing had already been evolved by the men of 'the Reindeer Race.'" He states also that "A symbolic value certainly is to be attributed to these signs and it must at least be admitted that by the close of the late Quaternary Age considerable advance had been made in hieroglyphic expression." As such a development for man has usually been reserved with absolute assurance to a comparatively short historical period almost in our own time, this discovery of the prehistoric inscribed expression of men's thoughts is indeed a surprise.

Perhaps the most interesting thing for popular information is the style of the ladies' gowns. At Cogul the pictures show the ladies wearing gowns with well-cut skirts, but without much waist and the skirts rather short. That seems to be the special old fashion we have reverted to in our time. At Alpera there are ladies with the same sort of skirts, but their dress is supplemented by flying sashes. On the rock painting of the Cueva de la Vieja, near Alpera, women are seen wearing still longer gowns cut high in the waist. Manifestly the cave woman must have been at least as interesting as her husband and brothers.

At Alpera several new elements are found in the picture. For the first time bowmen are seen and some of the hunters wear plumed head-dresses. Some of these groups of hunters have jackals or dogs accompanying them, showing that the process of domesticating animals had evidently begun. In one case two opposed bands of archers are drawn up as if for battle, but curiously enough in the earlier period of paleolithic man there are no weapons that seem made for war. The radical pacifist should have been living then.

Every advance then in our knowledge of man before our time has been a surprise. When Greece and Rome seemed old it was a shock to find how much had been accomplished in Etruria and Egypt. Voltaire called Herodotus "the father of lies" rather than "the father of history" because he ventured to suggest a magnificent ancient development of civilization in the Euphrates and Nile countries, and the Manetho dynasties were scoffed at. Now we know that the story of man goes back far beyond these and that the remains uncovered show man like ourselves and not some lower being gradually struggling upwards. Even the men of the old Stone Age had good taste, fine powers of artistic expression and domestic tendencies. They tried to make their homes beautiful and were much more interested in art and the desire to enjoy the beauties of life than in its mere utilities. They were also the inventors of fire and lamps, brushes and painting in oils. This evidently shows that they had the power to develop a utilitarian civilization, had that been their impelling desire. Such are the conclusions which Dr. Evans has brought out in his recent address.

The War and Labor Conditions

A. Hilliard Atteridge

With so much of the existing industrial resources of the country given over to munitions and war supplies of all kinds, the Government has become directly or indirectly the chief employer of labor. Besides its control of munition works, in the widest sense of the term, it has temporary control of other forms of industry. For instance, all the railways and all the flour mills are working under Government direction or supervision. Thus for the time being, there is an approach to the situation imagined by the Socialists as ideal.

War conditions mean a considerable abridgment of personal liberty, and this has taken place to a very serious extent among the workers. The old freedom of contract as to employment and wages is largely suspended. Under the Munitions act, the Government has the right to declare any manufacturing district where war-work is being done directly for the State, or indirectly through contractors, a "Munitions Area." Once a district has been proclaimed, there is a radical alteration in conditions of employment. A man cannot leave his work and transfer his services to another employer, without the permission of the local "Munitions Tribunal." At the same time, it is an offence against the act for an employer to try to induce a workman to come into his service and leave another employer for this purpose. Once a man is on a job, he must stick to it, unless he can persuade the Tribunal to give him permission to change. The mere fact that he will get better wages in another factory is not accepted as a valid reason. Further, absence from employment, or neglect of work, is an offence punishable by fine or imprisonment. Any agitation for improved wages and conditions can be dealt with either by the infliction of penalties, or more simply by ordering those who are responsible for the trouble to remove to another district and accept work there. These powers have been exercised more than once. The right of deporting a man does not arise directly, under the Munitions act, but is part of the very wide powers given to the authorities under the earlier National Defense act, which was passed by Parliament just after the declaration of war.

The compulsory powers of the Government in the regulation of labor have been considerably increased, not directly but indirectly, through the enactment of conscription. When the act was proposed, many of the Labor members opposed it on the ground that, though primarily a military conscription act, it might be used to bring industrial pressure to bear on the workers. They had in mind, amongst other things, the action of the French Government during the railway strike of 1913. Under French military law, most of the railway men on strike were liable to service, either in the active army or the territorial force. The Government broke the strike by calling them all to the colors, and then ordering them to work the railways under military control. Whilst our own Military Service act was passing through Parliament, the Government gave a pledge that no such use would ever be made of it.

But indirectly the compulsory powers possessed by the military authorities affect labor conditions. Large numbers of men of military age, that is, between eighteen and forty-one, had been exempted from military service, because they were still workers engaged in some form of munition or war-work, which for the moment was more important than mere service in the ranks of the army. Indeed some thousands of skilled workers were sent back from the front, released from military service and sent to the workshops. Now, all these men are only exempt from the Military Service act, so long as they are employed on munition work, or other necessary work recognized by the tribunals. If they give up their job, or if they are dismissed, and do not find similar work within two months, they at once become liable to military service and are sent to the depots. It is obvious that this gives an employer or a foreman a new power of controlling his workmen. A man can be dismissed and dismissed with such a record that he will not easily find other work. If this were done, the discharged employee would be forced into the army. I do not say that this has been done to any great extent, but it is alleged that unscrupulous employers have used this indirect power as a threat and a means of disciplinary coercion. There have also been cases where, without dismissing workers from the army in order to send them into the workshops, they have been sent there as soldiers to work under military direction, drawing only their military pay. A case of this in the steel works in South Wales, where about a hundred soldiers are so employed, has caused a good deal of agitation, the trade union leaders alleging that it is a breach of the pledge that all workers should receive the full rate of trade union wages, plus the recognized additional war bonus.

It will be seen that, although, taking it as a whole, the new legislation has been prudently and moderately administered, in principle it means curtailment in various directions of the workers' freedom. It is a temporary state of things, of course, accepted in a patriotic spirit, as one of the necessary conditions of war-time. But it is very interesting as a practical commentary on the Socialist theory of the State as the one employer and controller of labor. It is a proof for all time that Socialism and liberty, as we ordinarily understand it, are incompatible. But on the other hand, the greatest industrial experiment has enforced lessons of another kind. At the outset the attempt was made to increase output by working long hours and keeping the factories going on Sundays and week-days alike. It was found that, under this system, there was much illness among the workers, especially among the women, that there were many permanent breakdowns of health, that accidents became more frequent and that the output actually fell off under the strain of long fatigue and the quality of the work deteriorated. The Government appointed a commission with an eminent doctor as its chairman "To consider and advise on questions of industrial fatigue, hours of labor and other matters affecting the personal health and physical efficiency of workers in munition factories and workshops." It was not a question of philanthropic reform, it was a question of how to get the best results from the labor of the 2,000,000 men and women already employed on munition work.

The reports of the Committee, issued in a series of memoranda on various topics, are a most important contribution to social science. They lay it down emphatically that Sunday work is a mistake. It must be confined, they say, to exceptional emergencies, necessary repairs of machinery, keeping furnaces alight, and the like, and the men thus employed must have another day of rest in the week. They condemn overtime, even where the worker is anxious for it, for the sake of the extra pay. They assert that, exclusive of meal-times, the average weekly hours of work should not exceed from sixty-five to sixty-seven, and the higher figure should only be allowed for short periods to meet emergencies. Sixty-five hours in six days means an average of something over ten hours a day. Before the war, in some of the most efficient factories the eight-hour system had been introduced, with the result that the output, instead of falling off, actually increased.

The most important proposal of the Commission, to which practical effect is now being given, is that: "In every factory and workshop a man or woman should be appointed to act, not as a mere overseer in the ordinary sense, but as an official Welfare Supervisor." The duties of this new official are: "To advise and help the workers in the matter of lodging, food, and health generally." The supervisor is to keep a register of available houses and lodgings, to find out how the workers come to the factory, advise them how to diminish time and fatigue in traveling, and if necessary, have the working hours altered, so as to fit in better with local means of transit. Further, they are to advise as to food, and if necessary, see that canteens and dining-rooms are organized in or near the factories where good meals can be had at moderate prices. In addition to all this, they are to pay special attention to the health of the women and the younger workers, taking care that employees do not stay at work, when they require rest or medical assistance.

In many of the factories, in the spirit of these suggestions, trained nurses are attached to the women's department, rest-rooms are provided for the workers, and an emergency ward with proper surgical assistance is ready to deal immediately with any accident.

All these arrangements have been made with purely utilitarian views. But they represent most useful reforms. The war-time experiment will convince every employer by practical demonstration that a certain amount of expenditure on the welfare of the workers gives an immediate and direct result in an improved output from the factory. There is no doubt that the welfare supervision system, thus inaugurated during the war, will become a permanent feature of English industry, and this is a solid gain. It had been proposed before the war, and in a few cases, actually adopted, but it was generally regarded rather as a Utopian scheme. The stress of war has led to the experiment being made, and the improved state of things has come to stay.

Cords of Adam

B. M. KELLY

IT is close upon 400 years since Martin Luther proclaimed himself under the imperative necessity of "cursing the Pope and his kingdom," and one of the reasons which he gave for the performance of this duty was the restoration of the Christian Faith to what has been called its "seat in the heart." He had, he asserted, brought folk to esteem once more the earthly calling. "Before my time," said he with characteristic modesty, "nobody knew . . . what the secular power, what matrimony, parents, children, master, servant, wife or maid really signified." There is an amazing section of mankind which rejects miracles as unreasonable, but which has never, even down to our own day, experienced any difficulty in accepting this view of the Pope and his kingdom.

Catholicism, as they see it, is a monstrous system, whereby man's nature is thwarted, his affections stifled, his will harnessed, his intellect darkened. They wax indignant over what they call its "terrific asceticism." "She was no mother, but a saint," is the glib comment of Henry Osborne Taylor, self-constituted interpreter of the "Medieval Mind." He is speaking of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, and the inference is that sanctity, which is Catholicism carried to its logical conclusion, crowds out maternal tenderness.

A few years ago Mr. Carlos Lumsden, writing on the conditions prevailing anterior to the Reformation, said: "The too human beauty of his [Raphael's] Madonnas shows that the eye of the painter was leaving the heaven which the old Faith had bidden him look on, and was scanning humanity closer." And again, the Lutheran task of humanizing mankind having been fairly launched: "In Rembrandt . . . the painter's eye has left the things that are not, to look at the things that are."

It would not be a difficult task, even for one not versed in theology, to pile up citations from theological writers in flat and categorical denials of Luther's assertion, but his appeal was ad hominem, and there is no need to lift the discussion from that plane. Admitting, therefore, that the Protestant system has given the old Adam the upper hand, it is, to say the least, a curious freak of evolution that the result should be a host of dismal creeds, in which there is no room for human tenderness, no warmth, no light, no inspiration. Perhaps if a forewarned humanity had the choice to make over again no part of it would declare for the Scotch Sabbath, the Puritan "Blue Laws," or that ultimate production of nature unbridled by grace, the superman. As for the positivist deification of humanity, Mr. W. H. Mallock has long since made it abundantly evident what little space it affords for the play of human feeling.

So much for Luther's achievement. But was there, after all, any occasion for him to make the attempt? Is it true that the earthly calling stood in need of his smashing blows to rescue it from the stultifying grip of Catholicism? Has heaven so little to do with earth that the eye which contemplates the one must disregard the other?

It is, perhaps, unfortunate that the neo-paganism of the Renaissance should have been called humanism, as though thereby affirming an antagonism between sacred and human interests. "I am Divine," says the Catholic Church, "and nothing human is foreign to me." They who find the "too human beauty" of Raphael's Madonnas an indication of the dwindling influence of Catholicism are unmindful of the countless intimate details of the early life of Christ with which the pre-Raphaelites, in the historical sense of that word, crowded their canvases. Surely nothing could be more appealing than Roger Van der Weyde's "St. Luke Painting the Virgin and Child," in which the Divine Infant is obviously posing for his portrait, while Rembrandt's realism is counterbalanced by that of Ribera, a realism in which it is manifest that He whose feet take hold so firmly on this earth of ours is the same before whose face the heavens and the earth flee away.

It may be readily conceded that Catholicism is a system, such a system as a lover elaborates for the captivation of his beloved, and a fulfilment of the promise made long ago to Osee: "I will draw them with the cords of Adam, with the bands of love." In the life of a Catholic there is no crisis so poignantly acute, no routine so deadly in its monotony, no moment of exaltation so supreme, nor of depression so abysmal, that the Church is not at his side, "intervening between the soul and Christ," say they who do not understand that to the Catholic the Church is Christ's agent. A book might be filled with the details of this system, of the way in which man is lured heavenward with the snares of the Sacraments and heaven comes down to earth through the lifted gateways of the priest's hands in the Mass, but for the purpose of this paper it is enough to glance at one aspect of what is known as popular devotions, a phrase which disposes at the outset of the point at issue.

Chief among these is that devotion based on the doctrine of the Communion of Saints, devotion to the Saints themselves. When one considers the prodigality with which sanctity is, as it were, poured out in the Church, when one remembers the Apocalyptic hosts, the thousands slain in persecutions, when one learns that in the island of Bardsey, which is not large, it is true, it is impossible to take a step without treading on the grave of a saint, it seems easy to get out of touch with the Saints as individuals. Yet each of them was a vivid human personality, a fact which Catholics seem to have no difficulty in realizing. Somehow their attitude towards the Saints is lacking in that aloofness which we should expect to see manifested towards monsters of asceticism. This may be due to their ready discernment of the Saints' attractively human qualities, for surely it was not for nothing that the Church's Founder chose as His cornerstone one of the most typical of the children of Adam, ardent, generous, headlong Simon Peter. If we may accept the description in an apocryphal work, which Renan accepted, that Apostle whose conversation was in heaven and who knew no man according to the flesh, bore in his outward appearance no marks of these heavenly familiarities, for he was "undersized, bald and bowlegged." We know that St. Thomas à Becket had an impediment in his speech, though we are safe in assuming that there was no stammering when he turned to meet the assassins' blades with the words: "Here I am, no traitor, but archbishop and priest of God." And that Saint who is said to have wrestled with demons above Lough Derg, Patrick of the Prayers, is recorded as having included in his household "Aithcen his true cook," and "Mescan, his friend and his brewer." Even he about whom blazes the splendor of the seven lamps is known as "John of the Breast" in the Gaelic tongue, a language which seems to have been expressly constructed to meet admirably two human needs, love-making and prayer.

Uncertainty as to the exact translation of a Greek word may have led in higher critical circles to a discussion as to whether the foster-father of Our Lord was really a carpenter, but no such uncertainty troubled the prayer of the good woman who appealed to him in her hour of need as follows: "Sure, it's yourself will help us now, that knows well what it was to go with your kit of tools on your back looking for work." That some of this Saint's clients are not above giving him a hint as to the way the wind blows is evident from some verses of W. M. Letts:

"I'd have St. Joseph choose me a comrade rich and kind—
And if it's Terry Sullivan—maybe I mightn't mind."

There is one crisis of human life in which the Church proclaims simultaneously and with peculiar emphasis both her humanity and her Divinity. It is the hour of death. Then, unwilling that her child should go alone into the dark valley, she stands at his side and with her hands she strengthens his trembling human hands to take hold of the fringes of eternity, and he departs with the sound in his ears of her unfaltering voice, uttering words which only she would dare to utter. She is summoning his escort, and they are not strangers, not beings of another race, but his brethren and his familiar friends, "the senate of the Apostles, the triumphant army of the martyrs, the band of glowing confessors, the choir of virgins singing jubilees." And even then it is not the end, for Catholics are not as those that have no hope, and among them devotion to the Saints is matched by remembrance of the dead, "the poor souls," as they are affectionately called. With their prayers they can accompany their beloved into the prison-house, they can lighten their chains and even cause the doors to swing sooner on their hinges.

In the days when the whole of Christendom was Catholic this belief was charmingly expressed in many pious customs, none of them more beautiful than the appealing inscriptions on gravestones. Dr. Rock, in his chapter on this subject, grows indignantly eloquent as he contrasts their reiterated requests for prayers with the coldness and even paganism of modern epitaphs. Venetian children of the present time are taught to say before they go to bed:

Bona sera ai vivi,
E riposo ai poveri morti.

"Good-night to the living, and rest to the poor dead." But it is to be feared that modern solicitude for a good night's rest would prove too strong for the custom which prevailed in medieval Paris, when the crier called out as he announced the hours:

Réveillez-vous, gens qui dormez,
Priez Dieu pour les trépassés.

And in Catholic countries the passing-bell was rung to give notice that one of life's wayfarers was entering on his agony and needed the prayers of priests and people in the last and decisive encounter with the powers of sin and darkness. When death had claimed its own the bell was tolled again, that all might piously breathe a prayer for the departed soul. Father Thurston's consoling book, "The Memory of Our Dead," gives further evidence of the love and tenderness with which the Church has ever kept before her the memory and the name of her departed children. The perusal of that work would be especially timely at this season of the year. Written with all the care and erudition of a painstaking scholar, it will interest and enlighten the reader.

Shavian Christianity

DANIEL A. LORD, S. J.

THE first appearance of "Androcles and the Lion" was greeted with a chorus of mingled praise and blame unique even in the history of Mr. George Bernard Shaw's remarkable productions. Some called it a noteworthy religious drama, deeply sympathetic toward Christianity and genuinely appreciative of the glory of martyrdom. Evidently they were lacking in Mr. Shaw's own sense of humor. Many were frankly horrified at what they considered a slap at the dearest sons and daughters of the Church; and a few of us vented honest rage in ink. Probably Mr. Shaw sat back and smiled while the stupid world worked enough meanings and purposes out of his play to supply matter for a hundred odd debates, reams of controversial prose, and some very silly idolatry of G. B. S.

But Mr. Shaw has with customary thoughtfulness read us a very comprehensive and satisfactory answer to his own riddle in a preface of considerably more than twice the length of the play. We of the opposition are sincerely grateful. One may think Mr. Shaw right or wrong in his views of Christ and Christianity therein expressed; the only way one can escape his clear and emphatic statements is to exercise the agnostic's privilege of denying the authenticity of the preface.

Internal evidence, it must be admitted, would be with the agnostic there. The preface is singularly lacking in the wit which has been hitherto Mr. Shaw's chief charm. And for a man of his professed originality it is strongly reminiscent of arguments used time out of mind by critics of Christianity. For once Mr. Shaw has given us very old matter spiced with very little wit. Accepting the blending of warmed-over arguments as broth of Mr. Shaw's making, we find that his views of Christ and Christianity and the Apostolic College cease to be matter for speculation.

Mr. Shaw approached his discussion with a candor and insinuating profession of open-mindedness that suggest what must have been the look on the face of the tiger after his famous expedition with the lady of Niger. Why not give Christianity a trial? Late though it be, there may still be something to gather from the teaching of Jesus of Nazareth. For clearly the world which has constantly chosen Barabbas has gone very far astray. Why not, indeed? The candor is so unexpected, the suggestion so absolutely out of character, that one wonders if it may not be time to cast an eye about for a fatted calf and to call for a ring and sandals.

Mr. Shaw proceeds. The Gospels which present us with the record of a very remarkable and interesting man are certainly as good historic evidence as any documents of the same age. Suppose we study them to find the historic Christ. However—and here he holds up a warning finger—we are going to investigate the Gospels in a spirit from which prejudice and predispositions have been rigorously barred. Prejudice and predispositions, since they destroy all judicial balance of judgment, must give place to the calm, common-sense view characteristic of a genuine historian. This unquestionably is a noble statement of historical fairness. The pity is that it is no sooner spoken than it is forgotten.

For Mr. Shaw's historical fairness has one tremendous flaw. By prejudice and predisposition he means any belief in a God or the supernatural. He does not count it prejudice and predisposition to deny the existence of God and hence all possibility of any power beyond the purely physical. He begins this impartial investigation by forgetting that unbelief is very decidedly more dogmatic than faith. The theologian approaches his study of the Gospels only after he has proved from pure reason the existence of God and of immortal souls. Mr. Shaw begins with a simply unprovable denial of a personal God and all spiritual realities.

In his preface, it is true, he often speaks of God and of gods; but those who know anything about his philosophy are aware that the god of his making is no more the scientifically necessary God of the Christians than is the Hottentot's glorified fetish or the Egyptian's deified crocodile. We have elsewhere his plain statement that the only god he recognizes is a cosmic force identical with the world and with ourselves, which by a long process of evolution is straining up toward perfect consciousness.

When Mr. Shaw asks us to lay aside prejudices and predispositions, he keeps all the while a tender eye on his own pet prejudice and predispositions, though no more radical ones could hamper a man's study of the Gospels. He goes further, and to prove his claim to being a writer of admirable fiction and a possessor of the strongest predispositions, sketches the rise of religious belief. This, he says, is a necessary bit of technical knowledge for the student of the Gospels.

He tells us how men saw in the sunrise and sunset, in the tempest, the flood, and in their own consciences, effects which they did not produce. They began forthwith to adore first the tremendous natural forces about them, and then the mysterious personages whom imagination suggested might be their authors. Thus they gained their first concept of gods. To propitiate these powers, presents were invented and called sacrifices. Then they thought out a cheaper form of gift, the flattery of prayer. Men's misconceived sense of justice which caused them to kill the murderer in expiation of his crime, led them to suspect that their own crimes must be wiped out with suffering and death. First they thought of themselves as destined to the punishment of their gods; but later they conceived the brilliant idea of one person who should be forced to take the place of all criminals and with his sufferings and death expiate all crimes. Behold, we have the simple origin of the redeemer idea!

The theories advanced in this elaborate and highly imaginative sketch of religious beliefs are trite and often refuted. At best, even the unbelieving scientist holds them as possible theories; Mr. Shaw sets them down as sober fact and proved history. Worse; they are necessary prelusive knowledge to a study of the Gospels. As a matter of fact, Mr. Shaw is merely reciting his credo, a credo of unbelief, it is true, but implicitly accepted for all that. He founds his credo on the lightly spoken word of a few very fallible scientists; but he makes it with a calm acceptance which would startle a theologian accustomed to reasoning out and proving his faith. And please note that Mr. Shaw asks his readers to repeat after him this pious credo before they enter on his treatise. The Catholic student ends his studies with a credo; the student of Mr. Shaw's theology begins with a profession of faith.

Mr. Shaw is reported once to have stated that he possessed perfectly normal eyes and a perfectly normal brain. One may have a perfectly normal brain and yet make mistakes which proceed from a lack of proper knowledge. We are not surprised then to find that he makes the wearisome mistake of supposing that the Immaculate Conception and the Virgin Birth are identical. When he tells us that the Gospel of St. Matthew was written in Greek, we do not expect him to be aware that the earliest authorities, Papias, disciple of St. John, and St. Irenaeus, quoted in the Douay Version, say it was written in the colloquial Hebrew. One may be a critic of Christianity and yet show ignorance on cardinal points. Yet one who sets himself up as an impartial historical student shocks us by displaying ignorance of the principles of critical history and almost of common sense. His method of historical study will not encourage us in the belief in his perfectly normal brain.

Students of the Gospels have always been divided into two classes: those who have reconciled the Gospels in strict historic fashion, and those who have tried to find in them, every possible discrepancy. Mr. Shaw goes yet farther and finds inconsistencies and mistakes which a little common judgment would show him are perfectly plain and consistent statements of facts. Thus the omission of a fact by one of the Evangelists is always construed as a denial. St. Matthew does not mention that Christ healed the ear of the servant of the high priest; therefore Matthew denies the fact. Three of the Evangelists make no mention of the slaughter of the Innocents; therefore they reject the story. One of the Evangelists, by the way, begins his narrative from the public life, but his omission of the slaughter is none the less put down for a denial. The argument in another case could be put thus: Some biographer of Mr. Shaw omits all mention of Mr. Shaw's justly famous red beard; therefore, he denies that Mr. Shaw ever had a beard. As an instance of historical logic, this is not strongly suggestive of a perfectly normal brain.

The same logical obliquity appears again and again. Mr. Shaw tells us that St. Matthew describes the visit of the Angel being made to St. Joseph, while St. Luke gives it as made to Our Lady. It doesn't seem to occur to him that the Angel might have visited both Mary and Joseph. He tells us that in the hands of St. John, the story of the Syrophenician woman becomes transformed into the story of the woman of Samaria. Of course, it was impossible for both the events to have occurred. St. Luke, he reminds us, placed the miraculous catch of fishes at the beginning of Our Saviour's public career, whereas, St. John ascribes it to a time after the Resurrection. Obviously, to Mr. Shaw's mind, Christ was incapable of working a miracle of this type in two places and times.

Having recited piously his credo, taken to his heart Mr. Shaw's predispositions, and accepting this truly original method of historical study, the reader is now ready to proceed to the study of the genuine Christ and genuine Christianity. For "genuine" he may at will substitute the adjective "Shavian." Mr. Shaw would consider them synonyms.

Obscuring the Issue

J. D. TIBBITS

IN its issue of September 27, under the title, "Which is Catholic," the Outlook continues the controversy which I recently discussed in these pages. A well-written and courteous letter is contributed by the scholarly Rector of Trinity in which he sets forth, in the clearest possible terms, the orthodox High Church position. Of the viewpoint, peculiar to this school, it is necessary to say but little. A whole library has arisen, both in its attack and in its defense, and that, quite out of proportion to the school's influence or numbers; for the truth is, that in America at least, High Church Anglicanism has never been taken very seriously, even by the great majority of those who compose the Protestant Episcopal Church. It is well, however, to call attention to one fact which is strikingly demonstrated in a single passage of Dr. Manning's letter. Speaking of the Anglican theory of continuity, he says:

> The Continental Reformers separated themselves from the historic church and claimed the power to establish new churches for themselves. The English Reformers acted upon the opposite principle. Their appeal was to the faith and practice of the Whole Undivided Catholic Church of the first centuries.

Now the nub of the matter is simply this: The English reformers may have thought, and probably did think.

that they were appealing to the undivided Church of the first three centuries, just as the editor of the Outlook doubtless thinks that he is reaching back behind that Church and appealing to the even more primitive source of Christ Himself. But widely as they differ in their respective conceptions of Christianity, the fact remains that in method they are absolutely at one; for the appeal of each, when analyzed, turns out to be simply an appeal to his own impressions. And though one may believe in Orders, in other Sacraments and in the Visible Church, and the other deny them all, yet is the ultimate motive, whether of belief or disbelief, the same. Both are equally impressionists and both equally obscure the issue.

And this obscuration becomes all the more apparent in the following passage, in which the Outlook, replying to Dr. Manning and others, restates its own position.

> We do not think there is any authority, either in Scripture or in history, for the affirmation that Jesus founded a visible church, either Papal, Episcopal, Presbyterian, or Congregational. We think he left his followers to form their own organizations, and adapt them to the varying needs of varying times. We agree with Archbishop Whately in our understanding of history: "There is not a minister in Christendom who is able to trace up, with any approach to certainty, his own spiritual pedigree." And we agree with Alford, the Dean of Canterbury, whose "Commentary on the New Testament" we regard as the ablest in the English if not the ablest in any language, and who says of apostolical succession that it is a "fiction of which I find in the New Testament no trace."

Now I have not the slightest intention of entering into any discussion with the Outlook as to what it finds, or fails to find, in the New Testament. But it is a very demonstrable fact that men of the most divergent type have found there doctrines as divergent as they are themselves. They have made of Christ everything, from a Christian Scientist to a Socialist. And did I wish to illustrate for how little the obviousness of a text counts, I would instance the words, "This is My body," which are, perhaps, of all the words of Christ, the most lucid and direct. I do not know how the editor of the Outlook construes them, but if he construes them as does Dr. Abbott, he reads into them a meaning that is certainly not there, and reads out of them a meaning that certainly is there. I merely mention this to show how futile it is to pretend to clinch an argument by an appeal to Scripture, when that appeal is really to oneself; and the futility of it all is even more apparent in the Outlook's rejection of the doctrine of Apostolical Succession, because of the fact that Dean Alford considered it a "fiction." I have no wish to detract from the universally recognized scholarship of Dean Alford, but there is every reason to suppose that his prepossession of pronounced Evangelicalism had quite as much to do with the forming of his judgments as the prepossessions of the New Theology have had to do with forming those of the editor of the Outlook. Just what light the New Testament casts upon Apostolical Succession is utterly without the compass of this discussion. But a very casual consideration of the form and purpose of the Sacred Writings ought to make it very evident that to demand of the Apostles and Evangelists any very explicit treatise upon it would be just about as reasonable as to demand of a writer on wireless telegraphy that he preface his writings with a proof of the reality of the material universe.

Between the Outlook then and Dr. Manning there is little to choose. Both are in essence the same; and both equally irrational. To the growing indifference of our day all they can offer are impressions which can never be verified, and speculations which can never be proved. Each has obscured the issue by appealing to an authority which he believes external to himself, yet each, in his failure, has borne unwitting testimony to the necessity for such authority in order to formulate a rational faith.

The one advantage which the scheme of the editor of the Outlook has over that of Dr. Manning is brevity; though brevity, however much it may be to the soul of wit, is not necessarily the test of truth. In the interest, however, of both brevity and truth, I am going to venture to suggest to these gentlemen that they confine their controversy to the one question that is really essential to it. That question is how to reconcile two propositions: the one a Divine religion; the other a fallible revelation. Their answers may clarify the situation.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Some Aspects of Mormonism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a recent tirade against Catholicism and Protestantism, Hyrum M. Smith, the son of the President of the Mormon Church, makes such a violent attack on Christianity, that I am prompted to give to your readers some information on the subject of Mormonism, its ideals, personnel and methods. The resources of the Mormon church are rated between $500,000,000 and $900,000,000, although no one except those in the inner circle possesses accurate information about the exact amount of the capital; and the secret is well guarded, for it is lèse majesté, punishable by excommunication, for any member to make disclosures or to make inquiries of the officials as to what is done with the $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 which these high-grade grafters take in annually as tithes from their dupes. The Apostles, etc., of Mormonism are interested in their sect to the following extent: commercialism, 75 per cent; finance, 10 per cent; politics, 10 per cent; spirituality, 5 per cent. Joseph Smith, the President, owns and controls, together with his inner circle, the principal business concerns in Utah; of the banks and trust companies in Salt Lake City they own ten out of thirteen.

Their members are recruited from the lowest and most ignorant of the North of Ireland people, from the lower English stock, and to a slight extent from Norwegians, Swedes and Danes. Nearly all their converts have been lured to Utah by glowing but false accounts of "a land of promise." Utah is richer in natural resources than any other Western State, and if it were not for Mormon arrogance and dominance, Salt Lake City would be one of the most wonderful and beautiful cities in the United States, and would have a population of 500,000 instead of merely 100,000. The Czar of Russia has no greater control over his people than the Mormon leaders have over the rank and file of their communion. The latter are practically slaves to their hierarchy. They prate about Christianity, but there is absolutely no spirituality among them. Their religion is physical and consists of physical comforts. This fact enables them to perpetrate and perpetuate the greatest fraud in the world. What they think of Christ may be gathered from the fact that they gave a public dance in their largest college on Good Friday, which called forth a vigorous protest from Bishop Glass of Salt Lake City. And yet their organization is very perfect, and by means of humbug of all sorts they reach their deluded followers and make them like Mormonism, and this in spite of the fact that the leaders control business, finance, politics and commerce. As a consequence it is rare to find a Mormon man or woman of education or financial prominence. The only exceptions are those who were educated outside of Utah or have got a hold on the flesh-pots of Zion or have intermarried with the officials.

Their arrogance towards the "Gentiles," a name which includes all non-Mormons here, is something appalling at times. They are taught that some day God will give them the power to sweep their enemies, the Gentiles, back of the Rockies and into the ocean. Then the "land of promise" will belong to Mormons alone. The Gentiles have a hard struggle in business, for it is part of the Mormon religion not to trade with Gentiles, if it can possibly be avoided. It is an accurate description to say that Mormonism was conceived in "fakery," and continued by humbug and fraud, and that it is a living lie. The wonder is that it can exist in this enlightened century.

Salt Lake City. J. C.

Dr. O'Malley's Meaning

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I respectfully suggest to Mr. Thomas F. Marshall of Oakland, Cal., that he read again the article from the pen of Dr. Austin O'Malley, which appeared in AMERICA for August 26. This second necessary reading should show him that he has missed the obvious purpose of my criticism, which appeared in AMERICA for September 16.

The measure of my surprise at what Dr. O'Malley had offered to your readers in the article in question was such that I could not resist the inclination to point out the historical refutation of his startling theory, and I quoted from the article the most striking passage. I made no direct analysis of Dr. O'Malley's novel deduction, but contented myself with leaving to my readers the privilege of drawing their own conclusions from my presentation of facts.

My critic accused me of either misrepresentation or misinterpretation. The facts in the case are against his charge, and in my favor, as he will readily see, provided he reads again, with the care I exercised, the article under discussion. I could not presume to interpret the purpose of Dr. O'Malley. I did not misinterpret it. I commented on the meaning of the Doctor's article, and for obvious reasons I did not need to attempt an interpretation of it.

Dorchester, Mass. J. D. RUSSELL.

"Benefit of Clergy"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It seems that Father Blakely, whose admirable articles I always read with great interest, has made a little slip in his use of the phrase "benefit of clergy" in his contribution to your issue of October 7. As he uses it the phrase is meaningless. Does he not know that "benefit of clergy" was the right accorded to ecclesiastics in the Middle Ages of being tried in the ecclesiastical courts when accused of felony? Such courts could not inflict the death penalty, the then usual punishment of felonies. Also at one time, in England at least, anybody who could read, after having been convicted of a felony, might claim the benefit of clergy and then he would be punished by being merely branded on the brawn of his thumb. Hence it became the practice of Parliament to declare certain crimes "felonies without benefit of clergy." I think it quite probable that Father Blakely knows all this as well as I do.

Canaan, Conn. DAVID C. WHITTLESEY.

What Is an Episcopalian?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The question, "What is an Episcopalian?" has frequently recurred in this journal, so the solution of the implied difficulty must be troubling several devout converts. The answer is simple. An Episcopalian at present is (1) an adult who ought to know better; and (2) he is a handy reagent for testing religious doctrine. Pour into him any religious material you find in the magazines, and he will remain sweetly pink unless the stuff is Catholic; then he turns green with explosive ebullition of gas. An Episcopalian, therefore, is an English-speaking adult badly educated in religion who believes anything provided it isn't so.

Philadelphia. AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

Archbishop Hughes on Prison Discipline

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In 1839 there was, as now, a notable agitation over prison discipline. Henry Carey of Philadelphia was in favor of "reform" in that direction, and wrote a pamphlet, "A Vindication of the Separate System of Prison Discipline." A copy of this fell into the hands of Archbishop Hughes of New York and was found among the contents of his library after his death. On the fly-leaf the great prelate had written the following opinion of its contents:

> I have read this pamphlet through, and whatever theory may be adopted it seems to me that the well-known principles of human nature will be its soundest basis. Facts here quoted are far from sufficient to prove the great superiority of modern improvement in prison discipline. It seems to me that the fear of punishment is the strongest restraint on the depraved; and this barrier will be entirely broken down if prisons are changed from places of punishment to houses of correction, where the wolf and the tiger, after having preyed on humanity, are to be wheedled out of their ferocity and soothed into kindness by the influence of an ill-timed sickly affectation of humanity. The difference of punishment between murder and robbery has saved many a life when otherwise the life and purse would be taken together.

Of course such medieval views as these would not receive any countenance from the late "Tom Brown" or his "Welfare League."

Brooklyn. T. F. M.

Down-stream New Orleans

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Being unfinancial, I cannot forecast or even conjecture what will be the market success of Miss King's right Catholic and excellent work, "The Pleasant Ways of St. Médard," but I certainly know, or have lost my poor wits and know not where they have strayed, that Miss King has realized a pronounced literary success by making the neglected and weedy old neighborhood of the Ursulines' down-stream site at New Orleans her background of life and manners. If a New Orleans laic, and, not to my knowledge, of Catholic profession, can mine literary gold of the sort from an abandoned waste corner, faith should be able to redeem the Ursulines' fallow land back to its potential richness. Tyrannous fashion alone moves New Orleans overwhelmingly up-stream; down-stream New Orleans would be quite as desirable intrinsically for homes and industry, did custom permit. Who will turn the current?

Savannah. WILLIAM PRICE.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Are Two Ceremonies Allowed?

NEW YORK newspapers stated a week ago that a marriage had taken place which had the unique distinction of being celebrated with two ceremonies, the Catholic and the Protestant. Minor variations appeared in the accounts, for there was a good deal of confusion as to which ceremony had the priority, but there was unanimity about the fact of a double celebration. Circumstantial details were not wanting as to the Protestant service; but no one seemed to know when, or where, or by whom the Catholic ritual was employed. The story would not be worth noting, were it not that one of the persons concerned is an international figure in the world of sports, and as a consequence the account of the efforts of this much-married man to enter wedlock has been industriously making its way north, south and west, and will soon be quoted as another instance of the inconsistency of Catholicism. The whole thing, of course, is a reporter's mistake. Non-Catholics would be inclined to question it, and to well-instructed Catholics it is intrinsically incredible.

No Catholic can be married by a Protestant minister. The word can, as opposed to may, is to be noted, for there is question here not merely of liceity but of validity. A Catholic who gets or permits a Protestant minister to officiate at his marriage, goes through a ceremony, it is true, but a ceremony that has no power whatever to establish the matrimonial bond. Hence he is no more married than if he had dispensed with the ceremony altogether. This was not the case before Easter, 1908. Prior to that date such a marriage would have been grievously sinful, it would have involved excommunication, but it would have been a real marriage. Since Easter, 1908, it is not only sinful and carries with it excommunication, but it is in addition null and void. Therefore, if one of the persons in the marriage referred to had been a Catholic, it would have been quite erroneous to speak of a Protestant marriage. The Protestant ceremony, whether it preceded or followed the Catholic ceremony, would have been an empty form and nothing more.

Besides, unless there were fraudulent concealment and deceit on the part of the Catholic, which the publicity given to the marriage in question rendered impossible, the Catholic ceremony simply could not have taken place. Had the Protestant ceremony preceded, it would have brought down on the head of the Catholic the excommunication of the Church, which fact would have barred him from the licit reception of the Sacrament, so that no priest would have married him until he had been absolved from his censure. Public cooperation in the Protestant rite of matrimony would have made the Catholic suspect of heresy, and would have called for public reparation. Of this there is not a sign in the case. On the other hand, no priest would have married a Catholic, when he knew that a subsequent Protestant marriage was contemplated, a marriage that savored of heresy and involved excommunication. The whole matter therefore may be regarded as a blunder or forgery, and, as such, may safely be consigned to the limbo of misrepresentations.

"Romanists" and Politics

ELECTION day is not far off and, as usual, "Romanists" are keen to lay their begrimed hands on "the sacred altar of government." It was always thus: knavery is the badge of the tribe. This year, however, Papal astuteness has taken a new and remarkable turn. It has laid snares for simple, unsuspecting Protestantism and turned it into a political machine. That is the reason why so many Protestant churches are ringing with the praises of this or that candidate. Ministers, decadent editors, professional politicians are all having their turn in the pulpit. Those Romanists! And to make matters worse the Papists have pounced upon the press and converted it to their nefarious use. Their success in this can be estimated by these two letters sent out from the office of a paper of which a minister of the Gospel is editor, a man who boasts his sturdy Protestantism:

Confidential

Dear Friend and Co-worker:

We are endeavoring to tabulate and run to corner all Romanists running for office on state and congressional tickets.

We have not as yet satisfactory returns from your district. If the district is to be properly tabulated in our special issue for Oct. 14 the information must be had at once.

Knowing you to be a worker for the best interests of American institutions and ideals we are asking you to report on candidates in your district for congress, and to report if possible on candidates for U. S. senator, for governor and state superintendent of public instruction. Do not overlook such of the candidates for state representatives as you are familiar with. To what lodges and other organizations do such candidates belong?

We must have a full report on New York. We are assigning you district No. 18. Please make special effort to see who the candidates are in this district and give us all valuable information on them.

Thanking you for your past good work and requesting an early reply.

Confidential

Dear Friend & Co-Worker:

We have written your state twice for information on your congressional districts, and as yet have received no report.

It is absolutely necessary that by the morning of Oct. 9th, not later than the morning of the 10th, we have reports on all congressional nominees, on the democratic and republican tickets especially, in your state. Please see that your district is not overlooked, by ATTENDING TO IT PERSONALLY NOW. This information will go to press on Friday after it is received, so you see we can have no delay. If you are interested in the cause and the defeat of papal politicians, please let us know at once who your candidates are and what you know about them. We don't want any of the pope's servants elected to congress or the United States Senate this fall.

Those Romanists! Their trickery is beyond comprehension.

"Touch Not Mine Anointed!"

REVERENCE is no characteristic of modern life. Gladstone, it is said, thought that next to the loss of "the sense of sin," the greatest danger to his age was the decay of reverence. Irreverence is surely not common among Catholics; yet some have not wholly escaped the malign influences of the day, which rank reverence with servility. "Touch not Mine anointed!" was once a mandate accepted literally by Catholics. Is it so accepted today? Recent public events in New York, for instance, would indicate that by a few Catholics it is not.

The presence of this unhallowed spirit of irreverence in any community, is deplorable; among Catholics, it is simply inexcusable. Do parents still teach their children the old Catholic custom of invariably showing outward marks of reverence to every religious woman, to every priest? Or, by the unhappy tendency to "take sides" with their children against the school authorities, when these are Sisters or Brothers, and freely to criticize the parish priest, within hearing of the younger members of the family, are they breaking down the reverence, with which the true Catholic instinctively regards all men and women consecrated to God?

"Sure, the greatest in the land are not equal to him now," said the old Irish mother, gazing through her tears at her newly ordained son. There spoke the Catholic heart! Catholics know the sublime dignity of even the humblest, most unlettered priest. He may not be a scholar; he may even be what an overcultured and hypocritical world deems "rude." But what does that matter? Christ was called a wine-bibber, a glutton, a consorter with outcasts, a Galilean. If there is one wish, deep in the heart of every Catholic, it is that when the last dread moment nears, some priest may be vouchsafed to loose his burdened soul from the bonds of sin, strengthening it with the Body of Christ, and heartening him for the conflict by the sacred Unction. The wish is founded upon faith. If the Catholic will but live his faith, he will never be found wanting in unaffected but profoundest reverence to every ambassador of Christ, even if he be as plain-spoken as John the Baptist, as unlettered as the Prince of the Apostles, and as poor as was his Master, Jesus Christ, in the days of His visible tarrying among men.

"Why Do Women Become Mothers?"

THE facts of motherhood, as seen from the viewpoint of modern paganism, are briefly enumerated by a feminine writer in one of our numerous sociological journals. The bearing and rearing of children, in the first place, are necessary for tribal or national existence and aggrandizement. Secondly, the bearing of children is painful and dangerous to life, and involves long years of exacting labor and sacrifice. Lastly, there is no verifiable evidence of any maternal instinct strong enough to impel woman voluntarily to seek to multiply these labors and self-sacrifices. And now the day of emancipation has dawned: there will be few children henceforth, or woman will demand for herself an adequate compensation, "in money or in fame." Such views have become familiar to the modern world. They are the commonplaces of Socialistic literature, the norms of good-breeding in fashionable society, and are thought to indicate the normal stage of progressiveness attained by our age.

Catholics are not surprised at these new standards of morality. They know them to be the natural deductions of the concupiscence of the flesh, the concupiscence of the eyes and the pride of life. Why should woman not seek the pleasure of sense without the sacrifice, the rose without the thorn, if there is only this brief life in which to feast and make merry? For her the wine of life is drunk all too soon and the lees of bitterness alone remain.

But how different the prospect that unfolds itself before the Catholic mother! How bright the splendor, falling from another world, that makes her radiant in the sight of her children and of the Church of God! She asks no perishable crown of fame, no earthly riches as an inducement to motherhood, for her treasures are hidden in Christ. Her labors and pains and sacrifices are not primarily for this world, but they are the price, small in comparison, which she pays to people heaven with souls who shall proclaim her blessed in the day of her final triumph.

Morals and the War

SHORTLY after the war began, a remarkable revival of religious fervor in the belligerent countries was observed. The call to arms caused the Protestants churches to be thronged with worshipers and made thousands of Catholics, who had been remiss, frequent the Sacraments once more. But as the conflict wore on both soldiers and non-combatants grew so accustomed to war-time conditions, and self-sacrifice, privation, peril, bereavement and death became such familiar things that many persons have "recovered," to use their flippant language, "from the acute attack of religion they had," and have now resumed their former careless manner of life. Regarding the present condition of England in this respect the October Month testifies:

> We can say that the war has stimulated self-sacrifice: it has also stimulated self-indulgence. Whether the balance inclines in favor of good or evil, only God can tell. But if there is any improvement in public morals, it is not very marked. Playwrights, actors, and novelists still appeal to human lust as openly as the public prosecutor will allow them, and much more openly than he should. The picture-palaces, for want of efficient censorship, continue to corrupt the morals of children. The social evil flaunts abroad unchecked, the wasteful consumption of strong drink has not been diminished, commercial frauds abound, Mammon is faithfully served. There has been little purifying of public life, little exhibition of national self-sacrifice, little apparent sense that God's favor is more helpful and more necessary than munitions. The lessons of the war can only be operative, if people think, and think aright, and unless people are accustomed to think aright, a few months' vicarious suffering will hardly teach them.

That the above picture is not overdrawn is proved by the fact that an eminent British General has indignantly protested against the indecency of the amusements offered the soldiers who return for a spell from facing death in the trenches. The Bishop of London has also been zealously striving to lessen the vice traffic in the metropolis and to have less tolerance shown the writers of pornographic novels and plays. But as we have repeatedly pointed out in these columns, laws are of little value unless a strong public opinion is behind them, and even when the law is effectively enforced, the permanent reformation of a community depends on the thoroughness with which the hearts of individuals are purified, and to keep hearts clean and strong is the high mission of the Catholic Church.

A Trader in Scandal

THE Protestant Episcopal Church, in conference at St. Louis, did not deem opportune an absolute prohibition of divorce. But it did the next best thing, in suffering some of its delegates to attack the Church of Rome. That Church, said these remarkable men, pretends to forbid divorce, but in practice, through "impediments" and "annulments," its laxity outranks any Protestant sect.

The times are evil. Despite the heroic Episcopal Church, from the days of Henry VIII, the unflinching champion of the unity of marriage, America rivals pagan Japan in adultery, legalized and blessed. What part of this foul record is written by the despised Catholics? In 1901, America numbered twice as many divorces as the rest of Christendom. How many were granted by the time-serving Church of Rome? The brother who scored the Catholic Church for its promotion of adultery, doubtless has his facts and figures within easy reach. Let him publish them, or stand branded as a trader in scandal.

Two Wrongs Make a Right

TWO maxims are in high favor with the doctors of the new morality. One is that the end justifies the means; the other, that two wrongs make a right. The first maxim is finely illustrated in most new books on social science, and in the practice of many physicians. In itself, race suicide may be thoroughly bad; but when invoked to alleviate poverty or allow luxury, it is a wholly laudable practice. Murder too, or the taking of the life of an innocent person, is to be discountenanced. Yet the physician is completely justified in killing a baby, if it chances to be sickly or deformed. Society must be protected, even if it be necessary to slaughter the innocents. Herod has lately entered upon a new domain, vaster than the old.

But it has been left for an official high in the counsels of this Government, Mr. Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, to give point to the second maxim, that two wrongs make a right. Those who do not understand this Government's policy in Mexico, the New York Tribune reports him as saying, "have forgotten our history and the Declaration of Independence." It is said that the Mexican revolutionists "do not respect the lives and property of our people. Perhaps they don't. We say that they do not pay their honest debts. They don't. We say that they do not respect Church property. That also is true." However, as Mr. Baker goes on to instruct the country, "people never respect these things in a revolution."

> Washington's army was in rags, and they stole. They stole the silver vessels from the churches, and melted them up to buy food. They drove the ministers of the Gospel out of their churches and out of the country.

Villa, Zapata and Carranza have in turn proved themselves villains, but it is not pleasant to know that Washington's army has a record of lust and pillage not surpassed by any of these worthies. Was it by oversight, that the Secretary did not mention how Washington's soldiers violated religious women, tortured religious men, stabled their horses in the sanctuary, and set lewd women on God's altar? "If you do not understand our Mexican policy," repeats Mr. Baker, "read the Declaration of Independence and the Golden Rule." To find a justification for lust and rapine? To be strengthened in the theory that, because unspeakable atrocities were perpetrated by Washington's army, Mexican bandits may slaughter and pillage and rape, in the name of "liberty?"

If two wrongs make a right, Christianity is an error, and civilization an impossibility.

Literature

THE CATHOLIC VS. THE SECULAR NOVELIST

THE secular novelist calls man's attention to the things of earth and insists that he must study these to make the most of himself; the Catholic novelist is reticent about the lower order of information save in so far as it may be absolutely necessary to make some reference to it. The secular writer superimposes his epistles upon those of St. Paul and preaches a new doctrine, that of curiosity; the Catholic novelist lists to the words of the manly Saint when he proclaims that there are certain things which must not be so much as mentioned among men.

The secular novelist parades knowledge of all things, high and low, exalting and debasing, as requisites of self-assertion; the Catholic novelist with the experience of the world-old Church to lend vigor to his teaching, proclaims the truth that knowledge may make a mind brilliant, but at the same time the black night of sin may darken a heart. The secular novelist would sharpen the wits of his readers and thus bring about the millenium; the Catholic writer knows that we need wits less than wisdom. The secular novelist places the development of the human personality, the free and indiscriminate use of man's powers, above all else; the Catholic novelist bows his will, which he realizes is at best weak and puny, to the expressed will of God as shown forth in the teachings of the Catholic Church.

The secular novelist harps upon the necessity of man doing as he wishes; the Catholic novelist finds in the agreement of man's will with that of God the highest ascension of the Christian gentleman. The secular novelist shouts stertorously: "I want the better individual!"; the Catholic novelist says calmly: "Without God the individual is nothing." Consequently the secular writer appears as a humanist; while the Catholic writer takes a dignified stand as a believer in the overruling power of a kind Providence.

The secular writer is a realist in the lower acceptation of that term; the Catholic writer is simply and prosaically a truth-teller. Between the two there is a world of difference. The secular writer is a vehement individualist; the Catholic writer sees nothing in the individual unless God is emphatically predicated. The secular writer is a revolutionist; the Catholic writer revolves but slowly. The secular writer is a faddist. The changing winds of fashion are mistaken by him for the Pentecostal stirrings from heaven; the Catholic writer is slow to shake off the old, and slower still to put on the new.

The secular writer eagerly grasps and fondles each new idea, scheme, fancy, or what-not and shouts: "Here is Salvation!"; the Catholic writer coolly remarks: "I have Salvation." The secular writer sees a savior in everything and is thus moved to announce his discoveries to the world: "Look, there he goes!" "Lo, he comes!"; the Catholic writer, smiling with pity and surety says in a matter-of-fact way: "There is but one Saviour."

Which, do you think, better presents the noblest qualities of man? Is it he who is worried, excited, bereft of his prophet-like calm by every wind of opinion that ruffles the waters of human thought? Or is it not rather he who disregards the winds and waves of sentiment and sophistry, but knows deep down in his trusting heart that those who leave the Bark of Peter in hope of independent security must return to it if they would have safety? Which presents the worthier picture of mankind? Is it he who insists that there is nothing enduring save change? Or is it not rather he who shows that man, if he would be safe, cannot change his allegiance, his faith, his philosophy as he does his garments?

Can there be any hesitation in choosing the safe, the sane, the self-reliant, the truth-assured? Can we, who in business are so exacting in preparing for eventualities, afford to be less careful in spiritual things where the loss may never be made good? For the Catholic there can be but one choice. And yet any man who prides himself on his hard business sense and his penetrating, commercial judgment, must fully acquiesce in the Catholic conclusion. But men seem unable to use their brains, when the problem to be solved is a religious one.

It is a question of what we want. Do we wish to appreciate the worth of a writer who finds with all humility and reverence that God has a place in His universe, who insists that He have that place if we are to understand men and nature directly and rightly? Do we wish to follow the Christian ideal of the Holy Family, or the natural family without any bonds and with no religion? Shall we, in short, prefer liberty to license? A sane choice will surely end with the exaltation of the Catholic novelist because he has been humble and truthful, and the rejection of the secular novelist because he has been arrogant and unreliable.

EDWARD FRANCIS MOHLER, A. B.

REVIEWS

The Literary History of Spanish America. By ALFRED COESTER, Ph.D. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

This volume fits admirably the times and their needs. For some years now Americans have had their eyes turned southwards. The serious-minded at least among our citizens have made an effort to understand the spirit, the characteristics, the life and habits of thought of our Latin neighbors. So Mr. Coester's review of the literature of Spanish America will undoubtedly be a help and a guide to what is a difficult object to attain: a sympathetic insight into the views and ideas of another people. The reader's first impression will be one of surprise at the extent and variety of the literature of Spanish America. From the beginning of Spanish rule in the vast regions to the South, letters kept pace with the advance of conquering arms. Ercilla wrote the "Araucana" and Bernal Diaz his "Memoirs" in the saddle or under the tent in the midst of the very alarms and battles they described. There is no species of literary composition which the writers of Spanish America have not tried and frequently with unusual success. In Mexico alone, Rodriguez Galván excels in the drama and in lyric poetry, Roa Bárcena treats in verse of the most delicate texture the legendary history of his country. Sierra, Sanchez Marmol and Maldonado, to name but a few, have reached a high level in the novel, and history and biography have also flourished. Among modern Mexican authors may be mentioned such well-known writers as Chavero and Joaquin Garcia Icazbalceta, whose works for certain important periods of Mexican history are absolutely indispensable.

Mr. Coester pays a deserved tribute to the work of the good friars in Mexico and to Catholic writers like the "Mexican Longfellow," Juan de Dios Peza, and Alejandro Arango y Escandón. According to him the friars interested themselves keenly in the Indian languages for the purpose of teaching the natives the Gospel of Christ. Grammars and dictionaries, catechisms and books of devotion in the native tongues abound. Dramas even were written in the various dialects to win the fierce aborigines to nobler ideals. The plays of Lope de Vega are said to have existed in the Mexican dialect, Nahuatl. The author devotes an interesting page to the famous drama "Ollantá," written in the Peruvian or Quechua language, and seems inclined to adopt the opinion of Professor E. C. Hills that the play is not a relic of Quechuan literature, but the work of a Spanish priest, Antonio Valdes.

Spanish-American literature has produced no Fray Luis de León, no Cervantes, no Calderon, no Lope de Vega, no St. Teresa. But it can boast of the Cuban José Maria de Heredia, whose magnificent lyrics, "Niagara," the "Teocalli of Cholula" and "The Hurricane" are from the imagination and heart of a genuine poet; of the Peruvian José Santos Chocano, "The singer of America aboriginal and wild . . . whose verses are like trumpets of crystal"; the Ecuadorian José Joaquin Olmedo, the inspired lyrist of the victories of Junin and Ayacucho and considered by Menendez y Palayo the greatest, probably of Spanish-American poets; and the Chilean Andrés Bello, equally known for his high poetic gifts and his standard works on Castilian grammar and language. The names of two women must be added to the list: that of the Cuban poet Gertrudis Gomez de Avellaneda and of the gifted and saintly nun of Mexico, Sor Juan Inés de la Cruz (1651-1695). Ruben Darío, whose Christian death occurred a few months ago, may be added to the roster of the truly gifted sons of Spain who in the New World have kept up the high literary ideals which were followed in the Old. J. C. R.

The Adornment of the Spiritual Marriage: The Book of Truth and the Sparkling Stone. By JAN VAN RUYSBROECK. Translated into English from the original Flemish by C. A. WYNSCHENK DOM. Edited with an Introduction by EVELYN UNDERHILL. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.75.

Any contribution in English to the literature of asceticism is welcome; and when that contribution is a recognized classic it is as valuable as it is welcome. The trinity of treatises from the pen of Jan Van Ruysbroeck is of this character, and the translator, C. A. Wynschenk Dom has placed his readers under a deep obligation to him. With excellent judgment he has drawn his materials from the original Flemish rather than from the Latin of Surius which has enabled him to mirror more faithfully the mind of the great medieval mystic whose writings molded the spirit of the Windesheim school which gave to the world its Thomas à Kempis. These treatises expound what has been aptly termed the metaphysics of mysticism. "The Adornment of the Spiritual Marriage" presents, in readable form, a compendium of the whole science of the spiritual life. The work is divided into three books which have for their subjects the active, the interior, and the contemplative life. From nature to grace, from grace to glory the author traces the possible progress of the soul. It is principally in the third book that he mounts to the highest reaches of mysticism.

In the treatment of a subject so subtle and so sublime as the soul's intimate union with God, it is not a matter for wonder that we should, with Groote, Gerson and Bossuet, find the author's language somewhat startling in its boldness. But reading his work in the light of his painstaking explanations, especially those found in "The Book of Truth," the feeling of alarm is allayed, and an intelligent analysis reveals his writings to be in strict accord with the canons of mystical theology. Moreover Van Ruysbroeck's beatification by the Church gives a more than sufficient guaranty of his orthodoxy.

The book is prefaced by an "Introduction" from the pen of Miss Evelyn Underhill which is divided into two parts, the first containing a biographical sketch of the author and the second being what may be termed an exegesis of the treatises. She culls from Van Ruysbroeck isolated expressions and weaves around them speculations some of which the author would doubtless be slow to adopt and some of which he would positively repudiate. The perusal of "The Adornment of the Spiritual Marriage" cannot fail to bring out into bold relief the orthodox mysticism of the Catholic Church and to emphasize the fact that the human soul assisted by Divine grace can attain to a high degree of detachment from created things and reach an intimate union with God; a detachment and a union alien to Quietistic passivity and Modernistic subjectivism. D. P. L.

Mr. Britling Sees It Through. By H. G. WELLS, New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.50.

It is not hard to picture Mr. Wells, as he prepared to write this novel, industriously reading a mass of papers and periodicals published during the first year of the war, jotting down the main events in chronological order and indicating here and there the places for "views and impressions" to be inserted. Mr. Britling, the central figure of the story, is an exceedingly "liter'y" and "viewy" person who talks more than he thinks, and writes more than he reads; who neglects his wife and runs after other women and who has made his home at Matching's Easy in Essex, a gathering-place for a flock of romping, irresponsible young people. The author records Mr. Britling's impressions from the day that the war burst upon England, until the Zeppelin raids became a commonplace, describes without mercy the fatuous "business as usual" stage and tells how the country-people felt when costly disasters made them at last realize what a formidable war England was involved in. There is a well-drawn American in the story and an amiable German tutor, but characters are introduced only to be dismissed, and unconnected episodes crowd the pages in bewildering confusion.

The development of young Hugh Britling's character, his letters from the front to his father, Letty's pagan grief at the loss of her husband, and the changes that take place in the mental attitude of Mr. Britling, all make the second half of the book the more interesting portion. Mr. Wells's conception of a "finite God who struggles in his great and comprehensive way as we struggle in our weak and silly way" is too absurd to be taken seriously, but the author's reflection that "English homes and women and children were, after all, undergoing only the same kind of experience that our ships have inflicted scores of times in the past upon innocent people in the villages of Africa and Polynesia" is certainly a just one. The novel's title could be improved, for the war is still going on. W. D.

The Criminal Imbecile. By H. H. GODDARD. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.50.

A Comparative Study of Delinquent Girls. By AUGUSTA F. BRONNER, Ph.D. New York: Teachers' College, Columbia University. $1.00.

The purpose of Dr. Goddard's book is to awaken public interest in the fact that many individuals usually termed "queer," but commonly accepted as sane, are in reality imbeciles of dangerous criminal tendencies. They have sufficient intelligence to comprehend the enormity of a given crime, but being susceptible to suggestion in an exaggerated degree, are almost totally lacking in inhibition. Catholic moralists will agree with Dr. Goddard that in these cases responsibility is either very slight, or wholly wanting, although this judgment is not in accord with the customary procedure of American courts. The present test of criminal responsibiliy is, apparently, "Did the accused know the nature and quality of the act at the time of commission, that it was wrong?" and by legal presumption, knowledge implies freedom of action. Taken by itself the test is obviously insufficient. The moralist will not impute formal guilt unless, together with full knowledge, there is complete freedom of the will. For two reasons the author's chapter on "Responsibility" is exceedingly interesting. First, Dr. Goddard manages to treat the subject without even referring to free will, and next, he presents an exceedingly plausible argument that children do not normally reach the "age of reason" before the twelfth year.

Dr. Bronner's study is a distinct advance in the literature of this subject. She recognizes, as other investigators seem unwilling to do, that in the absence of a certified, uniform test of intelligence, comparative ratings may be suggestive, but not final. To ask, as in Dr. Grabe's study: "How many classes of train service?" "How many legs has a grasshopper?" "What is the difference between a box and a basket?" "What are the colors and cost of postage stamps?" might rank many a Doctor of Divinity, together with the present reviewer, with the mentally-defective delinquent. Dr. Bronner's study is based on the usual "easy and hard opposites," word-and-passage memory tests, the Ebbinghaus Mutilated Text, and an adapted completion test. Dr. Bronner concludes that there is no necessary connection between intellectual rating and immorality. Among delinquents, girls of a low grade of intelligence are to be found, "but others no more endowed than they, are fighting life's battles without manifesting immoral or criminal tendencies." Both books may be recommended to properly qualified students. "Dabblers" had best let them alone. P. L. B.

Shakespeare: Macbeth, The Merchant of Venice, Hamlet, Julius Caesar. With Introduction, Notes and Questions for Review. Adapted from the Stanley Wood "Oxford and Cambridge Edition." By F. A. PURCELL, D. D., Rector, Cathedral College, Chicago, and L. M. SOMERS, M. A., Professor of English, Cathedral College, Chicago. Chicago: Scott Foresman & Co. $0.35 each.

Whatever Shakespeare's own religious belief may have been, he was certainly a child of Catholicism and of the Ages of Faith. So it is eminently fitting that Catholic editors should inaugurate a series of Shakespearean text-books, for who can better interpret and explain the numerous passages in the poet's dramas that reflect the life and spirit of the Church? This attractive series of text-books prepared by the Rector and the Professor of English of Cathedral College, Chicago, is abundantly furnished with every aid the young student requires for giving him an intelligent appreciation of Shakespeare. The notes on the text, the grammar and the versification of the plays are all that could be desired, and the Introduction contains a sketch of the poet's life, an account of the growth of the drama, and an analysis of the plot and characters of each play. The discussion of "Shakespeare's Religion," by Dr. James J. Walsh, appeared originally in AMERICA, as some of these text-books' readers may remember. Old-fashioned teachers would perhaps be better pleased with these little volumes if all the notes were confined to the end of the book. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In the October number of the Catholic Historical Review is published the last historical paper written by the late Dr. Charles George Herbermann. He traces the varying fortunes of the United States Catholic Historical Society from its birth in 1884, through its rejuvenation in 1897, to its present day of prosperity. He names the men who have been in the past the Society's strongest pillars and ends by pointing out what a rich field for research in the annals of the Church in this country still remains unexplored. Another interesting contribution to the number is Father Hudleston's paper on "The Spiritual Ancestry of the American, English and Australian Hierarchies." A chart shows that Charles Walmesley, O. S. B., V. A., of the Western District, who was consecrated at Rome in 1756, is the ghostly progenitor of three great hierarchies, renown enough for one man.

The current Catholic Mind opens with a well-reasoned paper by the late Father M. P. Dowling, S. J., on "Race Suicide." He proves from Holy Writ, from history and from modern instances, the wickedness and the folly of a practice that is now spreading widely. Regarding the oft-cited perils of over-population, the author writes:

> History may be reviewed in vain for an instance of any considerable country wherein poverty and want can be fairly traced to the increase of the number of mouths beyond the power of the accompanying hands to fill them. In most cases they can, more properly, be attributed to unjust laws, misgovernment, destructive warfare, decadent commerce, a disregard of the Divine law, vice and crime.

The number concludes with Father Hull's answer to "A Very Old Problem": Does God's foreknowledge of what is going to happen cause that thing to happen?

It is refreshing in our modern day to hear again the old-fashioned doctrine of something more than sheer "efficiency" in the home, and that something enthusiasm. This is what Lillian Hart Tryon has done in "Speaking of Home: Essays of a Contented Woman" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.00). She finds in housewifery a chosen profession, demanding endless versatility; and as for the drudgery of it and the staying at home, this is her bright unselfish philosophy: "Well, and if it is, there are those who like to stay at home.....There is drudgery in every profession though the kinds may differ." The chapters "On Keeping House by Ear" and "Pussy Cat, Pussy Cat" would tickle the hearts of Lamb and Stevenson, and "Wild Grapes for Jelly" would win a reminiscent smile from the author of the Georgics. They are more than any set instruction for housewives upon how to toss a salad; they are the dews of inspiration which the internal heaven of one woman's contented mind sheds upon the humble, common things of home. The book's first chapter "On Being a Housewife" and the last "On Being a Hostess" are the best of all.

Mr. Harold F. B. Wheeler, who has already written for the young a series of volumes describing the careers of military heroes, has now finished "The Boys' Life of Lord Kitchener" (Crowell, $1.50). The achievements of this English soldier in Egypt, India, and South Africa are described in a way that is sure to hold the interest of a boy who is in his early teens, and the last two chapters deal with Kitchener's part in the present war.——"La Salle" (Macmillan, $0.50) by Louise S. Hasbrouck, while laying no claim to originality gives a good account of that explorer's adventures. Catholics will not admit, however, that the Sulpicians and Jesuits were almost as much interested in trading as in laboring for the spiritual needs of the Indians. "The Jesuits planned to keep the country of the Great Lakes for their own," writes the author, "not only that they might be undisturbed in their missions, but also that they might have the full benefit of the fur trade." This assertion cannot be proved. For the rest, the author expresses admiration for the heroism and self-sacrifice of the missionaries. The book is meant for younger readers, but can be read with profit by all.

Here is a batch of recent novels that call for only brief mention: "Desmond's Daughter" (Putnam, $1.50), Mrs. Maud Diver's Anglo-Indian story, proves the author's intimate knowledge of that country. Thea in her fearlessness is a worthy daughter of General Desmond; while her inborn sense of righteousness and her lovable intimacy with her father lifts her to a rare, yet not unreal degree of natural virtue. The book gives the true story of the Tirah campaign.——"The More Excellent Way" (Putnam, $1.35) by Cyrus Townsend Brady is the tale of a New York society belle who touches pitch and is not defiled. The "Anglican Priest" in the novel explains well the doctrine of the indissolubility of matrimony. Colonel Taylor's sentimental belief, however, that "even the worst of us is not bad enough to be damned for his own sins" is poor support for the prevention of conjugal infidelity. The author could have taught his moral with less of the suggestive. ——"The Emperor of Portugallia," (Doubleday, Page, $1.50). Selma Lagerlöf's latest novel, translated from the Swedish by Velma Swanston Howard, centers around the actions of a father whom yearning for his absent daughter has deprived of his sanity. The story, though interesting, is somewhat depressing. The statements that Adam was punished "not for disobedience, but for cowardly blaming Eve," and that the Fourth Commandment is "not so much a command as a good counsel," cannot meet with approval from Catholic readers. —— "The girl of today is in revolt against the restrictions that bound woman in the past," is the text of "The Rising Tide" (Harper, $1.35) Margaret Deland's latest book. Frederica, the "heroine" utters volubly the tiresome cant of feminism.—A recent example of the "problem novel" is "The Sins of the Children" (Little, Brown, $1.40), by Cosmo Hamilton. The story is as dull and uninspired as the general run of similar productions, besides being worse morally.

"Blackbeard's Island: The Adventures of Three Boy Scouts in the Sea Islands" (Lippincott, $1.25), is the title of Rupert Sargent Holland's latest book for youthful readers. An old map—buried treasure—a thief's motor-boat—But why go on? ——Ruskin's little classic, "The King of the Golden River," has recently been published by Ginn in an attractive form.——Clifton Johnson has edited for young people an edition of Sir Thomas Malory's "King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table" (Macmillan, $1.50) that is very acceptable. "Whatever is unnecessary or morally doubtful in the original has been omitted .....but nothing essential has been sacrificed." Every boy and girl should be familiar with this famous book. Rodney Thomson's numerous pictures are excellent.

In the Poet Laureate's anthology, "The Spirit of Man" (Longmans), is this melodious description of "The Lake Isle of Innisfree," by William Butler Yeats:

I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree,
And a small cabin build there, of clay and wattles made;
Nine bean rows will I have there, a hive for the honeybee,
And live alone in the bee-loud glade.

And I shall have some peace there, for peace comes dropping slow,
Dropping from the veils of the morning to where the cricket sings,
There midnight's all a-glimmer and noon a purple glow,
And evening full of the linnet's wings.

I will arise and go now, for always night and day
I hear lake water lapping with low sounds by the shore;
While I stand on the roadway, or on the pavements gray,
I hear it in the deep heart's core.

And in "The Cambridge Book of Poetry for Children" (Putnam) is Richard Crashaw's description of "The Good Woman Made Welcome in Heaven":

Angels, thy old friends, there shall greet thee,
Glad at their own home now to meet thee.
All thy good works which went before,
And waited for thee at the door,
Shall own thee there; and all in one
Weave a constellation
Of crowns, with which the King, thy Spouse,
Shall build up thy triumphant brows.
All thy old woes shall now smile on thee,
And thy pains sit bright upon thee:
All thy sorrows here shall shine,
And thy sufferings be divine.
Tears shall take comfort, and turn gems,
And wrongs repent to diadems.
Even thy deaths shall live, and new Dress the soul which late they slew.
Thy wounds shall blush to such bright scars
As keep accounts of the Lamb's wars.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Allyn & Bacon, New York:
La Belle France. A French Reader for Beginners. By Adolphe De Monvert. With Illustrations by Charles H. Munson.

D. Appleton & Co., New York:
The Tide of Immigration. By Frank Julian Warne, A.M., Ph.D. $2.50.

Association Press, New York:
The Social Principles of Jesus. By Walter Rauschenbusch. $0.50.

Benziger Brothers, New York:
Cupid of Campion. By Francis J. Finn, S.J. $0.85.

Browne & Nolan, Ltd., Dublin:
A Century of Catholic Education. By a Christian Brother. With a Preface by Rev. M. F. Egan, S.J. 3s. 6d.

The Century Company, New York:
The Golden Book of the Dutch Navigators. By Hendrik Willem Van Loon. Illustrated with Seventy Reproductions of Old Prints. $2.50.

Thomas Y. Crowell Co., New York:
The Boys' Life of Lord Kitchener. By Harold F. B. Wheeler, F.R. Hist.S. $1.50; In the Garden of Delight. By L. H. Hammond, $1.00.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
A. E. (George W. Russell). A Study of a Man and a Nation. By Darrell Figgis. $1.00; The Life of the Caterpillar. By J. Henri Fabre. Translated by Alexander Teixeira De Mattos. $1.50.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y.:
The Emperor of Portugallia. By Selma Lagerlof. Translated by Velma Swanston Howard. $1.50; The Further Side of Silence. By Sir Hugh Clifford. $1.35; Old, Old Tales from the Old, Old Book. By Nora Archibald Smith. Illustrated. $1.50.

Ginn & Co., Boston:
Ancient History. By Philip Van Ness Myers. Second Revised Edition. Illustrated. $1.50; The King of the Golden River. A Legend of Stiria. By John Ruskin. With Drawings by Hiram P. Barnes after the Illustration of Richard Doyle. $0.25.

The Gorham Press, Boston:
Law and Love and Other Poems. By E. J. V. Huiginn.

Harper & Brothers, New York:
Lovers' Knots. By Elizabeth Jordan. $1.25.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
Aspects of the Infinite Mystery. By George A. Gordon. $1.50; The Romance of a Christmas Card. By Kate Douglas Wiggin. Illustrated by Alice Ercle Hunt. $1.00; With the Turks in Palestine. By Alexander Aaronsohn. With Illustrations. $1.25; Riders of the Stars. By Henry Herbert Knibbs. $1.00; French Perspectives. By Elizabeth Shepley Sergeant. $1.25; Portraits of Women. By Gamaliel Bradford. Illustrated. $2.50; The Syrian Christ. By Abraham Mitrie Rihbany. $1.50; The Glory of Toil. By Edna Dean Proctor. $0.75.

The House of Childhood, Inc., New York:
My System of Education. The Organization of Intellectual Work in the School. The Mother and the Child. Education in Relation to the Imagination of the Little Child. By Maria Montessori, M.D.

Alfred A. Knopf, New York:
Creative Involution. By Cora Lenore Williams, M.S. With an Introduction by Edwin Markham. $1.50; Tales of the Pampas. By W. H. Hudson, $1.25; The Borzoi Plays I. War. A Play in Four Acts. Translated by Thomas Seltzer from the Russian of Michael Artzibashef. $1.00.

John Lane Co., New York:
The Wonderful Year. By William J. Locke. $1.40; Ireland's Literary Renaissance. By Ernest A. Boyd. $2.50.

Little, Brown & Co., Boston:
The Sins of the Children. By Cosmo Hamilton. $1.40; Three Plays. The Fiddler's House; The Land; Thomas Muskerry. By Padraic Colum. $1.25.

J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia:
Joseph Pennell's Pictures of the Wonder of Work. Reproductions of a Series of Drawings, Etchings, Lithographs, Made by Him about the World, 1881-1915. With Impressions and Notes by the Artist, $2.00; Betty at Fort Blizzard. By Molly Elliott Seawell. $1.50; Blackbeard's Island. By Rupert Sargent Holland. Illustrations by Will Thomson. $1.25.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
Marriage and Morality. Papers by Various Authors. First Series. No. 1. Successful and Unsuccessful Marriages. By Louise Creighton. $.12; No. 2. Marriage. A Harmony of Body and Soul. By Gemma Bailey. $0.10; No. 3. Purity. By A. Herbert Gray. $0.10; No. 4. In Praise of Virginity. By Elma K. Paget. $0.10.

Loyola University Press, Chicago:
After Hours. By William Frederick Feld, S.J. $1.00.

A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago:
Cicero. A Sketch of His Life and Works. A Commentary on the Roman Constitution and Public Life Supplemented by the Sayings of Cicero. By Hannis Taylor. $3.50.

The Macmillan Company, New York:
King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table. By Sir Thomas Malory. Illustrated by Rodney Thomson. $1.50; Multitude and Solitude. A Novel. By John Masefield. $1.35.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
Desmond's Daughter. By Maud Diver. $1.50; The Myrtle Reed Cook Book, $1.50; And Thus He Came: a Christmas Fantasy. By Cyrus Townsend Brady.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
The Melancholy Tale of "Me." My Remembrances. By Edward H. Sothern. Illustrated. $3.50; Enoch Crane. A Novel Planned and Begun by F. Hopkinson Smith and Completed by F. Berkeley Smith. Illustrated by Alonzo Kimball. $1.35; Head Winds. By James B. Connolly. Illustrated. $1.35; Hawaii. Scenes and Impressions. By Katharine Fullerton Gerould. $1.50; Our Hispanic Southwest. By Ernest Peixotto. Illustrated. $2.50

The University of Chicago Press, Chicago:
American Prose. By Walter C. Bronson. $1.50.

EDUCATION

Is Julianne a Type?

SINCE the days of Mr. Patrick Henry of Virginia, it has been no secret that Caesar had his Brutus. It is quite possible that Mr. Henry never so much as mentioned either noble Roman, but the school-books have done it in his name for these many years, and far be it from me to deprive our young and unprotected country of even one cherished tradition. But, whatever the truth in this cause célèbre, it has remained for the zealous and distinguished Dr. Coakley of Pittsburgh to discover that nearly every convent school in this broad land of ours has its Julianne, a frivolous, heartless, self-centered creature, a disgrace to her Alma Mater and a discredit to the Church. She paints, too, according to Dr. Coakley, and uses enamel; she does not know how to walk naturally, she lacks poise, balance and propriety; and, as a final touch, placing her securely among the impossibles, she carries whole bunches of orchids when she graduates. On the whole, after surveying Dr. Coakley's portrait, I felt rather sorry for Julianne. I am also sorry that the portrait may lead the unreflecting to consider Julianne as a type, and not as an occasional accident.

Art and Reality

AN artist is Dr. Coakley, but he flourishes in Pittsburgh. Here, perhaps, we have the solution of the difficulty. Where the heavens are frequently penumbral, you may count upon finding a whole school of gloomy and dyspeptic artists whose incurable fondness is for dark colors and an excessive chiaroscuro. They paint things as they see them, poor dears, but that is not equivalent to painting things as they are. What this melancholy school will discern, even in the most innocent subject, is quite enough to recall Dürer's "The Knight, Death and Satan," and that curiously allegorical production has been known to cause brokers, grocers, dealers in coal, and similar prosaic persons, to shudder with unaccustomed horror. Now I revel, I protest, in impressionism and the symbolists, and all that sort of thing; but even in art I want my picture to bear some dim resemblance to the original. I reserve the right to object, if my impressionist, after looking into my kitchen, reports on his canvas, that the kettle is heating the stove. Similarly, if any honest symbolist discovers that some Julianne in a smoky grange, really uses her head only as a substructure for her hair, and then proceeds to paint this alumna of a Catholic school as a typical convent-school graduate, I at once arise to announce that I am a black protestant.

Julianne Testifies

I DON'T deny that Dr. Coakley's Julianne exists; in fact, I am acquainted with her. Dropping in the other day, I found her, like "Hermione," in the midst of a little group of serious thinkers.

"Julianne," I remarked, not waiting to choose my words, "did the nuns teach you to face-paint and enamel?"

Julianne looked somewhat startled, even under the paint. The question was, I admit, somewhat unconventional.

"How funny! Who says that I paint?" she inquired with an injured air. I borrowed that "injured air" from a "best-seller." I gather that an "injured air" is the heroine's last defense against the hissing villain, before the resort to tears.

"Dr. Coakley says so," I answered.

"Who's Dr. Coakley?" We seemed to be veering away from the introduction. At least in asking questions, Julianne is typically feminine.

"Why Dr. Coakley is a notable ecclesiastic, and he sometimes writes things for America. Now, last month he said that ——"

"But I don't even know Dr. Coakley, and I never heard of America. But I do know that the nuns didn't teach us to paint. They didn't even allow it. Why one day Mary Porter brought in some rouge, and Sister Mary Emerentiana ——"

Some Elements of Training

I FORBEAR to relate what happened in those peaceful convent surroundings when Mary Porter smuggled in her contraband, only to fall foul of a destroyer like Sister Mary Emerentiana, by nature no respecter of persons, and by fit appointment, Mistress of Discipline at St. Ursula's. At times Julianne's intelligence may resemble that of a sublimated chipmunk, and she has a turn for vivid words, but she usually tells the truth to others, if not to herself. At any rate, she made it plain that the dominant note of convent life is simplicity, and while in the telling, she added nothing to the world's store of knowledge, she bore witness to a fact of personal experience. But she used another term for "simplicity." She said that convent life was "strict." Actually, the girls were not allowed to wear pearl necklaces at the school dances, or a profusion of jewelry at any time. Attire out of keeping with their years and station was sternly banned. They might not come and go as they chose, and they never went to the city except in the company of a chaperon who was neither blind, deaf nor dumb. They were not permitted to read whatever they liked, or to receive visitors at all hours, and, under penalty of the door, "cousins" had to prove relationship by identifying themselves with that particular twig on the family tree. I cannot reproduce the technical terms employed in Julianne's narrative, but I gathered that, as a general thing, the girls were obliged to study, and to confine their young surplus energies to wholesome pursuits. "But most of them" added Julianne, somewhat wistfully, I thought, "seemed to like it"; some of them so well that they decided to spend the rest of their days within convent walls.

An Unconscious Tribute

NO, I do not deny that Julianne exists; but I must respectfully protest that her name is not legion. That it is not, is due, in my judgment, to the patient, quiet, efficient work of our convent schools. Why is it that every adventuress in the toils of the law, and every actress in search of a deodorizer for a noisome play, announces that she was educated in a convent school? The claim, invariably without foundation, is an unconscious tribute paid by murky morality to an acknowledged standard of cultured, virtuous womanhood. True, the Sisters cannot put a new soul into a pupil, or always make reparation for years of foolish "home training"; but even with the most unpromising material, they often come miraculously near success in what is apparently a hopeless task.

If I know anything at all about convent schools, I know that in them the pupil is taught by precept and example, that she has a soul to save, a neighbor to serve, and a God to glorify; and, so far as my experience and study of the question may be of any value, I am led to the conclusion that the convent-bred girl usually becomes a woman who makes the world a great deal better and happier for her presence in it. I admit exceptions, but think them few; and I am willing to adopt the statement of the old Jesuit Father who held that while the convent-bred girl might follow devious lights for a time, she would ultimately return to sanity, when another might not, simply because the former's early training had taught her how to return.

The Profit of Training

THERE is hope, then, even for Julianne. When Julianne was at school, her faults were pointed out quite plainly, she was told how to correct them, and encouraged in the endeavor. I do not see how any school can do more. Julianne has now taken the bit between her teeth, but she is under no delusion. She knows that she is violating every point of her convent training, and she knows perfectly well that she is doing wrong. In this knowledge lies an essential part of the profit of Catholic training. The life so justly reprobated by Dr. Coakley, might be led by many a girl, in utter ignorance that anything else could reasonably be expected from a person in her station of life. Not so the convent-bred woman. Knowledge alone is no pledge of reformation, but without it how can one see the error of his ways? When a man has come to believe that theft and lying are virtuous acts, the possibility of reform is, humanly speaking, negligible. You may pray for him, but argument is hopeless.

The Fruit of the Tree

IT is hardly necessary to insist that no school is justly appraised by attending solely to the list of its failures. Like the grace of God, the deep influences of Catholic education do not destroy the freedom of the will. The defection of eleven Apostles on Good Friday argued human weakness, but no weakness in the training given by the Great Teacher. The comparison may be extended, with its obvious reservations, to the school whose ultimate purpose is to continue the work of Christ upon earth. Neither the soundness of its principles, nor the efficiency of its methods may be justly questioned, particularly since the triumphs are numerous, and the failures few. In my judgment there is no more reason for criticizing convent-school education because of an occasional Julianne, than there is for raising an outcry against Jesuit education, on the ground that Diderot and Voltaire once sat at the feet of Jesuit masters. But they learned no infidelity there, nor did Julianne find the beginnings of her present aberrations in the sane and wholesome training of a convent school.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S. J.

SOCIOLOGY

A San Francisco Welfare League.

THE object of the St. Francis Welfare League as expressed in its Constitution, is to provide for the material and spiritual advancement of young people, particularly young girls, by organizing and conducting noonday clubs in large manufacturing and mercantile establishments, evening clubs, classes for educational work, and mothers' clubs.

The call for Catholic women in San Francisco to enter this field came from a non-Catholic business man, who employed several hundred women and who saw the need for welfare work among the young girls employed in his own large factory. A non-sectarian organization, hearing of the opportunity, at once offered to undertake the work. Its promoters were told that since the majority of those employed in the plant were Catholics, he felt that Catholic women should lead the project. His invitation finally reached a small group of interested Catholics, who immediately responded by sending a social worker to the factory.

Organization

IT was evident from the first that this phase of social service could not, for various reasons, be undertaken by the religious Sisterhoods, but that it was work for the laity. A plan was submitted to his Grace, our late beloved Archbishop, Dr. Patrick W. Riordan, and readily met with his approval. The lines laid down afforded from the beginning a broad field of endeavor and, while from time to time various activities have been introduced, these are only secondary to the prime object of the League, the spiritual welfare of its members.

The League is recognized by the young girls of its various clubs as a stanch friend, to whom they may turn for counsel and assistance, no matter what the need. It has been called upon to provide spiritual instruction, hospital attention, and legal advice; it has furnished employment, clothing, instruction in English branches and afforded outings in the country. The wisdom and necessity of the work becomes more apparent as time goes on, since only by personal contact with the girls can their confidence be gained and with it, the opportunity to help them spiritually and materially.

Noonday Clubs

THE League has organized and now maintains under its auspices, noonday clubs in two large biscuit factories, its representative, the Director of Clubs, meeting regularly with 300 young women employees. These clubs are organized along customary lines and the members are governed by their Constitution, and officers chosen from their number. A portion of the factory is set apart by the firm for the club room and recreation hall, and there, at the noon hour, the various activities are carried on. Perhaps it is well to state here that the most encouraging reports have been received from the company in whose plants these clubs exist. The benefit derived from them is mutual for they serve to bring the employer and employee together, and thus promote a better understanding.

Classes

THE library forms an attractive feature of the club, and care is taken to place proper reading matter on the shelves. Sewing and millinery have their place in the opportunities afforded the girls, and interested classes meet with the volunteer teachers. Lectures by physicians and nurses and talks on topics of interest are given from time to time. At the outset it was found that the teaching of dancing was a wise provision. Good music and correct methods led the club members to eliminate objectionable styles, and to maintain correct standards.

The League has a club house on Potrero Avenue, where, on Monday evenings, fifty young girls engaged in commercial work, take advantage of the lessons in millinery, sewing, and dancing. The use of an endowed bed in St. Mary's Hospital affords the girls free hospital care, and a special fund, subscribed by the same generous woman, provides assistance for them in the period of convalescence.

Mothers' Clubs

ALTHOUGH the prime interest of the League is the welfare of young girls, it has included mothers' clubs in its work, in the belief that the interests of mothers and their girls go hand in hand. A mothers' club meeting weekly at the Potrero Avenue club house has a membership of seventy-three. Its activities are spiritual and educational, as well as social and charitable. The Rev. P. J. Foote, S. J., spiritual director of the club, meets with them once a month, and has given many interesting and instructive talks. It is the annual custom for the members of the club to receive Holy Communion in a body on the Feast of the Ascension. That the club has a social side, no one would doubt after spending an afternoon at a meeting. To these works is added practical charity. For out of the club treasury material is bought and layettes are made for needy mothers.

Spiritual Work

FOR cooperation in its spiritual work, the League has been most fortunate. From the first the Religious of the Sacred Heart have been ready to respond to any call, granting the League the privilege of their chapel for the annual retreat and other religious functions. An added interest and strength has been given to the retreat work through the appointment by his Grace, Most Rev. E. J. Hanna, of the Rev. D. J. Kavanagh, S. J., as chaplain. Father Kavanagh conducts the exercises on three consecutive evenings, giving instructions that are of particular importance to the young retreatants. On Sunday morning the retreat closes with Mass, reception of Holy Communion, Benediction, and the Papal Blessing. After Mass, breakfast is served by the Religious. These retreats are a source of great satisfaction. Each year shows an increase in interest and attendance, the communicants numbering this year 250. Through the exercises many girls become promoters of the League of the Sacred Heart, spreading the devotion among their coworkers; others are enrolled in pious confraternities, while not a few, through the missionary zeal of the interested workers, are brought back to the fold.

PERSONAL SERVICE

THE annual Christmas Tree Festivals are the happy termination of the year's work. It is around the Christmas Tree that the annual reunions are held. Young girls of the clubs, their parents and friends, members of the firms, their wives and friends, League members, and the clergy, all assemble to exchange the season's greetings and enjoy a pleasing program. The League remembers each girl with a small gift. At the annual meeting the subscribers to the League are honored by the presence of his Grace, the Most Reverend Archbishop, who is ever ready to lend his counsel and encouragement to the work.

Coming in daily contact, as representatives of the League do, with numbers of young Catholic girls employed in these industrial centers, one realizes not only the opportunity but the call for the Catholic woman of leisure to give her time and personal service in active work for her neighbor. Hers is the privilege to show the personal interest, to lend the touch of tenderness, and to infuse into social service the religious spirit which gives it efficiency and spiritual worth.

M. A. TAYLOR.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Catholic Alumnae in Convention

THE assembly of the International Federation of the Catholic Alumnæ is to be held at Hotel Belvedere, Baltimore, November 23-26. The organization has progressed so rapidly during the past two years that its officers confidently describe the coming assembly as the "hub for that great wheel of educational, social and literary progress, turned by 25,000 women, graduates or sometime members of the Catholic educational institutions in the United States and Canada." The two definite objects of the association, according to its constitution, are to bring together the various Catholic alumnæ societies for the purpose of upholding the true ideals of Catholic womanhood and to formulate plans for the extension of Catholic education, Catholic literature and Catholic social work.

Cities and Babies

SPECIAL municipal health work for babies is at present being carried on in 599 of our American cities with 10,000 or more population. In twenty cities this work is so highly organized that a special division of child hygiene is included in the city's health department. No fewer than 100 municipalities employ a nurse to visit the homes and teach the mothers how to care for the baby. Sixty-three cities have special municipal nurses assigned to the care and instruction of prospective mothers. Sixty cities maintain infant welfare stations with doctors in attendance, at which mothers may obtain detailed advice about the care that is to be taken of their babies. Classes for instructing older schoolgirls in infant hygiene are conducted in forty-four cities. Though 255 report milk inspection as the only municipal activity directly affecting infant health, it is evident that in some respects at least baby life is not neglected in our country. Many State departments of health and extension divisions of State universities also report considerable educational work in child hygiene, such as lending exhibits, lantern slides and films, distributing pamphlets, sending out lecturers, conducting campaigns for complete birth registration and maintaining a regular press service.

Girls in Correctional Institutions

WHAT is the main cause that brings girls into correctional institutions? An attempt to answer this question was started in Philadelphia. Six hundred cases fell under the direct notice of the research bureau, whose findings are thus summarized by the American Statistical Association: "The principal results of the study were to show that in a large majority of cases the girls came from families in which relationship between parents was abnormal, or where one of the parents was away from home." These remarks gain further significance from the observation, equally based upon cold statistical facts, that other investigations of a similar nature have all led to the same conclusions. Divorce and the disintegration of the home are the curses of modern paganism which is bringing a blight upon our civilization. Religion in the home, supplemented by religious training in the school, is the obvious remedy. There is no other means of staying our retrogression into heathenism with all its vices.

Loyola University School of Sociology

THE total registration of Loyola University School of Sociology, Chicago, is close to 300 students and will probably exceed that number in the final reckoning. The increasing number of social courses in our Catholic universities and their growing popularity give promise that Catholics will soon occupy a prominent place in the social work of our country. The purpose of the Loyola University courses is to meet the needs of school-teachers as well as of social workers and to prepare for the examinations connected with the public service. Logic, history of philosophy, composition, mathematics, public speaking, and similar branches are included in the program. Those who have satisfactorily completed thirty-six credits, nine of which must be in residence, receive the degree of Ph.B. or B. S. A four years' high-school education is presupposed. Thus the student is given more than a mere specialist's training and is properly fitted for his great work.

Farm Wages

THAT farm wages have increased in the grain States and have remained stationary or slightly declined in the cotton States is the conclusion drawn from the estimates of the United States Department of Agriculture. In general the wages of male farm laborers have increased about one per cent throughout the United States during the year 1916, averaging $1.47 without board and $1.13 with board. The New York Observer remarks that wages have been tending upward almost steadily since 1894. The increase in the past five years is about ten per cent and in the past twenty years about sixty-five per cent. It is a notable fact, according to the figures quoted by this labor paper, that farm wages tend to increase in going from East to West and from South to North. The average wages with board per month are $23.71 in the New England States, $24.78 in the East North Central States, $27.38 in the West North Central States and $33.50 in the Far Western States. They are $15.01 in the South Atlantic States and $16.16 in the South Central States.

Catholic Theater Movement

THE first number of the Catholic Theatre Movement has just made its appearance. It is an eight-page bulletin giving a descriptive outline of all the plays presented on the New York stage from the opening of the season to October 4. The plot and character of each production is briefly given, and a word of approval or condemnation is usually added. Each play was witnessed by a member of the Committee and passed on by the Board of the Catholic Theater Movement. Later bulletins will discuss conditions prevalent on the stage and offer a "white list" of current plays. There is urgent need of such a guide especially for parents who cannot in conscience permit their children to attend productions of whose inoffensive character they are not perfectly assured. A file of the successive issues of the bulletin will constitute a detailed guide to many current plays and will be of particular value to all who may be consulted or have occasion to speak upon this topic.

The Chinese Catholic Daily Paper

A LETTER from Father Morel, quoted in the Field Afar, gives interesting details concerning the Catholic Chinese daily, Yih Shih Pao, published at Tientsin, to which reference has already been made in these columns. Though it can claim only 5,000 subscribers, it has become the leading newspaper of North China and is noted for its reliable information and careful editing. It appears daily in twelve large pages.

> Since only one thirtieth or one fortieth of the subscribers are Christians, we are obliged to address ourselves to the pagan mass. In the beginning the paper was quite neutral, but little by little it revealed its Catholic spirit. The people are not deceived. They speak of it now without hesitation as "the Catholic paper," and yet they continue to subscribe for it. Several controversial or apologetic articles have won conversions for us and we hope this movement will increase when we can supplement the work of the printed word by lectures, to be given as soon as our new hall is finished.

To indicate the enterprising spirit of this handful of Catholics in a great pagan country we are told that a school of Catholic journalism has been opened under the direction of a former newspaper manager. Plans are likewise under consideration for publishing special editions of the Catholic daily for Pekin; this will gradually be done in all the large cities. Besides the Yih Shih Pao or Social Welfare, there is a weekly paper intended for Catholics alone and an illustrated weekly, the Yih Shih Niu Pao, or Woman's Social Welfare, which is designed "to carry the Catholic idea among the Chinese women." When the war price on paper, from which China too is suffering, has gone down, the editors hope to give the widest diffusion to this Catholic Chinese journal for women. We have much to learn from our brethren in China. Prospective managers of our future American Catholic daily might profitably pay a visit to the Tientsin printing office to find out how a successful twelve-page Catholic daily can be issued even though the rosy prospects of circulation should at first be limited to 5,000 subscribers.

Jonas-and-the-Whale Controversy

"SPEAKING of whales," the Christian Herald, a non-Catholic publication, considers it timely to call attention once more to the complete refutation which science has afforded to the favorite Jonas-and-the-whale argument of Voltaire, Tom Paine, Bob Ingersoll and countless other infidel opponents of the inspired word of God. The story of Jonas, the writer believes, has aroused more controversy than any other Scriptural subject and down to the present day has been the point at which a great many souls have suffered shipwreck in their faith in the Bible. "The principal attacks upon the story were based upon the fact that science had discovered that the whale's throat was so small that it could not possibly swallow a man." In the first place the Bible does not specify a whale, but mentions only "a great fish." In the second place it was not difficult for God to have, as the Scripture says, "prepared a great fish to swallow Jonas." In the last place there is actually a fish in existence which could easily have performed the task assigned to the "great fish" of the Scripture, and that is the whale-shark. The first definite mention of it occurred in 1828, further information was gained in 1858 and in 1870. Since 1883 several whale-sharks have been captured. That killed by Captain Thompson with the aid of some fishermen, in 1912, was exhibited at Miami and its skin was later carefully mounted for more extensive exhibition.

> The specimen taken by Captain Thompson is about forty five feet long and the girth about eighteen feet. The mouth is so large that a man could crouch within it easily, and the throat was said to have been fully large enough to permit the passing of a man of ordinary size. The fact that there is a fish big enough to have swallowed a man makes foolish the argument of those who questioned the story of Jonas.

Science had spoken its "last word" upon this subject in the days of Paine and Ingersoll and fearful souls believed the Bible must surely be wrong. Since then the last words of science have been frequently enough revised.

Leper Colony of Surinam

FLOWERS, parks of roses, and a garden with beautiful trees is all that can be seen by a visitor looking from a distance at the leper colony of Surinam, separated by a stream from all external intercourse with men. On both sides of the garden are the little wooden houses, at the right for the men and on the left for the women. In the background is the chapel with the same Lord who cured the leper of old, but "seldom does so now. He sends the Sisters of Charity and He sends alms that the lepers may partake a little of the joys of life." Behind the chapel is the play-room, also used for a school, where forty boys are being instructed in reading or writing. Many have no fingers with which to write, and there is no intention of procuring a position in the world for them, "but only to keep them occupied and to teach them to read good books." Nearby is the kitchen and not far off is the sewing room where children who have not lost their fingers are repairing their clothes. Behind this is the laundry where one of the Sisters washes and irons the clothing of 110 patients. Such is the general description of the colony given by the Vicar Apostolic of Surinam in a letter wherein he thanks the members of the American Leprosy Society for the subscriptions they have gathered for his work of Christian charity. To employ the women and girls is not difficult because of the various household duties which they can perform, but it is more difficult to occupy the men. Many have a bit of ground where they plant vegetables and raise fowl; others are not able to work at all. A recreation room and a small library have been fitted up for the lepers and a Brother has organized a band. "The lepers cannot play at 'quick tempo' because they cannot move their stumps of fingers fast enough." Owing to the terrible odor of each individual, unbearable to the lepers themselves, every patient must have his own house. Total separation is necessary, and this is an expensive item. "Is leprosy contagious?" asks the Vicar Apostolic, and significantly answers: "Three of our European Fathers took the sickness and died here. And now one Sister, having been twenty years among the lepers, has fallen a victim of charity." Thus is practised the greatest love that man can have for his fellow-man. To those afar is given the privilege of aiding with their alms in this heroic work. "Would you not wish to rest and return to your native land and the friends you have left there?" the Vicar Apostolic asked one of the Sisters. The answer that came directly was that there would soon, she hoped, be rest enough in Heaven. How then could she weary of her work? Such has ever been the argument of the saints. What is most distressing to such heroic souls is not the hardness of their daily task and the greatness of the sacrifice, but the indifference of so many of the same faith to the cause for which they themselves have gladly offered all to Christ.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVI. No. 4
WHOLE No. 395

NOVEMBER 4, 1916

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—In the Somme district the British have gained ground on the ridge between Le Sars and Thiepval, and have pushed forward a short distance in the direction of Le Transloy; the French, further south, have taken Hill 128, northwest of Sailly. In the Verdun region the French have made the most sensational advance of the week. Advancing on a front of four miles, they recaptured the Thiaumont Works, Hill 321, Hill 320, the fort and the village of Douaumont, La Caillette Woods, the Fumin Woods and the Haudromont Quarries. At the same time they succeeded in surrounding on three sides the plateau of Vaux, on which are situated both the fort and village of the same name. As a consequence almost all the Meuse heights on the east side of the river are once more in French hands. At some points the French have penetrated as much as two miles into the territory held by the Germans.

Bulletin, Oct. 24, a.m.-Oct. 30, a.m.

In the Trentino, in the Goritz sector, in Macedonia and Volhynia, the situation remains unchanged. In Galicia the Central Powers have driven the Russians from the entire west bank of the Naraijunka River. In Bukowina the Austrians have gained two heights near Dorna Watra. On the eastern boundary of Transylvania the Rumanians have held their own, but in the Transylvanian Alps they have been less successful. Here the Central Powers have taken Predeal, south of Kronstadt, and are trying to force their way through the Predeal Pass. Further west the Central Powers have advanced from Toerzburg to the vicinity of Kimpulung, penetrated the Rothenthurm Pass, and have stormed the Vulkan Pass.

In Dobrudja the Central Powers have gained very important victories. Following up the capture of Constantsa, they took Tsara Murat, sixteen miles northwest of the Black Sea port, and Rasova on the Danube. Later they occupied Midjidie, midway between Constantsa and Cernavoda. This last success necessitated the evacuation of Cernavoda, but the Central Powers entered it too late to save the bridge of the same name, which the Rumanians had already blown up. The Rumanians are now offering no serious resistance; they have already evacuated Hirsova, and are retreating towards Tultcha and the other forts in northern Dobrudja.

Austria.—Austria is recovering from the shock caused by the murder of Premier Count Karl Stürgkh. His remains lay in state in the Cathedral of St. Stephen, where funeral services were conducted by Cardinal Piffl. The murder is without political significance, and is deeply deplored throughout the entire Empire. Victor Adler, the father of the assassin, is a Socialist member of Parliament, but the mad act of his son is disavowed both by him and by the Socialist party and press. The murderer had been secretary of the Socialist party and editor of the Socialist paper, Der Kampf. He separated from the party owing to its attitude towards the war. There is evidently a strain of insanity in the family, and the radical ideas with which Adler was indoctrinated helped to develop his fanaticism. At a service in memory of the Austrian Premier, held in Vienna, Dr. Pernerstorffer, after disclaiming all acts of terrorism, said in the name of the Socialist party:

Socialists Disclaim Assassin

> We disapprove the assassin's deed from a political standpoint, and express the deepest and most sincere regret at the tragic fate of the man who, whatever may be said as to his policies, worked for his country with unswerving zeal, in accordance with his convictions. We express deep sympathy with his family and with all near him.

As the murder was without political significance, no change is expected in the Austrian policy.

France.—On October 24, the French Government officially designated a commission for developing the use of agricultural machinery among the farmers of France. In the memorandum addressed to President Poincaré, upon which the official action was based, Jules Méline, the Minister of Agriculture, says:

Improved Agricultural Methods

> The employment of perfected machinery is not new in agriculture. Its use had already been begun before the war in the higher phases of farming, but it was still the object of instinctive distrust in the more remote regions of rural life, where it was considered a costly luxury, good for the rich.

This feeling, the memorandum of the Minister adds, has been thoroughly modified by the present lack of laborers throughout France, all eyes being turned towards the marvelous mechanisms which work with a hundred times the power of man. M. Méline, long known for the interest he has taken in the industrial and agricultural interests of the country, develops this idea in a lengthy article in the Journal Officiel, and calculates that for the invaded and devastated districts of France alone, there will be needed 2,000 motor-tractors, in addition to the 200 already in use; 110,000 plows, 50,000 harrows, 22,000 planters and 15,000 reapers. The Chairman of the commission is Senator Viger, and among his thirty assistants, are men bearing many of the most notable names in France, who are connected with the farming, automobile, and railway interests, including Fernand David, André Lebon and Edwin Téry.

Germany.—A new war credit bill for 12,000,000,000 marks was submitted to the Reichstag by the Secretary of the Imperial Treasury, Count von Roedern, and voted for by all the members with the exception of the extreme Left of the Socialist party. According to the Count, the amount hitherto spent upon the war by all belligerents is about $60,000,000,000, of which one-third falls to the share of Germany and her allies. The present cost of the war to Germany, owing to the extension of her battle-front in the Dobrudja and Transylvania, is 2,187,000,000 marks per month. The total of the preceding German war credits amounted to 52,000,000,000 marks. The number of subscribers to the fifth war loan was about 4,000,000, so that this extensive loan of 10,652,000,000 marks was in reality a "people's loan." Payments for almost the entire sum have already been received and less than three per cent of the amount paid has been subscribed by loan institutes. Count von Roedern asserted that much credit for this financial success was due to the increase of the saving capacity of the German people. In the first eight months of 1916 savings-banks showed increases of 1,710,000,000 marks in deposits, exclusive of the amounts subscribed to the war loan. While the discount rate of the Bank of England, he said, had been fixed at six per cent, the German Reichsbank has been able to maintain a five per cent standard since December, 1914. Part of the money invested in industries making war material will either be repaid or employed usefully in time of peace. In explanation Count von Roedern added:

New War Credit

> I refer to the nitrogen establishments, from which we hope to put at the disposal of agriculturists more nitrogen at lower prices than before the war. Further improvement in this direction is the replacing of part of our copper by aluminum, and the establishment of an industry for producing fodder.

He again called attention to the fact that German money circulates within Germany itself, while her enemies must pay enormous tributes to foreign lands. According to the Vorwärts, the Socialist party pronounced itself in favor of the new loan by a vote of 57 to 15.

Holland.—The war is laying a heavy tribute upon neutral Holland. At the present rate of expenditure the national debt will be twice as large as it was before the conflict began, should the struggle continue to the end of the year 1917. So far the maintenance of an army of over 250,000 men has cost Holland nearly $8,000,000 a month. Furthermore, according to a conservative estimate, the measures by which the Government proposes to insure an adequate supply of food for the nation will raise the expenditure for foodstuffs to $40,000,000 a year. In this event the sum of $10,000,000 a month will be spent on the troops, if the army is kept at its present strength. The two war loans so far raised amounted to a total of $160,000,000. This sum has long since been spent, and a new loan is under consideration. The tax on war profits, however, and the special defense taxes and war levies will probably yield about $60,000,000. According to figures just issued by the Ministry of Finance, the actual cost to Holland of the first two years of the European war was $178,400,000.

The Cost of Mobilization

Ireland.—Comments on Mr. Redmond's Waterford speech occupy a large space in the Irish press. The Irish Weekly Independent, while admitting that Mr. Redmond has "seldom descended to the offensive style too often adopted by some of his colleagues," is not a little surprised that in dealing with criticisms of his policy and that of his party, he made one or two departures from his usual moderation of tone and language. "One does not get rid of criticism," says the Independent, "by describing it as 'lies and calumnies' and by referring to other Irishmen, as 'the vilest excrescences that ever yet appeared in the body politic of Ireland'."

The Press and Mr. Redmond

That journal reminds readers how unjust these attacks are when they reflect on such men as Archbishop Walsh and the Most Rev. Dr. McHugh and the Bishops of the counties proposed to be excluded, men of unimpeachable patriotism, and all ardent Nationalists. Here, the Independent quotes the words of Archbishop Walsh, which it now sees only too strongly borne out by facts: "That the Home Rule cause in Parliament was being led along a line that could only lead to disaster, and that as a result of the abandonment of the policy of independent opposition in the House of Commons, the country was face to face with a truly awful prospect."

According to the Independent, the popular complaint against Mr. Redmond, is that he has erred more by omission than by acts of commission. He has been too weak as a leader; "he has failed to preserve the independence of the Irish party at Westminster; instead of reserving to the party such freedom of action as was necessary, he has treated the alliance with the Liberals as an arrangement so rigid that the Irish party has become a mere tail of the English Whigs."

Mr. Redmond and many of his party are declared guiltless of "place-hunting"; but he is criticized for allowing "a large proportion of the members" to seek preferment for their friends, to an extent, the paper adds, never tolerated in former days. The Irish Catholic also regrets the violent tone of Mr. Redmond's criticisms of his opponents. One part of the Waterford speech it finds satisfactory, that portion in which Mr. Redmond said: "Nothing in this wide world would ever induce me to accept as a settlement of the Home Rule question any scheme providing for the permanent division of our ancient nation." The same paper finds that something was gained when Mr. Redmond asserted that "partition-proposals were dead and vanished," and that "never more would he enter into private negotiations with any English Minister." It adds: "That the member for Waterford was tricked is certain, but so was Grattan, and even O'Connell more than once."

Mexico.—Though conditions in Mexico are worse today than they have been in many months, yet news about the different revolutions now going on there has been quite overshadowed by the condemnation of our Government by prominent Carranzistas. In an interview granted to the staff correspondent of the Outlook the First Chief himself spoke these incisive, if utterly ungrateful, words:

Estimate of Our Policy

. . . Lately we have had to complain of very serious interference in our affairs by your Government. . . . We cannot make such acts of your President accord with his words of sympathy for us. It is this inconsistent policy from your Government which is responsible for the disfavor in which Americans find themselves held in Mexico today. It seems to us that your President has not kept faith with Mexico.

These stinging words were followed by statements from Obregon, Gonzales and Aguilar, the first of whom declared that "Wilson makes too many declarations which have no facts behind them": the second affirmed that "Wilson's policy is not clear"; it is not frank; it is not clean. Aguilar, more talkative than his companions, said:

Wilson's policy has made Mexico feel like a man at whom is pointed a loaded and cocked pistol and who is kept in this uncomfortable and uncertain position for a long and nerve-racking period. If the trigger is to be pulled, the man would prefer to have it done at once, so that the worst would be over quickly.

These severe and humilitating indictments were followed by an extraordinary statement issued, in entire disregard of diplomatic usage and courtesy, by the Mexican News Bureau. The document was sent out from the Bureau to newspapers and reviews, was stamped "official" and carried an introduction which attributed its contents to Cabrera, Chairman of the Mexican section of the joint commission assembled to settle difficulties between the United States and Mexico. The statement reads:

A broad interpretation of the Federal laws of the United States dealing with neutrality and regulating immigration with a strict, consistent and efficient administration of these laws by the executives to whom their administration is delegated would go a long way toward correcting the border disturbances and allay much of the unrest which at present pervades that region. In the United States are many Mexicans and groups of Mexicans inimical to the Carranza Government. Plottings and schemings are engaged in, not alone by the extreme conservatives, who are striving to bring on intervention with the hope that the Constitutional Government shall be destroyed with the aid of American armies, but also there are groups of extremely radical malcontents, whose hope is the destruction of the Carranza Government in order that license, banditry and rapine may continue and multiply until human rights and property are all destroyed. The conservatives, reactionaries, are taking advantage of the situation created by the ultra-radicals. The importation of arms and munitions for the use of Villa, Zapata and the other bandits and brigands is conducted under the very eyes of supine officials, whose business it is to hinder their transmission across the border. The propaganda of revolt against constituted order is being promoted by scores of conspirators known to both the Mexican and the American officials, who, by even the most strictly literal interpretation of America's immigration laws, should be deported from the United States. That the American Government is competent to restrict and restrain the exportation of arms and munitions can be proved by the fact that during the early days of the Carranza revolt against the power of Huerta these rules were enforced with an almost cruel rigidity against Carranza. That the law governing the conduct of undesirable aliens can be enforced is proved at Ellis Island and throughout the United States every day in the year. Activity, energy, vigilance and persistency can correct the situation. Indifference, carelessness and needless liberality can only make a bad case worse.

On learning that the document had been given to the press, Cabrera disavowed it, but the Bureau was just as quick to state that it had been obtained directly from him. When informed of this later assertion Cabrera, after promising a true version of his views, asked "What is the Mexican News Bureau? Who are they? I never heard of such an organization." The Bureau has been in existence some time under the management of a former press censor for Carranza, in Mexico City; moreover it publishes a paper advocating the First Chief's cause. During a goodly portion of this time Cabrera has been a Constitutionalist agent here and according to the Mexican Ambassador-Designate to the United States, had an interview with a representative of the Bureau some days before the offensive statement was issued. Despite all this he never heard of the Bureau. Apparently Cabrera's words leaked out too soon and diplomacy was invoked to save the situation. Up to the present Cabrera has not repudiated the sentiments expressed: he has contented himself with saying that their publication was unauthorized. The Ambassador-Designate has done likewise, adding to his statement a repudiation of the views expressed in the Outlook.

Just before this faux pas occurred, Mr. Baker, Secretary of War, made this announcement:

The War Department has received definite information, confirmed from other sources, that enemies of the Administration's policy toward Mexico, in cooperation with Villa or other bandits in Mexico, have arranged a spectacular attack, to be made either upon some part of the American forces or upon some American community on the border, between now and the date of the election, for the purpose of turning the tide of sentiment against the policy which the Administration has adopted for the protection of the border. It is significant in this connection that both the State and War Departments were advised that the bandit's forces operating at the present time in Mexico are being paid in silver coin. Full particulars have been transmitted to General Funston and General Pershing. All American forces are, therefore, forewarned and in readiness for such an attack.

These unhappy words were taken at their face-value and interpreted to mean that Americans opposed to the reelection of Mr. Wilson were cooperating with unspeakable bandits to consummate an attack on Americans living on American soil. In answer to a popular clamor for the names of the criminals Mr. Lansing, Secretary of State, declared:

> Secretary Baker had no intention to intimate that American citizens were involved in the bandit-attack plot. He and Mr. Baker believed that in addition to warning the military commanders, it was wise to give the information received publicity, because it might have the effect of causing the plot to be abandoned.

The editorial comment on the incident is caustic in the extreme. One paper expresses surprise that Mr. Baker remains in the service of so wicked a people as Americans and adds: "He has found out that our fathers were horse-thieves and marauders in 1776, and that their sons betray their country to Mexican bandits."

Rome.—The Reisac incident which revolves around bogus statements attributed to Cardinal Gasparri, details of which were published in AMERICA last week, is not yet closed. According to Rome, both the Osservatore Romano and the Corriere d'Italia published M. Edouard Helsey's denial that he had communicated to Madame Reisac revelations or statements made to him in his interview with Cardinal Gasparri. In printing M. Helsey's telegram from Salonica, the Corriere d'Italia added a few words of explanatory comment, as a result of which, the following note appeared later in that paper:

The Reisac Incident Again

> Madame Irma Casier, who under the pseudonym of Madame Reisac wrote the famous interview referred to in the categorical denial of M. Helsey, which we published yesterday, sends us, by the hands of an usher, a letter, which claims to be in substance a counter-denial of M. Helsey. The matter regards M. Helsey and we do not know why Madame Casier applied to us. But since Madame Casier announces that she will bring an action against the Corriere d'Italia, we hasten to give the joyful tidings to our readers.

It is quite evident that whoever made the incriminating statements it was not the Papal Secretary of State.

A recent issue of Rome states that the Belgian deputy, Arthur Verhaegen of Ghent, head of the Catholic Labor party, has been recently pardoned by the Emperor of Germany, in consequence of the intercession of the Holy Father, and has been set at liberty. In September of last year, he had been condemned by the German military authorities to two years' imprisonment in a fortress. As soon as the Belgian Minister of the Holy See heard the news of the prisoner's liberation from Cardinal Gasparri, he communicated it to the Belgian Government at Havre. The Minister of Justice and Vice-President of the Cabinet, Carton de Wiart, who happens to be a relative of Mr. Verhaegen, telegraphed immediately to M. Van den Heuvel, charging him to present to the Cardinal Secretary of State the sentiments of profound gratitude of the Government, of himself and of the Verhaegen family, for the efficacious interest and paternal kindness of the Holy Father.

Pope, Emperor and Prisoner

Spain.—Two grave questions are now agitating the country. Great uneasiness prevails over the Government's attitude of neutrality in the present war. A speech by Señor Maura evidently brought the whole matter before the people in a new and startling light. In the Provinces, as many as 1,500 organizations, clubs, societies, have been formed to defend the country's neutral position. A certain unrest is evident in many circles hitherto untouched by the stress of the conflict, and it is feared that this unrest and uneasiness may vent themselves in the Cortes in the form of a debate on the European war and Spain's attitude towards it. The wiser and more prudent men of nearly all parties in Parliament look upon such a debate as extremely dangerous. The Government is anxious to avoid it, and the political press counsels calmness and prudence. But the general excitement is so tense that it may force a discussion, which may be of the utmost danger to the welfare and peace of the country.

Neutrality and Finances

The financial condition of the Government is also so critical that the Administration is in danger of shipwreck. The situation of the National Exchequer is now even worse than in 1900. To meet the crisis Señor Alba, Minister of Finance, has drawn up no fewer than twenty-two financial schemes which he will present to Parliament. Scarcely any one of these is known with certainty or in detail. One is said to deal with the extraordinary profits arising from the war. But the Regionalists of Catalonia, and the Senators and Deputies of the Basque Provinces, which would be most affected by the measure, are ready to do everything to obstruct and defeat this scheme. Rumor has it that another of these twenty-two projects deals with important modifications in the territorial contributions. In this plan, convents, hospitals, and other institutions of charity will be subject to taxation; cathedrals and parish churches will, however, be exempt. These last, it is reported, are being excepted only out of respect for the Concordat.

Eugenics and Old Clothes

VINCENT MCNABB, O.P.

AN old-clothes shop is a theater of this drama. Now, just as there are theaters and theaters, so there are old-clothes shops and old-clothes shops. There is the high-grade shop where Mrs. Dives, the multi-millionaire's wife, parts with her once-used garments for a consideration. There is the Bowery shop where Mrs. Jones, the poor sweated seamstress or box-maker, takes a garment from the lowest rung of the social ladder after it has been worn by half-a-dozen backs. Between these two lies the tragedy of a down-hill course from Fifth Avenue to the Bowery.

Great numbers of people with slender incomes indulge their thirst for finery by purchasing garments that have "come down" from Mrs. Dives or my Lady Bountiful. The same is a moral; and the occasion of some very disheartening thought if a man sets out thinking thereon. My particular watershed of thought thereon was determined by reading an article in a feminist paper recently under the title: "Wanted! Understanding! A word to the Archbishop of York!" The Archbishop seems to have said, meekly enough, that race-suicide was not a lovely thing. I cannot say whether he said it nicely. At any rate he seems to have stirred up a woman contributor to this paper. What she has written under stress of deep emotion is worthy of thought:

> What his Grace seems to be unaware of is that not only mothers, but fathers, are feeling a deep sense of responsibility for their children. Each pair of parents has to settle for themselves whether their aim is to have a small family born, tended, housed, clothed, fed and educated as human beings have a right to be, or a large family sharing penury as its portion and growing up as the public hewers of wood and drawers of water for the more fortunate members of the community.

There is a second paragraph that is in a still more emotional strain, which is no doubt meant to work up the feelings of that "superior person," the Archbishop:

> We would realize that the decrease in the birth-rate occurs chiefly in that part of the race where the progeny are likely to be most satisfactory, and so we continue to do the work which is animated and made beautiful in our eye by the spirit of mothering the whole race which pervades it.

It seems almost rude to say that on reading these two paragraphs, I can find nothing more satisfactory to say than "Old clothes!"

Old clothes are never quite sweet. Somehow a second-hand odor clings to them. Now the eugenics of this woman is twice-musty; musty in its origin with the well-to-do race-murderers, and more musty in its passage from Fifth Avenue to the Bowery, or to such persons on the Bowery as agree with her.

For, be it known to all my readers that the sentiments of this woman never sprang, nor ever could have sprung from working people—God bless them! For instance, vital statistics of New York, which I lately studied, showed that in certain average areas the birth-rate of the poor working quarters was nine times that of the well-to-do avenues. Race-suicide is a beastliness begotten amongst the rich; a kind of devilish luxury which May-fair and Fifth Avenue wear as a cloak. But, like the cheap atheism which dropped from the Paris salons to the Paris gutters, this race-suicide is now being taken up by certain "labor leaders" without a sense of smell; for Mr. Gilbert Chesterton has well said that eugenics is not a science, but a stink.

Most of the nice epithets which seek to deodorize the nasty thing are in these typical extracts which I have just quoted. "Sense of responsibility," how many crimes, crying to heaven and humanity for vengeance, are done under this plea? "Large family showing penury . . .hewers of wood, etc., etc." All these are comforting "Mesopotamias" of the gentle art of killing a noble people.

Sniff, gentle reader, the lavender-water perfume in the phrase, "the work animated and made beautiful in our eyes," etc. Race-suicide beautiful! Beautiful, infanticide! If, in reading this phrase, I do not hold my breath, it is because I once attended a meeting where a medical officer of health and some "nice" women applauded the sentiment that for the poor man to beget a large family was—a crime!

Now, women of the feminist movement, only let me take pity on you; let me show you and your fellows how to take care of your beloved poor. These cast-off doctrines of your financial superiors are not such stuff as you should wear. They do not become you. Their very breath is contagion.

Do you not see that consciously or unconsciously, under the plea of the "economic position" of the poor, the rich are following up the theft of the poor's wages by the theft of the poor's offspring? Nowadays, as always, the poor man's best wealth is his children. The poor have been robbed so effectually, that the good man's wage, which, as Leo XIII said, should be enough for him and his wife, and as many children as they choose to beget in lawful wedlock, is not enough for him and two children half the time.

Now what is the remedy for this economic position which reduces the poor to a state little better than slavery? It is very simple. Your good man must have a living wage. It is an economic difficulty; and finds an easy economic solution.

But these nasty-minded, greedy child-slayers suggest that the poor should be even as they. The poor shall not beget; the poor shall not bring forth. God have mercy on us! What is this but to offer a eugenic solution for an economic evil, and to make the slavery of the poor still more bitter and assured? To follow such teaching is for the poor not to fight their own battles, but to consent to their own death.

Women of the feminist movement, if for a moment you have donned these old garments of the well-to-do, cast them off while you are yet untouched by their contagion. Be clean in your own homespun virtues, for you are not the earth's salt, which is only now and then a need, but the earth's soil, from whence all life forever must spring.

The Shavian Christ

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

"FROM Frazer's magnum opus you will learn how . . . primitive logic led the first men who conceived God as capable of incarnation to believe that they could acquire a spark of his divinity by eating his flesh and drinking his blood. And from the song of John Barleycorn you may learn how the miracle of the seed, the growth, and the harvest . . . taught the primitive husbandman . . . that God is in the seed, and that God is immortal. And thus it became the test of Godhead that nothing that you could do to it could kill it, and that when you buried it, it would rise again in renewed life and beauty and give mankind eternal life on condition that it was eaten and drunk, and again slain and buried, to rise again forever and ever. You may, and indeed must, use John Barleycorn 'right barbarouslee,' cutting him 'off at knee' with your scythes, scourging him with your flails, burying him in the earth; and he will not resist nor reproach you, but will rise again in golden beauty amidst a great burst of sunshine and bird music, and save you and renew your life." (Preface, xxviii.)

In the light of this not ungraceful bit of folklore which saw in the grain a symbol of Him who is the Redeemer of men's souls, Mr. Shaw traces the origin of the idea of Christ, the Saviour. We are looking for history; and we find in its place this fanciful symbol far more in place in a lyric than in a sober and critical chronicle. There is an old axiom, old because it is so eminently true, that a comparison may illustrate, aid one to grasp the fact, but it never explains. When I say the courage of a man is like that of a lion, that does not give me the slightest clue to the nature of courage either in man or lion. Mr. Shaw dwells affectionately on his carefully evolved metaphor, but it is a very flat substitute for the calm historical analysis of Christ's character which we expect.

If one begins the study of Christ's life as portrayed in the Gospels with a belief in God, it becomes absolutely possible that Christ might be God. Whether He is or not is at worst a question to be tested as we test any other question, by proofs. Beginning with a presupposition that there is no God, all possibility of Christ's Divinity fades into the merest chimera. If there is no God, then certainly Jesus was man.

Mr. Shaw makes no attempt to argue the question of Christ's Divinity. He tells us instead how Alexander and Augustus fancied themselves sons of gods, and stresses the parable of John Barleycorn in an effort to show how Christ could have appropriated to Himself the old tribal ideas of a Redeemer. He then takes it simply for granted that Christ was a man who, perhaps, used slang, swore when He stepped on a nail, and did not marry—understand, please, that I am quoting—because marriage would have interfered with what He considered a higher mission.

Here Mr. Shaw finds himself confronted with miracles. He recognizes that Jesus had abnormal powers of which, he adds, He was sensibly ashamed. The miracles of healing, however, he calmly dismisses as unworthy of more than passing notice. There is nothing remarkable in doing suddenly what others have done less rapidly by purely natural means. Instead, he literally dares Christ to perform a miracle of a higher type. "Bring me a man with only one leg and make another grow instantaneously on him before my eyes, and I will be really impressed."

Then, because there is no God—and consequently miracles of that sort are by presupposition impossible—he passes over calmly or with a genial snub the miracles of Christ of a far higher order than the restoration of a leg. He demands one miracle beyond the possibility of human power, and when he gets such in abundance, proceeds quietly to deny or ignore them. He rejects as fabulous the miracle of the loaves; the calming of the winds and sea impresses him not in the least; the miracles by which Christ showed Himself master of life by recalling souls that had left the body, he calmly disregards; while for the tremendous fact of the Resurrection, without which, as St. Paul says, our faith is vain, he has not one word of comment, save another reference to John Barleycorn.

Be it said with all fairness, had Jesus restored the limbs of every one-legged man in the world with a single gesture and had the fact been recorded in bronze, Mr. Shaw with his present prejudices and predispositions would have been unimpressed. Were Christ to appear to Mr. Shaw as He did to St. Thomas, I have no doubt the clever Irishman would not look at the wounds in hands and side, but would rush to a nerve specialist. Mr. Shaw by his credo has renounced all right to listen to a proof for the Divinity of Christ. A leg more or less cannot affect a credo willingly and blindly accepted.

Nor does he see any purpose in Christ's miracles. In fact, he quotes with approval Rousseau's famous aphorism: "Get rid of miracles and the whole world will fall at the feet of Christ." Our answer to that is simply: Get rid of miracles and you have no reason for falling at the feet of Christ. One does not adore a man.

With one fine gesture, then, Mr. Shaw flings into the scrap-heap all that is supernatural about Jesus Christ: His Divine Sonship, His miraculous Conception, His miracles, and His claim to Godhead; and with what is left of Jesus, he proceeds to build up a genuine or Shavian Christ.

Naturally, he finds Him very human indeed. "He tells his strait-laced disciples . . . that they should avoid martyrdom and enjoy themselves whilst they have the chance," thus proving Himself "what we would call an artist and a Bohemian." He displays an intolerable bigotry in His treatment of the woman of Canaan, a "sin" which "seems quite out of character." Peter's declaration of his belief in the Master's Divinity causes Christ's naturally haughty character to become "arrogant, dictatorial, and even abusive, never replying to his critics without an insulting epithet, and even cursing a fig-tree which disappoints him when he goes to it for fruit." He adopts the old tribal ideas of eating His flesh and drinking His blood, and finally dies in despair on the Cross.

Mr. Shaw's "human defects" in Christ are historic in the annals of controversy, and have been explained as perfectly as one can hope to explain the actions of an infinite person. In any case, this paper is rather exposition than controversy. Mr. Shaw admits his inability to understand any Christ but the one he has made in his patch-quilt fashion. He is baffled at one > who was a baby and he was older than creation. He was a man who could be persecuted, stoned, scourged, and killed, and he was a god, immortal and all-powerful, able to raise the dead and call millions of angels to his aid.

Good; his difficulty is by no means unique. If Mr. Shaw or any one else could understand Jesus with anything approaching completeness, I for one should no longer consider Christ Divine. Infinity ceases to be infinity, God ceases to be God when the brain which is baffled by the physical mystery of electricity can grasp Him.

Of one point, Mr. Shaw is certain. Jesus really proclaimed Himself God. He describes the intense excitement which Christ experienced when Peter declared His Divinity. He pictures, very imaginatively and with references to John Barleycorn, the gradual development of this idea, and with it, the consciousness that it was His destiny to die and to rise again. And He was slain because the Jews took His assertion quite literally.

Mr. Shaw has laid his finger on the whole crux of the problem of the personality of Christ. Prescinding from his fanciful sketch of the rise of Christ's conviction, we agree with him that Christ asserted again and again His Divinity, and that He died for His declaration. We stand then before the very heart of the problem. In asserting His Divinity, either Christ was God or He was not. The first alternative, which is proved true by Christ's miracles, Mr. Shaw by a presupposition is bound to pass over. If He was not God, then either He really believed Himself Divine and was insane, or did not believe Himself Divine and was an arrant impostor. As Mr. Shaw admits his belief in Christ's sincere conviction that He was God, there remains only one alternative, and that he really accepts. Christ Jesus had, at least on one point, an hallucination, just as many a lunatic today who believes himself God. Christ Jesus was mad.

We have had our fill of mad philosophers and their still madder philosophies. Mr. Shaw may admire Nietzsche in spite of his insanity; but it takes a strong effort to write calmly when Christ is placed side by side with that cracked-brained dreamer. Mr. Shaw tries to work out of Christ's asserting that he was God a possible meaning which Christ never intended, namely, that we are all gods; but he frankly admits that today we would hold Christ demented.

"Jesus now became obsessed with a conviction of His Divinity," he tells us. And again:

> If Jesus had been indicted in a modern court, he would have been examined by two doctors, found to be obsessed by a delusion, declared incapable of pleading; and sent to an asylum. . . . [The high priest] treated Jesus as an impostor and a blasphemer, where we would have treated him as a madman.

From Divinity Mr. Shaw has dragged Christ down to mere humanity. From a perfect man, he has made Him mad. We are interested naturally in learning what sort of Christianity he will now find in the teachings of his mad theologian.

"Dies Irae"

HENRY C. WATTS

THERE is no contrast more remarkable in all the great works of art and literature, there is no climax more poignant or more forcible, than the sudden emotional change from the clanging triumph of the Feast of All Saints to the somber plaintiveness of the Day of the Holy Dead. It comes as the sudden transition from the bright glory of the hosts of the redeemed walking in heavenly places on high, to the sighs of the waiting souls as they lift up beseeching hands in the valley of their purgation.

Almost as strident as the blare of the Archangel's trumpet, as it summons the nations to judgment, is the surging wave of triumph that sounds and resounds through the liturgy of All Saints' Day. Ecce ego Ioannes: "Behold, I, John, saw these things." And the thing he saw was the splendid vision of the New Jerusalem coming down from heaven as a bride adorned for her husband, and the splendor of that vision has flashed through the centuries as the homeward march, the anabasis, of the conquering hosts of God. Angels and archangels, cherubim and seraphim, principalities, dominations, and powers, move in an array of bewildering dazzlement; and as they pass there follows the democracy of heaven, the Mother of God, the Baptist, the apostolic college, with the martyrs, the confessors, the monks, the virgins —the great company that follows the Lamb whithersoever He goeth.

The Divine triumph of Easter, coming, as it does, when the realm of nature is already bursting into bloom, seems to have less of the human appeal, the tremendous urge, of All Saints' Day, the day not only on which God reigns victoriously, but the day, too, in which men and women who walked the earth as we ourselves have put on the splendor of immortality.

There is the throne of David.
And there from care released
The shouts of them that triumph,
The songs of them that feast.

And then, when the clamor of the Saints is blended in one eternal and universal song, with a suddenness that is without equal in the dramatic values that the world has ever possessed, there creeps up, like a gray cloud smiting upon the sea of glass and the seven lamps of fire before the Throne, the plaint of the Holy Souls. "How long, O Lord!" they cry, and as the echoes of the shouts of the Saints in glory roll back like the voice of the thunders, again uprises the cry "How long!"

It comes, this Day of the Dead, in the dying hour of the year. When the glory of summer is past, when the trees stand out gaunt and bare, when in the heavy silence of the woods the autumn damps drop slowly and dully on the fallen leaves, and nature mourns for the brightness and fulness of life that is past, then the Church rises in her strength and storms the fortress of Divine Omnipotence for the souls that are passing through the cleansing fire of purgatory.

Slowly, silently, the ministers of the Requiem Mass approach the altar steps. The pale wintry sunlight of November filters through the windows of the church, and mingles with the heavy blue smoke that arises from the funeral torches burning around the catafalque. And through the smoke, through the swords of sunlight that pierce like the sword of the destroying Angel and beyond the flare of the massive unbleached lights, there is the glimmer of the lights of the altar of expiation. As the black-clothed figures bow themselves before the altar, there is flung up a great cry, a cry that bursts its way across the gulf between time and eternity, a cry that goes up from the living for the dead.

Requiem aeternam: "Rest eternal, grant unto them, O Lord, and let light perpetual shine upon them." It smites upon the doors of heaven, it pierces through the midst of the angelic choirs, and flings itself at the feet of God: "A hymn, O God, becometh thee in Sion: and a vow shall be paid unto thee in Jerusalem. O hear my prayer: all flesh shall come unto thee."

So begins this pageant of pity and of terror; of terror because of the scales of judgment; of pity because of the supplication for light and peace that goes up from the whole earth, the pageant also of eternal redemption. The action of this solemn ceremony moves with stately deliberation, it avoids any side-issue, it sees nothing but the souls waiting for deliverance, it looks for help to none save the Creator and Redeemer of souls. Consequently the words of consolation for mourners, which are so prominent in the funeral services of non-Catholic bodies, are missing, the plea is for help for those who can no longer help themselves. But when the prayer has been offered, when the final victory over death and the resurrection of the body has been proclaimed in the Epistle, when the memory of the righteous man has been celebrated in the Tract, there comes that most inspired and sublime of all sacred Latin poems, the Sequence Dies Irae.

Since its composition in the thirteenth century by Thomas of Celano, friend and biographer of St. Francis of Assisi, there has been no other poem that has so impressed people of all nations and creeds. It has inspired the noblest utterance of Sir Walter Scott, it has compelled the reverence and admiration of Goethe, it has been translated into almost every civilized language, and has formed the theme for some of the most exalted expressions of poets and writers. The stateliness of its meter, falling like blow after blow upon some mighty anvil in which eternal destinies are hammered and forged into shape, throbs with the tremendous import of death, of judgment, and of hope. But if it resounds with terror, it resounds also with confidence; if it tears away the complacencies of life and becomes frank almost to the verge of brutality, it rises also to majestic heights of Catholic faith. And, as he stands on this threshold of judgment, the poet sings

The day of wrath, that dreadful day
Shall the whole world in ashes lay,
As David and the Sibyl say.

Through this darkness and gloom, as of a world quivering on the brink of judgment, there cracks the thrilling blare of the Archangel's trumpet:

Wondrous sound the trumpet flingeth,
Through earth's sepulchers it ringeth,
All before the throne it bringeth.

Death is struck, and nature quaking,
All creation is awaking,
To its Judge an answer making.

Step by step the climax is approached, growing in intensity with the majestic clang of the meter:

When the Judge His seat attaineth,
And each hidden deed arraigneth,
Nothing unavenged remaineth.

Then, like a wave breaking upon the boundless shore of compassion, there breaks in full force this great cry:

King of Majesty tremendous,
Who dost free salvation send us.
Fount of Pity, then befriend us.

and the wave rolls back into the great ocean of the waiting souls, and as it rolls back it whispers, like the soft purling rustle of receding waters,

Think, good Jesu, my salvation
Caused Thy wondrous Incarnation,
Leave me not to reprobation.

So this supplication flows on, and as it flows the souls, bared of all the shams of life, are seen naked in the terrible light of judgment, and again the wave gathers itself, and again it casts itself upon the shore of eternity crying out for pity:

Ah, that day of tears and mourning,
When from dust of earth returning
Man for judgment must prepare him,
Spare, O God, in mercy, spare him!

Then the final climax comes, not in an outpouring of despair, not in a frenzied cry as of those beyond hope, but like the gentle sigh of a summer breeze after a night of storm, like the smooth gliding of a battered and storm-tossed hulk as it rides into a harbor of safety, there rises up the final petition of this great and immortal drama of the departed souls:

Lord all-pitying, Jesu blest!
Grant them Thine eternal rest.

The Church's mood is shown not only in the words of the liturgy but also in the chant that clothes the sacred words as with a rich yet somber vestment. It breathes confidence in the words of the Agnus Dei: "Grant them rest," "grant them rest eternal." And when the Sacrifice has been offered, when once more the priest has stood between the living and the dead, the Divine charity of the Church lingers, it seems loath to leave these waiting souls in the valley of purgatory. And so before the priest comes down from the steps of the altar he cries once again Requiescant in pace: "May they rest in peace." And in the response, Amen, we hear the sound of eternity, we hear a note that has been heard nowhere but here at the foot of the altar of the dead. It is the effect of the mood of the sacred chant, which ends, not with the finality of the modern modes of music, not with the full close that typifies the end. It ends with the lower note rising to the higher, it ends—it does not end at all. The sound of that Amen has no ending, it will continue through time and eternity, and will find its consummation only when the number of the elect is made up, and the souls under the altar no longer cry out. And so the Day of the Dead closes with that final Amen which will not end until that Requiescant in pace has been fulfilled.

Mr. Strong's Conclusions

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S. J.

UNDER date of October 25, Mr. Charles H. Strong reported to the Governor on the charges made against the State Board of Charities by the Department of Charities of the city of New York. On the evidence before him, and on the record of the State Board itself, Mr. Strong concludes that "the State Board of Charities lacks power; it lacks vision; it lacks drive. It does not know its job. It is not doing its real job." He recommends therefore that the Board be reorganized. Mr. Strong's conclusions, while in no sense judicial or mandatory, will, no doubt, be received with becoming deference by the general public, and, beyond all doubt, will be grievously misinterpreted by glass-house dwellers with stones in their hands. Therefore, let it be said, that this decision neither merits, nor asks, nor should receive, any attribute of finality or of infallibility. It represents Mr. Strong's honest conclusions, from which one may freely dissent without danger of the halter, and embodies a series of recommendations which may be safely left to the tender mercies of the next, or of a subsequent, legislature. Some of the recommendations are good, others are of doubtful value. Mr. Strong labors to prove that a board of three paid "experts," aided by six unpaid "experts," in place of the present unpaid Board, can in no wise become the spoil of "politicians." The evidence is not conclusive. That "experts" are never "politicians," is a proposition at least debatable. But many will wonder why Mr. Strong included a recommendation, condemning by inference, the work of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, and of kindred organizations. These religious women were never summoned by the Strong Commission, their work was not discussed at its sessions, and in simple justice, they should not be condemned without a hearing. Furthermore, the recommendation that all private charitable institutions, even when not in receipt of public assistance, be subject to State supervision, is open to serious objection. Mr. Strong himself writes that the very constitutionality of such legislation "may be doubted," but adds: "it should be tried out."

Detailed discussion of the remaining recommendations, none of which bear on any particular private institution, may be left for another time. At present it is important to note that the decision in no way impairs the rights or the continuance of private institutions as administered under the present "New York System," by provision of the State Constitution. Technically, as I have pointed out, by "proving its case" to the satisfaction of Mr. Strong, the city has won a victory, somewhat barren, but still a victory. Nevertheless, the decision has no immediate effect of any kind upon the private institutions, nor, in my judgment, would their legal status be changed essentially, even in the remote supposition that Mr. Strong's recommendations were adopted en bloc by the legislature.

But while finding the State Board guilty, Mr. Strong has no countenance for the accusation made by Mr. Kingsbury, and repeated with additions by others, that "many of" the twenty-four institutions investigated by the Doherty inspectors, "were unfit for human habitation." After stating that no criticism sustained by him, refers to the institutions as they now are—an important point—Mr. Strong writes:

> If I understand what is the common acceptance of these words, I do not agree with him. On the contrary, I find that not one of them was unfit for human habitation. . . . I repeat, that as far as I understand the phrase, not one of the twenty-four institutions was near a state in which it could have been said to have been "unfit for human habitation." (Italics inserted.)

As to Mr. Kingsbury's official report that "some of these institutions . . . were little less than a public scandal and disgrace," Mr. Strong rules, "In this I am compelled to say that he was right. Seven at least, of the twenty-four institutions must be thus described." The reasons for this decision are briefly noted, but the Commissioner cites no institution by name. This reticence is unhappy. It is a condemnation not of seven but of twenty-four institutions, all of which, according to Mr. Strong himself, are now approved, at least tacitly, by the very Department which filed the original charges. "In some institutions," writes Mr. Strong, "were girls working long hours without compensation." It is true that this accusation was made against one Catholic institution, but equally true that it was denied on oath by the religious women in charge. I am not familiar with the non-Catholic institutions, and cannot speak for them; but I can appeal without fear, to all who have known and helped our Catholic institutions for years, in challenging the statement that any Catholic institution in the State is, or ever was, "a public scandal and disgrace."

It is pleasant to note that Mr. Strong does not join in the senseless hue and cry against the "institutions." On the contrary, he believes that they are "indispensable."

> Some children could not and should not be cared for outside of good institutions. For example, the especially difficult child, often bordering on the defective, the delinquent, the ungovernable and the diseased, those in need of temporary refuge as a result of sudden and transient misfortune in the family, and many between the ages of twelve and sixteen who should receive the industrial and vocational training which they cannot receive in the best private boarding or free home. This is why thinking people should hesitate before urging the withdrawal of public aid from the private institutions, and before declaring that "the poorest family is better than the best institution."

How far removed the Commissioner is from the suggestion to withdraw public aid from private institutions, is obvious from his recommendation that these payments towards the support of dependents be increased:

> If the city chooses to aid private institutions, and thus escape an almost prohibitive expenditure for public institutions, or the adoption of a policy of exclusive placing-out, which would be unwise and impractical, then the State Board must fix the standards, and the city and the institutions must pay the price . . . per capita payments to the institutions are now $2.50 per week in the congregate institution, and $3.00 in the cottage institution. These payments evidently should be more. . . . The additional sum of $15 per annum per capita is paid for education in such institutions as furnish it within their own doors. It is estimated that it costs the city $40.24 per annum per capita in the public elementary day schools for instruction and educational supplies only. (Italics inserted.)

On the question of child-placing, there can be little room for dispute. Mr. Strong would require a "superior" private home, subject to careful visitation, and to secure the child's religious training, approved by "priest, rabbi, or minister."

Although Mr. Kingsbury's sweeping contention was rejected by Mr. Strong, Catholics may expect to see this decision quoted as proof final that our institutions were and are "unfit for human habitation." This perhaps is inevitable. But I am at a loss to understand why Mr. Strong, dating his report October 25, ranks Mgr. Dunn and Father Farrell, who were completely exonerated by Judge Greenbaum on September 15, with the "wire-tappers" now awaiting trial for felony. Nor does Mr. Strong's lengthy history of "the pamphlets" clearly disclose the fact that Father Farrell's protest followed an anonymous lying pamphlet paid for and circulated by Mr. Kingsbury, in the very course of the trial at which he was the chief complainant. Finally, Mr. Strong's suggestion that the differences between supervising boards and the institutions be aired in the newspapers, will hardly be approved by those who have the true interests of charity and relief at heart. In regard to the very hearings over which he himself presided, Mr. Strong writes that "there were many newspaper accounts . . which did injustice to some of the institutions and did not accurately state the testimony," and this in spite of the fact that "I did all that I could to induce the newspapers to publish the good as well as the bad about the institutions." It was something of a climax that was capped, moreover, when in reviewing the printed decision in which these lines are contained, the New York Sun completely misstated Mr. Strong's opinion on child-placing, adding conclusions for which the decision gave no warrant whatever!

This, however, is not pertinent to the main issues of the Strong decision. These are three. First, the legal status of the private institution remains unchanged. Second, to quote the words of Mr. Strong, "The New York System was regarded as intrenched by the leaders of the convention of 1894. It is certainly not less so today." Third, the charges made against the institutions, and summed up in the phrase "unfit for human habitation," are held by Commissioner Strong to be baseless.

The Episcopalians' Historical Pageant

WILLIAM F. ROBISON, S.J.

AT the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, held last month in St. Louis, an appeal was made to the general public in the form of a dramatized argument for continuity, the thing which seems to be nearest to the hearts of Episcopalians. This visualized argument took the form of a "Pageant of the Church," which has been described as "an entertainment with a purpose" by the Rev. George Long, who designed and produced it. It is this pageant, as shown forth in the official program for the occasion, which makes one wonder whether laughter or tears, whether pity or indignation is more appropriate for the occasion.

Many committees had labored hard in the production of the pageant, numerous members of various congregations had rehearsed diligently for it, the performance itself won encomiums from the secular press, and so the affair was probably a considerable theatrical success. But sound argument or presentation of solid facts as a basis for the all-important claim there was none. If the result were to be judged by the showing made by the "Committee on Historical Research," then failure was written large across the whole affair.

One might pity the failure, if the efforts were made in a good cause and after honest striving for a sacred object; or one might deplore the sad spectacle of sincere souls wandering in the mists. But with the program of the pageant as evidence, a program enriched by special papers by supposed experts, clarified by descriptive notes by the designer and producer, rounded out with the words of the "episodes" from the pen of another minister of the Episcopal Church, the Catholic reader must gasp at the colossal ignorance displayed or burn with indignation at the dishonest attempt to throw dust in the eyes of sincere souls.

In nine "groups" the history of Christ's Church is presented to the eye and ear; the period of 2,000 years is traced from the day of Pentecost to the present gathering of the "Protestant Episcopal Church." One might pass by the account of the Council of Jerusalem as entirely edifying and innocuous were it not for the fact that the proceedings are shown to be under the entire supervision of St. James. St. Peter is mentioned indeed but is not given the place which is his in the record of the Acts of the Apostles. Was that an oversight or was it considered an unimportant detail? Who knows? But in the following episode of the "Council of Nicaea," one cannot help asking why the presidency of the Council is put down as being in the hands of Constantine and of Eustathius of Antioch. Why is no mention made of Hosius of Cordoba and of the priests, Victor and Vincentius, who were the Papal Legates and who signed the acts of the Council before the Eastern Bishops? But the perplexed were doubtless enlightened by the subsequent assertion about "the rise of the Papacy in the sixth century" under the "masterful man" Gregory the Great, who introduced into southern England the Christianity "which was to fuse with that still existing in the north and in Wales, and so to produce the English Church." So Gregory is counted "among the authors of the freest spirit in modern Christianity!"

Of course, we are treated to the "truth" as to the unfailing opposition between the old English Church and Rome, an opposition which, on the statement of the authors of the written accompaniment of the pageant, passed away. We also have the glorification of "Wyclif and men of like vision," because of whom "the Church emerged from medieval darkness." It would be so comforting if the singers of this old tune could be made to realize that the Middle Ages can be "called dark only by those whose minds are in darkness." The printing press by multiplying the Bible "resulted in hastening the day when freedom of thought, the inalienable right of everyone, was to be restored." It was restored with a vengeance, and the end is not yet.

The only Catholic Church in England before the so-called Reformation was the one which recognized the spiritual headship of the Pope and recognized it as a vital part of the Church organized by Christ. If the Church of England and her "emancipated" daughters can claim continuity, it must be with this Church. The Rev. George Long tells us that "the temporal authority of the Pope" was repudiated; that "in matters spiritual the English Church never severed herself from Rome, it was solely the act of the Roman Curia." What does Mr. Long mean by that? The mystery grows, for on the very next page of the program we are told that a bill of Parliament made Henry "the Supreme Head of the Church": and thus "the English Church, without disturbing its historical continuity, became independent of the authority of Rome." Wonderful, wonderful, historical continuity! The spiritual headship of Christ's Church is transferred from the Pope, the Successor of Peter, whom Christ placed to rule His Church "all days even to the consummation of the world," to the hands of the King, and this by the power of Parliament. Later "Edward VI. formulates articles of religion and composes a Prayer Book" a function, of course, of the temporal power, and, still there is no "disturbance of historical continuity." The Church of England is the legitimate successor of the pre-Reformation English Church!

There is no foundation for the claim of continuity between the two. Continuity means a successive existence without constitutional change: to be the successor of another means to enter into the place of that other for the fulfilment of the same functions and under the same principle of accession to power. Between the Catholic Church in England before the Reformation and the Anglican Church there is no such succession. The old Church held its power from God and subject to Christ's Vicar on earth, the Roman Pontiff. The new church holds its power as a servant of the Crown and of Parliament, rejecting the headship of the Pope. In this country, for the mandate of Parliament the voice of the laity has, in large measure, been substituted, as was shown in the present convention, when the lay vote overrode the will of the clergy even regarding something so sacred as a Sacrament of the Church of Christ. Continuity in Apostolic succession! One might as well say that the French Republic which sprang from the French Revolution, was the successor of Louis XVI; that the United States of America is the successor of Great Britain in this country; that the Bulgarians are successors of the Turks in the new lands added after the last Balkan war. It was not a succession, it was a revolution for those who looked upon it as warranted, a rebellion for those who opposed its principles. But for neither can it stand as a continued succession.

The question of continuity of succession is chiefly the question of jurisdictional succession: the succession of Orders is of secondary importance. A church might preserve intact succession in Sacred Orders, though the line of Apostolic jurisdiction had been broken. Such is in fact the condition of the Greek and Russian Churches. Yet the English Church has not even preserved this; for it has no Orders.

The Rev. George Long tells us that "the English Church regains her autonomy" through the "consecration of Parker," and makes the following statement: "The question as to the validity of English Orders is nearly ceasing to be an open one with opponents; position after position has been abandoned by impugners . . . Archbishop Matthew Parker was consecrated by at least two bishops who had themselves been consecrated according to the Sarum rite, viz.: Barlow and Hodgkins." Of course, the writer would have one infer either that the contentions of the many and learned Catholic scholars are not worthy of being considered or that they too have receded from their position on the question. But we maintain of course that for Catholics the controversy has been ended by the exhaustive research and strong presentation of the matter by the Roman decree on Anglican Orders. Is the last sentence from the pen of the Rev. Mr. Long merely weak or is it designedly misleading? Why, even one of the "impugners" could have made out a better historical case than he has done, and that too without the misleading statement that "Parker was consecrated." The question is whether he was validly consecrated: and the contention against the Anglican claim is that he was not, because of an essential defect in the form of ordination used and in the intention of those who consecrated him. A cursory perusal of Father Smith's article on Anglican Orders in the "Catholic Encyclopedia" would have shown wherein lay the objection against the validity of Anglican Orders, which has not "been abandoned by impugners."

The rest of the pageant is concerned with the spread of the "Mother" Church to and through the United States. The Church in America, too, is said to be in continuity with the Church of England, because it is "a perpetuation of the principles and spiritual life of the English Church." But what of authority? "The Declaration of Independence led to the severance of this Church from the English Church, so far as government was concerned; but the closest comity and affection has always been maintained." Comity and affection are very sacred and desirable things; but comity and affection do not make America and England a single constitutional government. By this test there is no continuity of succession even between the Church of England and her American daughter, who is sui juris.

So the pageant has made its argument and has done its work. What will be the result? The one who would dare to prophesy would have to take into account the mental attitude of the spectators of the presentation and of the readers of the printed accompaniment, as well as the mysterious action of God's grace in seeking out the wanderers. As for the promoters of the presentation, should we feel pity for the hesitant steps of those who are seeking the way home, or amusement at the awkward shambling of those who will not see, or honest indignation with those who are trying to keep away from sincere souls, the truth which would make them free?

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Radicalism from the Inside

To the Editor of AMERICA:

You say in a recent editorial "Socialism is not yet dead." Thanks to Columbus, who it is said, discovered this land we call America, socialism not only is not dead, it is only one of the forces you have to contend against. The tactics of your church would have been successful; if we had not had a new land to breed and increase our kind—and organize; If it had not been for Columbus you would have had exterminated all who did not believe as you do. Socialism is dead as far as Europe is concerned—Thanks to our preaching Patriotism and competition, the war has killed Socialism there; If you can cause a great war between the U. S. and Canada you can kill Socialism here also; It is either war or revolution.

About eighty-five per cent. of this continent are radical of some kind or another—I know that we are all divided up and apparently fighting each other: But did you ever notice that the armed forces of the country are officered almost entirely by Free Masons? Did you ever notice how fast the Mormon Church is getting industrial control in this section of the country? And next month will show that Socialism is not dead, although thanks to war prosperity it may not be any stronger and even may show a falling off.

The I. W. W. as an organization does not amount to anything—but did you ever notice that the Rail Road brotherhoods have been acting on that idea? they are organizing industrially. And granting that the Protestant churches are getting so conservative that there is hardly any difference between them and your church, yet did you ever notice the percentage of people you can not scare with Hell? Christian Scientist—Theosophist—Free Thinker—Infidels—Agnostics, Scientists, Anarchists, etc.—too numerous to mention? And did you never notice that they are all active; either Anti Catholic or Anti Capital?

You know—or you would not be fighting Socialism that Catholicism and Capitalism are inter dependant, and that the enemies of Capitalism are your enemies—and that when Capitalism falls—you fall—and that Capitalism falls when it can no longer make a profit; it can no longer buy protection. There are only two ways that people can get new ideas—either revelation or revolution; but God does not give you revelatoins and I doubt very much that even a revolution could put a new idea into your head; but it will put us radicals in power—whether you like it or not that is coming soon; the more you resist the more it is going to hurt you; Then we are going to drive you conservatives out of this country altogether—you have always profited by the battles of the radical class in its struggle for freedom—but you will not benefit from this; you are here by told to beat it while the beating is good; Socialism is dead in Europe—go there—and pay the war debt—you are proud of the fact that you are not lazy—that you like work—go there and compete against machinery; you who preach slavery and submission you can have our share of that—we are going to make the final fight for freedom; and it does not matter if it costs a hundred million lives—we are going to win. Conservation is a brake upon the wheels of progress—but the brakes are wearing thin and the road is getting steep.

I know that at one time God was on your side—I know that because conservatism is not natural, that it is Super natural in its origin; but God has switched now—He is on our side now; we are infallable, we can not do wrong—He has told us so. We do not accept you as teachers any longer, you are discharged. If you knew the law of Economics you would not wait to be told to go—you would have been gone long ago—but perhaps it is as well that you can not see it—God wants us to punish you for your ignorance—

Salt Lake City. JAMES SMITH.

P. S. Inside of 10 years we will use your churches for dance halls and your cathedrals for Theaters

[Radicalism is to be congratulated on the superior intelligence of its protagonists.—Ed. AMERICA.]

The Mission of the "Dublin Review"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

With regard to your inquiry about the persistent rumors that I am the new editor of the historic Dublin Review, I must confess rather shamefacedly that I am not. Candid friends could suggest a number of reasons, but my principal one is that Dr. William Barry is still alive. I am sorry anybody should have thought me qualified to edit the chief periodical in the English-speaking Catholic world. I am unfortunately destitute of that knowledge of scholastic theology which Mr. Wilfrid Ward, the late editor, enjoyed to such a happy degree, and with which the last two Pontiffs have insisted that the defenders of the Church should be prepared to meet, digest and reconcile all that is best in modern thought.

In spite of the present confusion of Christendom the mission and the message of the Dublin must remain a great one. Catholic America and Catholic England need and deserve some bond of communicable thought through interchange of views not only in matters ecclesiastical but in the higher political questions. It is obvious that not the least of the latter must be a sympathetic treatment of the Irish problem. I am not sure that the time is ripe for an Irish Nationalist to essay the task from the chair of the Dublin, though the late Professor Kettle might have achieved it with success from the University of Dublin itself. At a time when matters are severely strained between the two countries it is best that an English editor should take the first step. I may add that it is an open secret that the Dublin courts an American future and that the venerable name of Cardinal Gibbons will be associated with the American Committee which will be charged in the future with selecting articles representative of Catholic thought in the United States.

New York. SHANE LESLIE.

The "Devil-Baby" Again!

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I wish to call the attention of your readers to the article in the Atlantic Monthly for October entitled the "Devil-baby at Hull-House." In view of the legends which have grown around the venerable head of Hull-House I presume that to some it will sound almost sacrilegious to say that the whole article from start to finish is a most disgusting piece of writing. As I remember, the incident relating to the devil-baby was said to have occurred in some city of the Middle West a dozen years ago. While not saying that Miss Addams attributes the same to the immigrants, I wonder why on earth at this late day the poor immigrant is dragged in and identified with such a disgusting myth? All that one can think is that self-advertisement and self-exploitation have become a habit with certain people. With this of course we have no quarrel; but we do object to having the poor defenseless immigrant, and very often his religion, as well, made the butt for most vulgar gibes, all in the name of "uplift" work. I wonder what the press of this country would say, if Mother Alphonsus (Rose Hawthorne) and Mother Katherine Drexel were to keep themselves constantly before the public at the expense of the poor suffering creatures for whom both of these noble-hearted women have sacrificed their lives, solely that they may live and be truly better in body and mind? It is surprising that a magazine like the Atlantic Monthly gives space, and perhaps pays a good price, for such stuff.

Buffalo. M. X. S.

Dr. O'Malley and the Episcopalians

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Permit me to enter a protest against Dr. O'Malley's letter entitled "What is an Episcopalian?" There is no doubt in the mind of really well-informed Catholics that in the Protestant Episcopal Church there exist many devout souls who are at one with the soul, if not with the visible body, of the Church. The invincible ignorance of these wholly estimable people is not likely to be dispelled by bitter and vulgar abuse, such as we find in Dr. O'Malley's letter. As a controversialist he ought to know that "more flies are caught with honey than with vinegar." Furthermore the virtue of Christian charity is worthy of cultivation.

New York. A. P. F.

"Catholicity" or "Catholicism"?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Would you mind, through your columns, explaining the exact meaning of the word "Catholicity," as used for instance in the following sentence from Mgr. Ward's "Catholic Revival in England"? "The period which followed the death of the venerable Bishop Challoner may be considered the low water mark of English Catholicity." Is not this a wrong use of the word? Should not, strictly speaking, the correct word in this connection have been "Catholicism?" Are the words "Catholicism" and "Catholicity" interchangeable?

New York. JOHN L. O'SULLIVAN.

[Mgr. Ward's use of "Catholicity" has the sanction of such writers as Dickens and Southey. However, "Catholicism" would stand better in the context. Strictly speaking, "Catholicity" is used to denote the universality of the Church, whereas "Catholicism" signifies the system, faith, practice, etc., of the Church.—Ed. AMERICA.]

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

A Secretary with a Secret

IN a recent communication to the Democratic National Committee, Mr. Newton Baker, Secretary of War, elucidates "the substance and spirit" of his Jersey City address in words that fall far short of that "substance and spirit" as expressed in the verbatim report of a stenographer. There is one point of the elucidation which is extremely interesting. Mr. Baker "described Madero's assassination, the part played by Huerta . . . and his ultimate disappearance as a factor in the revolution." Good; at last the world knows the history of the sordid murder, a detail heretofore hidden from most careful and painstaking inquirers both in the United States and Mexico. Mr. Baker's genius for facts prompts an inquiry quite pertinent to this issue. Will he explain the conduct of the United States towards Francisco Carvajal, who succeeded Huerta in the Presidency? He was not a murderer; on the contrary, he had been proposed to the A. B. C. Commission by our then Secretary of State as a fit man for provisional President; he became President, formed a Cabinet composed of the very best men of the country, good men untainted by Huertaism and in no way connected with the overthrow of Madero. All departments of the Government were in working order, Congress was in session, the Supreme Court was sitting, an army of 42,000 men was equipped and paid, industries were growing, our Administration was fully, even minutely, informed about this progress, but alas! elections for our Congress were pending. Note the strange coincidences. Carvajal sent a deputation headed by Villar, Madero's great friend, to tell Carranza that justice would be done to all. Carranza refused to receive the committee; Silliman had just delivered to him a message from Washington. First coincidence. The First Chief with only 20,000 men began to move on Mexico City. Carvajal, already approved of by Mr. Bryan, was seated firm, but of a sudden there came this telegram from our State Department to the Brazilian Minister: "Tell Carvajal to turn over the capital and surrender the Government peaceably to Carranza." To Colonel Robertson, trusted friend of our then Secretary of State, who had again and again advised Carvajal's recognition, this wire was sent, on August 7, 1914: "Thanks for information in your telegrams. Will communicate with Carvajal through Brazilian Legation. Signed, Bryan."

In reply to an appeal from Mexico, our Administration stood firm for Carranza, and on that day Mexico was ruined, but elections to our Congress were held. Second coincidence. And blood and whitening bones and desecrated churches and ruined virgins and starving children stand witness to Carranza's power and mercy. There is something for Mr. Baker to explain; and there would be more for him to explain did not AMERICA, which stands for morality and religion alone, disdain to stain its pages with the filth of party politics. And still the Mexicans cry, "Let us live, O God, let us live!"

Why Not Be Sure?

CERTAIN non-Catholics, resenting what they regard as the obtrusion of Catholic scenes and Catholic figures into plays and films offered for public amusement, have been taking theatrical managers severely to task for forcing upon them unwelcome subjects. Strange as it may seem, the Church is entirely in sympathy with their protest. She would extend the exclusion not merely to the stage but to the pages of popular novels and magazines as well.

Sir Gilbert Parker in his latest novel makes a gentle, unoffending, white-haired priest walk about the streets of Manitou, in a scarlet cassock, a white chasuble and a black biretta, carrying in a sacred vessel "the elements of the Mass." Mr. A. H. Fitch in his recent story, just from the press, makes another priest say, "I baptize you in the name of the Father and the Son and the Spirit. Amen." The current number of one of the fashionable monthlies depicts the magic process by which a stanch Scotch Presbyterian is inducted into the Faith. The man, a drunkard, has a fatal fall, the priest appears, and lo! while you wait, the Protestant is turned into a Catholic. The writer is sure that the man could not speak; he "guesses" that he was conscious, but he is certain that he died in the Faith. This last statement he insists on three times in almost as many sentences.

These examples are typical. In the first case, the eagerness to be picturesque prevails over the desirability of truth; in the second, indifference is responsible for the blunders that no Catholic child of ten years would make; and in the third, a sarcastic fling at the priesthood is allowed to pass, in spite of its falsehood, because it furnishes "good copy."

Mistakes that proceed from ignorance or indifference are to be deplored, but for these there is hope of amendment. Non-Catholic writers are beginning to see that it is worth their while not to speak at random but to verify impressions about the Church. The same spirit that drives them into minutiae about flora and fauna, and urges them to live in foreign lands or on the prairie in order to give accurate local coloring to their work, will, in all probability, eventually lead them to seek the same accuracy in their delineation of Catholic belief and practice. To do so is part of honest workmanship. But with the malicious misrepresentation of which the third case is an example, it is quite different. The sketch referred to would never have been printed if it had not catered to religious animosity. It has no literary excellence, no wit, no humor, no pathos, no redeeming quality of style or expression. Its one point is its deliberate travesty of Catholicism. It has not even the quality of straightforward statement. It has recourse to double indirectness and to contemptible suggestion. The wonder of it is that the owner of the magazine which published the story is a Catholic. Evidently he allows his editor-in-chief a great deal of latitude.

Youthful Crime and Divorce

THE growth of disorder and crime among the young becomes more ominous day by day. It has been made the subject of sorrowful comment by pulpit and bench, and is a matter of deepening concern to all who are interested in the welfare of the coming masters of society. The causes of this growth are many, but among the most influential and pernicious is the "broken home." Even though exteriorly a palace of luxury, the broken home is not a "home," but a nursery of crime. The unfortunate child condemned to its poisonous atmosphere, sets out in life with a set of principles and practices which will assuredly bring him to spiritual ruin, and which are admirably fitted to make him a menace to society.

It is plain that many among the delegates at the recent conference of the Episcopal Church, clearly recognized the dire need of applying a drastic and immediate remedy to these sad conditions. It is to be regretted, however, that this conference did not throw the weight of whatever authority it possessed against a practice which, by turning marriage into a mockery, is among the most potent causes of broken homes in this country. No church or community can fight divorce by viewing its progress with sorrow. One might as well hope to cure leprosy by a series of polite regrets, and this, it would seem, was the outcome of the conference's deliberations on the question of remarriage after divorce. It was well that the House of Deputies should "solemnly place itself on record as standing resolutely and unfailingly for . . . the highest and holiest recognition and maintenance of marital vows." But these brave words embody nothing more effective than a fruitless aspiration. How can the Protestant Episcopal Church, recognizing divorce, stand "resolutely and unfailingly for the highest and holiest recognition and maintenance of marital vows"? If the matter did not turn upon a subject so sorrowful as the frightful plague of divorce and ecclesiastically authorized adultery, this well-worded resolution would move to laughter.

Simplifying War

"IN all future warfare, every species of firearms, and every mechanical or chemical contrivance which acts at a distance shall be absolutely forbidden. All fighting shall be by personal contact between man and man." This solution of today's armament madness was recently offered Father Hull of the Bombay Examiner, by his gifted "office-boy and apprentice-poet." Enlarging on his theme, the budding statesman explained that the only weapons permitted in the wars of tomorrow will be swords, daggers, clubs and the like. All defensive armor except a shield held on the left arm will also be forbidden. Nor will fortifications of any kind be tolerated; furthermore, no fighting will be permitted after dark. Finally, naval warfare will be absolutely prohibited. Overseas countries may be invaded, but the conflict must begin on the shore. The office-boy and apprentice-poet is not such a silly pacifist as to believe that "this will be the last war." He knows human nature too well to talk nonsense of that kind. But he holds that when nations appeal to force to settle their differences, land-fighting, hand-to-hand with simple weapons, admirably brings out the real power of nature which a nation possesses. "Besides the cultivation of such force would be beneficial to the health of the nation, because it consists in a development of physical health, strength and manual skill."

If the warring Powers of Europe cannot be induced to adopt at once the foregoing excellent suggestions, perhaps they could be persuaded to confine all participation in the conflict to those who are actually responsible for the present state of things. Let the rulers, diplomats, financiers and statesmen of the various countries that are now at war, be paired off according to the laws that governed medieval tournaments. The combatants could be armed with sword and shield only, and then be forced to continue fighting till the victors were proclaimed. Meanwhile the simple, peace-loving people of the countries concerned could go about their ordinary occupations, without fear of being involved in the horrors of the wretched conflict. If either of the practices suggested above were followed, there is no doubt that the wars of the future would be much less costly, destructive and sanguinary than the slaughter we behold today. If men rather than machines do the fighting, and particularly if those who cause the quarrel are the only ones to enter the conflict, the wars of tomorrow are sure to be small and short and few. Were all the nations without artillery the world would be meeker, and statesmen-combatants would be quite soft-spoken.

Luther at Worms

CONTRARY to its wont, the Saturday Evening Post recently invaded the field of history in search of a portrait of Martin Luther. The effort was praiseworthy, but the quest unsuccessful. The picture presented by the Post in no way represents the Luther who, with Melancthon, authorized Philip of Hesse to have two wives. It bears no resemblance to the Luther who advised this same Philip "for the sake and good of the Christian Church to tell a good strong lie." The Luther who sat for this portrait is a lion-hearted Christian knight, who flung an immortal gage of battle before his persecutors at Worms: "God help me. I could do no different."

Brave are the words, but they were never spoken by Luther. They have no place in the Latin account written by himself, which concludes, "God help me. Amen," a customary phrase at the end of a discourse, to be found elsewhere in Luther's writings. The form, "Here I stand. I cannot do otherwise. God help me. Amen," was first published at Wittenberg in 1521, where it was found desirable, writes Grisar, quoting the Protestant Wrede, "to render the words rather more forcible and high-sounding." "There is not the faintest proof," concludes Wrede, in his "Deutsche Reichstagsakten," II, 555, "that the amplification came from anyone who actually heard the words." The new form, testifies Kalkoff, another Protestant, in his "Die Depeschen des Nuncius Aleander vom Wormser Reichstag," p. 174, has "no claim to credibility." Further proof is given by Müller, Friedensburg, Burkhardt, Elter, Maurenbrecher, Köstlin-Kawerau, Kolde, Hausrath, and a host of other Protestant scholars. "It would be well," advises the Protestant Böhmer in his "Luther im Lichte der Neueren Forschung," "not to quote any more those most celebrated of Luther's words as though they were his."

The advice will scarcely be heeded. Party cries die hard. No scholar can defend the authenticity of "those most celebrated of Luther's words," but the unscholarly and the unscrupulous will quote them freely in the coming year, as proof conclusive that in Luther the world has a peerless example of Christian knighthood.

Mexican Masonry and the Mexican Orgy

MUCH is heard these days of the awful orgy that is disgracing Mexico, and horrified people are asking who precipitated this wild revolution distinguished by unparalleled rapine and lust. The answer is no longer as difficult as it was three or four years ago, for there are men whose joy in their nefarious work has overflowed their dark hearts and found expression in words. Such is the case with José Castellot, Past Sovereign Grand Commander of the Supreme Council of the Scottish Rite, "an old and accepted order in Mexico." A year or more ago AMERICA copied from the New Age, a Masonic review, his gleeful statement that in the Diaz régime Mexican Masonry "laid the foundation of its patriotic and disinterested work, in open fight, as was to be expected," against the Church. In the same article he told how, despite Masonic liberty, fraternity, equality, free elections, and freedom from politics, the Craft tried to induce Diaz to prepare the Presidential succession, a task which might have been accomplished under skilful guidance, coupled with the ungrudging support always given by the Masons. According to this unimpeachable testimony, these same folk did not withhold a helping hand from Madero's revolution and socialistic propaganda: on the contrary they helped him "honestly and loyally, because he embodied [their] principles and preached [their] ideals."

Such is Mexican Masonry, a noisome creature that does dark deeds and rejoices in them. In this it is neither better nor worse than Latin Masonry in general, and would call for no comment at this particular time, were it not for a series of articles written for the American Freemason by John Lewin McLeish. These papers differ little from the ordinary low-grade Masonic literature. Masonry is pictured as the apostle of liberty, the torch-bearer of civilization—let Mexico stand witness—Catholicism as a dark and loathsome thing, the agent of reaction and obscurantism. Mr. McLeish has learned that lesson well: his ebullition can be passed over with profit. Not so however the fact that he exalts Masonry as the fomenter of successive Mexican revolutions, the oppressor of the Church, the violator of individual and corporate rights. Thus, for instance, he points out the "marked similitude" between the Masonic allocution of 1833 and the Laws of Reform of 1858; he affirms that this infamous code which is destructive of fundamental rights consists of essentially Masonic laws "due to the greatest of all the Inspectors General of the Mexican National Rite, Don Benito Juarez." Thereafter the right worthy Brother McLeish rises to sublime heights and declares in conclusion: "Greater men than he (Santa Anna) now strutted upon the Mexican stage to continue the duel al muerte between Church and State, between the Jesuits and the Freemasons." And this despite the fact that for long years, while the duel was fiercest, there were no Jesuits in Mexico to fight it! Mexican Masonry, by the confession of members of the Craft, was attacking God and the Catholic Church. The simple and unsuspecting may question this confession. But it has been made, on no compulsion, and who may deny it?

For the rest Brother McLeish is welcome to his joy. May the shadows of desecrated Churches and polluted altars never fall athwart his beaming face! May the souls of murdered priests and brothers never haunt his peaceful sleep! May the cries of outraged virgins and heart-broken mothers never reach his ears! For Mr. McLeish may have a mother and sisters and perhaps a little daughter and it were too bad to lessen the joyousness of his "three eagly cheers" for Mexican Masonry.

An American Mason to an American Mason

FORTUNATELY or unfortunately Brother John Lewin McLeish, A.M., M.D., does not confine all his brilliant output to the pages of the American Freemason. In June, so it appears, he printed in the Builder, the organ of the "National Masonic Research Society," an article in which he referred to José Castellot's contribution to the New Age. A brother Mason, an American, once resident in Mexico, answers in the October issue of the Builder. This article, a brilliant defense of the Church, is written with such logic, sincerity and warmth, that the following unglossed portions of it will serve the purpose of an editorial.

Latin-American Masonry is atheistic, revolutionary and contentious, and in Mexico it has become anarchistic and murderous. Whatever moral lessons, if any, are inculcated in its "lodges," are certainly forgotten entirely outside of them. . . .

About Señor Castellot and his article I would like to remind Bro. McLeish that a close reading of it will disclose the fact that while it has a wealth of charges it is poor indeed in citations of fact. Unfortunately, these charges all agree with what Bro. McLeish and I were taught to expect and to accept as true. They agree with our inherited prejudices—prejudices that have persisted in spite of the teachings of our lofty Masonic ideals of truth, charity and toleration. These inherited prejudices of ours go back to the days of the Spanish Armada and the Reformation. . . .

The Laws of Reform were not aimed at securing freedom of worship, but at the spoliation of the Catholic Church. Some justification was, of course, necessary even to themselves for such an act, and so we have had repeated to us a multitude of charges which, upon impartial investigation, are found without proof. . . .

Since the War of Mexican Independence, a militant minority, composed largely of socialistic "reformers," directing a collection of baser elements engaged in the enterprise for purposes of pillage, has dominated the majority. This has been made possible because of the heterogeneous elements in the Mexican population, which is composed of some fifty different Indian tribes, speaking as many different languages and preserving many of their pre-Columbian antagonisms. These are uniformly ignorant, not because of any lack of opportunity, but because of a congenital conservatism which avoids everything new. Between the white elements and the Indians are the mixed-bloods, inheriting sometimes good and sometimes bad qualities. The presence of so many primitive characteristics, so many that are in reality of the Cave Men and the Stone Age, has given Mexico a high percentage of mental defectives and criminals of the lower order. In addition to this, the student class has furnished a number of recruits to the Socialist ranks, and the Latin Socialist is a "direct-actionist," impatient to destroy all of our present civilization in order to remake it to his own liking. It is from such elements as these that we have the present revolution. Even the "sainted Madero," well-intentioned as he was, recruited his forces from the jails and the cattle rustlers, such as Villa and others like him. Madero's successors have not improved either in motives or in material. The result is that we have today in Mexico a condition just exactly such as might be expected from the teachings of Debs, Heywood, Mother Jones and Emma Goldman. And Señor Castellot is another of like kidney. Do American Masons vouch for this? I think not. . . .

Hence, it has been in Mexico that the attacks upon the Church have been directed to its spoliation and from that they [the revolutionists] have turned upon all owners of property with the purpose of destroying the very foundations of society. Not content with destroying the Church and driving the clergy from the country, they have turned their "reforming" attentions to the land-owners, the shop-owners and all employers of labor. These they have murdered or driven from the country, and have closed or destroyed the industrial establishments. The laboring classes for whom they were so solicitous are now without employment and are starving. The same revolutionary elements which have destroyed all semblance of law and government in Mexico and made of it a shambles, are actively at work in the United States, seeking to destroy our present industrial and social civilization. For the details of their intentions and desires I refer those interested to the literature published by the Industrial Workers of the World; for the Mexican Revolution is an I. W. W. Revolution.

Exit Brother McLeish, the defender of "atheistic," "revolutionary," "contentious," "anarchistic," "murderous" Mexican Masonry.

Literature

A MODERN ST. PHILIP

WHEN early on a gray November morning in 1845, Frederick William Faber was leaving his parish of Elton, to be received that evening into the Catholic Church by Bishop Wareing, the village folk crowded their doorways, and with tears in their eyes bade him farewell in these affectionate words: "God bless you, Mr. Faber, wherever you go!" Their wishes were to be fulfilled beyond all expectations.

God has indeed blessed the labors, the life and the writings of the great-hearted man, who thus wrenching himself from the past and all that it held dear, made a generous sacrifice of his worldly ambitions and hopes for the cause of truth and the best interests of his soul. Wherever his lot carried him, the former Rector of Elton became a power for good, a guide to higher spiritual ideals, an apostle of unworldliness and gentleness, of kindliness and love. In his biography of this great master, Father Bowden makes us realize the privilege it was to have known him. A spiritual son of St. Philip Neri, Faber had his Father's gift of cheerful piety and of childlike confidence in God, of tenderness and affection towards all men. With the perennial youth of virtue and holiness, those gifts still live and energize. They can be felt in the works he has left us. There he has revealed himself as completely as a man can do in the written page. In his "Hymns," in "All for Jesus," in "The Precious Blood," he is still continuing his work, with the same unction, the same sweet yet compelling force which he exercised in life.

The ascetical writings of Faber were a special gift of God to the Catholics of England. They came as one of the fairest flowers of that second spring whose unsuspected burst and bloom Newman had so touchingly described. They admirably met the needs of the times, and their influence has not yet been fully measured or realized. St. Alphonsus Liguori used to say that he liked those preachers whose message flashed not directly from the brain to the tongue, but first reached the recesses of the speaker's heart, and warmed and inflamed there by love, leaped thrilling and vibrant to his lips. Readers like spiritual writers of the same type. The author of "Growth in Holiness" and "Spiritual Conferences" is of that chosen band. The fine products of his mind seem to have a second and nobler birth in his heart. And rich and varied as are Faber's gifts of mind, soul and literary expression, the combination in him of quite opposite endowments is still more remarkable. To safe and solid ascetical teaching, he weds exquisite craftsmanship and literary form. He is a great spiritual guide, but he is also a great writer.

His mental endowments were of the finest and most delicate texture. Any page taken at random from his works gives proof of intellectual acumen and refinement, depth of feeling, originality of thought and expression. As a spiritual writer he had something far better. His treatises everywhere display solid, accurate and extensive theological knowledge. That was the soul of his teaching, the safe and deep-set foundation of his work. The broad and firm principles of dogma and asceticism support the delicate and at times elaborately carved tracery of his thought. They do not obtrude themselves technically and formally upon the reader, but they are felt to be a silent and vital power everywhere guiding the hand of the writer in the lessons he lays down and the conclusions which he safely draws. He treads with the elastic and firm step of the traveler acquainted with every feature of the roads in the realm of the supernatural, and peers boldly into the secret operations of grace, the mysteries of the Sacraments and the veiled glories of the future life. To use his own words, we are startled at the minuteness, familiarity, and assurance with which he talks of the unseen world "as if it were the banks of the Rhine, or the olive-yards of Provence, the campagna of Rome, or the crescent shores of Naples." The things of the other world were close to the heart of Faber. He lived in the white light of eternity.

He not only mastered the science of theology, but he had a thorough knowledge of the human heart. Certain phases of its weaknesses he could analyze with the art of an expert. The pages on self-deceit in the "Spiritual Conferences" are admirable for their sure diagnosis and anatomic skill. This penetration was refined in him by a still higher gift, the knowledge of the workings of grace in the soul, that peculiar boon which has been called the science of the Saints.

It is undoubtedly for these reasons that Faber wins his readers. To the educated and the cultured he offers his deep and solid theological teaching. For the simple and the less scholarly, he has unlocked the heavy tomes of ascetical lore and made their treasures accessible. For the religious he sounds a note of the highest spirituality: worldlings he allures to higher ideals and standards by seeming for the moment to condescend to their weaknesses. But this condescension never goes so far as to betray the sacred cause which he is ever pleading.

It would be doing a great injustice however to the memory of this thorough Catholic and unworldly apostle to think that he ever for a moment minimized or whittled away the dogmas or the teachings of the Church. As gentle as his father, St. Philip, he could be as rock-rigid and as uncompromising as St. Ignatius when there was question of principle. Not a single passage can be found in his works where he sacrifices an iota of truth to the spirit of Protestantism or pseudo-Christianity so prevalent in his day. When there was question of sin or evil he offered no compromise and no quarter to the world. But he was tolerant of men and their foibles because he wished to win and conquer souls.

The science of the Saints, the knowledge of the human heart and its infirmities was enhanced in Faber by another quality which has been called "the style of the Saints." The reader feels that the author has a message for his soul. He realizes that the message has been heard by the writer himself and that he has lived its commands in his own life, and that he is delivering it now only because his heart is athrill and overflowing with its meaning and import. Hence the vitality, the spontaneity, the color, the glow, the depth of feeling, the enthusiasm with which the message is delivered. It is so important that it must come home to all. It must be repeated then time and again and clothed in newer garb. It is so noble that it must not lose in dignity or power, so it is delivered with all the grace, the attraction of style and diction which the writer commands. It is God's message. It must not be marred by self-seeking or pretence, but must come home full and clear to all. To attain this end, the style is clear, popular, rich and large. There is in it an intimate appeal which convinces.

With the alchemy of the Saints, Faber transforms the sublimest doctrines and the loftiest spiritual axioms into personal devotion and love. In his noble volume on "The Blessed Sacrament," a book which the Angel of the Schools and Suarez would have read with admiration, the dogmas which he touches with such a sure hand do not remain mere speculative teachings but become a burning and holy passion.

His first book, "All for Jesus," gives the dominant note and motive of Faber's work. It is like the solemn chord which Beethoven sounds in the first bars of an overture and which is woven again and again in the mazes of his harmony. Under the Oratorian's hand, the note is struck with all the tenderness, grace and affection of the musician bending over the organ and drawing from its depths harmonies and strains of sweetest melody on the one theme which has won his heart. "All for Jesus," though the first-written of Faber's books, was the practical conclusion to which he would lead all men. His speculative theories and the groundwork of his Christian philosophy are to be found in "Creator and Creature" where with splendid logic and an overwhelming sense of the Divine Majesty and His outraged rights, which remind us of St. Ignatius and his "Exercises," he points out the relations, too often neglected and flouted, which bind man to his Maker. That masterpiece should have many readers today.

That Faber can be prolix, that he abuses his wonderful powers of amplification, no impartial critic will deny. But what generosity of feeling, what rich and Oriental imagination, what solid structure of thought, what charming and winsome humanity, what easy, gracious and tender familiarity are displayed in his books! He is the poet among the noble band of the great spiritual writers. Everywhere in "Bethlehem," in "The Precious Blood," while the teacher is always felt, we recognize the former singer of the "Knights of St. John," of "The Cherwell Water-Lily." And the "Hymns" of Frederick William Faber, sung by Protestants and Catholics alike, wherever the English language is spoken, complete the picture of the man. He is dull of heart who can listen unmoved to the thrilling and majestic refrains of his Passion hymn "Oh Come and Mourn with Me Awhile." The words "Jesus, Our Love is Crucified" fall on the ears with a moving cadence which even the poorest singing cannot dull. "Faith of Our Fathers, Living Still," "O Paradise! O Paradise!", "The Eternal Years," "The Pilgrims of the Night," have all the power, popular appeal, simplicity and depth of feeling of the best hymns in the language.

William Frederick Faber was the gentlest of men. But he had the heart of the Crusader, the tenderness of those Knights of St. John whom he had sung in his Newdigate prize-poem, but also their fearlessness. Hear him in "The Right Must Win":

> For right is right, since God is God;
> And right the day must win;
> To doubt would be disloyalty,
> To falter would be sin.

That martial note is often heard in the works of Faber.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S. J.

REVIEWS

Literature in Ireland. By THOMAS MACDONAGH. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $2.75.

Here is an authentic voice upon a theme which sorely needed a capable historian. If ever a field of letters was exploited for the financial betterment of publishers it is the literary product of supposed Irish writers. Thus we have had "Dublin Anthologies" and "Irish Libraries," and the main Irish suggestiveness they possessed was the gold and green binding. Their contents have as much claim to classification as Irish literature as the Arabian Nights have. Let us state this in terms of names: Goldsmith and Swift, Sheridan and Edmund Burke, and many more, for all their Irish relationships, belong most emphatically to the English. There is a distinct Anglo-Irish literature; and these studies by Thomas MacDonagh, with thorough scholarship, enunciate the formula by which it is to be known.

Yet a larger scope has this book: it gives with penetrating analysis and abundant illustrations an erudite account of that magic thing in modern letters, "the Irish mode." And on this score, the book deserves to stand with the best histories of any national literatures and of the forces that made them. It is the philosophy of a literature. Not merely they who have sympathy for Irish history and letters, but they as well who wish to learn something of a new leaven in English literature will find these studies interesting; nay, for them the book is an imperative need. For the strong wave from the great Irish world of the past seems destined to become one of the most influential currents that English literature has ever known.

This Anglo-Irish literature is rooted in the Gaelic tradition. It belongs to an ancient race, who use the new language indeed, but use it with the marvelous expressiveness of their Gaelic. Their English speech is not in the harsh over-stressed staccato of the English invaders, but is the even, musical accent of their Gaelic fathers, speaking the older and richer tongue. And this method of speech influences the constitution of the written language, both prose and verse; and the result is "the Irish mode."

MacDonagh was a scholarly reader in many literatures. In support of his thesis, he is on intimate terms with Latin, with Dante's Italian, with Chaucer and those who followed him, and with modern languages, German and Romance. Assured of definite conclusions for his theses, he states them like a philosopher and professors of poetry will find among his pages splendid dissertations on the technique of versification.

Who does not know, wherever English print appears in the present-day world, that Thomas MacDonagh was in his death one with Brian of the Tribute, with Owen Roe O'Neill, with Robert Emmet, a martyred patriot; let this book claim for him the scholar's crown of laurel. His ideals, national and religious, like those of his motherland, were powerful and holy. His exhortations to national effort were not in terms of hunger and profit, but in terms of tradition and the sacred gift of the ideal for which Ireland has stood against tramplings and settlements these thousand years. "Keep the fires of the nation burning," he cries in the words of one who went before him. "This terrible and splendid trust, this heritage of the race of kings, this service of a nation without a flag but with the lure of God in her eyes, has endowed some of our poetry with meanings that must be lost to all but those baptized in our national faith." M. E.

The Truth About Christian Science. By GEORGE M. SEARLE, of the Paulist Fathers. New York: The Paulist Press. $1.25.

The reading of a single page of Mrs. Eddy's "Science and Health, With a Key to the Scriptures," imposes a heavy task upon the mind of the most attentive and intelligent reader. It is a medley of half-truth and paradoxes, of phrases of Scripture misinterpreted and misapplied, of false scientific and philosophical principles, veiled in obscure yet pretentious language. Logical sequence and coherence are nowhere to be found. Yet by one of those strange phenomena often to be observed in the history of error, the doctrines which the book sets forth have caught many dupes whose number in some sections of the country is growing every day. These doctrines are subtle in their appeal to certain mental and physical cravings of fallen human nature. They bear the label, "Christian Science." But, as has time and again been proved, they are neither Christian nor scientific.

In his study of this strange manifestation of many older heresies, parading in a new dress, Father Searle has followed a method akin to the one pursued by that master of controversy, Father Lambert, when he faced and demolished Ingersoll. Under such headings as "Prayer," "Atonement and Eucharist," "Marriage," "Animal Magnetism," "Theology," "Creation," Father Searle takes the actual words of Mrs. Eddy, analyzes them, follows them out to their logical conclusions and shows them to be either absurd or childish or in contradiction with the very fundamentals of the teachings of Christ and of the plainest common-sense. As the disciples of Mrs. Eddy frequently boast of the cures wrought by Christian Science, the author has devoted a chapter to the study of a great number of these pretended instances of healing, dissects the evidence and shows them to be poorly authenticated, ill-proved and such as no jury or court would receive. The perusal of Father Searle's book will convince any sincere man that Christian Science, denying as it does the reality of the object of our sensitive perceptions, nullifies the whole scheme of the Incarnation and Redemption. For it material things are not really and truly existent, Christ never lived and died and rose from the grave, and the Gospel story is a shadowy myth. J. C. R.

The Melancholy Tale of "Me": My Remembrances. By EDWARD H. SOTHERN. Illustrated. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

"Eddy is a dear boy, but he will never make an actor," wrote the elder Sothern when the author of these entertaining "Remembrances" began his stage career at the Boston Museum. But the young man's father was wrong. For the son had the advantage of being associated with such excellent actors as William Warren, Richard Mansfield and John McCullough, and worked so hard at his profession that in modern comedy he repeated his father's successes and became besides a most artistic interpreter of the tragic rôles of Shakespeare. The best chapter in the volume, "I Talk to Myself," contains the following account of how Mr. Sothern achieved his lifelong ambition of presenting Shakespeare worthily:

> For my part, although I had to make a living out of acting, I was never concerned about financial results. I had a fine time doing my work; I was entirely engrossed in it; it quite possessed me every waking hour. To practise my calling in all humility and to feel myself become more expert, little by little, day by day, became a passion with me, and at last to seek expression in the great rôles of Shakespeare was a gratification far beyond the possession of wealth. I can look back on all the days of labor, and experiment, and preparation, and effort, as on a kind of delightful intoxication; and I say that such passionate obsession and joyful abandonment and unselfish slavery, belong to art alone. Here one lives in the realm of the imagination with the poets and the seers and treads upon the clouds. The cant that Shakespeare is not to be acted is nonsense. The pleasure obtained from reading is not comparable to the pleasure experienced in actually impersonating. The imagination is exercised to an even greater extent in acting than in mere contemplation. I am not speaking of the gratification of the auditor, that is a separate matter. I mean the experience of the player. A man who can act, experiences an added exaltation over and above that of the simple reader. To passively absorb the poet's thought is a small satisfaction compared to the elation of acting greatly a great part, and conducting the emotions of an assembly as one conducts a vast orchestra. Shakespeare's plays were written by an actor for actors to act.

They are an inspiration to the player, and, well acted, an inspiration to the auditor. Here is enough reason that a man or woman of intellect should go on the stage. To love Shakespeare is to love the best in literature. To impersonate Shakespeare's heroes and heroines is to enjoy the poet to the greatest possible extent.

Now that Mr. and Mrs. Sothern have retired from the stage, it is a matter of regret that there seem to be no American actors who are able and willing to devote themselves to the presentation of Shakespeare's plays. W. D.

The Philosophy of Bergson. By GUSTAVUS WATTS CUNNINGHAM, A.M., PH.D. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.25.

The author of this volume wisely confines himself to Bergson's basic doctrines and submits them to a keen, if merciless, analysis. Like all other thoughtful men who have given the "philosophy of change" serious and unprejudiced thought, Dr. Cunningham finds Bergson both inconsistent and lacking in the acumen usually associated with the originator of a new doctrine. Thus he points out that the French savant preaches a sharp and irreconcilable antagonism between science and philosophy, assuming all the while that they differ not in kind but in degree of concreteness only, and in reality supplement each other. Not only this, but Bergson is shown to hold two distinct views of the intellect, one which limits the function of the faculty to the material order, another which admits transcendence of that sphere and asserts the competency of the intellect to deal with the metaphysical order. There are some particularly good passages in the volume under review. Noteworthy among these is the comparison between Kant's "understanding" and Bergson's "intelligence." And not the less entertaining is the section wherein Dr. Cunningham illustrates how the French philosopher confuses imagination with intellect and proceeds to build up an elaborate hypothesis on this error. For the rest, "The Philosophy of Bergson" is a sane and incisive book which will do much to sweep away nonsense parading under the name of philosophy. R. H. T.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

September's six best-selling novels have already been noticed in AMERICA. According to the Bookman they are these: "When a Man's a Man," Wright; "The Rising Tide," Deland; "Seventeen," Tarkington; "The Heart of Rachael," Norris; "Just David," Porter; and "Tish," Rinehart. "Seventeen" is unquestionably the best book on the list. Four of the novels named, it is worthy of note, are written by women.

The innumerable young friends of Father Francis J. Finn, S. J., will be eager to read his latest book, "Cupid of Campion" (Benziger, $0.85) which appeared serially in the Queen's Work. The highly gifted and light-hearted hero, Clarence Esmond, is introduced thirsting for adventures, and before the story ends his desire is certainly gratified. There are hair-breadth escapes not a few, his meeting with the winsome little Dora is a pleasant episode, and his reception at Campion College, with the ensuing results is by no means conventional. As the story proceeds, the author, with his usual adroitness, instructs and edifies the Catholic reader.

These two stanzas, contributed to the Poetry Review of America by Karle Wilson Baker, well express the discerning poet's gratitude to God for the world's beauty:

Today I have grown taller from walking with the trees,
The seven sister-poplars who go softly in a line;
And I think my heart is whiter for its parley with a star
That trembled out at nightfall and hung above the pine.
The call-note of a redbird from the cedars in the dusk
Woke his happy mate within me to an answer free and fine;
And a sudden angel beckoned from a column of blue smoke—
Lord, who am I that they should stoop—these holy folk of Thine?

James B. Connolly's "Head Winds" (Scribner, $1.35), Elizabeth Jordan's "Lovers' Knots" (Harper, $1.25), W. H. Hudson's "Tales of the Pampas" (Knopf, $1.25) and Eliza Calvert Hall's "Clover and Blue Grass" (Little, Brown, $1.25) are four recent volumes of short-stories of which the first mentioned is the most interesting. Mr. Connolly is master of the dramatic seatale, and in his latest book, "The Trawler," "The Adoption" and "Mother Machree" are thoroughly characteristic of the author. As a maker of "Lovers' Knots," the creator of May Iverson does not appear at her best. The stories are trifling but clean. The belated vogue that the author of "Green Mansions" is having doubtless explains the publication of these six "Tales of the Pampas." The author paints vividly life in the South America of fifty years ago and takes an occasional shot at the Church. Natives and admirers of "God's country" will enjoy the Kentucky stories in the last of the books named above.

Calendars and almanacs for 1917 have begun to appear. "The Manna Almanac for Children" (Salvatorian Expedition, Nazianz, Wis., $0.15) is an abundantly illustrated booklet of short stories, anecdotes, verses and lives of saints which the Salvatorian Fathers offer as a bit of "delightful nourishment for little minds and little hearts and little souls." The almanac is a companion to the Manna, which is an illustrated children's monthly, likewise issued by the Salvatorian Expedition.—"Der Familienfreund" (B. Herder, $0.25) and "Der Wanderer" (Wanderer Printing Co., St. Paul, $0.25) have again set forth upon their annual visitation to our Catholic homes, bringing the usual wealth of good things for the year 1917.—"The Almanac of the Sacred Heart" (Apostleship of Prayer, New York, $0.12) contains besides its usual features, several stories by Father O'Rourke.—"St. Michael's Almanac" (Mission Press, Techny, Ill., $0.20) gives under the title "The Triumph of the Cross," a historical narrative of St. Boniface's apostolate.—The "Catholic Home Annual" (Benziger, $0.25), the 1917 number of which has just appeared, is now in its thirty-fourth year.

"Watermeads" (Dodd, Mead, $1.50) is an account of an old country land owner and his family that once commanded much wealth but are now reduced to a position in which they feel the pinch of trying to make ends meet. They hope, however, to retrieve their former fortunes through their children. The rather drawn-out story is clean but a little light and frothy and most of the characters are weaklings. The volume abounds in good descriptive passages.——"The Further Side of Silence" (Doubleday, Page, $1.35) Sir Hugh Clifford's latest collection of stories carries the reader into the very midst of the unregenerate Malays and Sakais of the Far East. These folk, according to travelers, are "thieves, liars and human beings with depraved morals," but Sir Hugh succeeds in skilfully weaving the witchery of romance around them. For more than twenty years the author studied the Malays, neither the fairest nor the foulest phases of their character escaping him. It is not surprising, then, that he has many fascinating tales to tell of them, nineteen of which he publishes in this volume. "A Daughter of the Mohammedans," innocently slipped in the center of the book, is the finest of the lot as it tells of Minah's self-sacrificing and courageous devotion to Mamat, her husband, who reeks with leprosy and is slowly rotting away.——"To the Minute" (Putnam, $1.00) by Anna Katharine Green, is the better of the two tales in her recent volume. But neither is worthy of the author of "The Leavenworth Case."——"The Wonderful Year" (Lane, $1.40) Mr. W. J. Locke's latest novel is by no means his best work. The book is about a young man and a young woman, who in defiance of conventions, go cycling together through France. The story of course ends with the war.——"The Romance of a Christmas Card" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.00), by Kate Douglas Wiggin, is a Christmas gift-book. The illustrations are attractive and the story is of the "back to the old home" type.

Though exception might well be taken to the fitness of the title "The Real Mother Goose" (Rand, McNally, $2.00), for that gifted and venerable dame would doubtless find among the 316 rhymes and jingles in the book many that she never saw before, she would certainly give her warm approval to Blanche Fisher Wright's numerous pictures in color, full-page and inserts, which make the volume one that will delight little boys and girls.——Those who are buying books for children should also keep in mind Katharine Pyle's "Wonder Tales Retold" (Little, Brown, $1.35), which she has written and illustrated for readers of eight to twelve. The eighteen fairy stories in the volume are taken from almost as many national sources, ranging from Korea to America, and the pictures are excellent.——Armed with a soft pencil, small children can work out with keen enjoyment the twenty-four stages of "The Great Dot Mystery" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1,00), Clifford L. Sherman's latest "dot-book." As no one can tell beforehand how the pictures will turn out, the excitement is sure to be intense.——In her amusing preface to "The Land of Don't-Want-To" (Rand, McNally, $1.25), Lilian Bell asks: "Is there not, anywhere upon this round earth, a book for intelligent children, suitable to be read aloud by uncomplaining grown-ups, which will not land all participants in padded cells?" So she determined that there should be at least one such book, and then wrote about little Billy's adventures in Nimbus's flying-machine. But the youngsters are likely to miss many of the things meant for grown-ups, and the grown-ups may get tired of what was written for the youngsters. All will enjoy, however, Milo Winter's numerous illustrations both in color and in line.

The best poems in "After Hours" (Loyola University Press, Chicago, $1.00), the recent little volume of verse by the Rev. William Frederick Feld, are those about children. Lamb would have liked these stanzas, for instance, on "My Little Friend":

There is a little miss I meet,—
I pass her daily on the street;
She greets me with a smile so sweet
That I am captivated.

A fairy she, scarce seven years old;
About her head play locks of gold;
No rose is fairer to behold
Than she, when all is stated.

She is like one of those,—ah, me!
That climbed the Saviour's gentle knee;
And felt His hand so lovingly
Upon their silken tresses.

And when she asks me, "How are you?"
Just as all grown-up persons do,
I make a serious answer to
Her ladylike addresses.

God bless my cheery little friend!
Her artless way I would not mend;
I'd have her thus unto the end,
Could I but have my pleasure.

Methinks full surely God has given
This sunny sprite of years scarce seven,
To closer link my heart to heaven,
And there to place my treasure.

EDUCATION

Education by Vagary

TIME and again I get letters asking my opinion of that new course in common-school education called sex-instruction. My opinion is that in dealing with this course we should be guided wholly by the practice of the Church and of the Christian fathers and mothers of every nation from the days of the Holy Family to the present time. The Church and Christian parents have had the experience of the ages to direct them. Parents have had the aid of the Sacraments; the Church has been guided by the Holy Ghost; and their traditional observance is certainly the only correct method of dealing with this nastiness. To run counter to what has been the universal use and custom of the flower of humanity for nearly 2,000 years is the height of insolence. Whenever there is real need of such instruction, let the confessor give it in the confessional, and not elsewhere. The objection that, if the parent or teacher does not impart this instruction, the devil will, is foolish. The way out is not by doing the devil's work, but to see that he does not get a chance to work at all. Put your children in Catholic schools, where they will not be exposed to sex-instruction, insist that they go to Confession twice a month, encourage them to receive Holy Communion frequently, and then possess your soul without fussing.

Educating for "Life"

THE fact that there is "a good Catholic girl" teaching in the public school in your neighborhood may be her misfortune, but no reason at all for sending your child to the public school. The companions of the child, the environment, the religious tone of those that associate with the child, make for good or evil more than the teacher does, at least in primary education. Evil crawls along floors behind the teacher's back.

But, you say: "The child must be educated for his work in life, and the public schools do this so much better than the Catholic schools." That is unmitigated nonsense. In purely secular learning, the Catholic primary schools are as good as the public schools, the Catholic high schools are better than the public high schools, the Catholic colleges are the best in the country.

For twenty-five years I was a student or teacher in schools, colleges, and universities in this country, and I have had much dealing with non-Catholic universities. I was a student for five years in German, Austrian, Czech and Italian universities, and I know certainly that the Catholic college, even apart from the moral instruction, is the best college in which to educate a boy, whether he is a Catholic, a Protestant, a Jew, or a pagan.

Comparative Ratings

SOME months ago, in Scranton, Pennsylvania, there was an examination of young women for the position of teacher in a public high school. All the candidates were graduates of colleges for women. Three came from the Catholic College of New Rochelle, one from Barnard, and one from Wellesley. I do not know the other colleges, but they were not Catholic. A graduate of New Rochelle College got the highest average. The second place was won by the graduate of Barnard, who had made her preliminary studies in a Catholic academy, the third place went to a graduate of New Rochelle, the fourth place was taken by a graduate of New Rochelle; and the girls from the non-Catholic colleges came trailing after, because there were no more New Rochelle girls in the room. The examiners had never even heard of New Rochelle; now they know it. There are many Catholic colleges for girls in the country, as good as New Rochelle. I do not mention them here, because once in an educational article I was rash enough to try to mention them all, and I missed one. I received a letter written all in italics.

Products of Catholic Schools

IT never occurs to the ignorant, who have opinions on education, that exactly the same methods of education, now used by the Jesuits in their American colleges, produced the theologians, Suarez, Vasquez, Molina, De Lugo, Benedict XIV, Petavius, Franzelin, Mazella, and a hundred others almost as great; astronomers like Grimaldi, Scheiner, Secchi, Hagen, and Perry; mathematicians like Clavius, famous for his work on the Gregorian calendar; naturalists like Wassmann who exposed the forgeries of Jena; historians like the Bollandists; poets like Molière, Calderon, Tasso, Corneille, Sarbiewski, and Goldoni; orators like Bossuet, Meagher, Massillon and Sheil, scholars like Galileo, Descartes, Buffon, Muratori, Montesquieu, Malesherbes; missionaries like Marquette, Jogues and De Smet; statesmen like the Carrolls; lawyers like our own Chief Justice White; Saints like Francis de Sales, Aloysius Gonzaga, Francis Girolamo, John Berchmans, Stanislaus Kostka, Francis Regis, Andrew Bobola, Edmund Campion, with scores of others, and thousands of real men, famous in every vocation of life. If these schools, which have not degenerated in any degree, produced men who are among the greatest the past three centuries have given the civilized world, they are better fitted to teach your boy than the mushroom schools about us, which try to educate the intellect, and memory, to the exclusion of the most important part of man, his will.

Modern Catholic Colleges

BESIDE the Jesuit colleges for boys in the United States we have Notre Dame University, and there is no better collegiate department anywhere. We have the Christian Brothers' colleges, the colleges of the Augustinians, and the Benedictines, old Mount St. Mary's, St. Charles', St. Viator's, St. Joseph's at Dubuque, St. Thomas' at St. Paul, Niagara, Seton Hall, Duquesne, St. Vincent's, St. John's of Minnesota, and many others.

These colleges do not let an infant, even if he calls himself a college "man," select the courses that will educate him. If he knew how to select these courses, he would need no education. The boy is no authority in pedagogy; he does not know the essential difference between the procession of the equinoxes and a trolley-car. Give fifty average college sophomores a plain sonnet to put into prose, and not ten of them will get at the perfectly evident meaning—I have tried that experiment often—yet these babes are permitted to select the method of education which is to "fit them for life."

Training the Will

THE boy is raw material, made up of intellect, imagination, memory, will, and body; and it is the will that makes or breaks him for time and eternity. The non-Catholic college educates his intellect, memory, and body after a fashion; the Catholic college educates his will, intellect, imagination, memory, and body. That is the difference, and it is so vast a difference that eternity depends on it. All the good and evil in the world are, finally, effects of volition; we use the intellect, imagination, memory, and body, to direct the will toward good and away from evil. If education does not begin, at the very dawn of life, to train the will, all development of the intellect, imagination, memory, and body furnishes tools for evil alone.

My experience has been that the Catholic college develops the intellect and memory of the average boy better than the non-Catholic college does, provided the boy remains at the Catholic college until graduation. The last two years of the course count the most. When graduates of Catholic colleges take up university work, they usually excel boys from colleges which give degrees for a course in the history of Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason," which is caviar to the multitude, and usually unintelligible even to the professor. Sometimes a boy with natural genius runs ahead, in spite of the courses he made at college along the outskirts of medieval English, and the esoteric meaning of Omar Khayyam. But the ordinary graduate of one of these "57-variety" colleges never hits the bottom of law or medicine alive. Years ago I heard a Yale graduate say he never did think much of scholastic philosophy. He knew as much about scholastic philosophy as a darky Doctor of Divinity knows of theology. He was naturally a talented youngster but he could not translate a paragraph in the "Summa" with the aid of all the dictionaries and professors in New Haven, and prayer besides.

Our "Scientific Age"

JUST this substitution of vagary for education is what makes American scholarship a joke in European universities, and causes the ghosts of bad science to haunt the corridors of our universities for years after they have been laid with bell, book, and candle in Europe. Our scientists actually still believe in evolution, even if they do not know enough to believe in God. Our philosophers try to get out patents on new systems of ethics, yet ethics was one of the most finally settled subjects in creation before Adam grew interested in apples. Every small editor, and big editor, too, insists incessantly that this is solely a scientific age, as if any age could be wholly scientific, any more than a man could be all feet. Why this pother over science? The only signification they give to science is physical science, because one can smell that. Science is not a bad thing in its place, nor is a cook, but both belong below stairs. The real wisdom of man begins where physical science ends.

Austin O'Malley, M.D., Ph.D.

SOCIOLOGY

Ave, Fordham!

IN some respects, the inauguration of a new university faculty is like the launching of a ship; in other respects, the ceremony is totally dissimilar. Launchings are associated with waving banners and the blare of bands, with champagne in unbreakable containers and a great splash, with the glint of sunlight on wind-vexed waters, and eager wavelets racing to the shore. This is poetry, or akin to it. Prose begins when snub-nosed tugs, puffing with importance, tow the helpless new-born vessel into the yards. But with no pageant of color and form will Fordham University open her new faculty of social science in this coming election week. Careful forethought has obviated difficulties that seemed final, and the new faculty will glide into the academic world and the world of action, freighted not with our fears, but with the happy realization of hopes long cherished.

Theory and Practice

THE need of schools of social science has long been stressed in these pages. It is true that in its philosophical courses, every Catholic college lays the foundations of this science, accurately and securely. Many institutions, moreover, through the St. Vincent de Paul, the sodality, or similar organizations, afford volunteer students an excellent training in genuinely constructive social work. But it has been felt keenly, that these philosophical courses, valuable and indeed indispensable, do not adequately meet the concrete needs of the day, even when thus supplemented. It cannot be said too strongly that sociology, if it wishes to avoid the responsibility for the panaceas daily proposed by restless and unbalanced minds, must rest upon indisputable principles; but, on the other hand, it is equally true that this science is not exclusively a matter of the study and the midnight lamp. Its principles are to be found in many fields. It draws upon ethics, law, moral theology, psychology and physical science, subjects whose value and boundaries have been drawn with definiteness by the research of many minds in many ages. But it is the function of the university faculty of social science, to coordinate these known principles, and by its experimental activities to formulate their proper application to the changing conditions of life.

The Fordham Program

THE announcement of courses by the university, indicates a well-balanced scheme in which the practical aspects of the work receive generous recognition. The first-year group includes a survey of the ethical principles of social service, the economic groundwork of sociology, social medicine and hygiene, juvenile and adult delinquency, child welfare, and the dependent family. The history of social reform, history, civics, and preparation for civil service examinations, are offered as supplementary courses. The syllabus for the second year outlines courses in social legislation, applied psychology, the treatment of the dependent adult, methods of relief and employment, the defective, problems of administration, social research and statistics. The supplementary courses of this year are social history, advanced tests in preparation for civil service, and special problems in social work. The required minimum of field work is twelve hours. Affiliated with the school, is the "School for Social Studies of the Laymen's League," which will offer lectures in logic, apologetics and special topics in history.

State and Individual

THE practical and immediate value of the courses is plain. But viewing the matter from a wider standpoint the Fordham School of Social Science will surely render signal service to its students and to the community, in its treatment of a question of great importance at the present day, the authority of the State over the individual.

Just here, it is easy to fall into extremes. Herbert Spencer once wrote that while in the past it was the function of liberalism to put a limit to the powers of kings, "the function of true liberalism in the future will be that of putting a limit to the powers of parliaments." The older philosophy which drew its fairly simple conclusions from the doctrine that obedience is due all well-ordered civil authority, because this authority represents God Himself, was current in a society far more individualistic than the society of today. There was a time when men educated their children, took care of their sick, married and gave in marriage, with but a trace of help or hindrance from the State. That age is passing. Today men move in herds, with the State as shepherd. The State educates the children free of cost, is beginning to feed and clothe them free of cost, and almost universally affords them the advantages of medical treatment, also free of cost. It plays nurse for the mewling baby, is Punch and Judy for the growing boy in search of amusement, and by ranging all under the age of twenty-one within the magic circle of public education seeks to become the guide, philosopher and friend of the rising generation. It joins in marriage, seeks to establish diriment impediments founded upon scientific near-thought, and, in the United States, grants freedom from the loose bonds of matrimony, which it has imposed, with a disgraceful and destructive liberality.

The New Democracy

IN all this, there is no tendency to exalt the individual above the State. On the contrary, the current has set in full tide towards that "Statolatry," in which the individual is but a pawn of the State, subjected to its minute direction from the cradle to the grave. Cæsarism is a relic of paganism, as foreign to the spirit of genuinely republican government as it is to Christianity. But, unfortunately, it is gaining strength in a country which, if not professedly Christian, proudly boasts that it is a republic. "The State," writes Hegel, ...

> is the reality of the ethical idea, the reality of the substantial Will, the absolute end in itself, in which liberty attains its highest Right, which has supreme dominion over its members, whose highest duty it is to be members of the State.

"Which has supreme dominion over its members." Here we have the fundamental principle of the ideals of social democracy. How long can we endure it, and be men, not mere cogs in a mechanism? "According to the old conception," writes Kidd in his "Principles of Western Civilization," "the meaning of society was to be reached through a study of the individual. . . . According to the new conception the individual is to be understood only through the meaning of the social process . . . which is everywhere in the ascendant in history, controlling the meaning of the individual, slowly imposing itself upon his interests, and in the end completely governing his development."

The Safety of Self-Government

THE dangerous conclusions to which this practical deification of the State necessarily leads, need not here be traced in detail. How far we have traveled from the days when the framers of the Constitution jealously debated what powers might be conferred upon the general Government, lest the proper liberty of the individual be infringed thereby, or the rights of the several States usurped, is marked by the mass of legislation which under color of "social betterment," has crept into our statute-books. It is well to realize that a man is yet a man, even when he is a citizen; that some degree of self-determination may be allowed him with safety; that he has rights which are inalienable, and duties from which no "social legislation" can free him; and finally that the beginning and end of all wisdom are not to be found in a State legislature or in a board of aldermen stung into hasty action by a swarm of social scientists of the radical type that will not be trained by Fordham University.

P. L. B.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Dr. James J Walsh Recipient of Laetare Medal

THE Laetare Medal was bestowed upon Doctor James J. Walsh on October 22. Owing to the celebration of Notre Dame's diamond jubilee the ceremonies took place in the university itself. Dr. Walsh has deserved well of his country and of the Church whose stanch defender he has been on all occasions. He has stood forth as a representative Catholic layman, true to Catholic principles, always making them the rule and square of all his writings. Few authors have been so prolific and at the same time so universally popular. The special value of his books consists in the fact that they are a record of the achievements of the Church for the good of humanity, particularly in the field of science. As such they have fulfilled an important mission to the world in our day and have furnished Catholics with an armory against opponents who see in the Church the foe of learning. Notre Dame University could hardly have made a more suitable and deserving choice for the recipient of her honors.

New Catholic Home for Blind Children

THE Catholics of New York have secured a beautiful new home for the little blind children of the archdiocese. The spacious grounds to which their Institute for the Blind has now been transferred will afford ample opportunity for future development. Catholic institutions for our sightless children are exceedingly few in the United States. Their number has not increased since Father Joseph Stadelman, S. J., whose life has been devoted to the apostolate of providing literature for our Catholic blind, wrote in 1911:

> And what, you may ask, has the Church done for the education of its Catholic blind? So far as I know, and I do hope I am mistaken in my figures, there are but four schools specially provided for the education of our Catholic blind children, with a total enrolment of not more than sixty pupils and these mostly girls. Two of these schools are located in the archdiocese of New York, the third in the Brooklyn and the fourth in the Newark diocese. This is all that the Church has done for a pretty large percentage of Catholic children out of the 4,816 pupils attending either special institutions or the few public schools in which provision has been made for the education of the blind.
>
> An association has been formed for the benefit of the Catholic Institute for the Blind in New York whose members pay annual dues of five dollars or $100 for life membership. A Neighborhood Club has likewise been established by friends living in the vicinity of the new home, on Eastchester Road and Two Hundred and Twenty-second street, Williamsbridge, to give occasional assistance to the Dominican Sisters in charge of the work.

Can Catholics Be Single Taxers?

THE statement is occasionally made by the advocates of the single-tax movement that many "good Catholics" subscribe to their theories, and that nothing is contained in them contrary to Catholic principles. An answer to such claims will be found in the pamphlet, "Single Tax and Its Cleveland Champions," by Father Betten, S. J. The theory of Henry George, that private property in land is an enormous wrong, that nobody can rightfully own a single square foot of land, and that only the civil authority may really be the lawful possessor of the soil, is evidently in direct opposition to the teachings of the Encyclical of Pope Leo XIII "On the Conditions of the Working Classes." No one realized this more perfectly than Henry George himself when he wrote his open answer to the Holy Father's Encyclical. That Catholics may not lend their support to the promotion of this theory is therefore clear. Confusion arises, as the author points out, from the introduction of entirely foreign elements into the single-tax movement. Similar methods of confusing the issue are equally popular with Socialists in their political campaigns. Inheritance taxes, revenues levied on franchises and monopolies, and the unearned increment tax are all confounded by ardent promoters with the single-tax theory, though they have no connection whatsoever with it. The justification given for such a procedure is that the people are not as yet prepared "to grasp the whole truth of the single tax." The final aim, however, as the name of the movement itself implies, if it has any significance at all, is that all other taxes are gradually to be removed until the tax on land values alone is left. Lack of instruction can therefore be the sole explanation why any "good Catholic" gives his support to a doctrine "so erroneous and pernicious."

Violent Deaths

THE number of deaths assigned to suicide, in the registration area from which the latest United States mortality statistics have just been compiled, was 10,933 for 1914, corresponding to a death-rate of 16.6 per 100,000 population. This was an increase of about 1,000 suicides for that area, comprising twenty-five States, and thirty-five cities in non-registration States, besides the District of Columbia. The increase in these statistics may be partly accounted for by greater completeness and accuracy in the statements assigning the causes of death. The number of homicides for the same year was 4,847 or 7.3 per 100,000 population. Among the registration States the highest rate for suicides was found in California, where it reached 33.4 per 100,000 population. Among the registration cities San Francisco holds the sad preeminence with a record of 52.4 per 100,000. Deaths from automobile accidents were 4.3 per 100,000 during the same year.

Petrified Forests of Arizona

A SHORT distance south of Adamson, on the line of the Santa Fé Railway, are four petrified forests included in a Government reservation called Petrified Forest National Monument. The name "forest" says, the U. S. Geological Survey, in a descriptive article, is not strictly appropriate, since the petrified tree trunks are all prostrate and are broken into sections. The Survey then offers the following interesting explanation of the process of petrifaction.

> The logs are the remains of giant trees that grew in Triassic time, the age of reptiles. The trees were of several kinds, but most of them were related to the Norfolk Island pine, now used for indoor decoration. Doubtless they grew in a nearby region and, after falling, drifted down a watercourse and lodged in some eddy or a sand bank. Later they were buried by sand and clay, finally to a depth of several thousand feet. The conversion to stone was effected by a gradual replacement of the woody material by silica in the form called chalcedony, deposited by underground water. A small amount of iron oxides deposited at the same time has given the brilliant and beautiful brown, yellow, and red tints which appear in much of the material. The petrified woods are beautiful objects for study. When thin slices are carefully ground down to a thickness of 0.003 inch or less and placed under the microscope they show perfectly the original wood structure, all the cells being distinct, though now they are replaced by chalcedony.

Some of the tree trunks are six feet in diameter and more than a hundred feet in length. It will particularly interest the average reader to know that most of these specimens are found to be araucarian trees of the species Araucarioxylon arizonicuum.

Parish Schools in Newark's Anniversary Celebration

AN instructive and completely detailed report has just been issued by the Superintendent of Parish Schools for the Newark Diocese. Illustrations are given in it of the architecturally beautiful buildings of many of the schools, and not the least interesting feature of the book is the series of floats prepared by the parochial schools for Newark's 250th Anniversary celebration, of which the local Sunday Call wrote editorially:

> Another feature that brought a gratifying revelation was the imposing procession of beautiful floats provided by the parochial schools. Their artistic and historical correctness and fitness surpassed anything of the kind ever attempted here. There was nothing of the garish and the tawdry; it was all good and sound and altogether inspiring, and showed a strengthening regard for the things that are beyond and above the merely material and the prosaically utilitarian.
>
> The illustrations bear witness that this praise is not exaggerated. The subjects chosen were either of local interest, such as "The Passing of the Indians from Newark," or of general educational value, such as "Poetry," "Science," "Law," "Patriotism," and "Religion." They are justly described by the secular press as "one of the most striking and popular features of the entire demonstration. Newark never before saw floats to approach them." The report shows that there are at present 127 parish schools in the Newark diocese, with an enrolment of 63,095 pupils and a total of 1,197 teachers. The past year saw the erection of nine school buildings, and seven new schools are at present in the course of erection. There is one serious cause for regret pointed out by the Superintendent. While the number of children entering institutions of higher education has increased, the increase has not been in the attendance at Catholic high schools and academies.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVI. No. 5
WHOLE No. 396

NOVEMBER 11, 1916

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—The striking feature of the week on the western front was the recapture of Fort Vaux by the French. Surrounded on all sides except the north, it had been subjected to a violent and continuous cannonading since October 24, and at last became untenable. Accordingly it was evacuated by the Germans on November 1. The French occupied it a few hours later and by so doing regained the last of the strong outlying defenses of Verdun. After taking possession of the fort, the French occupied the town of Vaux and the Damloup village. Elsewhere on the western front little has been accomplished. The Germans have heavily bombarded the British positions about Ypres and have made numerous attacks on other portions of the line, but have failed to make any impression except at La Maisonette, a portion of which they recaptured. At the same time the British forced their way a little further towards La Transloy, despite the strong resistance of the German forces, and took the western fringe of St. Pierre Vaast Wood. The Italians have resumed the offensive in the Goritz region. They have made progress in the Wippach Valley, southeast of Goritz; they have also advanced on the Carso Plateau and almost invested Castagnievizza. This last movement is important as it is directed toward Trieste.

Bulletin, Oct. 30, p.m.-Nov. 6, a.m.

In Western Macedonia the combined efforts of the French and Serbians to reach Monastir have proved unavailing. A number of battles have taken place, but the line remains practically unchanged. In Eastern Macedonia, however, the British have taken the villages of Barakli Djuma, Kumli and Prosenik. In Volhynia and Galicia the general situation has undergone no important modification.

On the eastern border of Transylvania no developments whatever have taken place. In the Transylvanian Alps, southeast of Kronstadt, the Rumanians have resumed the offensive and captured Table Butsi, Mount Siriul and Taturumio. In the Prahova Valley, south of Predeal, they have withstood the German attacks, but further west they have been obliged to fall back toward Kimpulung. Near the Vulkan Pass the advantage is on the side of the Rumanians. Nothing of importance is reported from Dobrudja.

Austria-Hungary.—Dr. Ernest von Koerber, previously Austro-Hungarian Minister of Finance in the Cabinet which was reorganized last spring with a view to efficiency in financial matters, has been appointed to succeed the late Count Karl Stürgkh as Premier. He had held this position at a former period and retired from office in 1905. His first step was the formation of a new Cabinet since the members of that body had been retired automatically on the death of Count Stürgkh. The following Cabinet has been selected with the approval of the Emperor:

Premier, Cabinet and Parliament

Dr. Franz Klein, a former Minister, Minister of Justice; Baron von Hochtinau, until now Vice-President of the Administrative Court, Minister of the Interior; Michael Bobrzynski, former Governor of Galicia, Minister without department; Dr. Franz Stibral, Minister of Commerce; Karl Merck, Minister of Finance; Major-General Ernest Schaible, Minister of Railways and Count Clam-Martiniz, Minister of Agriculture. The following three Ministers have been reappointed to their former offices: Col.-General Baron von Georgi, Minister of National Defense; Baron von Hussarek, Minister of Construction; and Baron von Trnka, Minister of Public Works.

The question of convening the Parliament has recently been discussed. The rooms of the Parliament building itself are still filled with wounded who since the beginning of the war have been housed there. The greater number of the political leaders of the Lower House are said to favor a session under condition that the members confine their deliberations to urgent matters and refrain from criticisms based upon political interests. The members of the House of Lords, however, continue to be opposed to the proposed session of Parliament. According to report, a session of the "Delegations" is nevertheless thought to be necessary. These are two bodies, chosen annually from the Upper and Lower Houses of the Austrian and Hungarian Parliaments, who meet one year at Vienna and the next at Budapest. They deliberate independently of each other and merely communicate their resolutions in writing. The convening of these Delegations would make a session of Parliament very probable.

France.—On October 31, the Government decided to intervene in the strike of the suburban street railway's employees which began last week and has caused great inconvenience in the capital and its surroundings. The Cabinet announced on the above date a decree, which must be ratified, however, by Parliament, under which the higher administration may take over any public service whose continuance is necessary to national safety. The decree is general in character and will confer large powers on the Government. The strike had threatened the other transport services, and meetings of unions had been called hastily to discuss the situation. On November 1, the striking employees of the northern suburban and street car system declared themselves satisfied with the Government action in their behalf and decided to return to work. The railway company is still undecided as to its course of action and will confer again with the other street car and omnibus companies and give a definite answer to the Government later. While admitting the justice of the employees' demand for an extra war allowance of fifteen cents a day, which the Government had asked it to concede, the company insisted that it could not afford to pay the increase on account of the higher cost of coal and other operating expenses. It maintained that the expense should be borne by the local authorities or by the traveling public in the shape of increased fares. This view the Government refuses to entertain.

The Carmen's Strike

Germany.—Considerable interest has been aroused by an interview given to a representative of the Vienna Neue Freie Presse by the Chief of the German Staff, Field Marshal von Hindenburg. The situation, as he sees it, is entirely satisfactory and promises to be so in the future. Prophesying he considered an ungrateful task, and no one could foretell when the end of the war would come. It was not, however, impossible that decisive battles might be fought in 1917. No one thought of peace at the present moment. The numerical strength of Russia did not greatly impress him: "There is no doubt that new troops will be levied in Russia, but that makes no difference; we, too, have enough men. Germany has a profusion of reserves, and in Austria-Hungary the reserves are by no means exhausted." The French, he thought, were exterminating themselves by their method of fighting. "All their tenacity will be of no avail, for in the end there will be none of them left. This fate of the French nation is owing above all else to the British. If the British ask next spring for one more offensive campaign they will rob France of the remainder of her army and of her national strength." Asked whether the decision of the war lay in the east, he disclaimed any final program with this end in view:

The von Hindenburg Interview

> There is no prepared program, except this one, to gain victory. Where and how that will be done can only be decided each moment anew on the basis of events. Therefore a decision can be looked for as well in the east as in the west. It is nonsense if they tell you that I intend to shorten my front in the west. I never thought of it. Why should I do it? The front in the west stands as firm as a rock, and if our enemies by gigantic use of artillery here and there gain a little territory, they will never break through. In order to do this they would still have to attack for thirty years, provided they had enough men.

The entrance of Rumania into the war, he said, was heartily welcomed by him. "By means of it we got out of trench warfare. The Rumanians are in retreat and the day of reckoning is coming."

Lieut.-Gen. von Stein, commander of the Fourteenth Reserve Army Corps, has been appointed Prussian Minister of War in place of Lieut.-Gen. Adolph Wild von Hohenborn. The latter was sent to take command of an army corps on the western front. The reason given for the change is the need of a War Minister who has had practical experience of conditions at the front, this being necessary to enable him to decide with prudence upon military measures at home. As late as two months ago Lieut.-Gen. von Stein had commanded troops in the Somme sector of the German front in the vicinity of Thiepval. Like his predecessor, who succeeded Gen. von Falkenhayn, he had held the post of Quartermaster-General.

New Prussian War Minister

Great Britain.—Writing in the Times, Lord Northcliffe sketches the England that is to be, when England's soldiers return victorious after their experiences on the Continent. The novelty consists largely in the changed economic conditions foreseen by Lord Northcliffe, who draws a parallel from circumstances immediately following the close of the American War between the States. "Just as Grant's soldiers, the Grand Army of the Republic," he writes, "dominated the elections in the United States for a quarter of a century, so will the men from the trenches . . . demand by their votes the reward of a very changed England. English soldiers in France have used their eyes, and have learned that a man and his family can manage a bit of land for themselves, and live well on it. Hence they intend to take steps that, when they come back to England, they will live, not as laborers or tenants, but as small owners. Speaking editorially, the Times admits that much is to be said for Lord Northcliffe's view, and that the demand of the soldiers for "a life on the land" will have to be met. What could not be done in time of peace, by theorists or half-hearted reformers, may be done in the impetus set on foot during war, and afterwards supported by those on whom war's burdens have fallen most heavily. The antiquated land system, according to this plan will be done away with, and the large estates can then be partitioned, to be used to much better advantage than at present. It should be said that, in the intention of the reformers, no force is contemplated in making these sweeping changes, except the force of legal enactment, which will likewise do full justice in the matter of compensation. But it might well be added, that the English peasant can hardly hope to vie with his brother of France, unless with his "few acres," he also acquires the foresight, patience, frugality and hardihood for which the French peasant is famous. Without these qualities in the new landholders, the scheme can hardly be anything else than another dream of the old, discredited communism.

A New Economic England

Ireland.—Ever since his Home Rule speech in the House of Commons Mr. John Redmond has been vigorously pushing his campaign for the immediate application of the measure to Ireland. Speaking at Sligo on October 29, he said:

Mr. Redmond at Sligo

The present state of Ireland is a serious menace to the British Empire, to a victorious ending of the war. Ireland's suspicion of British statesmen and their promises should be met with trust and Home Rule put immediately into operation. This would do more to help the successful ending of the war than the alliance of half a dozen neutrals. Ireland is suffering from a brain-storm. A gust of passion has swept the country and a period of calm is necessary to restore a rational and sane view of the causes and the consequences of the tragedy through which Ireland has just passed. Common-sense is rapidly reasserting itself and the passion is subsiding. Ireland has come to believe that she must not sacrifice the fruits of forty years of patient labor in a moment of anger and disappointment.

But little other Irish news has managed to leak through during the week. Government censure of Irish papers is extremely severe; many are held up, others reach this country long after the date of publication. The so-called "seditious" papers have long since been suppressed. Among these journals may be named Connolly's Republic, McNeill's Irish Volunteer, Sean McDermott's Nationality and The Spark conducted by Countess Markievicz. Altogether sixteen papers have been done away with. Those that have survived are passing through bad times. The price of paper has tripled since the war and printing materials of every kind are growing daily dearer. War news and recruiting advertising have kept a number fairly prosperous. Among the prosperous ones must be counted the Belfast News and the Dublin Independent. The latter paper together with the Dublin Evening Herald is owned by Mr. Murphy, who is fighting Mr. Redmond as an independent Nationalist.

Japan.—Conjecture is busy about the probable character of the new Premier's foreign and domestic policy. Notwithstanding his denial last month that his ministry would be militaristic and reactionary, a large portion of the Japanese press seems to fear that he will prove to be an exponent of "saber politics." In a speech the Premier made before the Prefectural Governors on October 28, he said that he would "bend all his energy to the attainment of common objects in cooperation with the Entente Allies," that "his constant aim would be to uphold justice and to use particular circumspection with regard to the foreign relations of the country, keeping faith with other nations," and that "he wished in particular to maintain friendly relations with China and to place the peace of the Far East on a secure footing."

Is Terauchi a Reactionist?

Such pronouncements as the Premier's are of course intentionally vague. His record in Korea seems to bode ill for China. A Tokyo correspondent of the New York Sun writes in this connection:

The question is naturally being asked in the United States whether the change of Government means a change of policy with reference to China. It is too soon to say. The appointment of a military man at this time looks ominous to people accustomed to representative institutions, but ordinary Western footrules will not measure Japanese politics . . . It is certain that China will sound the alarm, and China is getting into such a deplorable condition internally that anything may happen. But whatever happens will not be a change, but only a development of policy. In one important respect Count Terauchi may be a force for peace between Japan and China. The Okuma Ministry had very little control over the army. Officers were disposed to do pretty much as they pleased, and the absence of effective restraint was one of the causes of the recent "incidents" in Mongolia. Terauchi is at the center of the military web, and the officer who disregards his instructions will have short shrift.

While Terauchi's appointment as Prime Minister has caused great satisfaction in army circles the "plain people" of Japan seem to regard it as a grave menace to the progress of constitutionalism.

Mexico.—The country is as ever, poor, disheartened, disease-ridden, groaning under the heel of a base, heartless tyrant. A letter written from Mexico City, October 27, 1916, says: "If only the people of the United States could see with their own eyes what their President's policy has brought about, they would take immediate and vigorous action." Divorce is in full swing, so too apparently are quarrels amongst the Carranzistas. Palavicini, the first Mexican to take advantage of the First Chief's divorce-decree, is at odds with Obregon and has issued a leaflet setting forth his grievance. Meantime, despite Mr. Cabrera's diplomatic assertion to the contrary, the persecution of the Church continues. Gross crimes against priests and Sisters have not been perpetrated for some time past: otherwise the situation remains practically unchanged. Less than a month ago a delegation of women protested vigorously against the arbitrary closing of churches. The following description of the incident is taken from a leaflet sent directly to AMERICA from Mexico City:

General Conditions

On the eleventh of October, at half past three in the afternoon, a committee of Catholic ladies met at the house of Señor Carranza and begged an audience of him, in order to protest against the closing of certain churches of the capital. As Señor Carranza was absent, Señora Carranza gave the committee a card, which would admit them to the palace without difficulty. In its passage from the Paseo de la Reforma to the National Palace, the committee increased considerably in numbers, to such an extent indeed that it filled two of the large reception rooms set apart for public use.

The arrival of such a numerous committee caused no little surprise at the palace. The aides of the First Chief showed great displeasure when they learned of its object. After the ladies had been announced, they were told that Señor Carranza could not receive them, as he gave audiences only on Tuesdays. The note of Señora Carranza proved of no avail. It was made known, but in vain, that the committee was composed of women of all ranks of life, and that their visit to the palace was not meant to be a manifestation, but that they were but a mere delegation speaking for others. After the refusal of an audience, some of the ladies returned to Señor Carranza's house in order to hand to Señora Carranza a protest. But here also they were refused admittance. The protest is as follows: The body present before you can pride itself on being a widely and genuinely popular delegation, for it comes to interpret the religious sentiments of the Mexican women, who as a whole are profoundly Christian. We do not come to air ideas or express desires which affect us alone; we are the echo of a national inspiration, for although there is question of a purely local affair, we are sure that in every part of the Republic voices will be lifted to approve our conduct, and that there will be no corner in the country where hearts will not beat in unison with ours, all bound together as we are by the common tie of a religious ideal.

By your order the churches of Santa Teresa, San Juan de Dios, and Corpus Christi have been recently closed. We hear it said every day that many others are destined to undergo a similar fate, under the pretext that they are to be used as municipal bureaus.

The people do not believe in the sincerity of this pretext, for the nation has at its disposal many other buildings, and can call upon the revenues necessary for the payment of the lease. In the measure ordered by you we can see nothing but a sectarian tendency that takes pleasure in insulting our religious sentiments and depriving public worship of those temples where just homage is paid to God. A year ago we noticed the same methods of procedure against other churches, and the fact produced intense indignation among our people, notwithstanding that the order to close them had been given by a military chief, and that it might have been excused as it was given in a moment of excitement, when the civil struggle was at its height.

But now, when the noise of the contest is dying away, now that minds are regaining their calm, now that the victorious party is directing its activities to rule the country as a government, the closing of these churches still more deeply wounds our religious sentiments, for without any reason to excuse it, it gives evidence of a preconceived idea of religious persecution. We are disposed to shed the very last drop of our blood for the sacred Faith of our fathers; and with all the strength of which our Catholic hearts are capable, we protest against the outrage inflicted upon our Catholic people by the closing of these churches, and we beg you to reconsider your order and recall it. And although our voice may not succeed in reaching the higher sphere of executive power, we shall at least have the ineffable consolation of having fulfilled our duty.—Mexico, October 11, 1916. To the Citizen First Chief of the Constitutionalist Army, Charged with the Executive Power.

The following passage is from an editorial in El Imparcial de Texas, October 12:

For many years it had been admitted, as a matter of fact, that the clergy of Mexico, especially the higher ecclesiastics, possessed immense wealth, so great that, without exaggeration, they enjoyed not only an abundance, but lived in opulence. So, when the barbarous horde of Carranza, destroying what of value and honor Mexico had, raised its hand against the altar, and drove from their country, by means of imprisonment, outrages and assassination, the priests, the representatives of Catholicism, and the higher dignitaries of the Roman Church, it was believed that they should suffer, besides the pain and torture of beholding this monstrous attack against their Faith, the bitterness attendant or consequent upon total ostracism, but it was never dreamed that they would be reduced to a state of abject poverty. It now comes to light, as proved by facts, that the reputed wealth of the Mexican clergy was more imaginary than real, since the life which the exiled priests and Bishops now lead, could not be more humble or frugal. Some have found employment in the churches of the large cities or small towns of the United States, with a salary or remuneration barely sufficient to supply their necessities. Others live upon their own very limited resources, and not a few depend upon the assistance of the Church in the United States. This is wholly true and well known among those who are intimate with the Mexican priests, and if not made public, it is because their modesty, resignation and reticence have kept this sad condition within the confines of their own hearts. . . .

Another reason for consideration and respect for the Mexican priesthood, is the humiliating poverty in which the greater number of them now live, because of the depredations of the reprobates of the revolution.

Even the newspapers are beginning to print the truth.

A Monumental Work

Rome.—According to the Roman correspondent of the Irish Catholic, the Italian press has been for some time calling attention to the completion of the work of codifying the Canon Law. The work, as is well known, was conceived and begun by Pius X, carried on by a numerous body of learned canonists, amongst whom the present Papal Secretary of State, his Eminence Cardinal Gasparri, stands out prominently, and has now been brought practically to a close by Benedict XV. In the progress of this epoch-making undertaking, the old traditional divisions have been adhered to as far as possible, and only such modifications have been introduced in the classification and grouping as were considered suitable for present needs.

The work comprises five divisions or books. In the first are laid down the more general principles of canon law. Into this have "gravitated" sections which in the older collections found place elsewhere. Thus the portion dealing with laws, customs and rescripts has been transferred from the book that treats of ecclesiastical persons and incorporated into this general introduction. Annexed to this section are the laws that concern privileges; the treatise on dispensations follows: Those statutes are then drawn together in systematic order.

A second book follows, dealing with ecclesiastical persons under the heads of clergy, religions, etc. Among other things, practical rules are here given concerning ecclesiastical archives. The third book, entitled "De Rebus," treats in six parts of the means used by the Church to attain her end. In this part are found such matters as the Sacraments, sacred places, ecclesiastical seasons, worship, benefices, ecclesiastical institutes; Church goods, their preservation and management. The fourth book, "On Judgments," is what we would call a civil and criminal code. It is followed by a fifth book, "On Penalties."

PACIFIC SCHOOL
OF RELIGION

English Education Under War Conditions

A. Hilliard Atteridge

THE war has had a very marked effect on education in England in every grade from the elementary schools to the universities. The law of compulsory education has now been in force for more than twenty years, and the greater number of children of school age receive free education in the elementary schools which are of two classes, the council schools, directly under the local authorities, and the voluntary schools which are maintained by various religious bodies, under a certain amount of supervision both by the State and the local authorities. Both classes of schools are supported, partly by a Government grant, partly by the local rates. But in the case of voluntary schools, the body to which they belong has to provide the land and buildings and keep the latter in repair. In round numbers, 6,000,000 children attend these schools in England and Wales. Two-thirds go to the council schools and the other third to the voluntary schools. There are more than 1,000 Catholic elementary schools, with accommodation for nearly 400,000 pupils. The limit of the school age varies slightly, but generally speaking, one may say it ranges from the age of five to fourteen. Thus the child is for nine years in the hands of the teachers.

The war has affected the elementary schools in two ways. It has diminished the available supply of teachers and it has withdrawn an immense number of children from the schools by increasing the half-time system for the sake of securing additional boy labor. In a report recently issued by Sir George Newman, chief medical officer of the Board of Education, the half-time system is strongly condemned and, though no precise figures are given, it is estimated that some tens of thousands of boys have attended school for only half the day since the war began.

But in some tens of thousands of other cases, school work has been entirely stopped by the war. As soon as recruiting began on a large scale, educational authorities, both in rural and manufacturing districts, passed resolutions exempting children, even under twelve years of age, from school attendance, in order that they might be put to work. In many cases, the Board of Education prevented effect being given to these resolutions, but at the same time children, who had reached the age of twelve, were very freely exempted on passing an easy examination which was too often a mere formality. Boys of thirteen have also been very widely exempted from school attendance, in order to begin work in government factories. The result of all these measures is that there has been an enormous increase of juvenile employment, both in the case of boys and girls. This is a retrograde step which will have unfortunate results. It is all the worse because very often these boys and girls are earning wages that formerly could only be hoped for by men and women and thus they are placed in circumstances in which they cannot be controlled by parent or teacher.

In the higher class schools, the effect of the war has been chiefly felt in the case of the boys. An immense number of young men, on reaching the age of eighteen, when normally their higher studies would begin, have passed into the army. Before the war these schools had each an "officers' training corps," a battalion or company of boys under a military instructor who were not necessarily intended for the army, but who would probably later on take commissions in the Territorial or Home Defense Army, which has now become part of the first line army at the front. The result of the war has been not only to add considerably to the numbers in the ranks of the school corps, but to draft into the army almost every member of these corps as soon as he reached military age. It has thus stopped at its source a very large proportion of the supply of students for the universities and professional schools. The latter have also lost by sending to the army a great part of the students already on their rolls. Many of the professional schools have been either closed down or have seen their number of students reduced to a mere handful.

London is the great center for medical education. There are very few students now left in the schools attached to its great hospitals. The course of study extends over five years. In the summer of 1915, some months before military service became compulsory for people in general, a kind of indirect compulsion was applied to the students of the medical schools. They had already lost some of their most promising students, but the chiefs of the colleges were doing their best to keep the students together and had more than once pointed out to them that the service they could do to the country by continuing their studies and qualifying for medical practice was more important than that which they would do by enlisting for service in the army as mere combatants. But the War Office suddenly issued a circular to the medical schools, asking for all those in the first, second and third year to enlist in the army. The deans of the colleges waited upon the chief of the recruiting department and urged every possible argument against this step. They pointed out that it was already difficult to keep the work of the hospitals going, that a very large proportion of the civilian doctors and surgeons in England had already been attached to the army, that others were giving the whole, or part of their time, to the wounded in the home hospitals and were only able to carry through this work with the help of the senior students, and that in all the large towns there was a deficiency of doctors while those who remained were overworked. The deans of the the colleges also pointed out that to put a sudden stop to the studies of three-fifths of their students must mean an enormously increased deficiency of doctors two years hence. But all arguments were unavailing, and the junior students had to be invited to volunteer for the army as they themselves said: "It was a case of compulsory volunteering, for under the circumstances no one could refuse." A few were attached to the navy as medical probationers and learned something while assisting the surgeons. But in the case of the army, they were not, as one would have expected, attached to the Royal Army Medical Corps, but were simply sent into the fighting line as officers and privates. The result has been the disorganization of the whole system of medical education and the certain creation of a very serious crisis in the immediate future.

In the case of our Catholic seminaries and novitiates, the war has had very little effect. There have been some losses of young men, who intended to begin their studies for the priesthood, but have gone into the army instead. There have been a few cases of young men who have left the novitiate of the religious orders, saying that they would return to them when the war was over. I know of three cases where these young soldiers have been killed in action. But happily there has been no serious diminution in the numbers of our clerical students. This is a matter for congratulation, because there is already a shortage in the available number of priests, due to the fact that several hundreds are on military service as chaplains. Happily the Government has acted towards us in a very generous way. When the new law introduced compulsory military service, it provided exemption for all ministers of religion, Catholic priests, the Anglican clergy, and the ministers of the various dissenting denominations. Clerical students in immediate preparation for orders were also exempted, and the Government gave a very wide extension to this exemption in the case of Catholics, placing in the exempt class, even novices of the religious orders, who of course had not as yet begun their immediate studies for the priesthood. It was at first feared that the exemption allowed by law would not be interpreted so as to cover this important class. In fact at one time it was feared that it might take away many of the students from the seminaries by being interpreted as applying only to those who had actually begun their theological studies. But these difficulties have been wholly obviated by the law's provisions.

In the Anglican Church and the dissenting denominations the losses of students for the ministry have been very heavy. Many of the Anglican bishops and a great number of the dissenting leaders, even if they took the view that clergymen should not enlist as combatants, expressed the opinion that students for the ministry ought to serve in the army. The result has been the actual closing down of a considerable number of clerical colleges, and a serious diminution of the numbers in attendance at the rest of them.

As to the third of the learned professions, there has been a great falling off in the entries of students in the law schools, but many people will perhaps think that this is no great loss, and that we can get along after the war with a smaller supply of lawyers.

New York's Business Buildings and Health

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

SOCIAL service has occupied itself so much with the poor that apparently it has forgotten a much larger field, the correction of various social abuses, some of which are due to ignorance. True social service has to do with the needs of the many, as well as with the necessities of the few, and the securing of proper living and working conditions for toilers generally, means much more socially than the relief of a family here and there. In the working environment, especially in cities, many improvements are needed which, by preventing illness, would ward off conditions that later make relief imperative. Some of these unsuitable conditions exist not only in factories and crowded industrial establishments but even in places usually considered sanitary. The New York Department of Health has recently illustrated this by a careful investigation of the hygienic conditions of the office buildings of our financial districts. The report shows clearly that amelioration might be made in the sanitation of these structures that would materially improve the health of probably the most crowded business population in the world.

The unsanitary state of these buildings affects both employers and employees, and it is evident that the existence of unsuitable surroundings is due to failure to realize what is needful, or oftener still to unfortunate faults in construction, or in the ventilation and lighting of large buildings. To secure remedies for these, the New York Department of Health instituted a series of investigations with a view to gathering definite facts regarding conditions under which office employees are obliged to work in the most crowded business section of the city. In order to make the report typical, a "survey" of a "trial" city block was taken whose make-up is characteristic of those found in the financial district. The block chosen contains a building of the oldest type, another of a slightly more modern type, a quite recent building, and a fourth provided with the most sanitary and up-to-date improvements. Some idea of the importance of the health problems involved in this single city block may be gathered from the fact that nearly 2,400 people are distributed through 928 rooms and that over 16,000 persons visit these rooms every day.

Practically all the employees in the block work eight hours or more daily. About sixty per cent of them are allowed less than one hour for lunch. High authorities do not consider healthful the practice of taking less than an hour's nooning. The Assistant Sanitary Superintendent of the Health Department points out that it would probably be to the advantage of employers to give employees at least one full hour for lunch. As a rule people work much better after such an interval and the last hour of the morning service is usually brightened by the thought that there is to be some time for recreation and exercise as well as for a hasty meal. In olden days a two hours' break was given at midday. In Shakespeare's time people went to the theater during this period, taking a good rest of two hours and a half, and in certain cities of Europe, twenty years ago, the banks closed at noon for several hours. Of course business began much earlier then and usually continued much later. It is probable, however, that at the present time less than an hour's relaxation at midday is unfortunate for both employer and employee.

One of the most important problems for health in modern city buildings is the question of lighting. Artificial light is used very generally in offices, even in those on the uppermost floors. Actually over eighty-five per cent of the employees in this trial block were using artificial light constantly. Of the remaining nearly fifteen per cent, few were so placed that they did not have to use some artificial lights and during the winter practically all of them were subjected for some hours every day to mixed or artificial light.

The Health Department investigators found that while a great deal of attention had been given in the more modern buildings to the installing of expensive electric fixtures, comparatively little attention had been paid to the physiological effects likely to result from electric light. Evidently no standard had been used in the determination of the quantity and quality of light.

Indirect light from the ceilings is practically never sufficient for office work, and so desk-lights are needed. The best results are obtained from these when placed about nineteen inches from the work and so situated as to shade the individual worker's eyes from direct rays. The desk bulb should be covered by a green vitreous shade with a light-colored reflecting lining.

In some offices entirely too much light was provided and in many instances, as a consequence of this, well-marked eye-strain, hypersensitiveness of the retina accompanied by nervous manifestations, were observed in the worker. Any physician who reads the report quoted, must feel that when a young woman complains of nervousness with tendencies to headache, or perhaps "nervous indigestion," it would be well to find out under what conditions she works and above all what the lighting conditions of her office are. In one case observed by the Board of Health a persistent headache disappeared completely, and never returned, when the intensity of the light which the patient was using was reduced by one half. This probably represented a definite saving to the employer for the bookkeeper was sure that owing to the change she had improved in efficiency approximately twenty per cent.

In some places metallic reflectors which the Board of Health considers "little less than criminal," were used. Conical reflectors which concentrate the rays on a small area of the working surface do not meet with the physiological requirements of our vision, because of the sudden variations in intensity of light on the retina. In a few places insufficient light was provided and the wearing of glasses could be traced to the resultant eye-strain. In some rooms where there was a small amount of natural light, the workers preferred to get along with this, placing themselves under the most trying conditions in order to avoid the use of artificial light. The subject then of lighting in office buildings, is of great importance for the preservation of the normal sight of the workers and their consequent efficiency.

The subject of ventilation in such buildings has in recent years been given much more attention than formerly, so that the report finds little fault in this matter. Only about one in six of the employees in this trial block works with less than the 300 cubic feet of individual space considered absolutely necessary for the health of one obliged to remain indoors practically throughout the whole year. Even this small proportion, however, represents 400 employees in a single block working without adequate air. But the ventilation throughout the block proved for other reasons to be unsatisfactory. The height of the buildings in the business district creates strong drafts both in air shafts and in streets. Because of this windows are not opened and it is common to find offices hermetically sealed, and inside openings such as transoms either do not exist or are not used.

As the result of this sealing-up of working quarters the air of the office buildings is the subject of special criticism. The average temperature of the buildings throughout the block was found to be from two to three degrees too high. This conclusion was reached taking seventy degrees Fahrenheit as a limitation, though for a great many people more than sixty-eight degrees Fahrenheit in a working room is likely to be uncomfortable after a few hours. It is in humidity, however, that office buildings are sadly lacking. An enormous reduction in the water vapor in the atmosphere takes place. As a consequence the air breathed is so dry as to affect mucous membranes unfavorably. When office workers leave buildings heated above seventy degrees they are exposed at once to a drop in the temperature of nearly fifty degrees even on days when the temperature is only a little below freezing. At the same time there is a change of some thirty degrees at least in humidity. This accounts for the frequent "colds and coughs," the throat and nasal catarrh and above all for the bronchial and "grippy conditions" which so readily become epidemic throughout the community.

The pulmonary mucous membrane subjected to the dry air of over-heated rooms, offers less resistance to all forms of microbes, for it depends on its moistness to carry off the particles which attack it. In recent years pneumonia has become more and more the typical disease of our civilization. It seems to have replaced tuberculosis, in De Foe's striking phrase, "as the captain of the men of death." During certain parts of the changeable seasons, scarcely a morning passes without the account in our newspapers of prominent men not yet beyond middle life, who have died of pneumonia. The reason for this prevalence of a disease formerly much less frequent and fatal, is undoubtedly the "respiratory" conditions in modern business life. The problems thus evoked by the Board of Health deserve careful consideration for the sake of employer and employee. Their solution would be comparatively simple, if good-will combined with sanitary knowledge to improve conditions.

Some Shavian Theology

DANIEL A. LORD S. J.

CRITICS of Mr. Shaw, even those of a friendly cast, have not failed to note a prevailing defect in his work. All the characters of his plays are simply heart and soul Shaw. They have no ideas that do not coincide with his preconceived or carefully elaborated views of life. They speak his thoughts with unvarying monotony. In fact, they do their best to live up to the prefaces.

So we are not surprised to find that after making Christ first a mere man, and second a mad man, he makes Him finally a Shavian man. Mr. Shaw discovers that Christ, for the first time perfectly understood, is fortunate enough to agree with him in every essential point. We live in a blessed day! Suppose we had died in the year 1915; we should have been ignorant of Christ's true doctrine. No, not altogether: had we studied Mr. Shaw all would have been well, for Mr. Shaw and Christ are in perfect agreement.

Mr. Shaw begins his discussion of Christ's doctrines by warning us that they are quite distinct from Christianity. "Christianity as a specific doctrine," he tells us, "was slain with Jesus, suddenly and utterly. He was hardly cold in his grave, or high in his heaven (as you please) before the Apostles dragged the tradition of him down to the level of the thing it has remained ever since." In two sentences, he disposes of the Apostolic College, the early Fathers, the Doctors and the Theologians of Christianity. Only Shaw could do so much with a little rhetoric.

Though he speaks further of the Apostles, his conclusion is all summed up in these sentences. Clearly the Apostles are a poor lot, men who worked their miracles in the "spirit of pure display and advertisement." Nor were their followers much better, for poor St. Stephen was merely a tactless, conceited bore.

St Paul fares badly, very badly at Mr. Shaw's hands. He tells us that on the road to Damascus a tremendous "idea" came to Saul, so monstrous that it struck him blind for days. Another miracle, by the way, is incontinently shunted into Mr. Shaw's rapidly filling waste-paper basket. Saul becomes Paul, but "the conversion of Paul was no conversion at all; it was Paul who converted the religion that had raised one man above sin and death into a religion that delivered millions of men so completely into their dominion that their own common nature became a horror to them, and the religious life became a denial of life." St. Paul has the extreme misfortune of disagreeing with Mr. Shaw on a number of very fundamental points; he could hardly expect better treatment.

St. Peter meets with even less consideration. "When Jesus called Peter from his boat, he spoiled an honest fisherman and made nothing better out of the wreck than a salvation monger." It is interesting to note that Mr. Shaw regards St. Peter as the founder of the Catholic Church. Evidently he does not consider that anything to be proud of.

Mr. Shaw assures us that he is taking Christ's doctrines from His own lips; but throughout his study he commits an historian's greatest fault: he suppresses all the important facts and statements that tell against him. If anything is clear in the Gospels it is that Christ selected a definite set of men who were to be the nucleus of His Church. Mr. Shaw simply ignores that fact as irrelevant. Christ insisted again and again on the necessity of Baptism., Mr. Shaw falsely imputes the institution of Baptism as a Christian rite to a perversion of Christ's doctrines by the Apostles. Christ insisted again and again on the Holy Eucharist. Mr. Shaw passes that off with a reference to John Barleycorn.

In his hands, Christian doctrine becomes truly absurd. Repentance is an experience so thrillingly sweet that the "saved" thief is "tempted to steal again to repeat the glorious sensation." Grace is merely "a premium put on sin," and all personal responsibility is thrown aside in putting one's sins on Christ. That may be Luther's doctrine; it is not Peter's, nor Paul's, nor James's, the Saint of good works.

Mr. Shaw sweeps aside as quite without importance the necessity of belief in Christ, the doctrine of eternal reward and eternal punishment, grace and the Sacraments, the Church and her power to preach and teach. The fact that Jesus emphasized them does not weigh heavily with him. He has a definite thesis to prove: Christ agreed perfectly with me. If most of the doctrines taught by Christ cannot possibly be twisted into agreement with Mr. Shaw's views, there is only one thing to do, rigorously apply the blue pencil. By this time, his supply of blue pencils must be very low.

All the essential doctrines of Christ he reduces to four: 1, The kingdom of God is within you. That is merely another way of saying that since God is your father, and you and the father are one, you are really gods. 2, You cannot serve God and mammon. Consequently get rid of property by throwing it into the common stock. Communism is inevitable for a follower of Christ. 3, Judge not and you shall not be judged. Hence get rid once and for all of judges and punishments and revenge. 4, In the kingdom of heaven there is no marriage or giving in marriage. Get rid, then, of all family entanglements.

Never, perhaps, since the days of the Reformation's worst insanities has a Scripture text performed such gymnastics to suit the whims of its interpreter. It is possible to reply to all four points by stating that any man reading them with an open mind would know that Christ never for a moment spoke a single quoted text in the Shavian case . But it is interesting to take them singly.

Mr. Shaw's pet theory is the theory of the "life force." We are all and each entrusted with this spark of life which we pass down from generation to generation intact. The spark of life is really godlike in its immortality. The father gives his spark of life to his son, and he to his son; in this way fathers and son are in essence identical. And thus Christ taught, as Mr. Shaw triumphantly proves when he quotes the text: "I and the Father are one." If Mr. Shaw expects us to take that exquisite bit of exegesis seriously, especially from a man of his known wit, he has not reckoned with human nature's sense of humor.

Mr. Shaw's ardent Socialism makes him willing to find even in Christ an ally. Mr. Shaw's Socialism, unfortunately for himself, he has clearly expressed as a State wherein there is to be public ownership of lands, public control of industries, an absolutely equal distribution of income, and all enacted by law. Mr. Shaw would not call a religious community in which all freely give up their possessions to be drawn on for the common good a socialistic State at all.

Consequently, his statement that Christ preached Communism or Shavian Socialism, can simply be met with a flat denial. "We cannot serve God and mammon" does not for a moment mean that we must in consequence have State ownership of land. Christ urged constantly and insistently detachment from riches and contentment with one's lot; but it takes a perfectly normal brain like that of Mr. Shaw to see where these assertions could possibly mean equal State-regulated income for all. In fact, when the rich young man came to Jesus, He required for salvation only one thing: "Keep the Commandments." For perfection, He added the counsel to give what he had to the poor and follow Him. One may give all he has to the poor without accepting a single socialistic tenet. Christ condemned Dives for cupidity; the Pharisees for extortion; but He never once condemned private property or advocated public ownership. Socialism and the poverty of Christ have not one single point in common.

Modern courts and their judges are all wrong; punishments and prisons are simply crimes saddled on our generation by ages blind to justice. And Christ's words: "Judge not and you shall not be judged," prove conclusively that He was with Mr. Shaw in His desire to wipe out our judiciary. Certainly it is possible to learn much from Mr. Shaw's handling of texts. No doubt he could prove that Christ was opposed to marriage from the famous text in which He much approves an eye that is single. What chemical facts concerning the physical organization of our bodies do you suppose he could prove from the text: "Ye are the salt of the earth?"

The words are, as is perfectly obvious, a direction for private individuals. Christ never disputed the power of a single court of law: He advised obedience to the power of Caesar; paid tribute money to support the courts of the State; and when He stood before Pilate He did not answer Pilate's assertion of his power to kill or release Him by denying the Roman Governor's power. He merely insisted that whatever power he had came from God.

Mr. Shaw, as he has often declared, does not believe in marriage. That, even in our broad-minded and loose-moraled day, is still a delicate proposition to defend, and though he dares not say that Christ was with him in his advocacy of promiscuous intercourse, he likes to offer his solution as the one possible means of attaining to Christ's ideal of an undivided heart. Christ certainly declared that there was no marriage in heaven; but on earth He proclaimed marriage as an institution so indissoluble that no human power could break it. He advocated celibacy for His chosen disciples as the more perfect life; yet He honored a wedding feast with His company. When celibacy and indissoluble wedlock become identical with promiscuous mating, Mr. Shaw can claim Christ as his supporter on the marriage question. But not before.

If my reader feels that I have wasted his good time drawing him through the tortuous maze of Mr. Shaw's presuppositions, mistakes and distortions, misreadings and stale fallacies, I can only plead as my excuse the wide distribution of Mr. Shaw's writings. Hitherto, he has given no connected view of Christianity. An occasional sneer, a contemptuous slap, two plays that are based on its supposed futility, were not enough to keep a Protestant minister, writing in a prominent magazine, from speaking of Mr. Shaw as a valuable contributor to the welfare of religion. Henceforth, no one can be a Christian and say that.

The issue is now clear. If one holds Christ to be God, he cannot think with Mr. Shaw who considers Him a man and mad. For his Christianity the student has two clear alternatives: Shavian Christianity which Christ never for a moment preached any more than He preached Shintoism, or the Christianity which was founded on Christ's teaching which Mr. Shaw distorts, caught up and cherished by the Apostles whom Mr. Shaw despises, hallowed with the blood of the martyrs whom Mr. Shaw has ridiculed and parodied, which has bred thousands of men and maidens to a celibacy which Mr. Shaw calls "a worse failure than marriage," and sweetened the life and the death of millions of Christians with a touch of the Cross which Mr. Shaw thinks a superstition and a folly. And by way of anticlimax, it is to be hoped that, if "Androcles and the Lion" should survive a summer in storage, its reappearance on the American stage will be greeted not with laughter and applause but with the hearty derision which it deserves.

The Young Man and Sanitary Engineering

EMILE PERROT

SANITARY engineering is the branch of civil engineering which relates to structures and operations for promoting and guarding the health of communities. It deals with the means of providing cities and towns with pure and wholesome water, with the means for the removal of rain water and spent water called sewage, with the means of removing by cartage various waste products and refuse, such as garbage, ashes and street sweepings. Finally it also deals with ventilation. In other words sanitary engineering has to do with the design and construction of all works contributing to public health and comfort, and concerns the means of preventing offensive conditions which are apt to arise in populous communities.

In recent years the relation of public health to this phase of engineering has called for an increased knowledge of vital statistics, and of chemistry and biology as applied to its special branches. It is not necessary for the sanitary engineer to be a trained analyst, or accomplished in the details of State medicine, but he should be in touch with the general progress in these subjects if his work is to be on the highest plane of excellence. The course of study the young man must pursue, in order to fit himself for this profession follows closely that outlined for the civil engineer, with special attention given to the sciences of physics, chemistry and biology.

Of the first importance to a community is its water supply; hence the manner in which this can be obtained forms the paramount consideration of the sanitary engineer. Before the development and general acceptance, about 1880, of the germ theory of disease, comparatively little attention was given to the sanitary character of water supplies. Although the danger of sewage pollution was then recognized by some, its full significance was not appreciated, especially in the case of watersheds near which was a rural population. In recent years there has been a marked awakening to the needs of pure water supplies as is shown by the consideration given this subject by a majority of the larger cities and by the practical results achieved. Compared with the European water supplies, there is yet wide room for improvement in this country, as our prevailing standards are much below those established in northwestern Europe, where, in some countries, no surface water is used as a public supply without first being filtered in a satisfactory manner. As to the so-called mountain streams, the rapid increase in population in this country makes it, each year, more and more difficult to obtain comparatively pure municipal water supplies from such watersheds. In the case of small cities and towns this can still be done in some instances, but usually it necessitates the purchase of many properties situated on the watercourse, and a systematic patrolling of portions of the remaining area, in order to guard constantly against pollution.

A ground water supply, where the conditions are favorable, yields as good a water from a sanitary standpoint as can be obtained. This results of course from the efficient filtration which takes place under the conditions of nature, as the rainfall percolates through the earth and reaches the underground natural reservoirs from which it is drawn. With varying conditions in the geological formation, these underground supplies naturally present marked differences in the quality of the water obtained therefrom. In some instances the ground water is very highly charged with lime and magnesia, thus making it too hard for acceptable use, especially by those who employ it for steam-raising purposes. Under these circumstances the sanitary engineer has sometimes to consider the chemical aspect of the problem and to recommend plans for the softening of the water.

Water derived from rivers flowing near cities and towns forms one of the principal sources of supply in America. In early years raw river water supplies were fairly satisfactory from a hygienic standpoint. But with the rapidly increasing population, river pollution has become so great that now it is rare for a town or city of any size to obtain a safe supply from river water when taken in its raw condition. Hence, filtration works for municipal water supplies are multiplying every year, and eventually will include every important surface water supply in America.

The next branch of municipal works to which the sanitary engineer must give attention is the sewerage system; this has for its purpose the collection and removal of the foul waters of a community. The term "sewerage" is applied to the system of collecting pipes and underground channels. It begins in the houses at the various receptacles where water is used for cleansing purposes, extends through the streets and ends at one or more places where this dirty water, which we call sewage, is finally discharged. It is one of the tasks of the sanitary engineer to cause sewage to be discharged both quickly and completely, so as not to permit matter to be retained in the sewers. To this end it is necessary that the pipes be given a grade, or pitch, which will cause the sewage to flow with its suspended matter swiftly and uninterruptedly, from the starting point at the house to the place of final disposal.

The first method of purification for the disposal of sewage was that of irrigation, that is, the application of sewage to land to facilitate the raising of crops. In Paris, Berlin, and in some parts of England, this is still done with considerable advantage, although in no instance does the income received from the sewage farms equal the capital charges upon their purchase and adaptation for irrigation purposes.

There are two aspects to the problems of sewage disposal. One deals with the conditions that obtain when it becomes necessary to purify the sewage in order to protect the body of water into which it is discharged. The other relates to the prevention of bad odors arising from polluted water. The prevailing method of sewage disposal in America is by dilution in the most convenient water course. As a rule seaboard cities find this method satisfactory, particularly if the sewage is first carefully screened, so as to free it from those particles which would float and be unsightly. Some inland cities can also dispose of their sewage in this manner but in other communities more or less trouble results at times of low stream-flow, and these troubles are bound to increase as the cities grow in size. Many inland communities are gradually tending towards the ultimate adoption of some form of purification works, but generally the expense is so great that progress is slow, and may be accelerated only by the action of the courts.

A few years ago much was heard by sanitary engineers of this country about the merits of the so-called septic process and of contact beds made of coke or broken stone, matters which have been much studied in England since 1895. These methods are intimately associated with biological processes by which the bacteria convert putrescible organic matter into harmless and stable mineral matter. While these processes are not so effective or economical as was at first thought, they have much merit and are worthy of careful consideration, especially in those sections of this country where engineers find no porous land nearby. The disposal of trade wastes is becoming an important factor in some of the industrial centers, and this problem is one which in future years is bound to be brought more and more to the attention of the sanitary engineer.

Several of our States, through their boards of health, have a general supervision of questions of water supply and sewerage, so far as the sanitary aspects of new or additional works are concerned. This has been helpful and eventually will probably be extended to practically all of our States. The rules, regulations, etc., of the State sanitary authorities on these matters are a feature of the subject which the sanitary engineer has to cover; so too, are the decisions of courts where these form a precedent relative to the sanitary problem under consideration.

Another branch of municipal works to which the attention of the sanitary engineer is beginning to be drawn is the cleaning of streets and the disposal of garbage and other municipal wastes which cannot be removed by water carriage in underground channels. They include ashes, street sweepings, dry rubbish, and kitchen garbage, all of which require collection by special cartage. In small communities the disposal of this refuse is not very difficult or expensive, but in the larger cities it is frequently a perplexing and expensive undertaking. It is also a very important sanitary matter, as disease, bad odors, and general discomfort result from improper and ineffective attention to such affairs.

Speaking generally, sanitary engineering in America, since 1875, has justified itself by furnishing cities and towns with good water supplies and with efficient sewers and drainage. Improvements in this line began at a later date here than abroad, and in many ways the Europeans are still in advance of us in carrying out the well-established principles of this branch of engineering, although the contributions and experiences of Americans have added much to our general knowledge, of the subject. In no field of civil engineering does there appear a more promising opening for study and practical activity than in that of sanitary engineering.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Bandelier's Catholicism.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The statement that Adolph F. Bandelier, the historian and archeologist, was a devout Catholic has been called into question in a letter from one of your correspondents in the issue of AMERICA for August 5, 1916. The same statement was made on good authority in the July, 1916, issue of the Catholic Historical Review, and in the interests of truth as well as to protect Mrs. Bandelier, I asked her to send me the facts. In her letter dated New York, October 26, 1916, she says:

> You are perfectly right; my husband was a very true and sincere Catholic, although he embraced the Catholic Faith only in the year 1881, at Cholula, Mexico. His godfather was Señor Don Joaquin Garcia Icazbalceta. . . . He died in Sevilla, Spain, on March 18, 1914, and is buried in the Catholic cemetery there. His death is duly recorded in the books of the parish in the jurisdiction in which we lived and where I continued living until I left Spain. The anniversary Mass has been celebrated there also.

It may be that this information has already reached you; but, if not, it is only fair to his memory to give it to the public.

Washington. PETER GUILDAY.

Faith in Names

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Evidently E. S. Chester, who contributed a thoughtful article to AMERICA in one of its recent issues has great faith in names. They are, it would appear, things to conjure with. "Cooperation and arbitration would be immeasurably advanced by a more general use of the terms employer and employee instead of labor and capital." This remark might perhaps pass muster at ordinary times, but just at present we have before our eyes in New York a spectacle that prevents us from regarding the suggestion with favor. The leaders of the traction interests invariably speak of "our employees." The remedy suggested by E. S. Chester for industrial disputes will not do. It smacks too much of "prunes and prisms."

New York. WILLIAM A. I. CLARKE.

Catholic vs. Secular Novelists

To the Editor of AMERICA:

An article in your issue of October 28, on "The Catholic vs. the Secular Novelist," by Edward F. Mohler, A.B., certainly merits wide reading. The writer exposes in an attractive manner the prevalent materialism of modern novels; although there are doubtless many who will disagree with the essayist relative to the temperate tone of his expression, because, certainly, there is need of a pen which will write in burning characters a true estimate of the modern literary filth displayed in our popular literary cellars. The bookmen substitute an "s" for the "c," because the crowd has money, and business looks to the pockets and not to the souls of men.

The article of Mr. Mohler should make its appeal to at least two classes among your readers. Teachers of English in Catholic "Prep." schools and Catholic colleges should take up with their classes the study of this essay. The seven paragraphs should be considered, seriatim, one each week, and a study, descriptive and critical, on each paragraph, should be exacted of each student, with the purpose of showing the excellence and significance of the comparative study made by Mr. Mohler. Every business man should read it. He will find in it fruitful suggestions to apply to the field of business literature, which reeks with materialism. Catholic ethics gets a daily hard battle from the stuff that is offered to Catholic men and women in commercial pursuits. If a reading of the article in question will move just a few minds in the right direction, the power of example may call into action that large army of trained Catholic intellects, which are well acquainted with sound doctrine on social, economic, and commercial questions, but unfortunately are leaving, practically uncontested, a battlefield on which are being decided matters of very grave importance. Talent, Time, Timidity—a senseless combination.

Dorchester, Mass. JAMES D. RUSSELL.

Longevity in Holland

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Sanger, Robinson and Blossom contingent bolster up their propaganda by referring to Holland and the clinics on birth-control, that have flourished there with the consent of the Government since 1881. To quote: "The average birth-rate in the three principal cities of Holland was 33.7 per cent per thousand in 1881, when the birth-control clinics were started. In 1912 it had fallen to 25.3 per cent per thousand. The general death-rate, however, had dropped during the same period from 22.2 to 11.1 per thousand." "The lower the birth-rate, the longer we live," says the Secretary of the English Malthusian League.

Although it be assumed that the death-rate has fallen during this period (1881-1912) the fact cannot of course be attributed to the birth-control clinics, even though it be true that they are operated in Holland. Our own death-rate has fallen, not as a result of dissemination of reprehensible information, but, as every one knows, from the advance of medical and surgical science, from the betterment of environment and conditions of employment, and for other reasons. An article written by some one in Holland, giving detailed facts as to what has been done in that country during the past twenty-five years to increase the longevity of the people would be very welcome.

Boston. DAVID GOLDSTEIN.

What Becomes of Them All?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The interesting question raised by Hilaire Belloc recalls to my mind the words of Professor Owen, the eminent oil expert and geologist. We were traveling in and about the Santa Clara valley, and came upon the little burying ground, just outside Los Gatos, where interments are made in the earth. We began to discuss the question as to where it would be best to be buried, in order to arrest the decay of time. Professor Owen pointed to the chain of mountains back of the Novitiate of the Sacred Heart and said, "There is where I would like to be buried. Drive in a tunnel some fifty feet, encase the body in cement and seal the opening with concrete, and let it remain there undisturbed until the last day." It would seem that nature would prove a good care-taker of the bones and ashes of one thus securely preserved. But Professor Owen went on to remark,

> Of what use to try to defeat the laws of nature, for although the rocky depths of the mountains offer what might seem to be an everlasting resting place for man, the forces of an earthquake would crack any cement block, and water would complete the decay that mother earth so kindly furnishes to mankind. I have studied the structure of the earth, and I know its laws. There is no place on the earth, or within the earth, for man to find security for his bones. He comes and he goes.

Does this answer Mr. Belloc's question?

Los Gatos, Cal. SILAS WENTWORTH.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

"Judicious Control"

"THE larger the families of the poor," said Dr. Knopf at the recent convention of the American Public Health Association, "the more child labor is there, and the more disruption in families. Judicious birth-control is not race suicide, but race preservation."

Child labor is undeniably a serious evil. But if there were no children, there could be no child labor. Moreover, so long as children exist, the danger of child labor will exist, for child labor connotes children, just as sunlight connotes the sun. Dr. Knopf's remedy of "judicious control" is, therefore, a weak half-measure, worthy only of a quack. The surest way, the one way, to eliminate child labor is to eliminate the child.

It is not so easy to follow Dr. Knopf's assertion that children are a cause of disrupted families. The evidence sets the other way. "Families of two" have been known to break, precisely because outraged nature at last withheld the gift of children, or because their continued working in sickening iniquity had made mutual respect an impossibility. But accepting Dr. Knopf's statement at its face-value, a remedy is easily found. Eliminate the child. The process will also eliminate the law of nature, parents, and by degrees, the human race itself. Then only, will a barren world know absolute freedom from the very possibility of child labor, disrupted families, and similar evils. It will be the freedom of the dead from sin, sorrow and oppression.

But none can afford to pay the price of such freedom. Every act commended by Dr. Knopf as "judicious" is a perversion of nature. That is why, independently of all revelation and of every human statute made to save the community from a degradation worse than bestial, "control" in Dr. Knopf's sense, is absolutely forbidden. Argument, economic, esthetic, purely selfish, or drawn from whatever other source, is futile. No man can authorize it, no circumstance excuse it; for not even God, the Infinite Creator and Supreme Governor of the universe, can make it other than it is, an evil in itself, a thing foul beyond all telling.

How to Support Our Missions

THE Commission of Finance of the Methodist Episcopal Church has issued a document which is of special interest to Catholics at the present moment. According to the estimate drawn up by this body the annual minimum sum required for carrying on the missionary activities of their church is $1,800,000 for their foreign missions and $1,650,000 for their home missions. This sum is regarded as barely sufficient for the purpose, and a request for still larger funds is made to enable the workers to avail themselves of the exceptional opportunities offered at this favorable time. The Commission therefore earnestly recommends that further contributions to the amount of $455,000 for the foreign and $335,000 for the domestic missions be made by the church members. A minimum of $270,000 is moreover allowed for the Freedmen's Aid, or negro mission work, with a recommendation for an additional $50,000. Other large items are mentioned in the budget, with which we are not concerned here.

Calculating upon the same basis the contributions which might be expected from American Catholics for their foreign missions alone, we find that the proportional minimum would not be less than between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000. To enable the Church properly to avail herself of the present opportunities on an equal basis with that recommended by the Methodists an additional $2,000,000 should be earnestly requested. The total amount which Catholics might thus be expected to contribute to their foreign-mission work would closely approximate $10,000,000. Large as this sum may seem, it is proportionately a very sober estimate, particularly if we remember that it is only about one half the sum actually contributed in a single year by the Protestants of the United States and Canada, for their foreign missions.

In contrast with this we have asked our missionaries to accomplish the impossible by supplying them, in the same year, with a bare $750,000. The consequence is that native catechists cannot be paid, and therefore can no longer continue to devote their energies to the mission cause, since they, too, must have wherewithal to live. Schools must be closed or the number of Catholic pupils limited. Superiors of orphanages must refuse to accept children brought to them, lest those already in their charge should be exposed to starvation. Missions must be abandoned and new foundations cannot be undertaken. The situation has become acute.

What can be done? A practical solution is given us by the Methodists. It recommends itself by its perfect, business-like methods of procedure. Careful calculations should in the first place be made of the amount of money that is absolutely required from American Catholics in order to sustain our mission enterprises. This would be the work of a representative commission. The next step is that, as in the case of all the Protestant denominations, great insistence be placed upon the duty of every parish to contribute its adequate share. An accurate per capita computation can be made, and pastors can see to it that their parishioners will not fall behind the expectations entertained of them by the Church in the work of her apostolate. As among Protestants, contributions could be collected by any recognized mission agency. Each pastor would be in touch with the various missionary societies introduced into his parish and means could readily be devised to ascertain the general results. Donations to special missionary agencies as well as to the great central societies could be strongly encouraged.

The contributions expected from each individual would not be excessive and would gladly be offered by the average Catholic if the existing need and the missionary societies to which he could contribute were brought directly to his notice. Since, however, all would not respond generously, greater liberality should be recommended, particularly to wealthier parishes or parishioners. The fact must be definitely impressed upon the minds of American Catholics that they individually and their parishes must bear the burden of the world missions of the Church at the present moment. Sacrifices made for this purpose will be repaid a hundredfold.

Democracy and Morality

AS these words are going to press, millions of voters, the soldiers of American democracy, with the ballot as their only weapon, are selecting the chief who will guide the destinies of the Republic for the next four years. No spectacle could be more impressive than the ordered march of these multitudes of different races, creeds, social rank and condition, converging to the polls, there to settle this vital problem for their country's welfare. There is no other fact in our American life of which we are so justly proud. As long as our citizens fulfil this paramount duty fearlessly, with a high sense of justice, fair play and the responsibilities thrust upon them, the foundations of our democratic government are safe: they will withstand the storms and shocks which sooner or later attack the fairest works of the genius of man.

All forms of legitimate government are good, all are subject to certain weaknesses and defects. Monarchy often leads to absolutism and tyranny: the rule of an aristocracy engenders class pride and caste legislation. Democracy, that form of government so justly dear to every American, is no exception. And if attention is called to its shortcomings, it is not because we distrust it, but because we wish to see them overcome, so that in our country, where it has been tried and so far, thank God, not found wanting, it may endure to the end. If it fails here, where will it succeed?

More than any other form of government, a democracy needs good citizens. The citizen is the life and soul of democracy. He bears its fate on his shoulders: he settles its destinies with his vote or a stroke of his pen. By him laws are made and unmade, lawgivers and presidents lifted to the seats of the mighty or thrust aside. At his bidding the sword is drawn and put up again. His sense then of responsibility must be keenly developed: his morality must be of a high order. It will reach that high standard when ennobled by the principles of religion. In a government truly popular, a government through the people, by the people, for the people, this religious spirit, as Leo XIII once said, is absolutely necessary. In other forms, the rulers and individual leaders may cause the overthrow of the State by their crimes; if a democracy fails, it is the people themselves who destroy it. Following the thought of the same great Pontiff, it may be said that there are two causes which directly work for the overthrow of popular government. One is the set of false principles variously labeled radical Socialism, anarchism, atheism, which, subversive of the very idea of authority, restraint, subjection to law and order, wrench from their foundations the corner-stones of society. By an abuse of the liberty which forms the noblest privilege of the democratic state, these principles are spread broadcast, yet no State can long endure in vigor and national honor, if they be not offset by nobler ideals and doctrines.

The other cause of democracy's failure is a debased, servile, venal citizenship, corrupted by the arts of the politician for his own selfish ends, obeying no law but that of personal advancement and greed, afraid to smite with its verdict the criminal or to give its approval to the virtuous. When these two causes conspire on a large scale and infect the people, the temple of democracy is shaken to its foundations and must soon totter to its fall. They have not as yet entirely perverted the citizens of this great Republic. But they are slowly and treachously at work. Every true patriot must earnestly endeavor to destroy the deadly seeds.

"The American Language"

IN a paper contributed by Professor Gilbert Murray to a recent "American number" of the Manchester Guardian, he speaks of certain "perilous little differences" between Americans and Englishmen, not the least of which are our "peculiarities" of language and diction. He writes:

> When I heard one friend of mine take up a biscuit and say gravely, "This is a very attractive cracker," I felt as if he had been witty. Similarly when I heard a guileless Western girl on her travels say it was such a pity that Momma couldn't come; "I guess some of them old cities would have tickled Momma most to death," I loved her for saying it. But, of course, under slightly different conditions I should have hated her. The slight difference—the word, the accent, the intonation, the social habit—attracts notice and produces an acute impression where no such impression was intended.

Even before Dickens's "Martin Chuzzlewit" found such American expressions as "hail from," "realized the stakes" and "slicked up pretty smart" so diverting, English visitors had been highly amused at our "oddities" of speech. But it is only of late years that we have had the courage to laugh at the "peculiarities" of the British language. "I have been listening with keen enjoyment to your friend 'guessing,'" remarked an Englishman to his wide-awake American visitor. "Indeed," was the prompt reply. "And I've been equally well entertained at the way all your countrymen keep 'expecting.'" Such railroad terms as "goods-train," "shunt," "booking-office," "guard" and "luggage" and such expressions as "buying coals," "taking in the Times," "directly I came," "jolly well," "going white," "my word!" etc., at first puzzle and then amuse the American readers of English novels. On the other hand, English purists have made up interminable lists of Americanisms that no true-born Briton should ever be guilty of using without quotation marks.

Nevertheless many of our most expressive American phrases, such words, for instance, as "bluff," "graft," and "up against," are now used without quotation marks by British writers of the highest class. Indeed the remarkably picturesque character of American slang has frequently won the admiration of English authors. The most recent encomium it has received is from the pen of that genial essayist, Mr. E. V. Lucas, who in his volume "Cloud and Silver" makes a comparison, illustrated by examples, between English slang and American, and then gives the palm ungrudgingly to the latter. He writes:

> The trouble with English slang is that it is seldom descriptive, seldom paints pictures, seldom contains an idea. Probably no word signifying excellence has been so much used as "ripping," but how does it come to mean that? . . . American slang is interesting because it applies and illustrates. One recognizes its meaning in a flash of light. . . . American slang very often is poetry, or an admirable substitute for it. It illuminates, synthesizes. In England we should fumble for hours to find a swift description of Sir Oliver Lodge; an American looks at him and says "high-brow," and it is done. . . . When an American is asked a question for which he has no answer, and he says, "Search me," he is emphasizing in a striking and humorous way his total lack of information on that point. When he calls a very strong whisky "tangle-foot," he indicates its peculiar properties in unmistakable fashion in the briefest possible terms.

Mr. Lucas could, of course, have extended his list indefinitely by citing picturesque Americanisms like "thank-you-ma'am," "skyscraper," "pipe-dream," "gerrymander," "strap-hanger," etc., to say nothing of the many striking and widely used metaphors borrowed from the ball-field and the poker-table. "Lift," "motor-car," "typist," and "to wire" (telegraph) are Britishisms, however, that for time-saving or etymological reasons are better than their American equivalents. But Professor Murray and other English visitors should not take it hard if Americans prefer "candy" to "sweets," "editorials" to "leaders," "pitchers" to "jugs," "drug stores" to "chemists' shops," "spools of thread" to "reels of cotton," "canned" fruit to "tinned," "mail-carriers" to "postmen," and "parlor-cars" to "saloon-carriages." For our tenacious preference for Americanisms like the foregoing is doubtless of no little help in keeping us neutral during the present war.

The Child Pays

LAST week the Supreme Court of New York, speaking through Justice Pendleton, gave its official permission to a divorced man to contract a second marriage. The court's sanction was necessary, because the man in question had been an unsuccessful defendant in an action brought against him on statutory grounds. But the interesting circumstance in the case is the fact that the permission was granted at the request of the wife. The husband was sighing for second nuptials, and, of the two women concerned, the former wife was at least complaisant, and the prospective wife somewhat more than willing, so the Justice acquiesced in the petition, and the story bids fair to have the accustomed ending of the fairy tale; that is to say, for the principals. But what was to be done with the little child of the marriage? Even with this difficulty, the learned Judge was able to deal to the satisfaction of all concerned.

The daughter is to be educated at the father's expense in Germany, where there is little danger that she will disturb any one's connubial felicity. This is bad enough. To be exiled from her native land is a hardship; to grow up without the benign and sanctifying influence of parental love, to be deprived of the affection of father and mother, which is every child's inalienable right and imperative need, is an inexcusable privation; but this is not all. The climax of injustice is to be reached when the little girl attains the age of fifteen. For she must then pass an unnatural sentence on her parents and elect either one or the other of them for her custodian.

If an indictment of the iniquity of the whole system were needed, it is to be had in this decision. It is the old story of the kings raging and the people paying the price. The guilty parent goes singing and dancing through life, and the innocent daughter bears the consequence.

If only the unfortunate child could spend six months with her father and six with her mother, if she could have the poor solace of going from one pair of clinging arms to another, things would still be sadly awry; but she would still be able to satisfy her hungry little heart with affection, divided and hostile though it were. But now she must go off to a foreign land, and sit at an alien board, and taste the bitterness of hired care, and never have a week-end or a vacation with those she loves, and never know how sweet it is to be taken on a father's knee or to nestle close to a mother's heart. Even the possibility of reconciliation between her parents has been taken from her; for her own mother has bidden her father take another wife, and the Justice has ordained that the child shall never enjoy a real home. The father, forsooth, needs comforting; the mother is accommodating; the fiancée is forgiving and indulgent; and the Judge is just. But what of the child?

Mexican Truth and American Falsehood

LAST week Atlantic City was a most interesting place: the sea was roaring, so too were the Mexican commissioners, representatives of a noble Government dedicated to truth, mercy, justice and humanity. The high idealism of these swarthy gentlemen had received a severe shock. For nine or ten long weeks they had been striving to school three perverse Americans, one of them an ardent evangelist, in honesty. But the task was too great, and outraged Mexican virtue registered this noble protest: "We are sick of American promises, disgusted with American insincerity, tired of American lies."

And the sessions of the Joint Commission were suspended till after Election Day, to give opportunity for diplomatic denials, no doubt.

However, Cabrera and his wily confrères had already "seized a psychological moment" to tell the great truth that not only has Carranza never persecuted the Catholic Church, but has even acted as nursing mother to it, restoring over ninety-five per cent of the clergy to their charges. American "insincerity" is abashed at such magnanimity. But the facts? Ah, that is another question. The facts are absolutely at variance with the statement of the Mexicans. True, those who made it are honorable gentlemen; honor drips from their finger-tips, in a pinch, but somehow or other their standards are not our standards. As a consequence, Mexican words square with figments only. Carranza was, is and will be a bitter relentless persecutor of religion. Even since his recognition by the United States he has baited priests, expelled Sisters, closed churches and enacted decrees that cramp liberty of worship. Ninety-five per cent of the priests back in their churches! The "ninety" is a slip of the tongue. Whole sections of the country are without ministers of religion. In Yucatan, Merida excepted, they are as rare as "white blackbirds." So, too, are they in Sonora and in many another section. Not long ago a priest who had the temerity to slip across the border to administer the Sacraments was flung into prison. Carranza was restoring him to his church: the intention was good, the way of effecting it was peculiar. What about the Mexican Bishops, where are they? Breaking the bitter bread of anxiety and poverty in exile, almost to a man. Less than a year ago one of them asked permission to return to his flock. The First Chief who lies awake at night excogitating ways and means of restoring bishops to their sees and priests to their churches, sent this impudent refusal:

PRIMER JEFE.

Manifiesto a usted en contestacion a su escrito fechado el 20 de noviembre anterior, en que solicita un salvo conducto para poder volver al país, que no es posible acordar de conformidad su petición por ahora, pues todos los emigrados políticos no podrán volver a la República sino hasta que sea expedida una ley general de amnistia, y siempre que se encuentren comprendidos en ella.

CONSTITUCION Y REFORMAS.

Cuartel GraL. en Saltillo, Coah. a 21 de diciembre 1915

El Primer Jefe del E.C.Encargado del Poder Ejecutivo de la Nacion

/ Carranza

Al C. Presbítero José M. Echavarría,
Brackeuridge Villa Alamo Heights,
San Antonio, Tex.

What, too, about the official document addressed, on February 24, 1916, "to the citizens of the free and sovereign State of Hidalgo?" Note its liberality:

(1) The following articles and usages are strictly prohibited in the churches:

(B) As a prophylactic or preventive sanitary measure—the use of pews and any other permanent seats, as well as so-called holy-water fonts. (C) In behalf of morality, both public and private, the establishment and use of confessionals.

(4) Funeral Masses and responses (sic) shall not be held in the church, nor shall said responses be recited in the cemetery.

(6) Priests and all other persons are strictly prohibited from collecting and receiving donations or offerings for the churches and for the celebration of religious services.

(9) Priests shall not have their dwellings or habitations in the buildings or houses adjoining the churches.

(11) Article 2. Private schools, that is, those not supported by the public treasury of the State, shall be lay schools and separated from the church. Therefore seminaries for the education of students for the priesthood are hereby prohibited.

This odious decree was supplemented by a vicious editorial in El Pueblo for July 21, 1916, which declared that similar documents would be issued in Jalisco, Puebla, Queretaro, San Luis Potosi, etc., because forsooth: "Wherever the Catholic priests are dominant, consciences are enslaved by dogma, and bodies by the tyrants with whom priests are always in league." And has Mr. Cabrera forgotten that priests were murdered not long since by Constitutionalists, "for harboring Zapatistas"? Does he not know that last May thirty gentle Sisters arrived in New York on the Reina Maria Cristina, driven from Mexico, by Carranza? Mr. Cabrera has heard all these facts, he knows them, he has not forgotten them nor any other of the numerous villainous deeds perpetrated by the First Chief, but apparently he thinks that the American section of the Joint Commission and the American nation are one. Who lied? The Americans, of course.

Literature

THE ART OF PAUL CLAUDEL

TWO books recently published by the Yale University Press introduce to American readers, in English, the work of Paul Claudel, one of the most extraordinary and powerful literary artists of modern France. Like Brunetière, Huysmans, Bourget and many another first-class writer, Claudel is a convert to the Catholic Faith. He made his submission, like the others, before the war. It is now known that preceding the war there was a most powerful stirring of the spirit of religion in France. The invisible tide of faith, spreading and rising higher and higher, undermining the solid-seeming but in reality feeble barriers of indifferentism and materialism, inundated the proud souls of many men who had stood aloof from religion, isolated by their pride of intellect, and hallucinated by the spiritual morphine of false science, which is a subtle drug that creates the most amazing and deceptive type of illusions.

Claudel for twenty years worked at his art in an almost complete obscurity. I draw my information from an article by Pierre Chavannes, reprinted as a preface to Claudel's book of sketches, "The East I Know." He was known only to a handful of fellow-artists, men who shared with him his passion for experimenting in new forms, and who, like himself, were restless under the impulsion of the psychic movement of new ideas which swept through modern art and literature as couriers of the vast cataclysm which is now shaking the very pillars of the world, men like Marcel Schwab, Francis Jammes, André Gide, Camille Mauclair, and others of the sort. They, however, atoned for the public indifference by the fervency of their appreciation. They prophesied great things for Claudel, who, living in various towns in the Far East as an employee of the consular service, worked steadily away at his poems, dramas and fantastic verbal bric-a-brac. Now all their prophesies are justified. Claudel is recognized as one of the greatest literary forces of France. The appreciation of his fellow-poets is shared by a strong and rapidly growing public which he has created by the tremendous patriotism, powerful beauty, and burning religious spirit of his war poems.

The two books represent his earlier, less popular, and more "literary" work. The first is, "The East I Know," translated by Teresa Frances Benét and William Rose Benét. The second is the four-act mystery play, "The Tidings Brought to Mary," translated by Louise Morgan Sill.

The scenes of the drama take place at the close of the Middle Ages, and, to quote from the prologue, they are "seen conventionally, as medieval poets might have imagined classic antiquity." The whole action of the drama takes place on or near the farm of the peasant proprietor, Anne Vercors, whose two daughters, Violaine and Mara, furnish the emotional material of the play. Violaine arises through sacrifice, suffering, and great love to the height of sanctity; while Mara, led by her passionate heart and powerful self-will passes through strange places to an enigmatical and gloomy gulf at the edge of which human judgment must cease, to leave her tortured and wounded spirit to the wiser wisdom of the mercy of God. It is a curiously beautiful and moving play, and should be given on the stage, provided it be produced by a director who is at once an artist in drama, and a practical Catholic. In other hands the play would probably be badly misunderstood, and fail of making its artistic purpose manifest.

The other book, "The East I Know," consists of a kind of prose almost totally unknown in present-day American literature, a kind which in certain quarters is regarded as the extreme type of artistic caviar. It may seem so strange, and so unfortunate, that an author acknowledged to be one of the most eminent of modern French writers, and an ardent Catholic to whom religion is the supremely important thing, should be brought before the American public through the medium of exotic work like this, that I think the matter calls for discussion.

The book contains less than 200 pages, but there are more than sixty separate pieces. None occupies more than a very few pages; some only a single page. There are descriptions of landscape, and scenes of Oriental life by the wayside, or in temples and hermitages; there are dreams and reveries: the dreams of a poet and the reveries of a subtle philosopher; and there are one or two that might pass as stories.

We lack a good term by which to define them. "Sketch" is perhaps the most convenient word; yet it implies a slightness and a tentative quality which do not characterize the best and most typical examples, which are as profound in thought and definite in idea as one of Milton's majestic sonnets. Others are more like lyrics, because of their personal quality and elastic structure; while others again suggest the effect produced by certain of the more subjective piano pieces of Chopin; employing the musical and magical power of well-chosen words arranged in rhythmical or symphonic patterns to lead the imagination into regions of fantasy, where singular vistas open up glimpses of strange beauty.

Probably the larger portion of this form of literature as it is produced in France could not be translated and published in the United States because it shares the evil qualities of many French novels and French poetry: moral corruption, yes, and even worse, a spiritual depravity. For this sensitive and yet powerful instrument is peculiarly available for the expression of the most deplorable confessions and professions of sensuality, pessimism, impiety, and despair. The very quintessence of modern France's soul-sickness has been distilled and then crystallized by the most skilful of artists into these somber and sometimes truly diabolical gems of prose. Yet dispite this fact, often no doubt even because of it, the form by virtue of its intrinsic artistic charm appeals most powerfully to readers who are desirous of satisfying their need for verbal beauty, which surely is as legitimate a desire as that for beauty in painting, sculpture, or music.

Now, there are people with good taste in literature for the really substantial and enduring things, people to whom Shakespeare and Dante and Pascal and all the classic masters are familiar spirits or friends, who consider work of the fragile kind which we have been discussing, even when it is not immoral or impious, as quite futile productions, appealing only to dilletanti and the artistically dissipated. And there are many others, of course, to whom it is caviar of such a frankly outlandish flavor as to be utterly and finally foreign. To these good people I have nothing to say; but to the first class, I would appeal for a more generous toleration, and a broader vision, of modern art. For I think it is useless either to attempt to ignore, or deride, the kind of work which this book displays so finely. Serious, authentic authors, men with things worth while saying, cultivate it more and more.

The important question is this: Do these tiny gems of literature, these verbal ornaments and decorations of the great, many-mansioned house of art, scintillate with the rays of a pure and benign beauty, clean, healthy thought, and true spirituality; or do they burn with the strange and baleful fires of moral corruption and atheistical pessimism and despair? So far as Paul Claudel is concerned, and with him Marcel Schwab and Francis Jammes, if what work I have seen of the two latter is typical, it can be affirmed that the charm and beauty of these word-jewels has been secured, with the elimination of the corruption and the sin.

MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

REVIEWS

Roma, Ancient, Subterranean and Modern Rome, in Word and Picture. By Rev. Dr. Albert Kuhn, O. S. B. New York: Benziger Brothers. $10.00.

The charm of Rome, as Cardinal Gibbons aptly says in his preface to this monumental work, is infinite. She is the eternal city, the city of the soul, the mistress of arts and sciences. To Catholics, she is the center and the stronghold of that Faith from which she drew another life when the power and the might of the Caesars and her invincible legions had left her forever. At some time or other in life, it is the dream of the scholar, the poet and statesman to visit her seven hills and to summon up in vision on the very spots they once trod, the forms of her consuls, and soldiers and to recall their splendid history. And with what reverence and admiration and love the Christian and Catholic treads the sacred dust of the Catacombs, where rested the bones of her martyred Saints, the noblest and the most martial of her heroic brood! How his faith and devotion are enkindled as he kneels in the mighty spaces of St. Peter's, the noblest temple ever erected to the majesty of God, or wanders through streets once traversed by the two great Heralds of the Gospel as they went to their death! Rome is an enchanted city. Its charm and its fascination are for all time and for all men.

The stranger and the visitor, however, who would know its history and its treasures both sacred and profane, need a guide. We recommend them to the learned Benedictine who has given us this splendid volume. "Roma," with its 617 pages of text, its 744 illustrations, its 48 full-page inserts on tinted paper, its plans of the city, its accurate, scholarly and at the same time condensed and terse review of the city's history, from the days of those friends of our childhood, Numitor, Romulus and Remus down to the days of Benedict XV, gives proof on every page of that scholarship and critical erudition which is a tradition of the learned Order to which the author belongs. Yet, the work is written in a popular style. This will undoubtedly explain a few lacunae which the student who looks for more intimate detail and exhaustive criticism might wish to see filled. He will find them in De Waal, Stettiner and Lanciani. It is quite evident from the whole tenor of the work that the writer has been anxious to reach the general reader and that he has purposely left aside certain intricate details and mooted points of archeology and history which we feel he is quite competent to handle. The expert may regret it. But the work gains in many ways by the omission. It is more compact and interesting.

The reading of the book will serve the purpose of a short but solid course of instruction in the principles of art and esthetics. The monuments of pagan Rome, the splendid masterpieces of painting, sculpture and architecture which the Rome of the Popes gave to the world, the temples, churches, colleges, hospitals whose fame is world-wide, are described with illuminating comments as brief as they are scholarly. "Roma" would make an excellent Christmas present, and should find a place of honor in Catholic libraries. J. C. R.

Saints' Legends. By Gordon Hall Gerould. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.50.

This is one of those books which the self-sufficiency of professors and the uninformed rashness of publishers impose on an unthinking public as works of learning. The author, Professor of English Literature in Princeton, having read a good deal about the legends of the Saints, nothing very difficult, undertakes to discuss their place in that literature. Two things do not seem to have occurred to him. First, has a college professor the right to brand the legends as literature? Their presentation by this author or that may be such; but then the discussion should be, not of the legend, but of the vehicle by which it reaches us. We do not hear of the place of wars, conspiracies, voyages in literature but of the place of their authors. Second, if legends have a place in literature, they must be related to not only Chaucer and Lydgate and Wace, on the one side, but also to Dickens and Meredith and Mrs. Humphry Ward on the other; unless there be two English literatures separated by an impassable chasm. There may be such a relationship: if so, we should like it to be made clear. The author sees for a moment that if he is to discuss legends as literature, he has nothing to do with their "historical accuracy"; but he forgets immediately and gives us a long chapter on origin and propagation, with the usual twiddle-twaddle: "What more natural?" "It may have happened easily," etc., that builds up destructive criticism.

How far Mr. Gerould is from the region he would discuss, appears in many ways. He speaks, for instance, of legends introduced into "the service of nocturns." Cluny, Clairvaux, etc., are for him "names that indicate the prevailing impulse to righteousness," and the Saints, "leaders in the cause of righteousness." It is well known what righteousness means among Protestants, and Mr. Gerould can rest assured that a week at Clairvaux would have meant for him much more than an "impulse to righteousness," and he would have found St. Bernard something more than a "moral uplifter." He would have found himself in a world hitherto unimagined, of which he never shows more ignorance than when he calls attention to Professor Günter's "striking" discovery "that the great theologians of the middle ages never rested their scholarly speculation on evidence drawn from the miracles of the Saints. Presumably they regard these wonders as matters of faith rather than of knowledge." It would be hard to betray in as many words, as great an ignorance of the meaning of theology, the work of the theologians and the nature of faith. But Mr. Gerould is not up even in the matter of his chair. He speaks of Thackeray's description of the Battle of Waterloo! To find it would be for him a suitable matter of research; and till he has found it he might leave higher and holier matters alone. H. W.

The Insurrection in Dublin. By James Stephens. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.25.

"I speak as an Irishman, and am momentarily leaving out of account every other consideration," remarks the author of this interesting book in the introduction. During last Easter week Mr. Stephens recorded day by day what he saw and heard in Dublin, and now he publishes that diary just as it stands, only adding his subsequent reflections on the causes and results of the insurrection. He believes that except for furnishing the revolters with some arms and ammunition, Germany was not concerned in the rising, and that the "sole aim was to make such a row in Ireland that the Irish question would take the status of an international one." Moreover the Volunteers had good grounds for fearing that the Government intended to seize their arms and leaders, so the insurrection took place to forestall such a move. Mr. Stephens observes in conclusion:

> From whatever angle Irish people consider this affair it must appear to them tragic and lamentable beyond expression, but not mean and not unheroic. It was hard enough that our men in the English armies should be slain for causes which no amount of explanation will ever render less foreign to us, or even intelligible; but that our men who were left should be killed in Ireland fighting against the same England that their brothers are fighting for ties the question into such knots of contradiction as we may give up trying to unravel.

Regarding religious intolerance in Ireland the author protests that there is none "except that which is political," and though he is not a Catholic himself, he says that he has "never found real intolerance" among his "fellow-countrymen of that religion," but he has "found it among Protestants." In answer to the Ulsterites' assertion that "Life is not safe in Ireland," Mr. Stephens calls attention to the "annoying" regularity with which Irish judges receive white gloves. W. D.

Prolegomena to History. By FREDERICK J. TEGGART. Berkley, California: University of California Press. $1.50.

These "Prolegomena" are the third part of the fourth volume of the University of California Publications in History. They correlate history with philosophy, literature and science. That history is a science has been pooh-poohed by many a writer, who was not a historian. Jevons thought that a science of history, in the true sense of the term, was an absurd notion. And Sidgwick looks upon history as merely the arrangement of events in chronological order. Such an arrangement is not a science. For science is elevated out of the domain of facts and details; it deals with principles, and shows the presence of law. The challenge of Jevons and Sidgwick and others is nobly taken up in this monograph of Dr. Teggart, Associate Professor of History in the University of California, who is fully familiar with the literature of his subject. After reading his essay, we are convinced that the domain of the historian is not merely facts, but factors also. The ancient historians dealt very much with principles, with the factors that make for law in the evolution of economic and political conditions of the human race. And so it came to be that old historians like Herodotus wrote with an epos, a main theme, which his facts are never said to demonstrate but are clearly meant to convey. One may object that this is not critical history. Maybe not, although time has shown that the facts of Herodotus were better guaranteed than critical historians deemed twenty-five years ago. In like manner, the primitive history of the Books of the Pentateuch shows an underlying law, that of Jahweh's protective care for the people he had decreed to be the depository of unpolluted primitive revelation to the human race. The old-time historians, primitive though they were in method, were scientific in that they did not merely serve out facts. They correlated these facts, and dealt with the principles evidenced by this correlation. Dr. Teggart well thinks that the modern historian should be equally, nay, more, scientific; and should never fall to the low level of the chronologist of fact on fact. W. F. D.

The Assumption of the Virgin: a Miracle Play from the N. Town Cycle. Edited by W. W. GREG, Litt. D. New York: Oxford University Press. $1.25.

"You to worship mother is liketh the Holy Trinity.
Wherefore I crown you here in this kingdom of glory.
Of all my chosen, thus shall you called be.
Queen of Heaven and Mother of Mercy."

Those words are from Our Lord's lips. Then Michael the Archangel speaks.

"Now blessed be your name we cry,
For this holy assumption all Heaven maketh melody."

So ends this miracle play in heaven. Its reading brings one very near to the spirit of that blessed home, for in its lines we hear Our Divine Lord Himself speaking, or Mary, our Mother, or St. Peter, or St. Paul, or St. John, and an Angel now and again. And although all the spelling of the original Middle English is preserved in the printing, one quickly forgets it, lost in the peace and joy and reverence that surrounded the death and assumption of Our Lady. So accurately is the Catholic teaching with regard to the Virgin Mary expressed in this play that one almost feels as if he were perusing the canons of a great council set in the words and music of a classic.

The task of the learned editor of the play has been chiefly to show in a lengthy and scholarly introduction that this play belongs to the period around 1468 and came from the same locality of England as did the other plays found with it in the Vespasian Manuscript, D. VIII. The introductory study of the color of inks and the diversity of handwritings and of style, of the tricks of rhythm and of rhyme, holds a fascination for the student of literature, but for the historian or the theologian we believe that the play itself, so mirroring the warm and genuine beliefs of the people of England in the fifteenth century, will always keep a more valuable interest. J. P. M.

Penrod and Sam. By BOOTH TARKINGTON. Illustrated by WORTH BREHM. Garden City: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.35.

Those who recall what pleasure they got from reading Mr. Tarkington's faithful study of that twelve-year-old American boy "Penrod," a book which is now in its sixty-eighth thousand and which was praised in our issue of May 30, 1914, will be glad to learn that they will find quite as much entertainment in "Penrod and Sam." For the lifelike young hero has not altered a hair and his chum, Samuel Williams, is as real a boy as ever. The author must retain a remarkably vivid recollection of his own early adventures and habit of mind, for the children in this volume are perfect likenesses of the boys and girls belonging to middle-class American families of thirty years ago. Penrod's hatred of Georgie Bassett, "a boy set apart" is so natural that the way the latter was initiated into the "Order of the In-Or-In" is not surprising; the episode in which the vagrant cat Gipsy is the central figure could hardly be described better than the author does it; and Penrod's predicament when he read in school his older sister's "model letter to a friend" is delightfully funny. "Penrod and Sam" may be a book for boys, but none of their grown-up relatives should miss reading it. W. D.

Hawaii: Scenes and Impressions. BY KATHARINE FULLERTON GEROULD. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

One has a gentle kind of resentment against certain books of travel, because they seem to assume an air of superiority, somewhat like the upper classman uses towards the freshman. One may be quite alive to one's ignorance and inexperience, but it is a mistake to insinuate too openly that the traveler "knows it all," and that the poor reader is utterly at the mercy of the great teacher both as to what is to be given and what withheld, as from one who can take in only a greater or less pittance of information. The book under review however is pleasing because, while it gives a real insight into life in Hawaii, it does so in a way that is friendly, sympathetic, and, as one may say, informal. Its manner is neither of the pedagogue nor the savant. It is simply that of a trained observer who not only sees things worth while, but sees them in her own bright way, and then tells what she thinks of them, yet not in commonplaces.

One-third of the book is devoted to the leper colony at Molokai, the scene of Father Damien's heroic labors. A truer picture of the colony than that Mrs. Gerould offers in this volume has not been given, and no writer has ever said better things of Father Damien. On a neighboring island the Federal Government has built a magnificent establishment for lepers, but it is falling to ruin, because the stricken ones do not care to go there. They turn to Father Damien's where, as the author observes, "it is cause for thanking God that the settlement is managed by men who can make science and religion walk hand in hand." She also writes:

> Happily Damien is like to be the last (as he was, immortally, the first) of Molokai martyrs. Of saints uncanonized it has held many, and will yet hold more. . . . And some day these men and women will get their due, though it is a faint light of publicity that beats on Kalaupapa.

The author gives details begotten not of hearsay, but of personal investigation, and the book will well repay reading.

F. J. McN.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In the Catholic Mind for November 8 will be found Father Decorme's excellent review of "Catholic Education in Mexico." He sketches the history of the Church's zeal in converting, civilizing and refining the natives of Mexico from the year 1525 until the outbreak of the present revolution. There is such a vast deal of ignorance and misinformation in this country regarding the Church's responsibility for Mexican illiteracy that the pamphlet ought to be a veritable light-bringer. The author proves, for instance, that in the eighteenth century Mexicans prided themselves on being able to vie with European savants, and four years ago the country had some 6,000 Catholic schools. But now they are all demolished. "Their libraries and scientific laboratories, their museums, their works of art, and their educational equipment have been destroyed through the rapacity of the soldiers. Their professors have been imprisoned, robbed, or sent into exile, and teaching has been absolutely forbidden." "Mexican Catholicism and Masonry," the second article in the number, is the remarkable tribute paid the Church's work in Mexico by Col. Byam, a prominent American Mason.

"Betty at Fort Blizzard" (Lippincott, $1.50) is a little love story, told with extreme simplicity, but at the same time with much charm by Molly Elliot Seawell. The scene is laid in a cavalry post; and the tale, which is instinct with the spirit of the ever-romantic soldier, deals with the wooing and the winning of the Colonel's daughter by one of the officers. The girl's father and mother have their own idyl of mid-summer love, which is hardly less delightful than that of Betty and Lieutenant Broussard.——In "Georgina of the Rainbows" (Britton Pub. Co., $1.25) Annie Fellows Johnston has written another of her charming children's stories. The book, which has its appeal for grown-ups as well as youthful readers, tells of a little girl's persistent idealism and her efforts to see everything wreathed in bright rainbows.——In "Enoch Crane" (Scribner, $1.35), a novel planned and begun by F. Hopkinson Smith and completed by F. Berkeley Smith, one finds much of the charm rightly associated with the creator of "Felix O'Day," and also, it must be confessed, just a suspicion of the "triangle plot," which seems to be the inevitable basis of modern love tales.

Catholics will take prompt exception to Robert Sturgis Ingersoll's advice in his "Open that Door!" (Lippincott, $1.00) in regard to reading Smollett, Balzac and Gibbon; some may resent the intrusion of too many of the author's personal preferences in a book meant for a general appeal, but Mr. Ingersoll's attempt to make life seem pleasurable and worth living through the means of wide reading, will be commonly approved. It is the author's conviction that life is always romantic and interesting, but it has never struck him that there must be religion behind it all. Father Faber was nearer right when he wrote "Supernatural things greatly increase the romance of life."——An interesting introduction, a clever diagram, a concise bibliography, a list of representative short-stories, the text of nine short-stories, all but three of which are American, and instructive, unpedantic notes, make "The Short-Story" by W. Patterson Atkinson (Allyn & Bacon, $0.60) a little book thoroughly useful for freshman work on the short-story, or for high-school work in narration and description.

The following stanzas on "Glencar" by Stephen Gwynn, which appear in a recent anthology, hardly seem in keeping with its compiler's professed purpose; that "of brightening the lot of the Irish soldiers of the King":

Few roads and far to grey Glencar,
  Where Caragh ripples past;
But there, mavrone, shall be your throne,
  When I win home at last.

On alien soil I bleed and toil,
  The soldier sworn of France;
I follow where her bugles blare,
  Her eagles glint and glance.

But ships may yet ride on some tide,
  Leagued to restore our rights,
And I may head the men I've led
  In half a hundred fights.

Yet till that day, asthore, machree,
  For me nor love nor land;
I plant no foot on shamrock's root
  Till I come sword in hand.

Few roads and far to grey Glencar,
  And life is wasting fast;
Yet there, mavrone, should be your throne,
  Could I win home at last.

Though this does not seem to be a propitious time for starting magazines, nevertheless Mr. William S. Braithwaite and Mr. Henry T. Schnittkind have started a new literary quarterly called the Stratford Journal, which is described as a forum of contemporary international thought, and is published by the Stratford Co., 32 Oliver street, Boston. ($3.00 a year.) Each issue, it is announced, will have translations of foreign masterpieces in fiction and a section will be devoted to the best contemporary foreign and American poetry. In the contents of the current number is a bright little play translated from the Spanish of the Quintero brothers, together with some selections from Luis G. Urbina, a Mexican poet of today. The line "Yes, the flowers their Mass are holding," in his fine poem, "The Mass at Dawn," is not a good rendering. In an interesting paper on "The Short-Story in the United States," by Harry S. Van Landingham, he attributes American success in this form of fiction to our superficiality, love of excitement and spirit of hurry. In the opinion of the author the prevalent moving-picture craze and the low artistic value of the average film is ruining the short-story. Novels are already "too long to read" and soon the "short-story will not be tolerated if it runs beyond a page or two."

The decay of faith outside the Church is becoming daily more evident in the writings of those who are professedly teachers of religious truth. The recent work of the Rev. George A. Gordon, D.D., is an example in point. "Aspects of the Infinite Mystery" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.50) is a collection of sermons preached to his congregation by the Minister of the Old South Church, Boston. They are thoughtful, and well expressed, and they give evidence of an earnest effort to inspire high ideals of life and to preserve belief in the Fatherhood of God and a future life, but they are a sad testimony to lack of faith. The Fall, the Redemption, the need of Baptism, the Divinity of Christ, the Trinity, and inspiration, in the Catholic sense, are some of the dogmas that the author declares to have had their day and passed away. Obviously the book has no message for Catholics. The surprising thing about this and similar works is the calm assurance with which their authors state that such beliefs have disappeared, simply because their own small coterie has discarded them.—In an effort to bring the Bible story close to the reader, the Rev. Arthur W. Moulton, Pastor of Grace Church, Lawrence, Mass., in a little book called "It Came to pass" (Gorham, $1.00) has pictured six incidents of Christ's life in fancied settings. Peter and Joseph of Arimathea are not well drawn; in Magdalen and Zaccheus, avowal of guilt seems to preponderate over a true sense of contrition because of God offended. Justification by faith alone is not acceptable to Catholics. In an age that denies the Divinity of Christ it is gratifying to see the Virginity of Mary allowed, and Jesus plainly acknowledged to be God.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Benziger Brothers, New York:
The Sunday Missal. By Father Lasance. $1.00; Heaven Open to Souls. Love for God Above All Things and Perfect Contrition Easy and Common in Souls Resolved to Avoid Mortal Sin. By Rev. Henry Churchill Semple, S. J. $2.00.

The Century Co., New York:
The Leatherwood God. By William Dean Howells. $1.35.

Catholic Union Store, Buffalo:
Spiritistic Phenomena and Their Interpretation. By J. Godfrey Raupert, K.S.G. $0.20.

Columbia University Press, New York:
The Book of the Popes. By Louise Ropes Loomis, Ph.D.; St. Jean De Crevecoeur. By Julia Post Mitchell, Ph.D.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
The Old Blood. By Frederick Palmer. $1.40.

George H. Doran Co., New York:
Cloud and Silver. By E. V. Lucas. $1.25; More Wanderings in London. By E. V. Lucas. $2.00; The Short Story. By Barry Pain. $0.40; The Lyric. By John Drinkwater. $0.40.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y.:
Booker T. Washington. Builder of a Civilization. By Emmett J. Scott and Lyman Beecher Stowe. Illustrated. $2.00; A Circuit Rider's Widow. By Cora Harris. Illustrated. $1.50; The Wishing Moon. By Louise Dutton. $1.35; O. Henry: Biography. By C. Alphonso Smith. Illustrated. $2.50; My Garden. By Louise Beebe Wilder. With Many Illustrations. $1.50; Morning Face. By Gene Stratton-Porter. With Many Photographs by the Author. $2.00.

Duffield & Co., New York:
In Seven Lands. By Ernest Alfred Vizetelly. With Sixteen Illustrations.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
El Supremo. A Romance of the Great Dictator of Paraguay. By Edward Lucas White. $1.90; Belle Jones. By Allan Meacham. $0.50; Poetry and the Renascence of Wonder. By Theodore Watts-Dunton. $1.75; The Whirlpool. By Victoria Morton. $1.50; The Taming of Calinda. By C. L. Carlsen. $1.35; Omniana: The Autobiography of An Irish Octogenarian. By J. F. Fuller, F.S.A., M.R.I.A. With Illustrations. $3.00.

Paul Elder & Co., San Francisco:
Impressions Calendar, 1917.

Thomas J. Flynn Co., Boston:
An Altar Wreath. By Joseph Gordian Daley. $1.25.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
God and Man. Vol. II. By Rev. L. Labauche, S. S. $1.50; Refining Fires. A Novel. By Alice Dease. $0.75.

Harper & Brothers, New York:
The Mysterious Stranger. A Romance. By Mark Twain. With Illustrations by N. C. Wyeth. $2.00; The Shining Adventure. By Dana Burnet. $1.30.

Hearst's International Library Co., New York:
Lady Connie. By Mrs. Humphry Ward. Illustrated by Albert Sterner. $1.50.

Henry Holt & Co., New York:
Wild Earth and Other Poems. By Padraic Colum. $1.25.

Houghton Mifflin Co., Boston:
The Life of John Marshall. By Albert J. Beveridge. 2 vols. $8.00; A Volunteer Poilu. By Henry Sheahan. $1.25; Ambulance No. 10. Personal Letters from the Front. By Leslie Buswell. $1.00.

Alfred A. Knopf, New York:
A Drake, By George! By John Trevena. $1.50; The Brown Mare. By Alfred Ollivant. $1.00; Moloch. A Play. By Beulah Marie Dix. $1.00.

The Macmillan Company, New York:
Social Life in England, 1750-1850. By F. J. Foakes Jackson. $1.50; An Introduction to Economics. By Frank O'Hara. $1.00; Men, Women and Ghosts. By Amy Lowell. $1.25; What's the Matter with Mexico? By Caspar Whitney. $0.50; The Insurrection in Dublin. By James Stephens. $1.25; The Long Road of Woman's Memory. By Jane Addams. $1.25; The Ideal Catholic Sixth Reader. By a Sister of St. Joseph. $0.60.

John Murphy Co., Baltimore:
From Convent to Conflict; or, a Nun's Account of the Invasion of Belgium. By Sister M. Antonia. $1.00.

Naegele Printing Co., Helena:
First Communion Catechism. With Story and Picture. By Rt. Rev. Monsignor Day, V. G. $0.45.

Frederick Pustet & Co., New York:
The Facts About Luther. By Rt. Rev. Mons. Patrick F. O'Hare, LL.D. $0.25.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
A Sheaf. By John Galsworthy. $1.50.

Sherman, French & Co., Boston:
The Essentials of Religious Education. By Charles William Heathcote. $1.50.

Silver, Burdett & Co., Boston:
Socializing the Child. By Sarah A. Dynes. $1.00.

Small, Maynard & Co., Boston:
Told in a French Garden. By Mildred Aldrich. $1.25.

University of California Press, Berkeley:
Du Transcendantalisme Considéré Essentiellement dans sa Définition et ses Origines Françaises. By William Girard. $1.50; The Reorganization of Spain by Augustus. By John James Van Nostrand, Jr. $0.75.

World Book Co., Yonkers-on-Hudson:
Form and Functions of American Government. By Thomas Harrison Reed, A.B., LL.B. Illustrated $1.50.

Yale University Press, New Haven:
Woman's Suffrage by Constitutional Amendment. By H. St. George Tucker. $1.35.

EDUCATION

College Dramatics

I ATTENDED the annual play at St. Arsenius College this afternoon and I am in an unusually vicious mood. Not that I could find fault with the acting, the staging, the scenic effects. All these were excellent and, to use a banality, "superior to the usual run of amateur productions." Nevertheless, I have been tearing my hair ever since and calling on high heaven to witness the terribleness of it all. During my short span of life I have attended a goodly number of college plays; not always because I wanted to do so; often enough as a member of the faculty, I was obliged to attend. The acting, in general, at these college plays is good, but why, in the name of all the harlequins, the school authorities select the plays they do, I never could fathom.

A Typical Play

THE production I saw this afternoon is typical. I have seen it at least five times in different colleges. The audience roared with laughter. There was no doubt about their enjoyment; that's the pity of it. But I wonder what they thought afterwards. One of the characters is a salesman who masquerades as a college professor to escape detection. A series of ludicrous complications follows, in which the profession comes in for a large share of ridicule. Thought I to myself, "I wonder if my boys think I am as silly an ass as that crew of nondescript, spineless schoolmasters." The hero of the play is an easy liar who insults his "sticks" of professors, to the manifest delight of the audience. The type never would be tolerated five minutes in any reputable college. The other characters are effeminate milk-sops. The only moral I could draw from the play was that if a boy is decent and honorable he is bound to be a namby-pamby. And yet we rail at George Bernard Shaw!

The Play's Purpose

OF course, our colleges present other plays besides farces. There are tearful tragedies, for instance, with a medieval or early Christian setting. Certainly they are infinitely superior to the farces, but every healthy person will confess that they are dreadfully dull. Then, there are the historical plays. Many of these are good, but the good ones have been worked to death, and the rest lack dramatic interest. One day I expressed my opinion on these matters to my colleague, the instructor in dramatics.

"Well, what are you going to do about it?" he asked defiantly. "What remedy have you to offer?"

Frankly I have no remedy, but the following suggestions may enable some one to devise a remedy. In the first place, I shall explain what, in my opinion, is the raison d'être of a college play. In many cases, a secondary end is to raise money for some college activity, athletics, students' library, what-not. That's the reason many choose the rip-roaring farce; it means less expense for costuming, and it draws capacity audiences. But money-making should be very decidedly subordinated to the primary purpose. That purpose, to my mind, is to educate the boys who take part, and the college world generally, to appreciate good drama.

Selecting the Play

SINCE this is so, I should lay down the following requirements. First, the play must be good morally. Secondly, it must not offend the sensibilities of any class of people. Consequently, exeunt stage Irishman, stage Jew, stage minister, and stage professor. Lastly, it must be a play of real artistic merit. Anything mediocre has little educational influence, and time spent in its production is time lost.

But where are we to get plays of this sort? Ay, here's the rub. Well, there once was a man named Shakespeare who wrote a great many dramas that posterity has pronounced incomparable. It seems to me, that in Catholic colleges where the classics are emphasized so strongly, something should be done to revive interest in the classic drama. I suppose it is almost too much to expect many of our colleges to produce them in the original, but Sophocles, Aeschylus, and Euripides have been translated into magnificent English; indeed, the translations themselves are classics. The presentation of a Greek play would be an innovation that would draw the attention of educators and of educated people to our colleges, even though it might not "pay."

A Practical Difficulty

HERE another difficulty crops up. Women have a prominent place in the dramatis personæ of the plays of Shakespeare, of the ancients, and, in fact, of every standard drama. In most Catholic colleges, however, boys are not allowed to assume female rôles, therefore, many plays in use are "adaptations." The mother of the original play becomes an uncle or a schoolmaster or a minister; the fair heroine is usually changed into a very insipid fidus Achates. A friend of mine calls the Catholic college play the "cherches-la-femme drama," and generally, there is not much difficulty in discovering what characters in the adaptation were originally of the opposite sex. The metamorphosis is usually not happy; the erstwhile female characters have the name and habiliments of men, and that is about all. Here is a real difficulty. Its solution I leave to wiser heads.

I am aware that the strictures I have made on the college drama do not apply to every Catholic college. There are some that cherish a tradition for what is best in the dramatic art; there are some that have made splendid efforts within the past few years to break away from hackneyed themes and have produced magnificent spectacles like the "Passion Play," but they are in the minority. I am not blaming, but only stating a fact.

Training in Elocution

WHILE I am speaking about the drama, just a word about elocution contests. Here again the boys in our colleges are well trained; they are always equal to, and usually better than students in secular colleges. But the selections chosen! In the last twenty-five years, one wonders if any new "elocution pieces" have appeared. Mutatis mutandis, the elocution program of St. A's College for 1896 is much the same as the program of St. B's for 1916. Boys for the most part are left to their own resources. I don't say that this is bad, but as a consequence, they choose a lurid selection with melodramatic possibilities of the "Tell-Tale Heart" variety, or else one reeking with mawkish sentimentality of the sob-sister type.

I should make the same requirements for the elocution contest as for the college play. Surely it is indolence or lack of direction, that causes our students to choose selections devoid of all literary merit. The poets and prose-writers of the language offer a wide field for dramatic opportunity. Can it be that the novels of Thackeray, Dickens, and Eliot have been exhausted? And Shakespeare! Every play is a mine for the elocutionist, and yet our college students are satisfied with the mediocre or worse. There are the orators too, with their brilliant episodes and stirring perorations. In Catholic colleges, would it be amiss to have an occasional selection from some great pulpit orator? As yet, our Catholic novelists are an unexplored field. Take Benson's historic novels. What splendid dramatic pictures he gives us of those troublous times when England forsook the Faith. But why go on? A score of instances will occur to every reader.

Exchanging Ideas

THIS defect in our elocutionary exhibitions might be remedied if there were more cooperation among Catholic teachers, more exchange of ideas among them. We have a system of colleges that is nation-wide and yet how little we realize our strength. Surely it is not jealousy that keeps us apart; we are all working for the same end. Say rather, that it is timidity and modesty. We think our ideas are of little value. I have often wished that I might have supreme authority over Catholic secondary education for one week. Czar-like, I should issue a ukase demanding a search into the archives of every college, the seizure and burning of every play of mediocre or doubtful value, and the destruction of every book of "elocution pieces" which does not conform to the canons of literary and dramatic art. And I should forbid all schools, academies and colleges to secure copies of these or similar works in the future, all things to the contrary notwithstanding.

FELIX HAYDEN.

SOCIOLOGY

A Plea for Social Settlements

DO we Catholics need social settlements? Are they not a "fad"? Do not our parochial schools obviate any necessity for them? Are they not a needless addition to the already long list of institutions which Catholics are called upon to support?

These are questions which the Catholic social worker is frequently required to answer. As it seems to me, the Catholic social settlement is not only desirable, but imperatively necessary in our large cities, for two main reasons. The first is the existence of the non-Catholic settlement, and the second, the increasing number of settlements that are openly anti-Catholic. These settlements offer much. They provide a place where tired mothers may gather for a pleasant break in the monotony of their daily lives. Under skilled direction, boys and girls congregate for innocent amusement, and for instruction. In most cases, the people of the neighborhood soon learn to come to the "settlement-people" with their trials and troubles, sure at least of a sympathetic hearing.

Settlement Influence

PLAINLY, the social settlement may, and usually does, exercise a deep influence on both children and parents. However well-meant this influence may be, frequently it in no wise helps to the strengthening of Catholic life. The amount of ignorance, or of religious indifference, among many Catholic immigrants of the first generation is almost unbelievable. They are willing to send their children to any settlement, any Sunday school, any church, from which they foresee some material advantage. Often none of these agencies directly proselyte, but sometimes they do. In any case, these children, strangers in a strange land, are surrounded by influences which, if they do not destroy faith, at least contribute nothing which will safeguard their inheritance, the pearl of great price. These conditions exist in every large American city. True, no city of any size in this country is without a Catholic social settlement of some kind, but often it merely exists, and in the majority of cases is kept alive by the sacrifices of a few Catholics. It does not receive, as it should, general support. The dangerous omen is not that our settlements are so few, but that so few Catholics are alive to their imperative need.

Not an End in Itself

IN an age that is amusement-mad, if we forbid pleasures within easy reach, should we not provide innocent and equally attractive substitutes? To the children of the alleys and tenements, the settlement means in summer, large airy rooms, picnics and playgrounds, and warmth and comfort in winter. If you wish to understand the temptation held out by the non-Catholic settlement, go into the houses of the abjectly poor, and see for yourself the sordid surroundings in which these children are reared. Drunken fathers, overworked mothers, absence of even the most primitive conveniences, are conditions that send our boys to the street corners to join "gangs," and our girls to the dance halls that so often mean ruin, or at least, a tarnishing of their womanhood. It is doubtless one of the tragedies of human existence that we are so prone to barter our birthright for a mess of pottage. But the present is very insistent in its demands. Heat and cold and hunger, and craving for human companionship are vital forces that must be reckoned with.

To feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, are works of mercy, and we know it. But they are not, as the paganized charity of modern times would have it, the only works, neither are they the highest. There is no place in the Catholic philosophy of life for purely "humanitarian" effort. We serve our fellow-man best, when we consult his highest interests, and these are of the soul. Nevertheless, our Catholic children, and adults too, are going astray, by reason of the influence, often well-intended, of the non-Catholic social settlement. To oppose it by a Catholic settlement is not to serve merely the physical wants of these poor people. It is to help them effectively to save their souls. That is the final reason of the Catholic settlement.

Supplementing the School

THE objection that, because of parochial schools, social settlements are a needless duplication of work, is wholly groundless. No social settlement is designed to displace the school, but to supplement its work, outside of school hours. Where are our Catholic children, coming from the "homes" described above, in their free time, and on Sundays? Perhaps the best answer to this question is found in the number of Catholic children in non-Catholic social settlements. One such settlement in Baltimore has a Sunday-school attendance of six hundred. Very many of these children should be in the Sunday schools of the two Catholic churches of this neighborhood. Not far from this settlement is a splendidly equipped house under the patronage of the Social Service Corporation. It is filled with Catholic children. At the very doors of a certain Catholic church, is a mission house whose active members go into the streets to offer material inducements to Catholic Lithuanians. Would a Catholic social settlement be superfluous in any of these neighborhoods? Is its place supplied by the parochial school?

The Need of Preparedness

THE air about us is vibrant with the spirit of preparedness. It is opportune to ask what we Catholics are doing to prepare for settlement work, and to fit ourselves and our successors to conduct it properly. A social settlement cannot be maintained on good wishes. It needs a substantial financial foundation, together with the sincere interest of all our Catholic people. We must fight our battles alone. We cannot count upon the financial advantages so often showered on the non-sectarian house, by the wealthy, but must rely upon the assistance of our own. This is among the first of our needs. But next, we must be keenly alive to the necessity of a training that will enable us to make instant and practical application of the principles of Catholic social work. This realization stresses the need of Catholic schools of social science. The graduates of Catholic schools and colleges are entering upon the work of social service in increasing numbers. Under present conditions they must seek a definite course in sociology in schools where, if nothing worse happens, their Catholic ideals are clouded, and their Catholic sensibilities shocked. The professors to whom they listen, as a rule divorce charity from religion, and seek to restore all things through purely natural processes. They laugh to scorn the proposition that man's spiritual needs must never be sacrificed for what they deem material progress. They have the veneer of culture; their arguments are often attractively presented; but as a rule, the result of their work for the student is that they give him a vocabulary of modern expressions, a few practical suggestions, and prepare him for the acceptance of a creed of materialism. Often, too, the creed is accepted.

The Test of Conviction

A HUNDRED years ago, atheistic France cried out, "Show us your works," and Ozanam answered the scoffers by establishing the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. Today history is repeating itself. If we accept as a cardinal principle, that our faith is the most priceless of all possessions, and that the man who would deprive a Catholic child of its heritage, is worse than a robber, we must translate our convictions into terms of substantial support for the social settlement under Catholic auspices. Catholics sometimes unfortunately enroll themselves in organizations whose intentions we need not question, but whose principles are fundamentally wrong. Without realizing it, they go on record as encouraging principles and practices which in reality, they abhor. The Catholic movement for the establishment of social settlements, needs the assistance of every Catholic, and needs it badly. If we do not uphold our own, who, in this day of pagan sociology, will? Our practical sympathy will encourage the workers now in the field; it will be, under God, the salvation of many sheep now wandering away from the fold; it will prepare the way for vaster fields of usefulness in the future.

L. B. Seager.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Potato Bread

EXPERTS in the United States Department of Agriculture recommend the more general use of bread containing boiled mashed potatoes. The special advantages enumerated are that it is considerably less expensive than ordinary bread, equally nutritious and keeps its freshness longer. The flour used in the potato-bread, now familiar in Germany, cannot be procured in this country. Instead of this the United States department bakers used wheat flour and potatoes in their experiments. Excellent bread is said to have been the result of a combination of three pounds of potatoes with two and a half pounds of flour. Three recipes have been prepared for distribution. One of the effects of the war has evidently been to bring the despised potato into prominence and honor, and even to make of it a theme for the poet's pen. Why not? A Southern paper already sees in the potato another source of prosperity and regards as an obsession the idea that cotton is king.

"Modest Russia"

AS an illustration of the modesty of Russian demands the American Israelite quotes the following peace conditions laid down in the Russian Bourse Gazette after General Brusiloff's successful offensive:

> When peace negotiations begin Russia will demand all Prussian territory east of the Oder, Bohemia, parts of Moravia, Galicia, the Bukowina, Transylvania, the major part of Bulgaria, European Turkey with Constantinople, the Asiatic shore of the Dardanelles and the Marmora Sea, Anatolia and Armenia. The rest of Bukowina and Transylvania, the Banat and parts of Bulgaria will be turned over to Rumania, and Serbia is also to receive a part of the Bulgarian territory.
>
> Hungary, or rather what is left of this kingdom after the Allies have made the new map of Europe, will be separated from Austria and become a small State under Russian control.
>
> Since no indemnity can be collected from the Central Powers after their defeat and division Russia may consider it necessary to enlarge her territorial demands. This will surely be done if Germany and Austria-Hungary continue their resistance much longer.
>
> It is expected that the two doomed empires will ask for peace in April or May next year, but if they try to prolong their hopeless struggle through the next summer no mercy will be shown to them, and in this case we will not hesitate to make Berlin a Russian city and to annex all of Hungary.

The annexation dreams of the Slovo are not less sublime. The acquisition of European Turkey, Constantinople and the Dardanelles are a foregone conclusion, while it considers the "Russification" of certain German provinces which "must be" assimilated as "not more difficult than that of Courland and Finland." There is no need of further details. Russia, we are told, is firmly resolved to emerge from the war "a much larger empire." We have here more than a straw in the wind. No less significant is the remark recently made by a leading Russian military authority that within a comparatively few years Russia would be able to wage war on the basis of a daily expenditure of $100,000,000. The ambition as well as the imagination of Russia has evidently been keenly aroused. Who, whether friend or foe, can foresee the end?

How the A. F. of L. Is Organized

THE frequent references in the press to the American Federation of Labor make it of interest to all to have a clear conception of the Federation's plan of organization. An excellent description of this was lately given in the Tailor, the official organ of the Journeymen Tailors' Union. The object of the writer was to show that the coming together of the different labor groups composing the Federation does not cause any one group to lose its autonomy. He therefore points out the analogy existing between the plan of organization of the United States and of the American Federation of Labor:

> The national unions hold the relationship to the A. F. of L. that the States hold to the national Government. The locals composing the national unions hold the same relation to them that the different counties hold to the State. The United States cannot make a law contrary to the agreement made at the time the States formed a federation. Neither can the American Federation make a law that would abridge the rights of any national union.

An understanding of this analogy will explain the action of the three integral factors of the great labor organization during any important labor crisis: the local, the national, and the federation.

Indian Congresses and an Indian Artist

AN account of two great Indian congresses held this summer, one at Poplar, Montana, and the other at Wakpala, South Dakota, is given in the Indian Sentinel. The example of the Sioux and the neighboring tribes, we are told, has been contagious, and the Chippewas have likewise inaugurated congresses of their own. "It is not possible to overestimate the value of these congresses nor their influence in propagating religion and upbuilding morality among the Indians." In the same number a description is given, by a Sister of Mercy, of a unique painting in a little Catholic Church on Indian Island, lying in the great Penobscot. It is a picture of the Crucifixion, the handiwork of an Indian artist who accomplished his task with "the juice of berries for paints and the tail of an animal for a brush."

> There are two figures in the picture, the dying Christ and St. Mary Magdalen. The latter kneels at the right of the foot of the Cross, one arm clasped with her robe around the sacred feet, the hand of the other seemingly engaged in stanching the flow of blood from the wound of the right foot. As we find is the case with the artists of other nations, his types are those of his own nationality. So the faces of Christ and of Mary Magdalen in the picture are of Indian type. The tension of the sacred Body, the drawn features, the swollen eyes, the gaping wounds and the streaming blood are all well portrayed, while the uplifted eyes are fixed, as if upon the Vision of the Eternal Father.

Untaught in human schools, the artist, Joe Paul Orson, was a young man of austere life who often accompanied the priest on his missionary journeys. The picture was painted by him almost a century ago. The Indian Sentinel itself, as has already been pointed out, appears in a very appropriate and artistic dress, with a wampum belt shaped into a cross on its brown cover. The contents and illustrations are no less attractive and should win for it many subscribers, aside from the intrinsic merit of the cause it represents. It is published quarterly by the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, Washington, D. C.

A Dread Disease

THE dreadful nature of the disease of poliomyelitis can hardly be brought home more forcibly than by the simple statistics given in the weekly bulletin issued by the Department of Health of New York City. Out of a total 8,927 true cases placed under quarantine by this Department 2,343 ended fatally. It is noted that in the hospitals of the Department of Health and in twenty-seven other hospitals in the city the percentage of deaths was 14.59 and 14.53 respectively, while in the cases treated in the homes it was 63.87 per cent. The main reason for the high percentage in the latter instance was the fact that most of these cases were of the severest type. Of the 2,058 cases discharged from the hospitals of the Department of Health between August 21 and October 13 no fewer than 66 per cent showed evidences of paralysis to some degree. In 18 per cent paralysis has wholly disappeared and 15 per cent did not show any paralysis in the course of the disease. Of 2,715 cases followed up carefully in the homes it has been found that 1,885 have a serious paralysis of one or both lower limbs and are unable to walk; 530 are partially paralyzed in the lower limbs, although still able to walk; and 273 have one or both arms totally paralyzed. Such have been the grim effects of this disease, God's visitation in the midst of our modern culture.

Gregorian Chant

THE judgments passed upon Gregorian chant by some of the world's greatest musical artists and critics are gathered together in an address delivered by Archbishop Moeller of Cincinnati on the occasion of the opening of the Archdiocesan Institute of Sacred Music. We quote from the Catholic Choirmaster:

> I contend, and I feel you will be convinced, when you hear it sung as it ought to be sung, that the Plain Chant deserves to be regarded as the most inspiring and devotional music. Such was the opinion of the great composers of music and of other distinguished men who have spoken of it in terms of rapture. Of Mozart it is reported that he stated he would give all his fame for the honor of having composed the Plain Chant music of the Preface of the Mass. One day, being present in church at the singing of the Stabat Mater he exclaimed: "Only four notes and what power!" Mendelssohn wrote: "I cannot understand how Catholics, who in their own church music have the best that can be made, can put up with Mass compositions, which are not even passably suitable, but absolutely distracting and operatic." Wagner often declared "that it was a delight to him to listen to Gregorian Chant and to the compositions of Palestrina; and that this was an artistic treat difficult to describe in words." Jean Jacques Rousseau, anything but a Catholic, a good musician, however, said: "A man must have, I will not say, no sense of piety, but no taste, if to any music he gives the preference over the choral in the church."

His Grace disapproves of the use of all church music which is not helpful to devotion, which protracts or interrupts services, which is sensuous or theatrical in character, or finally which fails to give force and expression to the prayers with which it is associated. "The sacrilege of the organ loft" is the title which has been given to certain classes of operatic and sensuous music sung by church choirs. "Were it permitted," says the Archbishop, "the angelic hosts themselves would throng from the heavens to bring their golden harps and their everlasting-song to the service of the Christian altar. How sublime then and privileged is the function of the church choir!"

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVI. No. 6
WHOLE No. 397

NOVEMBER 18, 1916

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

Home News.—This year's elections were the most extraordinary held in the United States since 1884. On the night of November 7 Mr. Hughes was declared President; the morning papers of November 8 hailed him as Chief Executive of the nation, but the evening papers under the same date announced that Mr. Wilson had probably been reelected. Although, at this writing, all the ballots have not been counted, yet practical politicians concede that the Democratic candidate has won the victory. According to present calculations, which are subject to slight revisions, the total number of votes cast for Messrs. Wilson and Hughes was 16,599,306. Of these the latter received 8,090,951, the former 8,508,085, a plurality of 417,134. Of the total number of electoral votes, 531, Mr. Hughes has secured 255, Mr. Wilson 276, a safe margin, since only 266 are necessary for a choice. These figures give rise to interesting reflections. In 1912 Mr. Wilson polled hardly forty per cent of the then electorate; this year the vote in his favor was increased by 2,270,700, while the vote for Mr. Hughes exceeded the combined vote cast for Messrs. Taft and Roosevelt by 556,000.

The Elections

The Republicans carried the East and the Middle West, the Democrats the South and Far West. Mr. Hughes found favor in all industrial communities, except Ohio; Mr. Wilson in the agricultural communities, especially in those of the Mississippi Valley and further west. The papers in favor of the reelected President declare that women and the "Moose" are responsible for his victory, those opposed to him affirm that Mr. Hughes was defeated because of an apparent alliance with reactionaries.

The foreign press in general expresses satisfaction with the outcome of the elections. The papers of Japan praise the President's peaceful disposition and rejoice that there is now no chance of a tariff likely to hinder exports to America. The German press is rather cautious in its comment. The Berlin Tageblatt points out that Mr. Wilson's reelection indicates a policy of peace which will perhaps eventuate in an international peace organization. This paper too rejoices that a high tariff will not interfere with the German-American trade. The Cologne Gazette and the Volkszeitung of the same city think that the result is due to the peaceful temper of the American people. The former adds, however, that the victory is not a triumph for the Mr. Wilson who was the enemy of Germany and the friend of England, but for the Mr. Wilson who boasted he maintained peace and vowed to observe the same policy in future. The English papers are on the whole sympathetic. The London Globe thinks that the war "which is the only issue before civilized men, hardly entered into the contest," and declares that "the mass of the American people ask for nothing more than peace at almost any price with liberty to gather wealth." This paper and the Pall Mall Gazette look for a stiffening of the President's attitude towards foreign affairs. The London Star rejoices that Mr. Wilson's reelection is a defeat for Germany. The Manchester Guardian attributes the Democratic success to the Progressives and affirms that the President "may be destined to play a part in the achievement of peace which will give him a place in world-history." The French newspapers attach little importance to the elections. The Petit Journal is highly satisfied with the results, because they will put new life into American neutrality. The Matin and the Parisien express the same opinion; the other great papers refrain from comment.

Foreign Opinion

There are many minor items in connection with the elections, which are of interest. For the first time in our history a woman, Jeanette Rankin, of Missoula, Montana, has been sent to Congress. She is a Republican and will sit in a House which will be Republican by a narrow margin of about two members. According to present calculations the Senate is Democratic by a majority of twelve. The Prohibitionists have put Nebraska, Michigan, South Dakota, Montana, and, as it now appears, the Territory of Alaska into the "dry column." Moreover the new Governors of Utah and Florida are Prohibitionists and before long these latter States will no doubt "go dry." More than half the area of the country is now Prohibition-territory, as follows: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Georgia, Idaho,

Minor Items

Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Mississippi, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, and those mentioned above. A second minor but significant item is the increase in the Socialist vote. In 1912, 900,000 votes were polled, in 1916 about 1,200,000. The national manager of the party has announced that some thirty-five Socialists have won seats in State legislatures, while several less important offices have also fallen to members of the party.

The War.—South of Ancre the British have made a slight advance. At Sailly and in the St. Pierre Vaast Wood the Germans regained some ground, but subsequently lost it to the French. South of the Somme the French have taken Ablaincourt, Pressoir and most of the woods north of Chaulnes. Nothing of importance has been accomplished by the Italians in the Trentino, but in the Goritz region they have straightened their line between Monte Faiti and Castagnavizza. In Western Macedonia the Serbs have occupied the village of Polog and other positions on the Chuke Ridge. On the Struma attempts made by the British to advance from Barakli Juma have failed.

Bulletin, Nov. 6, p.m.-Nov. 13, a.m.

In the province of Minsk the Germans have resumed the offensive after a long period of inactivity; they have penetrated the Russian line on a front of two miles and a half, and driven the Russians back of the Skrobowa Brook, near Baranovichi. They have also gained some of the Russian positions east of the Narayuvka, in Galicia, but these places the Russians claim they have retaken. In the Carpathians the Central Powers stormed but later lost Mount Dedul, near Kirlibaba. South of Dorna Watra the Russians have driven the Central Powers from their positions in the Bistricedra Valley, entered Transylvania, and taken Belbor and Hollo. Still further south they have, with the Rumanians, made progress near the Tolgyes, Gyimes and Oitoz Passes.

In the region south of Kronstadt the Central Powers have taken the Bodza Pass, occupied the town of Surdoin, and advanced about sixteen miles in the Buzeo Valley. In the Prahova Valley they have taken Asuga, and further west, La Omu, the loftiest peak in the Bucsesc group of the Transylvanian Alps. Near Campulung, however, the Rumanians have forced the Central Powers to retreat towards the frontier. In the Alt Valley the Central Powers have reached a point about five miles from Pitesti, but in the Jiu Valley they are merely holding their own. In Dobrudja the Rumanians and Russians have resumed the offensive, recaptured Hirsova, Ghisdarechti and Topal, and are about fifteen miles from Cernavoda. From this last place the Central Powers have crossed the southern branch of the Danube, on the Cernavoda bridge, and are engaging the Rumanians and Russians, in the great Balta Marsh, south of the town of Dunareav.

Austria-Hungary.—Count Adam Tarnowski, one of the ablest diplomats of the dual monarchy, and at present serving as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Sofia, has been appointed to succeed Dr. Dumba as Ambassador to the United States. He is the descendant of Catholic Polish nobility and was born in Galicia, March 4, 1866. He first entered the public service at Lemberg in 1889, and after holding diplomatic positions at Constantinople and Athens, came to the United States as Secretary to the Austro-Hungarian Embassy in Washington, where he remained from 1899 to 1901. He then served successively at the Embassies of Paris (1901), Dresden (1903), Brussels (1905), Madrid (1907) and London (1909), and in 1911 was sent as Austro-Hungarian Minister to Sofia. Count Tarnowski was married at Warsaw in 1901 to the Polish princess Swiapotolk Czopworpynska, a native of Russian Poland. It is not known when he will leave for his new post, but it is explained that a request for safe conduct from the Allies will not be necessary, since he is entitled to diplomatic immunity. The new Ambassador is acceptable at Washington and his appointment is looked upon as a sign that more cordial relations are to exist between the two countries.

New Envoy for United States

France.—The report recently submitted to the Chamber by M. Desplas, concerning the territory still occupied by the enemy, furnishes interesting details. It shows that at the present moment the Germans hold 2,351 of the 36,247 Communes composing France. The invaded district, comprising some of the most flourishing centers of industry and commerce, is one of the richest regions of the country. The average value of land throughout France is now about $230.00 per hectare (a hectare is equal to two and one-half acres); before the German invasion, land in the Department of the Nord was valued at $885.00 per hectare, in the Pas de Calais at $800.00 per hectare, and in the Somme at $360.00 per hectare. Of the 130,000 French factories, 25,763 are situated in the occupied departments. Their value is estimated at thirty-eight per cent of the total value of the manufactories existing in France. Before the war the inhabitants of these departments paid no less than $172,200,000 in direct taxation. These districts were not only rich in agricultural, commercial and agricultural resources, but were also noted for their large and constantly increasing families. In the whole of France there were only thirty of the eighty-six departments in which the population was increasing before the war. Among the ten invaded departments, seven were in that category.

The Invaded Territory

Germany.—Among the messages forwarded to the German Emperor thanking him for the proclamation of the new Kingdom of Poland, the most notable were those from the Archbishop of Gnesen-Posen and from the League of the Polish Commonwealth. Protesting his unswerving loyalty, the Catholic prelate expressed his gratitude, in his own name and in the name of his diocesans, "for the restitution of an autonomous Polish Kingdom." He prayed that his Majesty's "magnanimous resolution" might be to the welfare of Germany and of the new State, which he confidently hoped "will fulfil its historic mission as a bulwark of Occidental civilization and the bearer of the Catholic Faith in the East."

The New Kingdom of Poland

More warlike in tone was the message forwarded to the Emperor by the Representatives of the League of the Polish Commonwealth. "We recognize," they said, "the confidence reposed in us and answer it with equal confidence. We believe and hope that the promises in the proclamation will be fulfilled, and we are determined to give our property and lives to develop the Kingdom of Poland at the side of our liberators as an independent and powerful State." The exact boundaries of the new kingdom have not yet been determined, although according to the most recent proclamation it is to consist of "the Polish territory delivered from Russian tyranny." As hitherto specified, therefore, Prussian Poland and Austrian Galicia are not to be included. The manifesto itself declaring the independence of Poland is as follows:

His Majesty the German Emperor and his Majesty the Emperor of Austria and Apostolic King of Hungary, inspired by firm confidence in a final victory of their arms and prompted by a desire to lead the districts conquered by their armies under heavy sacrifices from Russian domination toward a happy future, have agreed to form of these districts a national State with a hereditary monarchy and a constitutional government. The exact frontiers of the Kingdom of Poland will be outlined later.

The new kingdom will receive the guarantees needed for the free development of its own forces by its intimate relations with both Powers. The glorious traditions of the ancient Polish armies and the memory of the brave comradeship in the great war of our days will be revived in a national army. The organization, instruction and command of this army will be arranged by common agreement.

Hopes are then expressed that the Polish wishes for the development of a national kingdom will be realized, due consideration being given to existing conditions. The new realm is to be "a free and happy State, enjoying its own national life." A more recent document makes clear that the administration will at present be kept in the hands of the allied Germanic Powers. They pledge themselves to give to the Polish Kingdom by degrees, in cooperation with the Poles themselves, "those public institutions which will guarantee its consolidation, development and safety. Of these the Polish army is the most important." In order to "complete their victory over their oppressors" the Poles are invited to step to the side of the Central Powers: "You will protect your country under your own colors and flag, cherished by you above all. We know your courage and your ardent patriotism, and call you to arms at our side." The response with which this appeal for volunteers will be met may perhaps be the best index of the popular sentiment.

All doubt has been set aside regarding Germany's desire to cooperate in an endeavor to find a practical means for insuring a lasting peace by means of an international league, though certain conditions are definitely laid down by the Imperial Chancellor. At the end of this horrifying war, he thought, the nations of the earth would certainly seek for peaceful arrangements to prevent the repetition of such a monstrous calamity:

Peace League Plan

Germany will honestly cooperate in the examination of every endeavor to find a practical solution, and will collaborate for its possible realization. This all the more if the war, as we expect and trust, brings about political conditions that do full justice to the free development of all nations, of small as well as great nations. Then the principles of justice and free development, not only on the Continent but also on the seas, must be made valid. This, to be sure, Viscount Grey did not mention."

The fault he had to find with the ideas of the British Foreign Secretary in regard to international guarantees of peace was that they took into consideration the British wants only. Describing in great detail the origin of the war, he asked: "Who wanted war? We who were ready to give to England all imaginable securities, not only for her immediate interests, but also for France and Belgium, or Viscount Grey, who declined every one of our propositions and refused even to hint at a way by which to preserve a just peace between our two countries?"

Great Britain.—According to the Catholic Times, and other journals, an increase of juvenile crime has been noted since the outbreak of the war. No figures are given, but the causes of this unhappy condition have been discussed at some length. In some instances, juvenile delinquency can be traced to homes broken, at least temporarily, by the departure of fathers and guardians for the war. As a consequence, the discipline of the home suffers relaxation, and the young assume a degree of freedom to which they have hitherto been strangers. The war has also, as it would seem, caused a considerable weakening in the elementary schools, since many of the teachers are engaged in military service. The introduction of children into many fields of labor hitherto closed against them, no doubt has had its part in contributing to delinquency. It is to be noted that nearly all the journals discussing the subject assign "visits to the picture-palaces which rouse the spirit of adventure," as one of the chief causes of the increase of juvenile disorder. The London County Council has undertaken a serious study of the matter through the formation of "Care Committees," and this course has also been adopted in other parts of the country. These Committees will endeavor to impress upon guardians the necessity of sending their children to school regularly, and of watching over them carefully at all times, "stressing the necessity of obedience." The "war after the war," predicted for Great Britain as well as the other countries now in conflict, may be a reality scarcely less bitter than battles now fought on sea and land. To realign the educational, social and economic forces of the country is the problem that will perplex nations and statesmen for the next generation.

The "War After the War"

Ireland.—It has been officially announced, says the Irish Catholic, that Sir William Patrick Byrne, K.C.V.O., C.B., has been appointed Under-Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The new Under-Secretary, who was born at Withington, Lancashire, is 57 years of age, and a barrister of Gray's Inn. He is of Irish descent, a Catholic, and was educated at St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw, and St. Bede's, Manchester, after which he entered the service of the General Post Office. In 1884 he was transferred to the Home Office, where he became Senior Clerk in 1896 and Assistant Under-Secretary of State in 1908. In 1910 he was appointed Registrar of the Baronetage, and in 1913 Chairman of the Board of Control in connection with the Home Office. In 1894 he acted as Secretary to the Departmental Committee on Riots, and later as Chairman of the Home Office Committee on Inebriate Reformatories, and as a member of the Royal Commission on the Feeble-minded. In 1910 he was one of the British delegates to the International Conference in Paris on Aerial Navigation. To this brief sketch the Irish Catholic adds: "Every fair-minded person will wish Sir William a happy and successful tenure of his office in a period of difficulty without precedent during the last hundred years. "It is also to be hoped that Lieutenant-General Bryan Mahon, lately Commander of the British forces on the western frontier in Egypt, and now appointed to succeed Major-General Sir John Maxwell as Commander of the British forces in Ireland, will use his extensive powers with the utmost wisdom and discretion. The times require this, for in addition to the political troubles which are agitating the country and which call for a speedy and just settlement, the enormously high price of foodstuffs, according to a statement of the Dublin correspondent of the Daily News, is everywhere causing the most serious alarm. The Irish potato crop, it has also been reported, has been attacked with another blight which may cause a great deal of suffering and misery.

The New Under-Secretary

Rome.—The death, at the age of seventy-two, of Cardinal Della Volpe, Prefect of the Congregation of the Index, has removed a loyal and devoted servant of the Church and the Papacy. At the time of his death, besides being the Prefect of the important Congregation mentioned, the deceased Cardinal was Camerlengo of the Holy Roman Church, and Chancellor of the Roman University. He was born on December 24, at Ravenna, and was descended from the noble family of the Counts Della Volpe, long distinguished in Italian history. He studied at the Seminario Pio in Rome and was ordained priest in December, 1867. After studying till 1874 in the Academy for Noble Ecclesiastics, he became Secretary of the Congregation of Indulgences and Chamberlain to his Holiness Piux IX. He was a member of the Extraordinary Embassy sent to Moscow by Leo XIII on the occasion of the Coronation of Alexander III, by whom he was decorated with the Order of St. Anne. He was appointed Maestro di Camera by Leo XIII in 1886 and Majordomo to his Holiness in 1892. He was created Cardinal by Leo XIII, reserved in petto in the Consistory of June 19, 1899, and proclaimed on April 15, 1901, his title being that of Sancta Maria in Aquiro. Besides holding the offices mentioned, he was a member of the Propaganda and Consistorial Congregations and was one of the Commission for the Administration of the Revenues of the Holy See.

Death of Cardinal Della Volpe

Spain.—King Alfonso has gained another victory by his charitable and humane efforts to mitigate the horrors of the war. The Spanish press has just published the various stages of the monarch's latest negotiations, which have been crowned with success. In April, 1915, the Spanish Ministry transmitted to the French and German Governments the generous and spontaneous offer of the King to intervene personally in behalf of the prisoners of both countries, in order to obtain a cessation of reprisals, and the suspension of judicial penalties imposed on some of the prisoners, until the termination of the war. After long and intricate negotiations, in which the King displayed the greatest tact and diplomatic skill in his correspondence with the two Governments, France and Germany have reached an agreement, as a result of which, not only has the system of reprisals been discontinued, but the judicial penalties have been suspended. This clause of the agreement includes those penalties already imposed and those which might be in future imposed for acts committed prior to the agreement. Alfonso and Benedict XV have, so to say, worked side by side for the welfare of the prisoners and sufferers of the war. The Catholic world knows of the efforts of the Holy Father. It is but just that the services of a Catholic king should not be forgotten. The Spanish people are proud of its ruler. The men of Spanish blood in the Republics of South America share in that pride. The Irish Catholic, to whom we owe these details, informs us that the great Buenos Aires daily, La Nacion, lately devoted one of its editions to an appreciative review and study of the monarch's generous and humane conduct in all its phases. It cordially thanked the King in the name of the people of Argentina, invited him to visit the Republic and assured him of a most enthusiastic welcome.

The King and the War Prisoners

Cooperation Without Compromise

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

WEARY and jaded, she felt that to die was better than to live without hope. She seemed to be moving in an ugly dream, but at the age of thirty, she knew it to be a pitiful, sordid reality, and no transient phantasm of sleep. A drunken husband had carelessly gambled away her little fortune, and become a vagabond, leaving her with two small children. Then came an ill-advised legal divorce, with all the shame of publicity, and at the last, misery. When her woe was deepest, some one came like a ray of sunshine into her life. He was an old sweetheart. He wanted her, and she was willing to go to him, not so much because of anything he might give her, as for all that he would do for her little ones. One obstacle only stood between comfort for her, and a happy future for her children. She was a Catholic.

The tale is not novel. On the card-catalogue of any social-service clearing-house, it is repeated with sad reiterance. Nor, unfortunately, is the story altogether new in its conclusion. The unhappy woman, thinking only of her children, did not consult her pastor. She knew well that for king and beggar, the Church has but one answer, based on a decision even more unwavering than a mother's love. But she had a friend, a clever, energetic woman, a Fellow in social science, at a local university. She said but little to the desolate mother, except to bid her follow, and at once, the dictates of her heart. But to others she said much of ecclesiastical despotism which, rather than abandon one punctilio of its antiquated code, would break a mother's heart, and throw helpless children on the world's cold charity. She inveighed against the dangerously anti-social character of the Catholic Church, exhibited in its absolute prohibition of divorce, and in its promotion of poverty and disease, by the imposition upon marital relations of a fiction of medieval metaphysics, called the natural law. Modern society, as everyone not in a cloister knew, stood in sore need of rehabilitation. The world of thought had changed even as had the world of visible realities; and with the process of readjusting the individual, and society itself, to the new environment, no outworn superstition, however honestly held, could be suffered to interfere. Religion, indeed, might be enlisted as a valuable aid in the reconstructive process, but only in cooperation with the new forces energizing society, and always in a function wholly subsidiary.

Under the technical verbiage, the pronouncement is the familiar formula of the new school of social philosophy. "Society, working through the ideals of modern democracy, is the supreme arbiter of the individual's life and destiny. To society, and to our conception of its welfare, all other forces, whether educational, social or religious, must be subordinated." True, in practice, the formula often loses much of its innate viciousness. Yet no philosophy, founded on error, and no translation of this false philosophy into act, can work, save by accident, to the ultimate good either of the individual or of the race. It is this philosophy, embodying the apotheosis of a paganized State, which today rules the field of social science. Essentially, it is tyrannical; but some of its more thoughtful exponents, dimly sensing its inhumanity and consequent insufficiency, are now inviting "Catholic cooperation." To what degree can the invitation be accepted, if at all?

Cooperation implies a union, or at least an alignment, of forces working towards a common end. But another complex element must be added to complete the factors, and to state the conditions of the problem. The principles upon which the several forces propose to act, their scope and limit, must be clearly ascertained. The end may be laudable; but no man may employ an evil means to encompass a good purpose. The end, moreover, even when assumed as common, will be appraised in the light of fundamental principles, and these principles inevitably guide the choice of the means. It is clear, for instance, that the most advanced social democrat will be one with the most "reactionary" of Catholic philosophers, in the proposition that the welfare of the individual and of the community, is a condition to be promoted by all suitable means. But with the thesis yet warm upon their lips, differences will arise, first, on the true meaning of "welfare," and next, as to the "suitability" of the means. My Fellow in social science held vigorously, that the "welfare" of the mother in question, and of her children, was completely stated in terms of physical and mental conservation and development, and that the "welfare," both of these individuals and of the community, was licitly secured by remarriage after divorce. Either is a position which obviously renders Catholic cooperation impossible. Similar phenomena mark the growth of the "new thought" in other departments of social science. A school, daily augmenting its numbers and force, teaches that society works towards a desirable goal by encouraging extra-marital sex-relations, and by extending to all a working knowledge of contraceptive methods. Plainly, there can be no Catholic cooperation here. In spite of the alleged common end, "the welfare of the individual and of the community," there neither is nor can be, a common goal. The divergence between the two schools of thought is inevitable, complete, and radical. The Catholic sociologist must hold the existence of the natural law, with precepts, restraints and sanction, predicating the existence of God. The exponent of modern democracy does not. The Catholic may not allow that the welfare of the individual, adequately considered, can be contrary to this law, or secured by its violation. His modern brother either considers the natural law a dream of metaphysicians, or regards it as the summation of human conventionalities, directive in normal circumstances, but to be disregarded in cases deemed extreme.

In view of these fundamental differences, the plea for Catholic cooperation does not, indeed, seem to evoke a favorable reply. Yet after the encyclicals of Leo XIII, it scarcely need be said that there are many fields of endeavor for the common welfare, in which Catholics may well work in harmony with the most liberal of "social democrats." Such, for instance, are the protection of the laboring classes, through wisely regulated private associations, and when necessary, by legal enactment; the manifold problems of public health, and of proper community recreation; the suppression of gross external violations of public morality; and the encouragement of every community force which makes for thrift and sobriety. But even here, cooperation is worse than barren gain, when it tends to obscure the principles which must underlie all profitable social work, or leads the worker to esteem these principles of less worth, since, apparently, they are of small practical utility.

But while welcoming all possible cooperation, the present is surely no time for the Catholic social student either to hide his principles, or to gloss over fundamental differences. No good can come from a "cooperation" which disregards these differences, or involves a denial of essential principles. Black is not white, and the Church of God can enter into no true fellowship with any social force which denies or minimizes the absolute rights of God over men and nations. No power of diplomatic speech can reconcile the radical antagonism of the two forces which today are aligned with Christ, and with what Christ called "the world." Does the Catholic Church stand for anything that is definite in the great work of social reform? If it does, then let the message be spoken clearly and bravely by all Catholics.

This is neither the place nor the fit occasion for the voicing of this message. Yet certain truths which no one may relinquish without changing legitimate cooperation into fatal compromise, may be briefly noted. First, there exists a natural law, with clear precepts and prohibitions, and a sufficient sanction. Second, man as a rational being, living in time but destined for eternity, has inalienable rights and inevitable duties, with neither of which may any State interfere. Third, the family is not the creation of the State. No authority may unmake it by divorce, or by the sanction of unnatural practices, degrade it to a state which outrages the dignity of man's very nature. Finally, right does not consist in the material fact, nor is authority the sum-total of material forces; for, while within its sphere the State exercises full and legitimate authority, the ultimate source of all authority is God.

This program makes no claims to completeness. It merely sketches those principles against which certain modern schools of social science are directing an attack, characterized by plausible appeals to sentiment and expediency, rather than by truth or logic.

Roses or Regrets

FRANCIS A. MCCLOSKEY

ON the road to Ispahan, upon a wide plain in the Persian province of Fars, there stands today the mud-walled city of Shiraz, founded twelve centuries ago. Once the residence of Persia's monarchs and the favorite resort of her princes, the city that gave to Iranian literature S'adi and the honey-lipped Hafiz and many another poet and scholar, has by time and the convulsions of nature been greatly shorn of its ancient splendor. Even today, so redolent and ravishing are the rose-beds environing this neighbor of the fabled Persepolis, that "gardens of Shiraz" is a poetic synonym for floral fragrance and bloom. Yet there are two gardens, each planted by a Catholic priest, that are more admirable than the gardens of Shiraz. One of these gardens was the monastery garden of the Abbot Mendel at Brünn, in Austria, and the other is, or was, the garden of Father George Schoener at Brooks, in Oregon.

I have not space to tell even briefly the story of the Abbot Mendel's life; indeed, I have not space even properly to summarize his great contribution to science. I must, however, attempt to indicate the results of his search for the secrets of plant genetics. For eight years, through multitudinous experimental plantings of peas, he endeavored to discover the laws of plant heredity. For this purpose he selected two plants of the same species, i.e., peas, which had well-marked differences of color, height, shape of seed, and the like. One he used as the male, the other as the female parent. What, he asked, is the law of plant inheritance? Will the resulting hybrid resemble, for example, the tall parent or the dwarf parent, or will it combine these two characters and be medium in height? He discovered that it would exactly resemble one of the parents according as the character of that parent was what he called dominant over the character of the other parent. If tallness was the dominant character then dwarfness was recessive and disappeared. He therefore said the primary law was that the first generation was always like the dominant parent, or as he formulated it D (ominant) × R (recessive) = D (ominant). Next he inquired what would happen if he should breed from this hybrid generation, and he found that the hybrids never bred true but produced some tall and some dwarf peas, and always in a mathematical proportion of three to one. That is, if the original tall parent was dominant, the offspring of the hybrid progeny was always in the proportion of three tall to one dwarf. Therefore he concluded that the dominant characters are due to something which is absent from the recessive. Since the fertilized ovum formed by the original cross was made by the union of two germ-cells, the male and the female, both these elements entered into the composition of the original hybrid and if the germ-cells which that hybrid forms are bearers either of tallness or dwarfness there must, at some stage, be a separation of the ultimate factors which cause those characters to be developed in the plants. This phenomenon he called segregation. His discovery of this fact was the essential revelation made by Abbot Mendel. His conclusions were embodied in a paper which he read before the Brünn Natural History Society. This paper was published in the Society's journal but seems to have fallen on barren ground, for no attention was paid to his theories for upwards of a quarter of a century. About 1900, Bateson, Correns and DeVries, almost simultaneously, discovered the paper and gave its really basic theories to the scientific world. Meanwhile Mendel had been sleeping in the grave for twenty-five years. Today the name of Mendel is a household word in the world of science. His genius is everywhere conceded and his discoveries appraised with unstinted commendation. But what the world lost through its neglect of Mendel in his lifetime cannot now be estimated.

Brooks, Marion County, Oregon, is the place where another Catholic priest planted a garden, not merely a garden of Shiraz, but a garden of science, like Abbot Mendel's, and in which were to be worked out to their ultimate conclusions the laws announced by the prelate of the Königskloster. Here in tiny open spaces about his house and church and in the backyard of a neighbor, beside the right of way of the Southern Pacific Railroad, Father George Schoener began the double task of regaining his health and of developing Mendel's theories.

About five or six years ago, while stationed at Rochester in the diocese of Pittsburgh, Father Schoener's health broke down. His doctor ordered him to go west, to live in the open air and to engage in some outdoor manual exercise. Father Schoener was assigned to Brooks, a pastorate comprising about a dozen half-breed Indians. Territorially, however, his parish was Gargantuan and included two missions, with Mass at each on alternate Sundays. His Sunday school was almost peripatetic and was wholly pathetic; he went to the children, since they were too widely scattered to permit of their going to him. "From the start," he writes to me, "there was no income whatever, and I have been compelled to make a mere living from the things I raised in the garden."

On his journeyings up and down the Willamette Valley, on the ocean side of the Cascade Range, Father Schoener saw and wondered at the luxuriance and the ubiquity of the rose. In field and forest, in lonely lanes and on traveled highways, in the valley and on the mountain top, there were roses, roses everywhere. Father Schoener was a student; he knew his chemistry, his biology, his geology, his botany. His observations on his walks and his readings in his home led him to formulate certain theories that he longed to test. These theories were: (1) That the rose originated in the rosa Persica of Persia, Turkestan and Thibet, where centuries ago the rosa prima, as he terms the original genera, were much more alike in characters than are the roses of today; (2) That the rosa prima was filled with floral wanderlust and traveled from Persia across Asia and thence over the Behring Strait to Alaska and so down the Pacific Coast to California and to Mexico; that, indeed, it had traversed the world and had found lodgment in Africa, Australia, Europe and South America; (3) That a study of the characteristics of these progenies of the parent-rose showed that the variations observable were due to new climates, to different altitudes, to diverse latitudes, and to the varied chemical constituents of the soils; (4) That the skill of the hand of man and the design of the mind of man, if applied in strict accord with the Mendelian laws of plant heredity, not merely could reproduce in new localities the variations existing in other situations, but even could create new varieties. As a Catholic priest he saw nothing out of joint between these theories and his belief in a generic creation. So he began, in his hortus conclusus et disseptus, to put his theories to the test, and thereafter the passengers on the Southern Pacific had brief, blurred vision of an Oregon garden of Hesperus. And his name began to be on the lips of the rosarians of the world.

Chiefly Father Schoener wrought with roses, in itself a task for a horticultural Hercules. But he did not limit his labors to the "queen of flowers," Back of his ambition to develop the Mendelian theory to the end of the chapter, back of his fondness for flowers, he had another aim, formed in his wanderings about his parish. As he tramped up hill and down dale around Brooks, he saw luscious Bartlett pears fed to swine, ruby-ripe cherries rotting where they lay, ambrosial grapes decaying on the vine, everywhere an abundance of fruits and vegetables wasting for want of a market. There was an economic supply, potentially inexhaustible in quantity, illimitable in variety, and incalculable in value; but there was no corresponding economic demand. Oregon's population was not large enough to consume what her generous soil produced, and the ravenous markets of the populous East were too remote. There was a solution if it could be made; namely, to develop Oregon's products so as to render them immune to the perils of transportation. Therefore, he set about the evolving of new fruits and vegetables. He produced an ever-bearing raspberry, a cross from the raspberry and the blackberry; a cross from the cherry and the plum, a cross from the Siberian and the California apricots, a cross from the Oregon Hawthorn and the Spitzenberg apple, a pea with an edible pod, a corn maturing thirty days earlier than other corn, and a dozen other marvels of plant development. And always he grew roses. Then came the fire of October last and the oasis at Brooks became a lava-like desert. Yet, as the smoke cleared away and the charred embers of church and home and garden cooled and crumbled into ashes, there came an envoy from 200 of Portland's citizens urging Father Schoener to go to that city and undertake the establishment and superintendence of a project to be known as the Schoener Scientific Gardens. Hope renewed her flagging spirits. Archbishop Christie relieved Father Schoener from pastoral duties that he might give his whole time and entire energy to the new garden. Mr. Coe McKenna generously donated about ten acres at McKenna Park. Father Schoener moved to Portland, and he is there still. The ten acres are at his command, but the 200 citizens who were to finance the Schoener Scientific Gardens, where are they? Well, Father Schoener is now a priest without a parish, and without a cent. Mark you, Father Schoener was not seeking money. The men who invited him to Portland prepared a prospectus which declared: "Father Schoener might have replied to the Portland call in terms of such recognition [as one of the foremost scientists in the world]. He might have asked much for himself. But he stated his idea: 'The good of our neighbor and to make the world understand that it is good to live in Oregon.' He asked only cooperation." The italics are not mine!

I assume that, if need be, Archbishop Christie will assign Father Schoener to a new parish, but that is not the point. To bury Father Schoener in another Brooks is to rob the world of the economic value of his researches, to stifle his genius and to pluck a jewel from the diadem of Catholic science. Is the history of the Abbot Mendel to be duplicated in the biography of Father Schoener? This is no idle question; it may be large with dishonor and it may be big with glory and pride. Father Schoener's place in the sun of science is no uncertain one. From the Literary Digest for April 10, 1915, we learn that in England, in France and in Germany, he is regarded as the greatest of the exponents of Mendel's theory of plant-life and evolution. England's most noted rosarian, Miss E. A. Wilmott, recognized the world over as the foremost authority on wild roses, sent Father Schoener 1,000 wild-rose plants, gathered under every sky by the explorers employed by her to search the earth for new varieties. The Canadian Government, on one of its expeditions to the frozen North, found a rose that had wintered a temperature of 30 degrees below zero and sent it to Father Schoener that he might experiment with it. Our own Federal Department of Agriculture has sent him hundreds of plants for tests and analyses. But of Catholic confidence, encouragement, recognition or assistance, he has received nothing. If by the apathy of Catholic laymen, Father Schoener's wonderful work is destined now to be abandoned, the future will be pregnant with censure. In my former paper, "The Rosary of a Parish Priest," I asked a question. I conclude this paper with a different inquiry: "Are there no Catholics at all who will join a movement to make the Schoener Scientific Gardens a reality? Shall we have roses or regrets?" I shall hope for a more audible answer than my former question received.

Who Elect the President?

JOHN WILTBYE

WHEN John Jones steps into the little booth on Election Day, he may be, and often is, under many delusions as to his rights and power as a duly qualified voter. John probably cherishes a trusting belief, for he has never inquired deeply into the matter, that he is casting a direct vote for some gentleman aspiring to be President of the United States. In the next place, it is quite possible that, in common with a surprisingly large number of citizens, he has the impression that the candidate who receives the largest number of popular votes is thereby elected President.

As a matter of fact, when on November 7, 1916, John unfolded his ballot, and put a cross in the circle below the names of Messrs Hughes and Fairbanks, or of Messrs Wilson and Marshall, he voted directly for none of these gentlemen. The truth is, that there is no constitutional reason whatever why these names should have appeared on the ballot at all. Later usage put them there, and the purpose, let it be whispered, was to make the ballots, as far as might be, "fool-proof." So what John really did, was to cast a vote for a set of men called "electors," with whose names, very probably, he is totally unacquainted. Furthermore, as John ought to know by this time, the President is not, and has never been, elected by "popular vote." He is chosen by the electors, who in turn are appointed by the several States, "in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct." A little history will make this perfectly clear. In 1876 Hayes received a smaller popular vote than his defeated rival, Tilden; and in 1888, while Cleveland had a popular plurality of nearly 100,000, he nevertheless lost the election to Harrison.

It is clear, then, that the President is elected not directly by the people, but by the electoral vote of the States. The framers of the Constitution never even contemplated submitting this august office to a choice of the popular vote, although there was a time when the Convention provided that the President should be elected by Congress. On reconsideration, however, it was decided that the President should be chosen by electors appointed by the several States, "in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct" (Art. II, sec. 1). The same instrument fixes their number as "equal to the whole number of senators and representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress." In pursuance of this provision, electors have at various times been appointed in a variety of ways. In the early days of the Republic they were frequently chosen by the legislature, and this method was followed by South Carolina until 1868. Selection by districts, as members of the Lower House are now elected, was also in favor, and as late as 1828 about one-third of the States held to this plan. This method is now generally discarded, although Michigan returned to it from 1891 to 1893. Virginia, Maryland and Pennsylvania very early chose the electors by a direct vote of the State, and this system is now universal, although to change it is fully within the power of the State legislature.

The fact that the President is chosen by the States in this manner, and not directly by the people, has been subjected to fierce criticism, particularly by professors of the newer school of political thought. Professor Young, of the University of Pennsylvania, in his "The New American Government," complains that "the indirect system is a standing peril of civil dissension and strife," and holds that "the gravest and most serious weakness of the indirect plan is that one candidate may be chosen by the people while another is elected by the electors." But the very cases instanced by Dr. Young, the Hayes-Tilden controversy in 1876, and the popular choice, but electoral defeat, of Cleveland in 1888, fail to bear out his contention. There was no thought of "civil dissension and strife" in 1888, and even in 1876, there was none in the event. True, the Electoral Commission invariably voted on party lines, but the very machinery chosen to settle the dispute had the happy effect of cooling the angry feelings of all parties, and of arriving at a decision substantially just. Fundamentally, however, Dr. Young's objection seems to rest on a misapprehension of the nature of the American Union. The United States is a union, not of individuals or of voters, but of States. Fitly, therefore, is the choice of the Chief Executive reserved to the parties to the contract. The present constitutional provisions will not appeal to any whose ideal is to strengthen the central government, while reducing the powers of local government to a minimum. But the more conservative school, believing that a government such as ours, best consults its welfare by insisting upon the principle embodied in the Tenth Article, "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited to it by the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people," will regard any further delegation of powers with grave concern. The proposition bears within it the germ of tyranny. Finally, the danger of civil dissension insisted on by Dr. Young seems sufficiently met by the law of February 3, 1887, providing that tribunals appointed in and by each State shall in case of dispute determine what electoral votes are legal; and that if there be no such tribunal, the legality is to be determined by the two Houses of Congress. Here again, it may be noted, the original power of the State to decide with finality the legality of its elections is affirmed.

Supposing, then, the choice of the electors by the several States, the remaining steps towards the election of the President are, as a rule, a matter of routine. The Twelfth Amendment, adopted in 1804, directs that the electors meet in their own States "and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President." According to the Constitution, "Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes," and the Act of Congress of February 3, 1887, ordains that "the electors of each State shall meet and give their votes on the second Monday in January next following their appointment at such place in each State as the legislature of each State shall direct." It is supposed that these electors will cast their vote for the candidate of the party which has elected them, and this has always been done. On the other hand, there is no constitutional clause restricting their liberty, and no penalty can be visited upon Republican electors who cast their votes for the Democratic candidate, or vice-versa.

After this meeting, three certificates of the result are signed by the electors. One is sent to the President of the Senate at Washington by messenger, the second is forwarded to him by mail, and the third is given to the judge of the district in which the election is held. On the second Wednesday in February, as provided by the Twelfth Amendment, "the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." In practice, this has become a mere formality, since the result of the election is known long before.

The successful candidate must have a majority of all the electoral votes. If no candidate has this majority, the election is now made by the House of Representatives in the manner prescribed by the Twelfth Amendment, from "the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President." This unusual but constitutional mode of election throws into very clear light the electoral power of the State, since the members of the House vote not as individuals, but by States, each State having one vote. Twice in the history of the United States has the President been chosen by the House of Representatives. In 1800 Jefferson was elected over Burr, who, according to the original constitutional provision, changed by the Twelfth Amendment in 1804, became Vice-President. Twenty-four years later, in 1824, Andrew Jackson not only received a plurality of 50,551 over John Quincy Adams, but also secured ninety-nine electoral votes, while three competitors divided 162 votes between them. In the absence of a majority, the election was referred to the House, and Adams was chosen by a vote of thirteen States, against seven for Jackson and four for Crawford. Thus the dominating power of the State in the presidential election was again clearly affirmed.

Catholicism and Happiness

GARRETT PIERSE

BALZAC has a striking story of a scientist whose whole life was ardently devoted to the quest of the Absolute. Though he neglected the dearest ties of relationship for the sake of his pursuit, though he restlessly sought the great object as a miser seeks gold, he miscalculated through expecting to find the Absolute in created things. The scientist found the Absolute only in death.

The scientist's fate is a parable of life. All men are seeking happiness with passionate and feverish search. There is a veiled figure denied of all the nations of the earth. The God of their dreams is a hidden God. Partly for that reason, partly through their own negligence, many men make miscalculations in identifying this mysterious figure, the object of all human ambition. Some identify the desired object with wealth, and believe that this can satisfy an immortal spirit. Vain thought! Wealth does not meet the deep needs of the human heart, for the greatest millionaire ever seeks restlessly for more, and, until he is laid on the peaceful couch of death, his heart refuses to be quieted.

The great object of man's quest is identified by others with voluptuousness. Omar Khayyam ever had, and ever will have his followers. But the world has had time enough to test Circean wine and the Dead Sea apples of indulgence, and it has experienced that the wine becomes bitter and the apples become ashes. The heart of a voluptuary, even of a Solomon with all means of selfish gratification at his disposal, finds no rest. The ancient Ecclesiastes breaks forth into the sigh of vanity, and the modern Ecclesiastes, the Faust of Goethe, reveals to us wine, wit, wealth, and voluptuousness as the unsubstantial baubles of a child's dream that dissolves into illusion. Even the pleasures of the intellect do not quiet the cravings of the human heart. A Newton, after a lifetime of partially successful study, after having made a few giant steps across the boundary of the unknown, compares himself to a child gathering a few pebbles from the limitless ocean. The great Bossuet adds that the thoughts which have not the eternal for their object pertain to the domain of death.

Those who make frantic efforts to identify the goal of human desire with finite and created reality are like those in France who try to give solace to the grieved human heart in time of war, by beating drums and by singing the "Marseillaise." Human need is too deep to be satisfied by such pitiful fanfare.

Yet there must surely exist some worthy object to satisfy this deepest need of human nature. Unless the laws of nature are nugatory, this object exists. It is the method of science to recognize that faculties have their objects in nature. Correlative supposes the existence of correlative. The eye, when it was first made, supposed the existence of an object to be seen. The fin of the fish suggested the existence of water. The wing of the bird supposed a sustaining medium. Is it to be thought that the deepest need of human nature alone has no satisfying object? Is it to be believed that nature is vain? Not so. The object of human happiness then exists. It is not, we have seen, mere finite reality which can satisfy our hearts. It remains that only the Infinite, only God, is the worthy object of the quest of the human soul. The cry of a great genius, Augustine, rings true: "We were made for Thee O Lord, and our hearts will never rest till they rest in Thee." How appropriate was the phrase applied by the Old Testament to the Messiah: "The One desired of all the nations of the earth"! For all nature, whether rational or not, whether animate or inanimate, is groping after God.

Everyone, then, who has found God, has found a mood where all quest ceases. The thousand ills that flesh is heir to cannot rob him of that peaceful mood. The least in the Kingdom of God becomes akin with the most advanced mystic in the sharing of this gift of peace. The ceaseless mind and the restless heart find an oasis in the desert of life. But this rest in God, attained by life's weary pilgrim, does not mean a Buddhistic quietism. For the love of God must be a working love, a love manifesting itself in beneficence to God's children, a love having for model Him of whom it was written: "He went about doing good." While the heart rests in God, the hands do not rest, but ever find numberless works of beneficence to be performed. And this is one of the reasons why perfect happiness is not of this earth. For full happiness is the complete possession of perfectly satisfying good. But in this life, while our ideals are boundless, and our performances are limited, we can never be entirely satisfied with our works; there will always be room for a Divine discontent in regard to evil conditions. But external circumstances need never rob us of substantial peace and happiness. In this sense happiness is subjective, though it always supposes union with the great object of our yearning, God. Our minds are largely independent of external objects. There was a glimmering of this truth even in paganism, for example, in the noble attitude of Epictetus towards a tyrant: "You may imprison my body, but you cannot imprison my mind. You can send me to prison, but can you send me weeping?" Horace also finely dreamed of the man, just and tenacious of purpose, who could stand unmoved amid the crash of worlds. But the dream of paganism became the Christian reality. It became fact in the child martyr, Agnes, who played with the manacles of torture, and in the deacon, Laurence, who, on the gridiron for a death-bed, mocked his persecutors.

If the love of God is the attainment of happiness, it must follow that the only safe way to God is the only sure path to happiness. Catholicism is this way. Christianity brought the "glad tidings" to an unhappy world. The Catholic Church is still the accredited preacher of the glad tidings, for she alone is the Church founded by Christ. We know by whom her rivals were founded. We know who and what these founders were. Henry VIII we know and Luther we know. The churches they founded are of yesterday; they are dividing into sects, and hastening to dissolution. The Catholic Church is nineteen centuries in existence; she can be traced back to the Apostles, and to the glad tidings of Christ. Though old, she is not decrepit. Assisting at the cradle and the grave of empires of this world, she continues, because she is Divine, her ancient apostolate with pristine vigor.

Catholicism has inherited from Christ the legacy of peace for men. "Peace I leave with you: my peace I give unto you." That peace implies the mental satisfaction of one who has settled one's account with God. It may be possessed by one who carries the sword. It may be enjoyed by the beggar eating his slender crust. It may visit the convict in his lonely cell. But this deep peace is not possessed, nor given, by the world which knows not God. For it is a gift to those whose faculties are harmoniously fulfilling their Divine destiny.

If anyone doubts that Catholicism holds the keys of happiness and peace, let him consider its highest product, the saint. Let him reflect on the curious fact that somehow the epithet "unhappy" is never applied to a saint. We may speak of a contemplative saint, of an eloquent saint, but never of an unhappy saint. Such would be a contradiction in terms. Amid the severest rigors of mortification, amid the instruments of torture the saint retains his deep-seated happiness. Even in this life he begins his beatitude. Or let the doubter concerning Catholicism continue his studies by a first-hand consideration of those who on a priori grounds are supposed to have chosen an unhappy life. Let him visit a convent of nuns and he will observe that their faces are cheerful and their lives happy. Let him stand beside the death-bed of practising Catholics, and ask himself whether the Catholic religion has brought them no solace, no happiness. Let him question those who have departed from the tribunal of Catholic penance, where the miracle of restoration to God's favor has been accomplished amid tears of joy. Let him question some poor Catholic charwoman who may tell him, as she told me, that her only happiness in life was found in her visits to a Catholic church.

The great influence of Catholicism on happiness is brought into bold relief by a comparison with paganism, ancient or modern. The student of human history will observe that in paganism there is joy on the surface, but sorrow and unhappiness beneath. In Christianity the sorrow is on the surface, but beneath there is an abiding peace. A modern pagan has written: "Thou hast conquered, O pale Galilaean, the world has grown gray with Thy breath." But it is really with the breath of paganism that the world has grown gray. One has only to ask oneself whether the paganism at the coming of Christ was not sorrowful at the core. In an outburst of natural virtue a Juvenal puts forth an undying wail for the universal misery. Modern paganism, however pleasing a front it may show, is not less unhappy. Its smiling appearance only serves to disguise a broken heart; the worm that dieth not is preying on its vitals. Its apostle, Nietzsche, is one of the saddest figures in history. The fall of countries from Catholicism marks a change from a deep happiness to an underlying sorrow. The England that was "merrie" was Catholic England. The Continent that created the carnivals was a Catholic Continent, but the Continent which is losing hold of the Christian ideals is deluging the world with blood. Catholics were sufficiently pessimistic to recognize "this vale of tears," but they were optimistic enough to expect a heavenly Jerusalem, "a blissful vision of peace." They had the strong optimism resulting from the Christian belief that right and truth are on the winning side and will ultimately prevail, and that the unrighteous and untruthful are pieces of God's machinery gone astray, whose unfortunate fate it is to be crushed. "Either a believer, or unhappy," is a summary of Pascal's apologetic thought.

True just here this momentous question forces itself upon us. "Why does God allow his creatures to suffer so many evils?" If you ask the so-called advanced thinkers of our day they will attempt an answer, but the solution is not in their hands. Before the mystery they are reduced to childish explanations. But ask the little Catholic child taught the lessons of the Gospel, to solve the riddle, and, enlightened by a wisdom that neither Plato nor Nietzsche knew, he will answer: "Man is a sin-stained culprit whom God is punishing. A crime committed against the Creator at the very origin of our history has defiled us, deprived us of perfect happiness, and subjected us to sorrow, disease and death." Yet man by an imperious law of his nature looks for that felicity here below. He can attain it in part by embodying in his life the truth of Catholic teaching.

The American Drama

HENRY C. WATTS

AN interesting sidelight into one phase of American history is afforded by the exhibition of American drama which, with the cooperation of the Drama League of America, is being shown in the New York Public Library. The exhibits are chiefly books and manuscripts of plays, histories of the American stage, a series of posters going back considerably more than a hundred years, and portraits and engravings of famous actors and actresses. The exhibition gives a more or less connected consecutive history of the drama in the United States, and its value is both interesting and educational.

Curiously enough, the very earliest item in the American drama was not American but French. It was the first piece written and acted in North America, being presented on November 14, 1606. It was an allegorical play called "Le Theatre de Neptune en la Novelle France," and was written by Marc Lescarbot. The play appears in a volume of his works entitled "Les Muses de la Novelle France," which was printed in Paris in 1609.

The earliest, perhaps the first, of the plays in the English language written and printed in North America was a satirical farce written by Governor Robert Hunter of New York. This work, which bears the title of "Androboros, A Biographical Farce in Three Acts, viz., The Senate, The Consistory and The Apotheosis," is stated to have been printed at Monoropolis on August 1, 1714. The play is evidently the echo of an ecclesiastical quarrel, for it develops into a satiric attack directed mainly against the entrenched power of Trinity Church in New York City. At that time the Episcopalians in the American Colonies were considered a part of the spiritual fold of the Bishop of London, and Governor Hunter's satire may be found to be an attack on privilege at that early date before the Revolution. "The Prince and the Patriot," which bears no name but is stated to have been written "By an American Gentleman," was printed in London in 1756. It is a drama which may contain allusions to the history of the time.

But there are two plays that call back old days, when the American Colonies were still subject to the British Crown. The first of these hardly comes under the heading of a play, though it was undoubtedly acted upon a stage. Its title is "An Exercise containing a Dialogue and Ode, sacred to the memory of his late majesty George II." The exercise was performed by the student body at the public commencement in the College of Philadelphia in May, 1761. This is an interesting early example of a play forming part of collegiate commencement exercises. Another play that may be mentioned in this connection is one entitled "The Military Glory of Great Britain." This formed part of an entertainment given by the late candidates for the bachelor's degree at the close of the anniversary commencement that was held in Nassau Hall, New Jersey, on September 29, 1762. This play was printed by William Bradford at Philadelphia in 1762.

The playwrights of America asserted themselves at about this period, and their works are a very important item in the literary history of the country. "Pontiach or The Savages of America" is a tragedy by Robert Rogers, that was printed in London in 1766. The play is in blank verse, and there is strong internal evidence that it was never intended for production on the stage. It deals with the deceptions practised on the Indians by the colonists, and is one of the most interesting of early American plays on account of its valuable contributions to Colonial history.

There appear to have been but two American plays produced on the professional stage prior to the Revolution. The first of these, "The Conquest of Canada or the Siege of Quebec," was the work of George Cockings, and was staged in Philadelphia in 1773; the other, "The Prince of Parthia," a tragedy, was written by Thomas Godfrey. "The Mercenary Match," a domestic tragedy in blank verse by Barna Bidwell, was concerned entirely with native material, and had Boston for its setting.

The year of the Revolution was not without its dramatic significance. In 1776 there was printed at Philadelphia a tragicomedy by J. Leacock which bore the very revolutionary title of "The Fall of British Tyranny or American Liberty Triumphant." This play bears the sub-title: "A tragic comedy in five acts as lately planned at the Royal Theatrum Pandemonium at St. James's, the presumed place of action in America." The writers of the Revolution period were not behind their military compatriots in their energy, and there is a group of plays from the pens of these Revolutionary satirists. One that is especially worthy of careful attention is written by an unknown author, and bears the title, "The Battle of Brooklyn: A farce in two acts performed at Long Island on Tuesday, August 27, 1776." The play itself was printed in book form in Edinburgh in 1777.

In the development of the national character the drama played a conspicuous part. It is surprising to find that during the reconstruction period American letters were by no means neglected, and many dramas dealing both with native and Revolutionary history were produced. "Tecumseh or the Battle of the Thames," a drama in five acts by Dr. Emmens, was printed in Philadelphia in 1836. There is a surprisingly large number of dramas covering this period, contrasting more than favorably with the dramatic production of our own generation. Some of these bear reminiscent titles: "Love in '76"; "The Cradle of Liberty or Boston in 1776"; and two in manuscript, "The Battle of Stillwater" and "The Battle of the Eutaw Springs," this last being a drama in five acts and dating from about the year 1790. David Trumbull wrote in 1845 a drama in five acts called "The Death of Captain Nathan Hale," and in "The Spy," a fragment by Freneau, a dramatic story circles around Benedict Arnold, who is the villain or hero—whichever it is—of several dramas. Nor was Pocahontas forgotten, for "Pocahontas or the Gentle Savage" came from the pen of John Brougham.

One of the most historically interesting features of this exhibit is the collection of theatrical posters, the earliest of them dating from 1791 and 1796. The earlier ones have the prices in English currency, when the price of a box was eight shillings, and in later days the prices are given in American currency. Seats were cheap then: for $0.12½ a seat in the family circle could be obtained.

These posters will repay long and careful study, and with the help of a little imagination will bring up many a rare scene before the mental eye of the beholder. There is one poster in particular which is worthy to become a national treasure. It tells how James F. O'Connell, the celebrated tattooed man, who had lived for six years among the natives of the Ascension Islands, would make his third appearance on June 15, 1837, in a play specially written round his experiences.

From about 1850 on the national drama took on a very melodramatic turn. "Moll Pitcher, the Fortune Teller of Lynn," appears to have been a favorite, with its haunted house and other thrills, and was cheap at twenty-five cents for admission to the dress circle. Irish subjects too, came to be popular as the titles "St. Patrick's Eve," "The Irish Emigrant" and similar names show. Tragedies with historical subjects also found favor with the playwrights. There were two with the title "Thomas à Becket" and "Belisarius," "Cromwell," and "Anne Boleyn" are but a few of such tragedies. The earliest of these tragedies, "The Warden of Malabar," was acted in Philadelphia in 1790.

The collection of photographs and plates of famous American actors and actresses is an interesting feature in American dramatic history, and altogether the exhibit is of such comprehensiveness as to form a very pointed object-lesson in the history of American drama. A series of lectures is to be given on the drama, and a visit to the exhibition would form an excellent preliminary to attendance at the course.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

More about Julianne

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Concerning Father Blakely's "Is Julianne a Type?" in AMERICA for October 29, as I recall Dr. Coakley's article, that gentleman gave as one of the reasons why Julianne "painted," the fact that her mother painted. He did not attribute the painting entirely to Julianne's convent training, or to the lack of it, as the case may be. In any event, I admire Dr. Coakley's courage in venturing to write an article for AMERICA, suggesting that there could possibly be any defect in a Catholic school. I wish that more Dr. Coakleys wrote for AMERICA. It would be a relief from reading so many articles in exaggerated praise of Catholic schools and of Catholic institutions in general.

Indianapolis. M. N. ASBURY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The name Julianne, I take it, just now, if not generally, stands for a girl, educated in a convent school, who is rather frivolous and addicted to face-paint and extravagant dress. Of course, she has many sisters, not educated in convent schools, who may go by other names. We all know both her and her sisters. The history of one Julianne, whom I know, may be of interest.

Some thirty years ago, an Irish-Catholic man married a Protestant woman, a thing that sometimes happens even in this present enlightened age, although one would certainly think that the Catholic had temporarily left his light under a bushel and was using it as anything but a guide. However, that is a digression. This couple, at least, were not addicted to race suicide. Eleven children blessed their home, some of whom died in infancy. A few years after marriage, the woman became a Catholic and probably all of the children were baptized in the Catholic faith. There the matter ended for some years; for both the Irish Catholic and his wife drifted from the Church and sent their children to public schools. I cannot explain this anomaly. I can only state facts. Besides, my story has to do with Julianne, one of the daughters. Julianne was certainly wild, a trifle vain, fond of pretty clothes, and of cosmetics, as she grew older, but I do not deny that she was clever in many ways and good at heart. Perhaps all Juliannes are not so. This Julianne had many ambitions but I cannot dwell on all of them in this brief sketch. The one which most affected her life was a desire for a stage career. In fact, she actually tried to escape the confines of a rather comfortable home and embark on her hazardous career. This made the Irish Catholic think. I do not know whether the mother thought or not. At any rate, at no very distant day, Julianne was forwarded with her luggage to a quiet country home where a handful of gentle nuns were conducting an academic course. I doubt if Julianne had ever seen the inside of a parochial school, but she became very much in love with her new home and her teachers, although there she was forced to wear black and white and observe rules.

At the end of about two and a half years, Julianne returned home, having been graduated with credit. She was a very changed young lady, being something more than merely a pious Catholic. I may add, in passing, for the benefit of Dr. Coakley, that Julianne's graduation gown came from Paris. There is little, at present, to add to Julianne's history, as it is still in the making. She married, a few years later, a good Catholic man and her union has been blessed with several children, none of whom, I am quite sure, will ever see the inside of a non-Catholic school. I would also add, in passing, that Julianne had a brother who was of a disposition like her own. That is, he sought trouble of various kinds for his peace-loving parents. As a last resort, he too was sent to a Catholic school and the Christian Brothers managed to bring him back to the Church of his fathers. So far as I know, these two children, who had a short time in Catholic schools, are the only members of this rather large family who ever look inside a Catholic church.

For all I can say to the contrary, Julianne may still use face-paint, when her babies spare her the time; she may still read light literature under the same circumstances; and I am quite sure she still likes pretty clothes. But the gentle Sisters who made no objection when her wealthy parents sent her a graduation gown from Paris, had seen to it that there was the heart of a Catholic woman beating beneath the gown and Catholic ideas behind whatever cosmetic Julianne had managed to use in the imaginary adornment of her girlish face. Julianne, adorned with rouge and Paris finery, has faults which she realizes and virtues of which she is unconscious. Julianne has a cold and correct sister who has few of her faults and none of her virtues, little of her weaknesses, and still less of her charity. But it is Julianne who is preferred by those who know both.

Washington. T. L. F.

The Shoppers' Conscience

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your pages have instructed and interested your many readers, from time to time, on ethics for doctors, for lawyers, for politicians, for employers and employees, for teachers, and so on along the social list. Now could you not say something in behalf of us merchants that would quicken the consciences of our customers in regard to the manner in which so many of them seem to view their obligation of fair dealing, not to use any harsher terms for it?

Philadelphia. L. S. D.

Cecil Chesterton in the Army

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It will doubtless interest your readers to learn that Mr. Cecil Chesterton, whose articles have appeared in AMERICA, has at last been able to join the English army. Since the beginning of the war he has repeatedly tried to become a recruit, but each time, owing to a physical defect, he was rejected. But Mr. W. Walter Crotch, the President of the English Dickens Society, lately informed me that Mr. Chesterton has now been accepted. His brother, Mr. Gilbert K. Chesterton, made similar attempts, but each time his elephantine form was rejected by the Board. "Indeed," he remarked to me after one of his failures, "I think these fellows are right. I really don't think that I would be of much use on a battlefield, except to act as a barricade!"

I am sure that Mr. Cecil Chesterton's admirers and friends in this country, those who know him through his articles or who met or heard him while he was lecturing in this country two years ago, will remember him in their prayers now that he has entered upon another and, as always, gallant adventure. Mr. Gilbert K. Chesterton assumes the editorship of the New Witness.

New York. LOUIS H. WETMORE.

Christian Art Magazines

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of October 21, Mr. William Koehl, in a communication, expresses his regret that there are no magazines devoted exclusively to Catholic art. Any Catholic bookseller should be able to furnish him with Die Christliche Kunst, Munich, which has been published, to my knowledge, every month for over ten years. Then, too, there was "Christian Art," four volumes of which appeared under the direction of Ralph A. Cram, an acknowledged master in church architecture. For want of an appreciative clientèle it eventually failed, but so long as it was published, it was, as far as I have seen, without an equal from an art standpoint.

Cincinnati. B. A. L.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN;
Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

A Triumph of Law and Order

THE voice of the American democracy has spoken. Calmly and quietly millions of freemen have registered their verdict on a burning question which intimately affected their personal and civic welfare. Momentous issues had been placed before them. For several months American citizens had been constituted the jury which was to decide upon the worth and the merits of the two claimants who solicited from them the highest gift which it is in the power of the nation to bestow. The voters cannot now make the excuse that the case was not clearly stated, or that they were left in the dark as to the issues at stake. They understood our national problems, they cast their votes, and elected a President.

With regard to the result of the long-undecided contest, we have nothing to say. Every good American will accept it and bow to the decision of his peers. There is one feature, however, of the struggle of which every genuine patriot must be proud. That here and there, there will be mutual incriminations, accusations of fraud, electoral venality and trickery at the polls will surprise no one. But with the rarest exceptions, in every part of the country, in the quiet suburban districts as in the crowded city, law and order have been triumphant. In a crisis which to a great extent decides the destinies of the Republic for the next four years, and whose permanent influence may not perhaps be foreseen in its entirety, good sense, tolerance, self-control and respect for law have achieved a splendid victory. Divided as our citizens are by policies and by parties, all nevertheless felt that they were called upon to perform a great civic duty, peacefully. Proverbially tolerant and good-natured, they manifested that deference to the opinions of others, that mutual respect which befits men who, though differing in their views of platforms and programs, unite in love of their common home and country and hold one interest close to their hearts, its welfare.

On the bloodless battlefield where they met to decide the contest, they saw in each other not foes but fellow-citizens, and the ballots cast, retired from the field. One party triumphed over the other, and naturally celebrated its victory. But the American people are the real and the great victor. They have won a moral victory of respect for law, of civic tolerance and of manly submission to the will of the majority.

In such a triumph, the best qualities of the people stand forth in their finer proportions. For though there are in our civic and national life vices which the most fiery patriot must sincerely deplore, Americans are at bottom worthy of the liberty whose fate was a few days ago put into their hands. That liberty is a privilege and a blessing from which no true citizen wishes to debar his fellows. Hence, if a patriot or his party is beaten at the polls, the bitterness of defeat does not linger in his heart; if he is victorious, he does not use his victory to trample on his beaten foe. For he is an American.

The great electoral contest which we have just witnessed put a great strain on the patience, the forbearance, the good nature of the people; it tested their sense of justice. Americans have responded to the test in a manner that speaks volumes for their finer traits and augurs well for the stability and prosperity of the country.

London's "Popish" Shrines

AMONG the effects of the present war on the spirit and mentality of England perhaps there is none more revolutionary than London's recent addiction to wayside shrines that smack marvelously of downright "Popery." In the opinion of the Boston Evening Transcript's London correspondent, it is the English "Tommy" who is largely responsible for these shrines. During his campaigns in France and Flanders he has noticed the frequency of the wayside Calvaries, "which still keep alive in cruel times the savor of an Old-World piety." The correspondent continues:

> These outward appeals to a primitive faith must needs awaken many thoughts in the minds of men who are thrown violently back upon the elemental facts of life and death, and a clear visualization, however crude or casual, of the greatest sacrifice in history cannot fail to touch the hearts of men who are challenging Eternity for the sake of others. . . .
>
> Thomas with his keen eye for realities has noted how often the sacred emblem of the Crucifix has survived the battering of the German guns, and the destruction of village churches. . . . It is no wonder that this strange and haunting survival of the central image of Christianity has become almost a byword amongst the beholders.

On returning home for a spell on leave, these volunteers saw no reason why England should not have her wayside shrines, too. The soldiers found an unexpected ally in the Bishop of London, who proposed, notwithstanding murmurs of "Idolatry!" from Low-Church clergymen, that "the beauty and simplicity of the wayside shrines in Catholic lands" should also become a familiar sight in England. London was the first to adopt the suggestion. In their simplest form these shrines consist of a roll of honor containing the names of the soldiers who have enlisted from the neighborhood, the list is surmounted by a short prayer, a little statue of St. George, the patron Saint of the parish, Our Lady and the Divine Child or even an unmistakably Popish Crucifix, while the flags of the Allies and vases of flowers complete the adornment of the shrine. In some instances the names of parishioners killed in action are headed by the letters "R. I. P.," thus countenancing prayers for the dead. From such sights as these the Transcript's correspondent concludes that in England "Religion is not merely coming into her own again, but she is reverting to ancient forms and symbols that have long been condemned as obsolete." To behold the Protestants of England spontaneously adopting religious practices which were holy commonplaces with their Catholic forefathers, but which the dour and heartless "Reformers" cast out as evil, is certainly full of significance. If one result of the present war is to prepare England for her return to Catholic unity it will only be another instance of the way God works out His high purposes through human suffering and brings good out of evil.

The Venerable Pillotherium

THE American Museum of Natural History has just announced the addition of the skeleton of a pillotherium to its valuable collection of prehistoric mammals. The pillotherium was found in Colorado by Walter Granger, associate curator of the department of vertebrate palæontology. The discovery of the animal which, it is said, was a rat-like creature, the size of a bear, is a fact, and as such will be welcomed by the scientific world. The statement, however, that the animal "was in its heyday between the years 2,998,084 and 2,498,084 B.C." will evoke a smile. Since the authorities are so vague as to the date when the gentle pillotherium flourished, that they allow a latitude of no less than 500,000 years, why are they so insistent on the last three figures, 084? Could the toothsome pillotherium's joyous heyday have come to an abrupt end at that exact date, owing to the persistent depredations of some mammoth mouser, a gigantic grimalkin that appeared on the scene as early, to be exact, as the year 2,498,083½ B.C.? This pretense at scientific accuracy is absurd. The next step will doubtless be to weave round these dates an argument to prove that the Biblical chronology is false, contradictory to the facts of science, and that therefore Holy Writ, and especially the first chapter of Genesis, is discredited.

The fixing of the age of the recent "find" is merely guesswork of a very extravagant kind, one that stretches the most willing credulity to the breaking-point; but even if it had solid foundation, even if the age of the pillotherium were as far removed in the distant past as we are assured it was, it would not in any sense be in contradiction with the first chapter of Genesis. What Moses wishes to insist on is the fact that the origin of the world, and everything in it, is to be attributed to the creative act of God. With this statement Holy Scripture begins. The separation of all created things into the popular division of the heaven, the waters and the earth, and their further preparation for the use of man, are sketched by the inspired writer, not with the idea of giving a scientific description of the intimate constitution of things, but with the purpose of conveying to the Hebrew mind, in terms that would be intelligible, the important truth, that in the beginning all visible things were created by God.

The Mosaic narrative does indicate six distinct phases of Divine activity, but it is not necessarily concerned with assigning the exact order of these phases or their duration. About the exact significance of the Hebrew term, which is translated in the Douay Version as day, there has been and is great diversity of opinion. St. Augustine does not interpret it in the sense of twenty-four hours, at least not consistently; nor do certain others of the Fathers and Doctors. Neither does the meaning of the word itself demand this sense, nor does the recent decision of the Biblical Commission insist on it. The Church has never defined its meaning; but has left it, and still leaves it to the exegetes to determine. The fact of creation is a dogma of the Faith; certain details connected with creation are not. Should geology or paleontology arrive at conclusions that are certain and exclude all doubt, the Church will accept them. But that day is not yet. In the meantime Catholics are free to accept any credible theory that essays to reconcile the Biblical cosmogony with the facts of science, provided such theories do not conflict with the general sense of the Mosaic narrative, are held with due reserve for the judgment of the Church, and are in accord with the analogy of faith.

Sanctifying Crime

CRIME has been committed in every period of human history. There have been ages when men were bad, knew it, and confessed their sin. They possessed at least the virtue of not seeking to gild their vice, and this was a saving trait which shows that faith had not died away entirely, though it was unproductive of good works. A nation which sanctifies its vices has reached the lowest depths of degradation, and God's judgment awaits it. This state of affairs came to pass in the decadent civilizations of paganism when men's favorite vices were deified. But such manifestations are not lacking in our own day. Wrapped about in the robe of righteousness and wearing the halo of martyrdom, the apostles of humanity are preaching, in the name of human liberty, the violation of all the Divine Commandments. Eugenists, Marxists, anarchists, Shavian idolaters and supermen of every kind have their enthusiastic following. The laws of nature; the rights of man to life, limb and property; the principle of authority and the claims of an Almighty Creator upon his human creatures are not merely set aside, but the act of rebellion is surrounded with a stage-halo of glory. The angel of darkness is often transfigured into an angel of light.

This arouses our pity or our wrath, according to the education or position of the culprit, but it is a shock to behold a State union of labor, instituted for the defense of the just rights of the worker, degrading itself to the level of anarchism and glorying in its shame. It is in the labor union, if anywhere, that we should find the best manhood of a country. But apparently good men are becoming fewer each year.

In a letter sent out by the Indianapolis Iron Workers' Union an appeal is made to unionists in general to interest themselves in liberating the confessed criminal who dynamited the Llewellyn Iron Works, John J. McNamara, brother of the dynamiter of the Times building, where many lives were recklessly jeopardized and some were actually sacrificed. Nor is this appeal the result of impulsive sentimentalism. The members of the Indianapolis trade union leave us no ground for such a charitable interpretation. They cast the robe of sanctity around a most murderous act and proclaim that "Brother McNamara has been for years and still is an honored member" of their organization.

When the crimes of the McNamaras were confessed, and the world had somewhat recovered from the shock of the revolting revelation, people were not only willing, but anxious to believe that the funds of the union had been misused by a villainous clique who hired these professional anarchists without knowledge of the duped members of their trade union. The declaration now put forth in the name of the State union itself repudiates any such interpretation. It glories in the murderous deed and announces that John J. McNamara is and was an honored member of their brotherhood. At the same time it pledges its "loyalty and support" to the other "imprisoned brothers" who had distinguished themselves in these heinous violations of human and Divine law. Such is the ideal this trade union, embracing the entire State of Indiana, is presenting to its members.

We would not in our dreams accuse American labor in general of subscribing to such sentiments. Yet here is an undoubted, an authentic deification of crime by a great labor body. We have gone far on the downward path when such a thing is possible. It should give food for serious thought to all concerned in the welfare of this country. Catholic workingmen have an heroic battle to sustain to save the labor movement from anarchistic and socialistic propaganda. We must give them all possible support, for they will need it in the days to come. The law of God above all things! This must be the watchword of labor and capital alike. There is peril for that law in the signs of the times.

The Skeleton in England's Closet

IT would not stay hidden in the darkness. It has leaped forth gaunt and hideous to the light of day. All England has been frightened and disgusted with the repulsive apparition. It is the same monster which has deprived France of thousands of her children, robbed one of the fairest parts of the United States of the offspring of the Puritan, and is spreading crime, immorality and death in thousands of families and homes.

According to the Rev. E. J. Quigley in an article entitled "England's National Morals," written for the Irish Theological Quarterly, the declining birth-rate in England has long been a source of anxiety to politicians, and to those who in some way know its shameful causes, "a source of grief and shame." The National Council of Public Morals, an unofficial organization made up of leading men in church and State, but backed by the Government, has lately been studying the question.

The revelations made are of a startling and depressing character. Most of them are out of place in AMERICA. They show that the hideous thing that we know by the name of birth-control is making terrible inroads into the families of rich and poor alike and that if something is not done to stop the ravages of the moral plague, the words which Dr. Saleeby spoke before the Commission will be realized with far more truth than he himself expected: "We own an Empire which is almost empty. . . . I do not know how we are to continue to fly our flag over this Empire unless we people it." The eminent doctor's words will be understood in their full significance when we read that the birth-rate fell from 36.3 in 1876 to 23.8 in 1912.

The Commission wisely set to work to find out the origin of the frightful cancer which is eating out the heart of the nation. For Catholics there can be little doubt as to the paramount cause of the evil. It is in the generality of cases the desecration of the marriage bond, the shirking of the noble responsibilities of parenthood, the love of a life of pleasure, materialistic views of life, the loss of the fear of God, and as a consequence, a heart coarsened and defiled by the things of sense and the allurements of vice. But there are other causes and the Commission wisely points them out.

Undoubtedly in many cases large families are regarded as curses because, owing to the poverty of the wretched surroundings in which the children have to be brought up, parents, not otherwise corrupt, are loath to burden themselves with the cares and worries which children entail. Dwellings in which the wives of workmen can find a material incentive to the duties and responsibilities of motherhood, in cheerful surroundings and with the reasonable comforts which their offspring require, may not prove an altogether ineffective remedy, though only a partial one for the evil of birth-restriction. Nothing should be neglected which in its feeble way can help to stop the onrush of this curse. Husbands and wives are certainly not guiltless, but their sin may be in some way, not indeed excused, but explained when they refuse to bring into the world children doomed to a premature death from want and disease in the miserable hovels in which they spend the few days of their wretched existence.

The workman deserves a decent home. It should be provided. Rightly then does the Commission call attention to the ever-present housing question and recommend that everything possible be done to provide the poor with a home. But the work should not end here. Neither husband nor wife can conquer sin without God's help. The Commission should provide the poor with homes and point the way to God.

Science in the School Program

"MY little girl," writes a college professor, in a recent number of a New York journal, "knows all about Carlyle and Kipling." This is not an ebullition of fond pride, pardonable in a parent, although without foundation, but the beginning of an indictment drawn against "modern education." But one wonders at the excessive note of grief sustained throughout the professor's complaint. Whatever may be said for Kipling, Carlyle is surely a character well worth study; and to know "all about Carlyle" is to have in hand the matter for a biography of that dour Scot, which the world will prize.

However, the professor is not put out, precisely because his little daughter is so unusually well equipped to undertake, at no distant date, the compilation of adequate biographies of Kipling and Carlyle. In fact, so the reader gathers, he might reconcile himself to his daughter's affliction, did the child possess even an elementary knowledge of the first steps in science. "If she knows anything about the sun and the moon," he mourns, "her knowledge is not derived from her school teachers." These benighted schoolmen have kept the youngster on the sparse diet of Burke, Kipling and Carlyle, whereas, explains the professor, "a very few story-tellers will amply suffice for the world's needs."

This last sage observation induces the canny suspicion that, if the little girl is in ignorance regarding "the sun and the moon," her scientific father is somewhat in the dark on certain points of literature. To class Burke and Carlyle with the "story-tellers" is a rash act, calculated to make the judicious grieve. Perhaps the moral of the professor's plaint is found in the rather threadbare conclusion, which, however, he neglects to draw, that every well-balanced school program ought to mix literature and science in suitable proportions. There would seem little danger in these days that science might fail to receive its due proportion, yet the danger was never greater. Winding armatures is not physics, nor is mixing the contents of test-tubes chemistry; and to train a child's fingers, while neglecting his mental reactions, is most certainly not to teach him science. Usually it is an excellent training in mental shiftlessness. But it is common enough today, and to this extent the professor's complaint that the typical modern school does not teach science, is fully justified.

Literature

THE IRISH REVIVAL

IT is as difficult to point out the exact moment at which any movement begins, as to assign the precise date on which the forces of winter are definitely routed by the bright-clad hosts of the vanguard of spring. But many will agree with Ernest A. Boyd, the author of "Ireland's Literary Renaissance" (Lane), that on the day when James Standish O'Grady discovered, while poring over the rugged but inspiring pages of O'Halloran's "History of Ireland," that his country had a splendid but much-neglected past, the movement known as the "Irish Literary Renaissance" was begun. It did not, however, take definite shape and form until 1878, when O'Grady published the "Heroic Period" of his own "History of Ireland." It would be hard to exaggerate the importance and the influence of this work It made at once a stirring and solemn appeal to the imagination and the heart of the Irish people. Keating, O'Donovan and O'Curry had, it is true, embraced the field of Irish history. but they had surveyed the ground in the light of scholars and antiquarians. O'Grady was to retouch the theme and bathe it in the golden light of poetry and romance. These older historians had excavated from the rich soil of Erin's past mounds of precious ore, but these had long stood "in gaunt uselessness." The hand of a deft craftsman was needed to chisel all this wealth into artistic beauty, into the sharp-lined cameo, and the nobly set gem of lasting literary form. In poetry the "first flutterings" of the Irish spirit in English literature had been heard in the Melodies of Moore. Then the stirring notes of the trumpet voice of Davis carried the hopes of a whole people, their fears and their hate, into every home in Ireland.

Before O'Grady was to reconstruct the heroic past of his country, two poets, James Clarence Mangan and Sir Samuel Ferguson, had already turned the attention of their countrymen to a storied age and shown them that in the bardic songs, in the ballads of the Gael, in the folk-tales as old as the race itself, they had a great literature in the native tongue, which should now be recast in the language of another people though still preserving all its beauty and compelling charm.

Mangan had been true to this inspiration by fits and starts only, but at times with real flashes of genius. Ferguson had not the fire, the imagination, the pathos of Mangan. But the vast store of Celtic lay, story and song proved for him a more constant and steady source of inspiration. If his work seldom reaches the height of emotion and that standard of rhythmic perfection reached in Mangan's "Dark Rosaleen," it preserves on the whole a steadier flight. While the legendary history of Ireland had never been forgotten among the people, and the bardic melodies had been constantly sung at the fireside and were known to thousands, it was to Ferguson that the honor fell of making them largely known in Anglo-Irish literature. It was from him that English readers learned in a form worthy of the subject the tragic story of the House of Usnach, of Naisi and Deirdre, and of the mighty deeds of the Irish Hector, Cuchulain.

O'Grady, the professional historian, goes a step further than the poet. Cuchulain, Naisi and Deirdre are not for him mere poetical and legendary personages. They live as the great protagonists of the epic age of Ireland. They are really and in the flesh his ancestors, of his blood and race. He sees them fighting their titanic battles, living, struggling with pathetic tragedies, suffering their doom on the plains which he knows so well, by the shore of the rivers and the lakes whose waters sparkle under his very eyes. It is no wonder then that both in his "History" proper, in his novels such as "Red Hugh's Captivity," and in his "Bardic History," he attains a force and power of visualization, a Homeric sweep and picturesqueness of phrase which become at times a startling revelation to the reader.

The trend of the Irish Revival as manifested by this original writer was decidedly noble and along the true lines. For there are in the past history of Ireland, pagan and Christian, all the elements of a great literature. There was first of all a really noble people. That is the very foundation of all high art. In the Irish people, imagination, sensibilities, affections, intellect, heart were of finest mold. Laws, customs, ceremonial recalled by their simplicity and rugged sincerity the days of the patriarchs and the heroes of the Iliad and the Odyssey. In their passionate and rich nature, ever amenable to the highest call of duty, responsive to its inspirations and most lofty idealism, answering every mood of tender compassion for the weak and of chivalrous opposition to tyranny and injustice, they presented to the poet and the story-teller one of the most fertile fields for study and analysis. And the writers of the Erin of the past, whose echoes the men of the Renaissance are anxious to recall and revive, had for the scenes of their battles, their forays and their feasts what appeared to be an enchanted land, where poetry seemed to have reared its temple by marge of lake and river and in those mysterious dells, where elve and sprite and pixie and the mischievous but lovable imps of legend were believed to have made their home. The physical features of Ireland were the fit and natural haunts of poesy. Greece itself was not more favored. For the noblest panorama was forever before the poet's eyes: mountains garbed in mystic clouds, lakes of bewitching beauty strewn like a chaplet of pearls over the vesture of a queen, rivers tracing their curving arabesques where light and shadows blended, vales of more than Arcadian loveliness deep-hollowed in the heart of the hills, and around the enchanted isle the great ocean everywhere stretching its arms to clasp those emerald shores in its strong but loving embrace and ever singing its deep-toned but tender lullaby. The instrument the people used, the language of the Gael, was rich, musical, flexible, capable of running the full gamut of passion, while in the power it had to paint certain phases of emotion, the love of home, the tender relations of family and domestic life, the martial strains of war and all the sudden turns of thought of a race proverbially quick to seize the hidden purposes of friend or foe, it was well-nigh unsurpassed.

A return then to the ways of the Gael, to his high idealism, to the virility, the tenderness, the quaint humor, to the laughter and the tears, to all the nobility of the older generation, is to be heartily welcomed. Where the Irish Revival has done its best work, these qualities greet us, as in those distinctively Celtic poems of Katharine Tynan, "The Pursuit of Diarmid and Grainne," "The Fate of King Fergus," and in those where the religious element predominates, as in "St. Francis to the Birds." The old Gaelic note has also been struck by Douglas Hyde, who, though not a Catholic, has nevertheless in that precious anthology, "The Religious Songs of Connacht," preserved for us a wonderful treasure, where the heart and the faith of a people speak with a depth, eloquence and a quaint and winsome simplicity that reveal a strong but finely fibered race It may be heard also in the humble note of Joseph Campbell's "The Gilly of Christ," and in Miss W. M. Letts's "Songs of Leinster." It vibrates with a more classic chord in the hands of Lionel Johnson, who, though an Englishman by birth, was swept into the eddies of the Irish Revival, and in the death-dirge of gallant Thomas MacDonagh cut off ere he could grow to perfect poetic manhood, it wailed a solemn and tragic note, the song of the swan fluting its last melancholy notes with eyes lifted to the brightening skies.

But other voices have been heard with greater insistence and in certain circles at least with more popularity and favor. Though they are to a great extent the best-known representatives of Anglo-Irish letters, they have nevertheless been in many ways false to the finest ideal of the Celtic literature which they are so anxious to revive. That William Butler Yeats, Arthur Millington Synge, Lady Gregory, George Moore and other lesser lights, have literary gifts, much as we must reject their philosophy of life in general and their distorted and coarse views of Irish life and character, it would be absurd to deny. At the same time, their talents have been grossly overrated. Like the sorry hero of George Moore's "Lake," they have left behind them the sacred vesture of genuine Celtic poesy and plunged into the turbid streams of doubt, coarseness, ribaldry and sensualism. If the Irish Revival is to succeed in giving to Ireland an Anglo-Irish literature truly representative of the nobler spirit of the people, it must not be left in the hands of the men of the school of Synge with his low caricature of Irish life in "Riders to the Sea," or his repulsive "Tinker's Wedding." The "Where There Is Nothing" of W. B. Yeats will show to what emptiness such leadership would condemn it. And how can a real Irish Revival be helped by that dilettante in depravity and pseudo-gospel criticism who has used his talents, whatever they be, to besmirch with his coarse sneer that one Sacred Name which, in spite of trials and persecution and blood, untold sufferings and tragic woes, Ireland's sons have never as a nation or a people betrayed or blasphemed?

These are not the men whom Ireland wants to guide her in the great movement which she longs to see crowned with results worthy of a great and heroic history. They are not of the stock from whom salvation will come. Their efforts, if not counteracted by a return to the brave, the chivalrous, the soul-uplifting traditions of the soil, will Ibsenize and Zolaize the new movement, steep it in the malodorous miasmas of Shaw and Baudelaire and in the vaporous but dangerous mysticism of Maeterlinck. Unfortunately, however, this is what Mr. Boyd, excellent as his book is in other respects, fails to discern.

But the stories of Maeve, Fergus, Ferdia, Conchobar, Laeg, the brave epics of Ultonia, the deeds of Ireland's kings and heroes, pagan or Christian, the ballads and the lays of a noble people, the ways of the peasantry such as a Kickham or a Sheehan can depict them with their weaknesses but also with their splendid virtues, the simple songs that Ethna Carbery can lilt—these are ever welcome; in them are to be found the true sources of that inspiration which brings the movement to the only result worthy of the Irish people. JOHN C. REVILLE, S. J.

REVIEWS

The Elements of the Great War. The Second Phase: The Battle of the Marne. Illustrated with Diagrams. By HILAIRE BELLOC. New York: Hearst's International Library Co. $1.50.

Those who have read the first volume of Hilaire Belloc's "Elements of the Great War" will welcome the second instalment of the series. No one will question his qualifications for such a work. His familiarity with history and historical methods, his acknowledged reputation as a master of tactics, and the singular opportunities he has had for visiting the entire scene of conflict and of interviewing those who were engaged at all parts of the long battle-line enable him to speak with undoubted authority on a subject that has puzzled the minds of military observers more, perhaps, than any other event in the various campaigns. Mr. Belloc makes no secret of the shortcomings of his work, which are due mainly to the censorship exercised by the Allied war-offices over all reports and the secrecy they have maintained with regard to important details. But when due allowance has been made for possible minor corrections to be made later in the light of fuller information it will be generally acknowledged that he has given a credible and satisfactory account of the events that led up to the Battle of the Marne, halted the victorious and seemingly resistless German invasion of France, precipitated the marvelous retreat to the Aisne and the line of the Suippe, and falsified the predictions of experts as to the methods of modern warfare. The Battle of the Marne is in Mr. Belloc's opinion the most surprising thing in the whole course of the war, and the most far-reaching in consequences. He does not hesitate to declare that "It is not rash to say of the Marne that it should stand out alone among the great decisions in human history as a whole." Here and there are to be found characterizations of methods of thought and action that will not be pleasing to those who sympathize with Prussia; but even these personal prepossessions have not diverted Mr. Belloc from his purpose of giving a fair and impartial description of events as he has been able to ascertain them. Mr. Belloc's work is the clearest, the most detailed, and the most satisfactory account that has yet appeared in English of what is the most perplexing and in many ways, the most important event in the war. J. H. F.

The Life of the Caterpillar. By J. HENRI FABRE; Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS, Fellow of the Zoological Society. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50.

Bird Friends. A Complete Bird Book for Americans. By GILBERT H. TRAFTON. With Illustrations. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $2.00.

Mr. Teixeira has done a noble work in bringing to the notice of English-speaking peoples the marvels of J. Henri Fabre's "Souvenirs Entomologiques," from which he has made this his sixth volume. It is as if the caterpillars envied the bee its Homer and challenged the singer to make an Odyssey of their own adventures, for Fabre presents, in the pages of this book, the story, strange almost to weirdness, of the caterpillar that we crush so thoughtlessly under foot, and tells the tale so entertainingly that the book reads like a novel But the accuracy of the author's observations precludes deception and "The Life of the Caterpillar" is a scientific work of the highest value. Again and again Fabre makes long and painstaking experiments to come to the conclusion that "a paltry moth follows the harmonious laws of order." He sees the perfect symmetry and beauty with which the pine bombyx lays out her rows of eggs and wonders if all this "enters into the plan of an Eternal Geometer." He sees the psyche moth, so ugly and misshapen, representing to the black bombyx the "last word in beauty," and he can only say, "Beauty lies in lovers' eyes." He sees the female great peacock moth attract her male admirers despite all obstacles and concludes that odor, like light, has its X-rays. He sees the psyche moth decapitate itself to let the young ones live, and says "It staggers the mind of any one who knows how to think." It is too bad that so good a book was not proof-read more carefully. For this Catholic scientist's works are the best of antidotes for such charlatans as Haeckel.

Both the harm and the good done by birds is carefully recorded by Mr. Trafton in the second of the above-mentioned books, and the good is proved to preponderate by far. Every topic connected with bird economy is at least touched upon, authorities are quoted to substantiate almost every claim, and suggestions are given for further experiments. The author has a slight leaning toward the theory of evolution, but he does not obtrude it. He aims above all else to be interesting and practical and succeeds admirably in both objects. Our birds need protection and care and it is just such a book as Mr. Trafton has written and just such enthusiasm as the book breathes that will do a great deal to protect our "Bird Friends." C. L. B.

French Perspectives. By ELIZABETH SHEPLEY SERGEANT. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.25.

Miss Sergeant loves France as quelque chose à part dans le monde. Hers, of course, is not the Paris of the cafés and the boulevards; a native New Englander, college-bred, devoted to literary and sociological observation, with a wide acquaintance in the literary, artistic and university worlds of ante-bellum France, she portrays, in a series of vivid, moving sketches, such widely divergent types as she saw and "savored" in a cosmopolitan pensionnat, in bourgeois families of academic affiliations, in the hidden but heroic lives of Parisian working girls, in the bucolic recreations of free-thinking professors, and among priests, poets and people in the enchanted land of Provence. Through such cross-sections of French life and character, she seeks to reveal the power of France's ancient every-day virtues, especially "her 'professional conscience,' that love of work for work's sake, that passion for technical perfection, that scrupulous patience in carrying things through," by dint of which, she ardently believes, France will come forth resurgent from her present ordeal by fire. As a sociologist, she presents her data concretely, through deftly wrought episodes and bits of dialogue and by suggestion. Through her style runs a haunting but elusive rhythm, elevated by a dramatic sense vibrant with life, a delicate and infectious humor, and a power of phrasing so remote from the commonplace and the cliché as to rank, not inaptly, with the best modern French masters of the croquis: Bourget, Barrès and Bazin.

Of a book so charming and sincere as "French Perspectives," it seems almost ungracious to suggest that its only fault is a certain lack of true perspective. The author's observant eye, over-exercised in environments "Catholic though by no means clerical," is slightly dazzled by the artificial light of the rationalist intellectuels. To things Catholic, indeed, her incidental references are sympathetic. Yet, of the forces that first shaped and still produce that deeper strength and dignity she so much admires in the âme française, she has but dimly discerned the cumulative effect of Catholic thought and tradition from the ages of faith. M. Loisy, too, she might more justly appraise if, from a truer standpoint, she could see that, as a theologian, he is notoriously minus habens, distinguished for temerity rather than for breadth or acumen, and that, even in critical and historical lore, countless other equally erudite savants have found no reason to break with France's memorable and Catholic past. G. H. D.

Lady Connie. By MRS. HUMPHRY WARD. New York: Hearst's International Library Co. $1.50

The Leatherwood God. By WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS. New York: The Century Co. $1.35.

Here are two novels, very different in method, but similar in the high order of their excellence. Both are clean, clever, well-constructed. The former mounts to a more dramatic climax and sinks away into a more satisfying conclusion; the latter is more lifelike, less conventional, and possessed of subtler stylistic qualities. The English story is built on the narrative plan, and depends for its interest and its progression mainly on what the author tells the reader about the characters; Mrs. Ward is everywhere at one's side, interpreting the emotions of the actors, and telling a tale that took place in the past. The American story proceeds by way of dialogue and has for the source of its power the self-portrayal of the participants in the action; Mr. Howells effaces himself, one is scarcely conscious of his presence at all, the persons concerned in the tale stand out by the expression of their own individuality, their characterization is effected by their own words and deeds.

The first is a love story. Lady Constance and Douglas Falloden, who almost wrecks her happiness but finally completes it, are both wilful, with flaws of character, but they work out their destinies in the classic atmosphere of Oxford, and finally through suffering, their own and that of others for which they are responsible, they attain to moral maturity. The crise and the plot conform to type, it is only the skill with which they are handled that lifts them above mediocrity. There are several minor characters that are delicately drawn. But it is idealization that gives the book its charm. The second story, "The Leatherwood God," is an imaginative amplification of the actual events that resulted in a violent religious upheaval in a remote village in Ohio. The scene is laid in a little town just emerging from pioneer days, and the action revolves around the attempt, successful for a time but in the end a failure, of a clever impostor to set himself up as Christ and God. Unfortunately there is a deal of blasphemy in the tale, not the author's, however, but that of the various characters, for they are very real and give evidence of having been copied from life. The author has made no effort to soften their angles or remove their crudities, nor is he at pains to shape the attitude of the reader. It is a strange story, built upon a substratum of fact, but nevertheless "effectively fiction," remarkably well told, and adding another claim to Mr. Howells' already strong hold on the title of dean of American novelists.

J. H. F.

Your Boy and His Training. By EDWIN PULLER. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $1.50.

The Practical Conduct of Play. By HENRY S. CURTIS. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.50.

"Assuming the bionomic law," writes G. Stanley Hall, "infant growth means being loaded with paleoatavistic qualities in a manner more conformable to Weissmannism, embryonic growth being yet purer, while the pubescent increment is relatively neoatavistic." Unless one sits at his desk, with puzzled head between resolute hands, this passage is apt to remain somewhat obscure. But when Mr. Puller writes that "obedience is the fundamental law of child training, and upon it the development of future character is predicated," one has some hope for young William. Be his traits neoatavistic or even paleoatavistic, his parents, if they will but train him to habits of obedience from the very beginning, may feel fairly sure of making a man out of him. The beginnings of much delinquency Mr. Puller traces to homes presided over by "spineless parents," whose methods of government he scores as "slovenly, inconsistent, and wishy-washy." In his opinion, nearly every moral derelict can trace his failure in life to disobedience in childhood. Regretting that the public schools can give "no comprehensive moral training," although "the true function of education is first of all to build strong character," Mr. Puller asks that this deficiency be met as far as possible, by better homes and more active religious influences. Catholics will probably question incidental statements, but on the whole, Mr. Puller has written a book both suggestive and profitable to all who are engaged in the tremendously important work of turning the harum-scarum boy into a wise, good and healthy man.

Despite such bits of philosophy as assigning the child's love of a swing to "a reminiscence of our tree-top homes" in the days when our ancestors bridged leafy chasms by swinging from one another's tails, Mr. Curtis has written an excellent book. Sensible and practical in the main, its primary appeal is to playground organizers and play-leaders, but teachers and parents will also find it useful. On page 276, quite incidentally, perhaps unintentionally, Mr. Curtis pointedly states one of the strongest arguments against coeducation.

P. L. B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Mr. J. Godfrey Raupert's pamphlet "Spiritistic Phenomena and Their Interpretation" (Catholic Union Store, Buffalo, $0.20) is an authoritative summary of the errors and dangers of Spiritism. After describing the facts and the phenomena of the cult the author enlarges on their interpretation and reaches the conclusion that modern Spiritism is but "a revival, in scientific and systematic form, of that practice of necromancy and magic with which most pagan races were and are only too well acquainted." For the real phenomena of Spiritism the devil is responsible and the rest is fraud. The most interesting pages in the pamphlet are those describing the dreadful effects of the practice of Spiritism on the minds, the bodies and the morals of all who take it up. Mr. Raupert is prepared to lecture on Spiritism to Catholic audiences.

"Belle Jones" (Dutton, $0.50), whose story Allen Meacham tells, was a commonplace drudge until she heard a minister preach on the first five words of Ephesians ii:10, which he translated "For we are His poems." Belle was told that "An individual, like an immortal poem, must have inspiration, apprehension, revelation; he must be rhythmical, musical and delightful." So she determined to be a poem of that kind and succeeded. The reader will wonder why Belle did not spend some of her earnings to repair her shiftless father's shack.——The literary executor of Mark Twain has done him no kindness in publishing "The Mysterious Stranger," a pessimistic, cynical and blasphemous story which was found among the late "humorist's" papers. Nor is it probable that the author of "Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc" would thank Harper and Brothers for bringing out this dangerous book as an attractive-looking holiday volume, presumably for children to read.

Miss Katherine Brégy has edited for the Philadelphia Center of the Catholic Theater Movement, 21 South Thirteenth Street, a "Juvenile Play Catalogue" ($0.25) which Catholic teachers are sure to find of great value. Thirty pages are filled with the titles and short descriptions of suitable plays of various kinds that boys and girls can present and practical suggestions for amateur managers are added.——In "La Belle France" (Allyn & Bacon) Adolphe de Monvert has composed an admirable French reader for beginners. The book records the impressions of two Americans traveling through France and is everywhere marked by simplicity, ease of diction and good taste. The student who masters it under a competent guide will get a practical working vocabulary, will learn a great deal about France, its history and its people and will no doubt conclude that it must be one of the most beautiful countries in the world. The illustrations are excellent. The Catholic Church, its practices, its priests, and religion are everywhere spoken of with the greatest reverence and sympathy.

Most of us probably take for granted that our present-day system of circulating libraries is a product of the modern mind. Prof. E. Boyd in his "Public Libraries and Literary Culture in Ancient Rome" (University of Chicago Press) has proved the contrary. Relying on citations from forty Latin and Greek authors, besides the testimony of many inscriptions, he has shown that in the early days of the Empire Rome boasted of twenty-nine magnificent buildings where the literary treasures of Rome were stored. It is quite a revelation, in these days of card-index systems and scientific cataloguing, to find in the ancient libraries a system of cataloguing and circulating books which is marvelous in its accuracy of detail. These libraries too offered opportunities for research and reference and could boast of reading-rooms which were the center of the literary culture of the time. The book closes with a brief description of the schools, book-shops, baths, literary circles and private libraries, all of which contributed to the culture of the early Empire. The book is to be commended as a model of careful original research on a topic of great interest to the classical world.

"The Triumph of Tim" (Doran, $1.40), Horace Annesley Vachell's latest novel, is not the hero's success as a rancher and land speculator in California, nor as an artist in France, but rather it is the abandonment of his pursuit of a married woman. The story is too long and its plot and treatment rather sordid.——"Apauk, Caller of Buffalo" (Houghton, Mifflin Co., $1.25) by James W. Schultz gives a vivid picture of Indian life. It contains all the thrills of the conventional Indian story, together with accurate information as to Indian austerity and self-denial.——The praiseworthy purpose Cyrus Townsend Brady had in writing the eleven little sketches that make up "a Christmas fantasy" entitled "And Thus He Came" (Putnam), was no doubt to show how Our Lord is present as a comforter or as a warner in the crises of men's lives. But the chapters in which Catholics figure are in decidedly bad taste, to take no higher ground. Dying priests do not behave as the author describes them.

With no special qualifications of an historian, made apparent in the writing of Farnum Bishop's "Our First War with Mexico" (Scribner, $1.25) a quality akin to prejudice lurks in the passages, "Throughout the war the Church behaved in the most selfish and unpatriotic manner" and "It had taken the American invasion to make the common people of Mexico realize how weak and worthless was the army and how selfishly unpatriotic the Church that had ruled and plundered them since the days of Iturbide." We Catholic readers may join in this prayer: "May there never be another!" while they parody his words: "It is taking the American occupation to make the world realize how rude and ruthless is the Freemasonry that had held power in Mexico since the days of one Joel Poinsett."——"With the Turks in Palestine" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25) by Alexander Aaronson, is a book well worth the reading. Being a late book on the present war it gives us an insight into military conditions in the Far East, and besides detailing the campaign of the Turks in Asia Minor, the author describes their low moral standards.

"Hold on, hold fast, hold out. Patience is genius," an apothegm attributed to Fra Savonarola, is printed on the cover of the coming year's "Impressions Calendar" (Paul Elder, San Francisco, $0.60) and among the best poems on the tastefully printed panels are these lines of Richard Le Gallienne:

I meant to do my work today—
But a brown bird sang in the apple tree,
And a butterfly flittered across the field,
And the leaves were calling me.
And the wind went sighing over the land
Tossing the grasses to and fro,
And a rainbow held out its shining hand,
So what could I do but laugh and go.

And in the closely packed pages of the new "Catholic Calendar" (Mt. Carmel Gild, Buffalo, $1.00) there is no finer poetry than Thomas Edward Brown's stanza:

A garden is a lovesome thing, God wot!
Rose plot,
Fringed pool,
Fern'd grot—
The veriest school
Of peace; and yet the fool
Contends that God is not——
Not God! in gardens! when the eve is cool?
Nay, but I have a sign;
'Tis very sure God walks in mine.

EDUCATION

The Christian Doctrine Hour

DOES the study of Christian doctrine merely mean to the child a rather dreary hour spent in learning and reciting uninteresting questions and answers out of a well-worn catechism? Is it a time more or less frankly dreaded? If so, only a hasty judgment would lay the whole blame on the child. Children frankly dislike routine and faulty presentations made even more unattractive by the teacher's lack of sympathy and understanding. The catechism hour should be full of interest and life, not after the manner of "camp-meeting," but so managed as to attract and not repel the child, or even leave him indifferent. This, surely, was the method Our Lord favored. By means of stories and object lessons, He drove home the facts He wished to impress on His hearers.

The Teacher's Work

THERE is an old and well-founded belief that restlessness and inattention on the part of the pupil is, to a great extent, the fault of the teacher. Perhaps there is an insufficient command of the matter in hand, or a lack of love of the work, or of a sympathetic understanding of the difficulties of the child. Enthusiasm is infectious, and a child studying under an enthusiastic teacher can scarcely fail to make rapid progress. If, on the contrary, the teacher is disaffected, preoccupied, or ill-prepared for her work, is it remarkable that the results are mirrored in her frankly bored pupils?

Two things are of primary importance, the preparation of the teacher, and the manner in which the subject is presented to the pupil. Of the first, Austin O'Malley, in his "Keystones of Thought," says, "The cause of failure in many teachers is that they mistake what is a mission from God, for a trade." This work that touches souls is sacred. It is ordinarily from the parents or from the teacher, that the child first learns of God, and the whole after life bears witness to the purity and vigor of early impressions. It is the teacher's task to light in the soul a vigil lamp of faith and love, that will shine over the tumbled waters of temptation and guide the child out of darkness.

Careful Preparation

A CAREFUL preparation for every class is absolutely necessary. The catechism time may be made a happy story-hour, the stories teaching deeper lessons than the child could otherwise learn. Explanations, it is true, must be given, and here great care is needed. The teacher may involve the answer in a tangled mass of "whys," using many words, but leaving a confused impression on the child's mind; or the explanation may be simply and concisely given, and the whole illustrated by means of an example or story. Obviously, the stories are better if literally true. The Old Testament, the life of Our Lord, and Church history, furnish an almost inexhaustible supply.

Even the teaching of prayers gains an added effectiveness from the use of the story method. The little ones listen eagerly to the story of Our Lord's lonely night on the hills. With the Apostles, they seek Him at the dawn, and watch Him as He prays. He is so beautiful, so full of gladness, that they beg Him as the Apostles did, "Master, teach us how to pray." Then the big words of the Lord's Prayer have a clearer meaning, and the prayer can be explained as the words are taught. The Hail Mary will never be forgotten if it is first known through the story of the Angel's visit, and the Apostles' Creed becomes a storehouse of explanatory stories, and in the end, a song of triumph to the child who begins to realize though dimly the real meaning of the beautiful prayer. The average child knows too little of the holy Sacrifice of the Mass. It is a necessary part of every Sunday's routine, and means carrying a prayer book, and kneeling or wriggling through a long hour. The Ite missa est at its close, though not understood, is plainly welcome.

Object Lessons

THERE are many ways of making the children love the Mass. If the Sunday-school teacher is fortunate enough to have a little room apart for her class, she can use a miniature altar, made of light wood or substantial pasteboard, and illustrate the Mass by practical examples. Tiny altar vessels are easily obtainable, and but little skill is required to utilize bits of silk and linen for the manufacture of small vestments and an altar equipment. The tabernacle, made of a tiny box, may have its door of pasteboard, its silk curtains and carefully lined interior, and the place and shape of the altar stone may be marked on the table of the altar. Then little by little the Holy Sacrifice may be explained. The altar, the tabernacle, the crucifix, the chalice, the ciborium are themselves a lesson, and the story of their use can be made doubly interesting by many a tale of the early days of persecution and terror. Stories of the vestments and their meaning follow, and then comes the Mass, with its beautiful ceremonies explained by the use of the little model. The children become keenly interested, and when, as a reward of merit, one is allowed to prepare the miniature altar for Mass or Benediction, the intelligent work done tells its own story. There is little restlessness after that, on Sundays or other days in attendance at Mass, and love grows out of knowledge. The method is a good one to use in the training of little altar boys, as well.

Striving to Interest

THE teacher may add to her own store of knowledge by the study of one or more of the standard works on the Mass, by Gihr, and others. It is undoubtedly true, that many Sunday-school teachers come to their work tired after a week of hard activity, little relishing any added work in the labor of love they have made their own. As one teacher was overheard to remark, "I never thought of such a thing as making catechism interesting, and was rather surprised to learn that it could be done." But the fascination of the work grows as one's interest increases, and one is richly repaid, by the wider sweep of personal knowledge as well as by the love and eager enthusiasm of the children.

M. A. Garnett.

SOCIOLOGY

The Gospel of Humanity

TOO many graduates of State universities draw from their courses in political economy and sociology an unsafe scheme of life, to serve as their guide in the practical world. It is the "gospel of humanity," preached to them by radical professors who assume, as a matter of course, that all that is old is "reactionary" and bad. One hears a great deal in these courses about the supreme importance of material progress, and the gradual evolution of the race from the darkness of intellectual bondage and superstition. The divine nature of man is a cardinal dogma, and many references are made, en passant, to "worn-out creeds that no thinking person of today can accept."

The New Tenets

SUCH statements, stressed by plausible talkers, appeal to the impressionable mind of youth, eager to learn the latest thought, and to be considered fully "up-to-date." One is never so impatient of restraint as during the college years; and it is small wonder that callow students who attend such courses and discussions often suffer a loss of faith, never to recover that faith in after life. "What is the use of bothering about an improbable hereafter, which we do not know anything about?" these apt pupils say. "The only immortality that is real, is the good that we do on earth. Is not a life devoted to furthering the progress of humanity for humanity's sake, a progress that consists of the happiness of material comforts and well-being, infinitely more unselfish than the life of a believer, who is filled with solicitude for the welfare of his own soul, and who does good deeds with the idea of some future reward? The race is immortal, not the individual; and as for sin, it is an offense not against God, but against the self-respect of a divine humanity."

False Ideals

THE college graduate who goes out to battle with the world, arrayed in the armor of such a code, will find it unavailing against the pitiless onslaught of temptation. There are hours when only an overwhelming appreciation of the value of the human soul and a deep sense of the responsibility of the individual to God, can guide to safety. Mere devotion to "humanity," or even a keen sense of "self-respect" will not suffice; for such ideals founded on materialism, will, if carried to a logical conclusion, crush out the finer spiritual sense of the individual who adopts them. This is an age when the difference between right and wrong is shaded. There is much talk of the rights of man, little of his duties. "Right" and "wrong" are considered mere points of view.

Weakened Responsibility

ONE hears much of the sins of society, little of the sins of the individual; for sin is thought a disease, the responsibility for which should be laid at the doors of organized society. In times of lessened individual responsibility, one would wish for more of the moral backbone of Puritan days, when black was black and white, white. The graduate, hearing everything excused, finishes by excusing himself. Cardinal Newman, who saw the birth of the gospel of humanitarianism, and the doctrine which substitutes self-respect for conscience, discusses its essential superficiality and its logical effect upon its followers in his "Knowledge and Religious Duty." "If the principle which determines what is virtuous is not conscience, but taste," he says, "it would be natural to suppose that what looks fair will be good, what causes offense will be evil; virtue will be what pleases, vice what pains." Thus, "that very refinement of intellectualism, which began by repelling sensuality, ends by excusing it."

The True Standard

THE young man or woman who carries the standard of humanitarianism into the field of social service will be found at a disadvantage with the Catholic worker. Religion is the mother of charity. For centuries the Catholic spirit has been teaching the world the lessons of genuine social service. The labor in the Master's vineyard has been twofold; for souls are to be saved, as well as bodies. Today an ungrateful world is trying to separate religion and charity to make the latter, degenerated into mere materialism, the slave of the State. Will the humanitarian worker succeed as well as the earnest Catholic; the humanitarian, who lacks the spirit of prayer which alone preserves humility and tolerance, and a sense of true values? The modern type of worker, to whom the material progress of a soulless creation is everything, will have no message of hope to broken and shattered lives, for he knows nothing of a merciful God, nothing of a Saviour, nothing of the tender and intimate relation between Creator and creature.

Complete Service

IMPROVE external conditions certainly; but even then the best part of the work still remains undone, for a materially contented race does not mean a moral race. Frederick Ozanam, the founder of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, distinguishes between the help that honors, and the help that humbles those who receive it. Material aid alone is apt to be humiliating; it is honorable when it may be mutual. "Because every man who gives a kind word, good advice, consolation, today, may tomorrow stand in need of like consolation . . . because that indigent family whom you love, loves you in return, and will have largely acquitted themselves toward you when the old man, the mother, the little children shall have prayed for you." Only he who has faith, a consciousness of the infinite value of the individual soul, and the spirit of Christian humility, can succeed with Christ's poor.

A Doctrine of Nothingness

THE doctrine of the "divinity of the race," as Canon Sheehan's Irish priest puts it, "makes gods out of a few wretched bipeds who eat carrion, and drink Oriental drugs to keep the wretched life in them, and clothe themselves in unlovely garments by night, and snore unto the stars!" The human race is as perishable as the individual, and humanity is no more eternal than is this planet. Ours is a comparatively young world. Science tells us that conditions will arise to make human life on this earth impossible, when there will be a dead earth and an exhausted sun. Then what has become of divine humanity? It turns out to be a tale signifying nothing. The denial of personal immortality, considered even aside from the question of faith, is irrational because it violates the eternal law of progress, and renders human existence purposeless, the meaningless product of blind chance. Thus the gospel of humanity, stripped of its high-sounding phrases and drawn to its natural conclusion, means "nothingness." But it is to this hopeless and dreary code of words that some of our young Catholic men and women have sacrificed the precious gift of their Faith.

M. P. Hayne, M.A.

NOTE AND COMMENT

"The War of Youth"

OUR press frequently refers to the extreme youthfulness of many of the combatants in the present war. They are apt to forget that our own Civil War was called the "War of Youth." Attention has been drawn in this connection to a table given in Major General William H. Carter's book, "The American Army," which represents the ages of the soldiers at the period of enlistment:

Those 10 years and younger	25
Those 11 years and under	38
Those 12 years and under	225
Those 13 years and under	300
Those 14 years and under	1,523
Those 15 years and under	104,987
Those 16 years and under	231,051
Those 17 years and under	844,891
Those 18 years and under	2,150,798
Between 18 and 22 years	2,159,798
Between 22 and 26 years	618,511
Between 26 and 45 years	46,462
More than 45 years old	16,071

It is furthermore remarked that almost all of the men in the last two classes of the table were officers, "making the rank and file of the army almost all beardless boys when they enlisted."

Fads in Protestant Sunday Schools

THAT modern fads are driving religion out of its last Protestant stronghold, the Sunday school, is the complaint brought by Protestant journals themselves. Reviewing a book on religious education which takes cognizance of everything except religion, the Baptist Journal and Messenger regretfully complains that while "commended by many well-meaning people, it seems designated to take what little religion we have out of education." The Herald and Presbyter remarks upon this that the same criticism might be passed upon "a good deal of our modern Sabbath-school pedagogical literature." Often more attention is given in the classes to drawing the things described in the lessons than to the lessons themselves. Thus the religious teaching in the book under consideration consists in directing the pupils to draw the house where Livingstone died and some pictures from the Old Testament. After remarking that "there is little education in religion in the book," the Baptist paper severely censures the society which published it: "That is the trouble with the society. It wants to cut out education in religion." The wisdom of the Catholic Church in insisting upon her own Catholic schools is implied in the lament of the Presbyterian weekly over this sad condition: "If the pupil is to get his ordinary instruction from the public schools the church ought at least to have a little time on Sabbath for education in religion." Take religion out of the daily teaching of the child and the little that can be given in the Sunday schools will not suffice to sustain an intelligent and strong Christianity.

Death of the Archbishop of Bombay

ANNOUNCEMENT is made of the death of Archbishop Herman Jürgens, S.J., of Bombay. Though a German by birth, he had been permitted to continue in the discharge of his sacred functions when the internment of the German priests took place in India. The anxiety and distress of this latter event, however, soon caused a complete breakdown, and he gradually lapsed into a condition of senile paralysis, though his intellect remained bright as ever. He had been actively interested in the development of missionary and educational undertakings, and the editor of the Bombay Examiner looks back at his advent, in 1906, as a godsend:

> Catholic journalism is not always a tranquil occupation, and not always an encouraging one. But under Archbishop Jürgens it was a perfect pleasure to work, he was so appreciative and sympathetic. His large-mindedness came out in this. He recognized that every human work must have defects; and so long as the substance is good and the defects incidental, it was a matter of congratulation. He was not only appreciative and sympathetic; he was also, a rarer quality, loyal to his subjects. It occasionally falls to the lot of a Catholic editor to be misunderstood and attacked. In such cases Archbishop Jürgens made straight for the main point: Was the thing complained of wrong? Was it unsound in doctrine, or injudicious, or inexpedient? When once convinced that there was no fault on this score, he would not give the editor away by shelving the matter or attempting a half-hearted compromise. He took up the challenge himself and defended the cause of the editor as his own.
>
> He was not merely an enterprising administrator, but a scholar as well, being especially well-versed in art.

Compensation Law Applied to Child

AN important decision by Judge McMichael of Philadelphia has ruled that the State workmen's compensation law must be interpreted in favor of children whose fathers are killed in industrial accidents. The contested case was that of a child four months old whose father had been killed six days before its birth. A workmen's compensation referee awarded benefits to the mother and the child until it should reach the age of sixteen years. Appeal was taken to the Compensation Board and thence to the Court itself. The argument of the appellants was that when there is a widow or widower entitled to compensation no award can be made to the children. To this the judge replied in his statement:

> An act of assembly of the character of the one in question should be interpreted broadly and in harmony with the aim of the act providing support for those dependent upon a deceased employee. Since dependents bound by the compensation feature of the law lose all their remedies at common law, a literal construction in their favor is required. In the case at bar the child takes nothing during the running of 300 weeks if its mother lives that long and does not marry. Can it be said that it was intended that the child thus should be excluded from the benefits of the act? We think the provision for the mother negatives that inquiry, because the payment made to her was based on the fact of the existence of the child. The child's right to compensation cannot be said in this way to be obliterated. It becomes merged with that of the mother, and rightly so, because she is usually the person to whom ultimately compensation due a child would naturally go.

It is said that more than 1,000 children will be affected by this judgment and that the payment of over $2,000,000 was involved in the case. The decision will likewise furnish a precedent for other States.

Another Poet Victim of the War

GREAT losses have been sustained by Catholics on both sides of the world war. Among these must be mentioned the death of the youthful German poet, Reinhard Sorge, a brief account of whose life is given by the Waisenfreund. Only twenty-four years of age when he fell, he had lived through a stormy and eventful career. His early life presaged disaster. Born of Protestant parents at Berlin, he had lost all religious belief before his seventeenth year. Nietzsche had become his idol. His first drama, "The Beggar," which won for him the Kleist prize, when he was only twenty years of age, was enthusiastically received. Unfortunately, as we might expect, an unchristian spirit predominates in it. An event which took place at almost this same time caused him to regret most bitterly that his play had ever been printed and accepted by the theaters of Berlin and Vienna. While enjoying a stay at the North See strand a sudden conviction of the truth of Christianity flashed upon his soul, like a personal revelation. He speaks of this as his conversion. At first he turned to a faithful practice of the Protestantism he had rejected; but a visit to Rome, in the following year, 1913, brought him close to the Church. He attended the Holy Week ceremonies and the Easter celebration at St. Peter's. On leaving Rome he determined to become a Catholic, and on the feast of St. Francis in that same year he and his young wife were received into the Fold at Jena. He paid a second visit to Rome where he was confirmed in the Vatican Seminary by a cardinal. Through the Jesuit author, Father Lippert, he was now brought into touch with leading Catholic periodicals. His first work after his conversion was "Guntwar, the School of a Prophet," which traces the course of his conversion. The fateful year 1914 then came, and with it the call to arms. He was drafted, was given leave of absence for a time, and was again summoned to the front, falling finally on a western battlefield.

Spanish and American Treatment of Natives

TO show how ridiculous is the effort made in the first number of the Mexican Review to belittle the Spaniards by unfavorably contrasting their treatment of the Mexicans with the gentleness shown by the Anglo-Saxons in their treatment of the Indians, the Central Bureau of the Central Verein offers an apt quotation from the American Journal of Sociology. It indicates what delicate consideration was shown towards their red-skin brethren by the early Pilgrim Fathers. The article, "Social Elements of the Indian Problem," has this to say:

> The churchman would bid us be silent when we tell of the wars of the Pilgrim Fathers on Indians. Some would not have us know that when the Pequot men, women and children had been murdered, the Pilgrim preacher rose in his pulpit to thank God that the militia had "sent six hundred heathen souls to hell"! It is not considered good form to mention that Christian Indians were hunted and murdered like dogs in Pennsylvania and Ohio, and even shot in church as they knelt to pray God's blessing on their persecutors. We are not allowed to know that Indians were hunted as wolves and that the states of Virginia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, New Jersey, and even New York offered bounties for Indian scalps. The Pennsylvania schedule was as follows: "For every male above ten years scalped, being killed, $134; for every female or male under ten years captured, $130; for every female above ten years scalped, being killed, $50."

Reference is made in the article quoted to a machine-gun attack on a peaceful Arapahoe village. These are but isolated instances from a long tale of horrors that might be told. Among other delectable methods employed in civilizing the American Indian we find mention, in the account of Father De Smet's life, of the killing of practically an entire village of innocent natives by the fiendish device of putting in their way the garments of a plague victim. The Church in the meantime protected and preserved the Mexican Indian and educated him in the knowledge of his God. Men of the Villa and Carranza type are the human fiends who now take pleasure in the extermination of the race.

Ruined Center of a Great Mission

THE most needy diocese in all the territory over which float the Stars and Stripes, according to the conviction of Bishop Hurth, now at Holy Cross College, Brookland, D. C., is the ruined district of Nueva Segovia, in the Philippine Islands. It is at the same time one of the most fruitful mission fields. Fifty-six churches, besides chapels, schools and presbyteries lie in ruin. Here, in the northern part of the Island of Luzon, the revolution had raged with the most destructive violence, and hard upon this, when the country had slightly recovered and the work of reconstruction had begun, followed appalling devastation from earthquakes and typhoons. In some places the people assist at religious functions under the open sky, and in many others they worship under mere sheds. In contrast to this stands the commodious meeting-house or "church" of the sectarian preacher, gratuitously erected, and made to bear witness to his pretension that the nation now ruling the Philippine Islands is Protestant, and that the Filipinos will share in the wondrous wealth and progress of America if they will embrace the "American" religion. More than this; within the diocese of Nueva Segovia three Protestant hospitals have been erected, while no fewer than eight dormitories throw open their doors to the Filipino student who wishes to attend the Government institutions for higher education, offering him board and lodging, together with other attractions, at nominal charges, or even gratis if he promises to be good material for the Protestant proselyting propaganda. Such is the power everywhere given to Protestantism by the generous response made to missionary appeals, while Catholics have in most cases contented themselves with contributing a few paltry pennies to this most important cause. The diocese of Nueva Segovia has not been able to oppose even one hospital to the three sectarian institutions, nor to inaugurate more than one student dormitory. Within this same diocese are the mountain districts inhabited by the Igorrots, Ifugaos, Tinguians and Kalingas, presenting the most hopeful field for missionary zeal. The Scheut Fathers of Belgium and the German Fathers of the Divine Word, each with a community of Sisters of their own nationality, divide this vast and fertile district between them. But the war has cut off the alms on which they depended, and the important Mass intentions from America are sadly few and insufficient. Yet here about 400,000 souls look to these apostolic missionaries to break to them the Bread of Life.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVI. No. 7
WHOLE No. 398

NOVEMBER 25, 1916

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—North and south of the Ancre River the British made considerable gains during the week. Advancing on a five-mile front on both sides of the river, they took Beaumont-Hamel, Beaucourt and St. Pierre Divion. About one mile was the measure of their greatest gain. Later the English drove the Germans still further east from their positions north of the river, and succeeded in pushing forward a quarter of a mile on a two-mile front south of the river. They have now reached the outskirts of Grandcourt. They lost, however, some important positions which they had recently taken from the Germans at Butte de Warlencourt. North of the Somme the Germans regained some ground at Saillisel, which for a time was entirely in the hands of the French. The line in the St. Pierre Vaast Wood has been swaying to and fro during the week, but is practically unchanged. South of the Somme the Germans got a footing in the village of Pressoir, but later were forced to withdraw.

Bulletin, Nov. 13, p.m.-Nov. 20, a.m.

In Western Macedonia the Serbians have made notable progress. Southeast of Monastir they forced the Bulgarians to abandon their strong positions at Kenali and to retire about six miles to the north bank of the Viro River. As a consequence the Serbians reached a point about four miles distant from Monastir. Further east the Serbians fought their way seven miles north of Polok along the Chuke Ridge, and captured Iven, Tepavtsi and Yarashok. Later they reached the outskirts of Kanena, took Grunishte, Brnik and Hill 1378, and finally forced the evacuation of Monastir. In Eastern Macedonia the British have captured Barakli, and Karakaska; they have also driven the Bulgarians from Prosenik and Kumli.

In the Dorna Watra district the Russians have taken several heights near Jocobene, west of Kimpolung; but further south, in the Gyergyo Mountains, the most that the Rumanians have been able to do, has been to hold their own. Southwest of the Oitoz Pass they have been driven from the summit of Mt. Rungel. On the southern slopes of the Transylvanian Alps the Central Powers have penetrated still further into Rumania. In the Prahova Valley they have advanced west of the Predeal Road, and northwest of Kimpolung they have captured Liresti. In the Alt Valley they have reached a point fifteen miles south of the border, and in the Jiu Valley they have forced the evacuation of Tergu Jiu and reached the Orsova-Crajova railroad. In Dobrudja nothing important has taken place.

Belgium.—According to press dispatches of November 13, Cardinal Mercier, Primate of Belgium, has issued a protest against the deportation of Belgians into Germany for forced labor. The protest is dated November 7, and is signed by Cardinal Mercier in behalf of all the Belgian bishops, except the Bishop of Bruges with whom he was unable to communicate. The protest reads in part:

The Deportations

> The situation which we denounce to the civilized world may be summed up as follows: Four hundred thousand workmen are reduced to unemployment through no fault of their own, and greatly inconvenience the German occupation. Sons, husbands, fathers, respectful of public order, bow to their unhappy lot. With their most pressing needs provided for, they await with dignity the end of their period of trial. Now, suddenly, parties of soldiers begin to enter by force these peaceful homes, tearing youth from parent, husband from wife, father from children. They bar with the bayonet the doors through which wives and mothers wish to pass to say farewell to those departing. They herd their captives in groups of tens and twenties and push them into cars. As soon as the train is filled the officer in charge brusquely waves the signal for departure. Thus thousands of Belgians are being reduced to slavery. The Germans are not only enrolling the unemployed, but they are also recruiting a great number of men who have never been out of work.

On November 16, the Belgian Legation at Washington made public its protest to the United States against the "enslavement" of Belgian civilians by Germany. Minister Havenith asked "the active intervention of the Government of the United States to obtain the cessation of this deportation of Belgian workmen into Germany, and to secure the liberation of those who have been already deported." The Belgian protest is as follows:

> The German Governor General in Belgium is forcing thousands of Belgian workmen who are unemployed or without work to go to Germany to work in the quarries, in manufacturing concrete and in the lime kilns, under pretext that they are a charge upon public charity. The Belgian Government protests energetically against this coercive measure, which is contrary to the law of nations and the laws of humanity. The Government of the King asks the active intervention of the Government of the United States to obtain the cessation of this deportation of Belgian workmen into Germany and to obtain the liberation of those who have been already deported. The Germans claim that these workmen are not employed in war industries. It should be remarked, however, that they are employed in industries directly connected with the war and that the employment of this Belgian labor releases a great number of German workmen who are sent to the front. Thus these Belgian workmen are compelled practically to fight against their own country.

Mr. J. C. Grew, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States Embassy at Berlin, has been collecting information on the subject from various sources and has recently, at the request of our State Department, taken occasion to discuss the matter informally and unofficially with the higher German officials to get material in shape for a conference which he hopes soon to have with Dr. Bethmann-Hollweg, the Imperial Chancellor.

France.—Questions affecting finance, economics, and the closer cooperation of France with her allies, are now occupying the country. In financial circles, interest in the war-loan overshadows that taken in the budget for 1917. Credits asked by the Government for the first three months of 1917 amount to $1,707,800,000, making a total since the beginning of the war of $14,050,000,000.

Financial and Military Programs

According to so well informed an authority as Yves Guyot, the question of a revision in taxes in order to increase the revenue of the country has come up, and the Senate has begun discussion of a plan for putting the tax-system on a new basis. The new scheme calls for alteration of the system established in the Revolution and in usage since 1791. In the opinion of many, it would have been simpler to have adopted the Ribot plan of increasing existing taxes.

The difficulty of transportation, which began with the war, continues to exist, and has become even more acute, as the number of freight cars in the country is less than it was two years ago. This is largely due to the fact that less than ten per cent of the cars ordered in foreign countries has been delivered. The gravity of the financial and economic situation may be surmised from the fact that a committee of Presidents of Chambers of Commerce has renewed its request that an end be put to the moratorium, or at least that interest on debts affected by the moratorium be declared due and collectible. While the country is diligently studying these internal questions, the Council of the Allies now gathered in Paris, is outlining a more general plan of conduct, whose purpose is to influence the management of the war. Mr. Asquith is conferring with M. Aristide Briand, the French Premier, on the diplomatic situation, Messrs. Lloyd George and Albert Thomas are discussing the munitions question, while the chiefs of the allied armies are debating the military problems.

Germany.—Governor-General von Bissing has issued this explanation of the deportation of Belgium workmen into Germany. More than 1,000,000 men, women and children had been made dependent by lack of work. To remedy this condition, attempts had been made to reopen the Belgian factories, in spite of the fact that the importation of raw materials was cut off. Representatives had even been sent to England to obtain permission for such importation, and a promise had been made that none of the manufactured goods would be used at home and that the entire produce would be sold at seventy-five per cent of the cost price of production. To this plan England absolutely refused to agree. Though some factories were nevertheless opened, yet the unemployment could be remedied only by great public works. But these undertakings accumulated enormous debts for the cities, while the works constructed often answered no pressing need. The demoralizing effects of continued idleness made it a matter of duty to find another solution of the difficulty. The problem was solved by sending men to fill the positions offered in Germany. Thus regular employment was provided and good wages paid. General von Bissing asserts that great care has been taken, according to strict orders, that no one should be forced from Belgium who had not refused work. This refusal was in each case to be proved by witnesses. Many went voluntarily, realizing the advantages it meant to them. No discrimination, it was said, was made between Belgian and German workmen. The average wage is eight marks, whereas in Belgium it had been four marks. Particular care is taken that the Belgians can send money to their people, who in the meantime are provided for out of the public charities. Such in brief is the explanation attributed to the German Governor-General. The inquiries made by the United States in regard to this question will be answered by Germany. The Berlin report says:

German Explanation of Belgian Deportation

> The German Government, according to authoritative statements, will not hesitate to give the Washington Government the desired information regarding the Belgian workmen. The German Foreign Office understands that the American step was evoked by various reports circulating abroad regarding German action in Belgium, and by a desire to have authentc information regarding the measures to be taken in case such reports should threaten to interfere with the execution of Belgian relief work and the collection of funds in the United States.

The criticism referred to regards certain details of the deportation, "notably the apparently unsystematic manner of selecting and assembling the men for transfer to Germany, disregarding in some instances the question whether they are already employed in Belgium or do not belong to the laboring classes."

Great Britain.—The proposal of the President of the Board of Trade, Mr. Runciman, that a "food dictator," or an official with similar powers, be appointed, was adopted when the Order in Council for the regulation of supplies was ratified by the King on November 16. Speaking in the House of Commons on the preceding day, Mr. Runciman asserted that the measure was not forced by any present need, but was advisable as a precaution for the future. Up to the present time, Great Britain has been able to take advantage, without difficulty, of the abundant harvests in Canada, Australia and the United States; for the future, however, greater reliance upon Australia seemed necessary, and this fact involved the difficult question of transportation. It is stated that during the last twelve months, the price of foodstuffs has advanced twenty-seven per cent, and the average rate is now seventy per cent higher than in July, 1914. Mr. Runciman's proposal met no opposition in the House, and has been commended by the press. The appointment of the new official will be announced shortly. The choice is said to rest between Mr. Runciman, Lord Devonport, and Lord Milner, former High Commissioner for South Africa.

The "Food Dictator"

Ireland.—The Dublin Weekly Independent complains that Ireland is being denuded of its woods at an alarming rate. In 1907 the Department Committee on Irish Forestry officially reported that the area of woods in Ireland was 306,661 acres, the smallest proportion of woodlands of any country in Europe, except Iceland. According to the evidence given before the Committee, the process of cutting down without replanting was going on at a "terrible pace." One of the most serious aspects of this state of things was the menace it constituted to existing Irish wood-working industries which are dependent on home-grown timber. To make matters worse, seventy-two per cent of the trees felled are sent out of the country. The Committee found, that apart from existing woodlands, at least 750,000 acres of land suitable for planting were available, and that altogether over 1,000,000 acres might be devoted to forestry without involving any disturbance of existing agricultural industries. The Committee also suggested that the State should undertake a scheme of national afforestation. But, says the Independent, considering that the area of woodlands today has been reduced to 295,000 acres, it is apparent that the State will pay no serious attention to the suggestion. Even the insignificant grant of $51,000 made by the "Development Commissioners" for the purpose of afforestation has been abolished. If the present process continues much longer, and there is no planting on a large scale, the country, adds the Dublin journal, will be completely stripped of its woods.

Woodlands and Crops

To this cry of alarm must be added, the still sadder reports, alluded to in last week's AMERICA, of the blight of the potato crop, especially in the West. Mr. T. W. Russell's "Parliamentary Paper," issued recently, draws a painful picture of the state of affairs in the stricken districts. In the West the crop appears to be one-half to two-thirds of the normal. If a speedy remedy be not applied, this means famine to the poorer peasants. This year they will not be able to make up for the shortage by using Indian meal, owing to the greatly increased price. The plight of the sufferers calls for energetic action.

Mexico.—As was to be expected, Mexico played a part in our last elections, how large it is impossible to tell. To the credit of the Republicans, be it said that they did not inject religion into the campaign. The Democrats, on the other hand, improved their opportunity at every turn. From the "Masonic Temple" of New York came a large pamphlet extolling Mr. Wilson for breaking down the Catholic Hierarchy in Mexico, and declaring that "big money" and the Roman "political machine" had conspired to elect Mr. Hughes. On the Sunday before election day another pamphlet entitled "Bulletin No. 16. Issued by the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A." was distributed in New York, in one instance at least at the door of a church. Some extracts will show the nature of the contents:

Mexico and the American Election

> Mexico's saints and idols are being shattered and who will fill those vacant niches with better things, if the Christian people of the United States do not supply their places? Listen to this statement from one of our missionaries now in the field: "Last week the great aristocratic church of Merida was swept clean of its idols and turned over to the Students' League of Yucatan for its assembly room. A certain Mexican whose hands were still covered with the dust of the idols he had been helping to smash said to a friend of mine: 'We saved a few images which we are going to take to the public schools and standing them up before the children, say: There you see what a saint looks like and now you see how he can be destroyed. Then with a hammer the image will be pounded to pieces before the eyes of the children.'"
>
> General Carranza is bitterly opposed to the Roman Catholic Church—he shows most excellent judgment in his choice of men for prominent political positions. A number of these men are Protestants, not in name only, but are leading earnest, active, Christian lives. True democracy and Protestant Christianity go hand in hand. Carranza is working for a democracy and Mexico is bound to have Protestant Christianity when she becomes a true democracy. The present Minister of Education in Mexico was educated for a Methodist minister. . . . The Superintendent of Schools of the State of Guanajuato is a graduate of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary at Cayoacan and later of Washington and Jefferson College. . . . Another Presbyterian is at the head of the technical schools. Another has gone about the country explaining to people the propaganda of the Carranzistas. . . . A Protestant is Superintendent of the Hidalgo State Schools. Another is on Carranza's staff, and many others are in positions of influence. . . .

The most remarkable pamphlet of all was the one which appealed to Catholics. On one side was a picture of Messrs. Daniels and Garrison, surrounded and surmounted by priest-chaplains of the army and navy. Below it was an appeal from which these extraordinary extracts are taken:

The above shows how well our interests are looked after at Washington, and how well it pays to have Secretary Tumulty and the first non-Mason in the White House. . . . Through Secretary Tumulty and the President our affairs have been satisfactorily adjusted in Mexico, and Carranza will do the right thing by us. We have fared well at the hands of the Administration, liberal appropriations having been made for our Indian schools and for our charities in Washington, Philippine independence having been set at an indefinite date; and appointments to office having been in due proportion to our deserts. A word to the wise is sufficient.

On the obverse side of the sheet is a picture of the President and Mr. Tumulty, both well posed. Below, the Catholic Church is paid this fine compliment:

On January 28, 1915, President Wilson vetoed the Burnett Immigration Bill, containing the illiteracy test, which, if enacted, would amount to federal statutory recognition of the public school principle. As a test for immigrants it would bear most heavily upon aliens coming from Roman Catholic countries and would cause those countries in time to establish religion-less public schools, with all their A. P. A. effects. One good turn deserves another. In these times of agitation and scurrilous criticism we should all stand together.

Thus were politics played at the expense of truth and decency. Not long before election Cabrera, chairman of the Mexican section of the Joint Commission, made public a telegram signed by ten priests under the leadership of one José Cortes, protesting that, although there had been outrages against priests, Sisters and churches in 1914, yet Carranza was now most fair. The trustworthiness of this statement may be judged from the fact that Cortes is a "suspended" priest from the diocese of Havana. When Carranza entered Mexico City, Cortes, styling himself a revolutionary colonel, accompanied him and from the pulpit of a local church proclaimed the First Chief "the anointed of the Lord" (el unzido del Señor) and "the living image of the Divinity" (destello de la divinidad).

In the current number of the Outlook Mr. Gregory Mason, no friend of the Catholic Church, confirms all that has been charged against Alvarado in Yucatan. In an article, "A Social Despot in Yucatan," he says:

Sacrilege Confirmed

Two years ago there were more than a hundred priests and many nuns in Merida alone. Today there are five priests and no nuns in the whole State. Today religious services are held in only four churches in the State, and those are in Merida. Priests, nuns and Archbishop have fled [most of them were expelled], and nunneries, convents, monasteries and churches have been bought or confiscated by the State. As a rule, the Governor paid for these properties [this is not true] but at that time depreciated Carranza money was the legal tender of the State, and the young social reformer of thirty-six told me with a chuckle how he acquired properties worth $300,000 for a few thousand dollars gold. . . . He admits that his preachings were the people's inspiration, when, more than a year ago, a meeting of labor unions adjourned to go from church to church tearing idols from their niches, burning those which would burn, and strewing church floors with the fragments of others. Today the churches of Yucatan are being used more materially than spiritually. . . . In Merida one is used as a club-house by the Masons who backed the revolution of Carranza and are now enjoying the fruits of their victory; another houses a students' club, another is the headquarters of the Bricklayers' Union, a fourth is a storehouse for alcoholic liquors, . . . a fifth has been torn down to make room for a park, while the impressive and lofty cathedral is filled with canned meats and vegetables. . . . The Bishop's palace . . . is being renovated and remade into the Palace of Art. . . . The rationalist, freethinker, or whatever he chooses to call himself, in short, the person who accepts no established religion and who hopes eventually for the abandonment of all churches and fixed creeds . . . will think he has found a millenium if he goes to Merida today.

All this hardly agrees with the report of the Mexican section of the Joint Commission.

Rome.—It is officially announced, says a Catholic Press Association cable, that at the secret Consistory to be held on Monday, December 4, and the public Consistory on Thursday, December 7, ten new Cardinals will be created. They are: Monsignor Lafontaine, Patriarch of Venice; Monsignor Sbarretti, Assessor of the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office; Monsignor Ranuzzi dei Bianchi, Majordomo; Monsignor Boggiano, Assessor of the Sacred Consistorial Congregation and Secretary to the Sacred College; Archbishop Ascalesi, of Benevento; Monsignor Marini, Secretary of the Segnatura and "Uditore" to the Pope; Monsignor Giorgi, Secretary to the Sacred Congregation of the Council; Archbishop Dubourg of Rennes; Archbishop Dubois of Rouen, and Archbishop Maurin of Lyons.

The New Cardinals

The list thus comprises the names of five prelates of the Curia holding what are recognized as cardinalitial posts. The second on the list, Archbishop Sbarretti, has a distinguished record for services abroad, having been auditor of the Apostolic Legation at Washington, Bishop of Havana and Apostolic Delegate to Canada. The appearance of the name of Monsignor Ascalesi on the list is a surprise. He is only forty-four years of age and has been archbishop for only a year. It is admitted that he owes his selection not only to his own conspicuous qualities but also to the desire of the Holy Father to pay honor to the age-long record of the archdiocese of Benevento, as well as to the fact that Southern Italy has only one Cardinal at present, the Archbishop of Naples. After the Consistory, the French Cardinals will number eight, and the Sacred College will number sixty-seven.

Another Catholic Press Association cable announces a new method of selecting American bishops. The new procedure ordered by his Holiness, through the Consistorial Congregation, abolishes the system of the submission of a "terna" of names chosen by the irremovable rectors, after the death of a bishop, to the bishops of the ecclesiastical province, and in its stead establishes a system of private inquiry by the bishops of each province, for the purpose of selecting suitable priests whose names are to be secretly balloted for, at a meeting of the bishops held under the archbishop. From those thus chosen the Pope will make a selection.

Phases of Quackery and Religion

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., Ph.D.

SOME twenty years ago a distinguished English physician who had a varied experience both at home and in Canada and the United States declared that he found much less tendency among Catholic clergymen to dabble with nostrums than among ministers. He thought priests much less liable to interfere in the treatment of patients than preachers. He even ventured to suggest that respect for authority founded on scientific knowledge was much more noticeable among Catholics than among people of the different sects. "The nearer to Rome the nearer to orthodoxy in medicine" was one of his favorite expressions.

In spite of this general attitude, which is well fostered by careful teaching in seminaries, a great deal of quackery is called into existence by appeals to a religious sentiment. Note, for instance, the number of remedies bearing saints' names, useless concoctions which owe their popularity to Catholic reverence for holy men and women. Such medicines are widespread and though the English physician's praise of the priesthood is not unmerited, yet there are good priests who not only take such medicines themselves but even recommend them to others. This of course is deplorable. Sick men may and do claim the right to prescribe for themselves, but it is hard to see why they should extend so doubtful a beneficence to others. For, truth to tell, any man who acts as his own physician is foolish beyond words. The more a medical man knows the less ready is he to give himself treatment. It is the diagnosis that counts above all else, not remedies. People with apparently the same symptoms may have a dozen different things the matter with them. I remember once recommending a rather strong, though familiar, remedy to a patient suffering from a sore throat, only to find to my amazement that five other people used that medicine for their sore throats. It so happened that the remedy was quite unsuitable for four of those five. It should not have been used by them and undoubtedly made them very uncomfortable.

Some people must have medicine: they think that they cannot get along without it. What many of them need is more air, less smoking, more exercise, more sleep at night and so on. Sometime or other we may be able to persuade men and women to change their habits in regard to food and drink. thus cutting off the need, real or imaginary, of remedies of various kinds.

Occasionally one hears and sees the announcement of a nostrum that priests have recommended as wonderfully effective. I suppose that the best known of these is the much advertised "Father John's Medicine." This is advertised as a cure for nearly everything under the sun and a few other things besides. It banishes colds, heals the throat and lungs and wards off attacks of this and that. Some time ago it was heralded as a cure for consumption. Just then the Federal authorities took action and seized over 4,000 bottles of the concoction on the charge that the product was misbranded. The United States officials declared the claim that this medicine was "without an equal as a body-builder, health-food, and for consumption," etc., false and fraudulent.

The manufacturers at first filed a protest against the seizure of their product and answered the charge that their remedy was fraudulently misbranded, but later they withdrew the protest and answers to the charge. Eventually the court entered a judgment of condemnation and forfeiture and permitted the product to be delivered to the manufacturers on payment of the costs of the proceedings and the execution of a bond of $5,000.

Now is it not a sad thing that the name of a priest should have been dragged through a Federal investigation with a charge of fraud attached to the remedy with which that name is associated? Apparently there is no redress, but at least those who have been attracted to the nostrum by the name should know the aforesaid facts.

As a consultant to consumption sanatoria I have come to realize that one of the most serious misfortunes that can happen to patients is to continue to take with confidence some remedy recommended for tuberculosis, until their affliction passes to a stage where cure is either extremely difficult or impossible. As a rule it is comparatively easy to cure incipient consumption by rational methods. Such methods, however, do not consist in taking nostrums but in a proper regulation of life, with an abundance of fresh air and good food.

Personally I have no doubt that "Father John's Medicine" has done a great deal of harm. It is a nationally advertised remedy, and national advertisement costs such a vast amount of money that it can only be kept up if a very large number of people respond to it. It is not unlikely that thousands of poor consumptives owe years of suffering to the fact that when the first symptom of the disease began to manifest itself they saw the advertisements of "Father John's" remedy and relied on it for a cure.

Unfortunately such advertisements are carried quite commonly not only in secular publications but in the religious press. When published by Catholic journals a definite stamp of approval seems to be given the remedies listed. Thus, to the discredit of the paper whose editor has been caught napping, confidence is betrayed.

Be this as it may, papers should be most chary of patent medicines. The one thing that popularizes nostrums is not their worth but the amount of ink used to make them known. The United States Government recently ordered that sixty "tonic remedies" which were being sold in the neighborhood of New York should no longer be put on the market as tonic remedies. They contain so large a proportion of alcohol that they must be listed as spirituous liquor. I believe that the real reason for this decision was that parents, and particularly foolish mothers who liked the good effect of the spirituous liquor on themselves, were beginning to give it to their children. Surely no reputable paper, secular or religious, wishes to cooperate in a nefarious traffic of this kind. It is better then to exclude from their pages all advertisements for quack remedies.

A Chicago Journalist and Restitution

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

WHAT he regards as a novel state of mind recently led a Chicago editor to dabble, rather disastrously, in moral theology. It appears that an elderly lady, touched by remorse of conscience, was anxious to repair a long-standing injury inflicted through an act of wilful fraud. Circumstances however thwarted her pious wish. As the corporation which was her creditor had ceased to exist, attempts to make compensation proved fruitless, and keen but seemingly hopeless distress settled down on the lady's mind. The editor suggested, whether sarcastically or not is not quite clear, that St Thomas "held that the Church might justly accept from a repentant thief the profits of theft, where restitution was impossible."

As frequently happens when non-Catholics take it on themselves to state Catholic doctrine, the editor is hopelessly confused. The grounds on which the Church could and would accept the profits of theft are the very opposite of that assigned by the journalist. The justification of the proceeding which he mentions, consists, not in the fact that restitution is impossible, but precisely in this, that it makes restitution possible and is itself a form of restitution. The editor should have said, if he wished to give a color of truth to his statement, that a thief, who cannot restore his ill-gotten gains to the man whom he has wronged, may make restitution by turning them over to the Church. As a matter of fact, however, the Angelic Doctor never committed himself to the absolute and unqualified proposition here attributed to him, although he would not deny that there might be circumstances under which the demands of justice would be satisfied in this way. St. Thomas' doctrine, and that of the Church, is simply this: A thief must make restitution to the owner if he is known and can be reached, but if this is impossible, the stolen property must be restored in the way it is reasonable to suppose the owner would desire, could he be interrogated on the subject.

A thief is bound in conscience, as soon as, and as far as, it is morally possible, to restore stolen property to its rightful possessor, whether the possessor be the owner of the thing itself, or one in whom is vested for the time being the title to its use. It is to be noted in passing that the determination of the limits of the moral possibility of restitution belongs to experts and not to the chance individual. Where the identity of the owner is in doubt, every reasonable effort must be made to discover to whom the stolen goods belong; and when this point has been determined, the property must be returned, where this can be done without disproportionate difficulty and expense, to the owner or to his heirs, guardians, executors, or in the case of bankruptcy, to the officially appointed administrator. Such cases of restitution are simple and as a rule admit of an obvious solution.

Not infrequently, however, it happens that after due investigation the title to the property remains a matter of mere conjecture or of complete ignorance. Such cases involve more difficulty in actual practice, but in theory they are almost as simple as the former. One thing is clear: the thief has no right to the stolen goods, nor will the Church, except in extraordinary cases, where for instance restitution works more harm than good, suffer him to retain them. He must divest himself of them, whether he finds the rightful owner or not. But how shall he dispose of them? The Church is insistent that the disposition of them shall not be at the pleasure of the thief, but simply and solely according to the wishes of the owner. As the owner, and he alone, has a right to the property, his wishes, and his alone, must in every instance determine what shall be done with it. If his actual wishes cannot be learned, the thief is bound to interpret those wishes as best he can, that is, he must dispose of the goods in the way he sincerely believes the owner would wish him to dispose of them. The legislation of the Church as regards such interpretative wishes is nothing more than a systematized presentation of the common views of men in general on such matters.

The first obvious presumption is that the owner does not, except in extraordinary cases, wish the thief to profit by his theft. For if the impression got abroad that there were cases in which thieves might eventually acquire the right to retain stolen property, there would be a constant temptation to wholesale thievery. Clearly no man should be thought to favor so dangerous a principle. It will be correct therefore to presume that the owner would wish the thief to rid himself of what he has fraudulently obtained. But what disposal would the owner desire? Evidently that which will benefit himself or others. Such benefit can be obtained in a variety of ways.

Faith teaches that the owner's advantage will be served, if the thief has Masses said for the owner's material and spiritual welfare. Should the owner happen to be a Catholic, he would certainly consent to such an arrangement. A non-Catholic of course would demur to having his property used in this manner, but his demurrer would arise from ignorance and would not be founded in fact; it would proceed from a mistaken notion of the value of the Mass. Whether he believed it or not, he would derive great profit from the offering of the Holy Sacrifice, and his best interests would be advanced by making this use of his property. This way of making compensation however is by no means obligatory, neither would it be urged upon the thief.

Then there are the poor. Reason suggests that any good man would consent to have his stolen property, if he could not recover it for himself, applied to the alleviation of those in need. That men who are ordinarily humane would be willing to have the destitute made their beneficiaries under such circumstances will scarcely be denied, because all men in their degree are the stewards of the poor, all men recognize the claims of charity or philanthropy, and all men are aware that alms-giving covers a multitude of sins. This then is a second way in which the thief is free to dispose of stolen property, but like the first way it is not a matter of necessity.

The third manner of making restitution according to the interpretative wishes of the owner, is to devote the profits of theft to some good cause, other than those already mentioned. No one would be wrong in supposing that the owner would have no reasonable objection against such a disposition being made of his goods, when he himself could not be found. Men are disposed, as a rule, even at considerable sacrifice to themselves, to help movements that benefit humanity. How much more willing are they to do so, when no added pecuniary loss to themselves is involved. In selecting the cause to be benefited, the thief should be guided by considerations of the respective worth of the charitable objects open to his choice. The more praiseworthy the cause, the more likely would the owner be to prefer it. The Church does not exclude secular institutions as possibilities of choice, but as such institutions are ordinarily well cared for and provide for the lesser interests of man, ecclesiastical advisers are more in favor of selecting as the objects of the owner's charity, works that are pious and that minister to man's true supernatural welfare and so, indirectly, to the interests of God. It is in this class that the Church, as a beneficiary in the matter of restitution, would be found.

Such is the attitude of the Church. It is eminently reasonable, for it is based on the prescriptions of the natural law, conforms to the canons of justice and is in keeping with mankind's sense of fairness. If in certain cases she permits her own works to profit by restitution, it is only because such a form of restitution may reasonably be presumed to be in accordance with the owner's wishes. There is only one case where she is willing to accept the profits of theft against the wishes of the one in whom the title is apparently vested, and that is when a government has stolen and so fraudulently possessed itself of ecclesiastical property. In accepting the profits of theft in spite of the wishes of such a government, the Church is acting in accordance with justice. She is accepting her own goods wrested from her by violence and fraud.

Our Indiscreet Electors

JOHN WILTBYE

WITHIN the normal comprehension of the term, a discreet person is an individual who uses his power of choice intelligently. An indiscreet person is one who does not. The line of cleavage is not, I confess, sharp. Must the college professor blissfully paddling through the slush in slippers, when he might have met his classes properly shod, be reckoned indiscreet, or merely weak in memory? Is indiscretion a disorder rooted in the intellect and will, or is the memory likewise involved? These are deep questions, and I dare not conclude, for fear of the psychologist. Declining to essay an answer which I feel would be a muddle, I hasten to advance a thesis touching our presidential electors. Without fear of the law of libel, I boldly impeach them of indiscretion. They have a vote to cast, and by presumption, this vote ought to be cast freely and intelligently. But it is not so cast. Although conceded the full power of choice by the supreme law of the land, these unhappy gentlemen, from the moment of their rightful election, are bound, gagged, wrapped, sealed, and delivered safely, and to all practical intents, irrevocably, into the hands of a candidate, whom they may deem thoroughly unfit to be President of the United States.

The story of this most un-Darwinian devolution of the presidential elector, is a brief but interesting page in the history of American government. Our political forbears, gathered in convention in Philadelphia in 1787, devoted much thought to the perplexing problem of the best method of electing the President. So exhaustive were their discussions, that they debated no fewer than five, or according to some grave authors, seven or even ten, electoral systems. Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts, urged that the President be elected by the State executives, and Hamilton, of New York, proposed to confide the choice to "electors chosen by electors chosen by the people." Daniel Carroll of Maryland, Franklin and Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania, Dickinson of Delaware, and others, favored an election by popular vote, while at the opposite extreme stood Roger Sherman of Connecticut, who wished to have the President appointed by Congress. "The people," he held, "would never be sufficiently informed of the character of the men, to vote intelligently for the candidates." He found, for a time at least, like-minded delegates in Charles Pinckney of South Carolina, whose opinion was that a popular vote would put the presidency "at the mercy of demagogues," in Gerry, denouncing the popular method as "radically vicious," and in George Mason of Virginia, who said that "it would be as unnatural to refer the choice of a proper person for President to the people, as to refer a trial of color to a blind man." Other views were also advanced, notably by Oliver Ellsworth of Connecticut and Luther Martin of Maryland, who advocated that the choice be intrusted to electors chosen directly by the State legislatures. Moderate counsels prevailed, however, and, in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the McPherson vs. Blacker decision, "The final result seems to have reconciled contrariety of views by leaving it to the State legislatures to appoint the presidential electors directly by joint ballot or concurrent separate action, or through popular election by districts or general ticket, or as otherwise might be directed."

The whole debate, as Chancellor Kent observes, turned upon one of the most momentous and difficult questions within the purview of the Convention, and it seems plain that, in the mind of the delegates, the presidential elector was to be a man of unusual qualifications. A grave and reverend person, distinguished for wisdom and eminent ability, they would have him independent of popular passion, and beyond the influence of tumult or of intrigue. He represented not a party, nor even, strictly speaking, the will of the people of his State, but was wholly free, foregathering with the electors appointed in his State, to exercise his judgment in selecting a citizen, fit in every respect to be the Chief Executive of the Federal Union. That this independence might receive an extrinsic safeguard, a vote by secret ballot was provided, so that neither the country nor his fellow-electors might know how he had voted. To employ a current political tag, such an elector "had no strings on him." He was at perfect liberty to vote for anyone possessing the constitutional requirements, and the framers of the Constitution believed that he would exercise his right with conscientious discretion.

In view of the great divergence between the theory of 1787 and the practice of 1916, it would serve no good purpose to inquire whether or not our modern electors are always, or even generally, men of the high type contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. Granting that they fulfil the expectations then formed, it is plain that the free elector created by the Constitution has now become, in the complete absence of any constitutional amendment or accretion of law, the merest instrument of a political party. As early as 1823 Thomas Benton of Missouri designated him as "nothing else but an agent tied down to the execution of a precise trust." In 1877 Mr. Justice Bradley, discussing the Louisiana Case, growing out of the Hayes-Tilden controversy, remarked that "instead of the electors being, as it was supposed they would be, invested with power to act on dictates of their own judgment and discretion, they have become mere puppets, elected to express the preordained will of the political party that elects them." The late Senator Ingalls of Kansas thought that he did not outstep the bounds of picturesque truth when he compared them to "the marionettes of a Punch and Judy show," the showman who pulled the strings being the political party in power.

The harshness of these criticisms is fully justified by the facts. Although no pledges were exacted from him, the devolution of the elector began with our third election, in 1796. With John Adams standing for the Federalists, and Thomas Jefferson for the Republicans, the contest was conducted on lines of political differences. Four years later, with the same men as opponents, the election was a typical political contest. In the end the election was referred to, and made by, the House of Representatives. By this time the devolution was essentially complete, for, as Bryce remarks, "the notion of leaving any freedom or discretion to the elector had vanished." The correctness of this statement is evidenced by a letter written in 1800 to the United States Gazette, by an indignant Federalist who believed that a Pennsylvania elector, one Samuel Miles, had betrayed his trust by voting for Jefferson. "What!" exclaimed this son of the Revolution, "do I chuse Samuel Miles to determine for me whether John Adams or Thomas Jefferson shall be President? No! I chuse him to act, not to think."

Today we have accepted what was, perhaps, inevitable. We vote for electors who dare not be other than frank partisans; for the action of an elector who would "bolt" his party would be considered a betrayal of trust and the equivalent of political suicide. Writing in 1877, Mr. Justice Story shows that for seventy-six years, no elector had even "been subjected to the imputation of being open to any influences in that direction," and the remark is true after nearly forty years. The elector "is under the implied obligation" to vote on party lines alone, and "to disregard the obligation the Constitution intends to put upon him, of selecting and voting for a President according to his own judgment." The "Democratic" electors, to use a term unknown to the Constitution, are at liberty to vote for Mr. Hughes, or for any other properly qualified citizen. But there is no probability whatever that they will exercise this constitutional right. The free and untrammeled patriot contemplated by the Constitution has disappeared. He is now but one of many indiscreet electors.

Catholicism and Courtesy

GARRETT PIERSE

COURTESY is the graceful expression of the kindly qualities of the heart. It derived a strong emphasis from Catholicism. Graciousness, considerateness, politeness, call it what you will, received new strength from Our Lord. In fact, the true idea of a gentleman is to be traced to Christ. For graciousness is an outstanding quality of Jesus. Even in regard to refined manners, which indeed are the blossoming of interior culture and kindness, He continues to be the model of humanity. The charity of Christ, which according to St. Paul is an impelling force, inspires this trait. Charity is but coldly expressed by the English word, love; it means more than commonplace love; it means the "dearness" of Christ. In graciousness we find one of the chief secrets of the attractiveness of Christ's personality. Some, that are called saints, are harsh in manner, and wanting in affability. They keep us at a distance, and our natural tendency is to wish them at a distance. But this habitual harshness is assuredly not a result of sanctity, and, if it is found in saints, it is because saints are not without slight sins and human imperfections. But it is not so in the case of the Saint of saints. Jesus is gracious with all sorts and conditions of men, with young and old, with poor and rich, with saint and sinner, with the lovable and the unlovable. He holds little children in His arms, and in this respect offers a striking contrast to the crabbed sages of ancient times; He does not allow to pass unnoticed the mite cast into the treasury by the poor widow; His heart melts in active compassion for the multitude, who, He fears, may faint in the way. In the case of an enemy whose name has become a synonym for treachery He uses a gentle courtesy, and calls him friend; He bears up with the dullness and incredulity of His disciples, and a gracious glance at Peter evokes a flood of penitent tears. To women, whom paganism despised as inferior creatures, He is also gracious. The adulterous woman, for whom zealots of the law thought stoning the only punishment, is told by Him to go in peace. The tentative beginnings in moral growth of a Magdalen are graciously and boldly encouraged in an adverse environment, as were the timorous advances of the unpopular and odious tax-gatherers, Matthew and Zachæus. Indeed His coming to our earth and its poor manger was an act of gracious condescension, and the close of His life on the Cross was in keeping with the beginning, for He then forgave His enemies, gave a new son to His mother, and issued a royal pardon to the crucified waif of Jewish society.

Christ's law of affectionate love, or beneficence for all men, reintroduced the virtue of gentleness to a wondering world. For tenderness or considerateness, especially as a quality of men, was but little prized by the pagan world. To be just to paganism, one should admit that courtesy was not entirely unknown to pagans, for paganism had received God's good gift of reason, and could sometimes display a brilliant natural virtue. If Christianity can boast of the act of a courtier who threw his cloak on the ground to receive the footsteps of his queen, a tribe of American Indians can point to a similar courtesy when one of their men hastened to throw some grass on the miry edge of a well whence a woman was to drink. Nevertheless there is a contrast between the general spirit of paganism and that of Christianity. Ancient pagans, like Zeno, and recent pagans, like Nietzsche, made valor the be-all and end-all of individual culture. More complete is the ideal of Christianity. It adds gentleness and tenderness to manliness. We may well be thankful to find in our heroes the heart of a woman, as well as a forceful mind. Otherwise force would become brutality. The worse than pagan ideal of Nietzsche would but tend to exterminate from the world the puny infant, Newton, and the unfortunate genius of Nietzsche's poor, insane self.

On account of its advocacy of gentleness some writers—for example, Lecky—have subtly misrepresented Christianity by contrasting it with paganism as the advocate of passive, womanly virtues, as against active, masculine ideals. In this he but continued the misrepresentations of the Protestant apologist Paley.

As against the one-sided views of the rationalistic historian, and the Protestant apologist, the truth is that Christianity is broad enough to embrace both types of virtue, one class the complement of the other. It is shallow to exclude, with Paley, the character of great men from the domain of Christianity, presenting as it does a lengthy roll of great names. It is flying in the face of history to contrast, as Lecky does, the heroic with the saintly ideal, as if the latter were not eminently heroic. Christian courtesy does not imply the languid and enervating manner of aristocratic drawing-rooms. Just as Christian courtesy stands for the courtesy of the heart as well as the courtesy of external forms, which without the former constitute an odious hypocrisy, so too it is far removed from the weakness of oversensitive and effeminate natures. It is willing to take its chance in the rough, work-a-day world, and to be hardened in its fiber by the storms of life. Like every other genuine virtue it supposes force of mind.

Some have been led by Newman's famous definition to believe that a true gentleman never gives pain. Others suppose that it is complimentary to a person to say that he has made no enemies. But it is necessary sometimes to give pain, and the person who has made no enemies has never struck any iniquity on the hip. Even the tender heart of St. Paul rejoiced that his rebuke saddened his converts for their own good. Let us give up, then, the idea possessed by over-sensitive natures that a gentleman never gives pain. Christianity favors gentleness and patience, but it also favors courage and manliness, it favors in each individual, man or woman, the most complete acquisition that is possible, of the highest elements of human nature, a masculine activity and daring, and its complement, a feminine tenderness; in a word, it favors gentlemanliness with all that both elements of this compound word imply. Christian women, like Joan of Arc, had a masculine courage; men saints, like Paul, had a womanly tenderness. Christ, the exemplar, was not all gentleness. Witness the severe manliness of His scourging of the money-changers, of His never-excelled invective against hypocrites, of His refusal to let His disciple bury his father, on the principle of great men, that one who has set his hand to the plow must not look back, and His stern rebuke to St. Peter himself: "Go behind me, Satan, thou art a scandal to me, because thou savorest not the things that are of God."

That Catholicism has been one of the strongest factors in favoring true courtesy is made perfectly clear in its history and its theology. That wonderful poetic product of medieval times, chivalry, received the positive blessing of the Church. The Christian knight was not more remarkable for his soldierly valor and high honor than for his true courtesy. He was the chevalier, sent forth with high vows to do battle for the right, and graciously to defend the weak, especially orphans and women. And the dubbing of a knight was accompanied by the set prayers of the Catholic ritual. Catholic theology, too, especially as represented by the great genius of St. Thomas, who touches on this as on nearly all subjects, makes courtesy a virtue and a duty. Courtesy is not merely a brilliant social attainment, which may be dispensed with; it is a matter of obligation. We owe it in justice to society. As society could not subsist without truth, neither could it subsist without one of the chief amenities of life, courtesy. In support of this view, St. Thomas quotes, as is his wont, a striking saying of the great philosopher of antiquity, Aristotle, that no one could remain for a single day with a sad, unpleasant man (Aristotle, 8 Ethic, ch. 5, and St. Thomas 2a, 2æ, q. 114, art 2). Consequently one is bound to live agreeably and pleasantly with others, unless for some special utility it is necessary to cause pain. Macaulay speaks of the Puritans as men with a sour aspect. In the view of Catholic theology the man with a long face and a sour aspect is doing an injustice to his fellows. In so far forth he is simply vicious. And Catholic theology is but an echo of that Divine voice which warns us, when we fast, not to look sad nor disfigure our faces.

An Old-Fashioned Teacher

THOMAS F. MEEHAN

A NOTE printed in the issue of AMERICA for June 11 concerning the grave of Patrick Sarsfield Casserly, a New York classical schoolmaster of the early years of the last century, attracted far-extended attention and aroused a desire for more details about him. The inscription on his tombstone in Calvary Cemetery reads:

> Of your charity pray for the soul of Patrick Sarsfield Casserly, born in the County Westmeath, Ireland, and for many years a resident of the City of New York, U. S. A., in which City he departed this life, April 29, 1847, in the 55th year of his age. Thy kingdom come.

Mr. Casserly came to New York in 1824 with his wife and a son, and although his ability as a teacher and writer brought him some local prominence, the details of his personality and career are meager enough. He wrote for the Weekly Expositor and the Truth Teller, two of the earliest Catholic weeklies in New York, and compiled and edited several books of devotional reading. His classical learning was splendidly shown in a Jacob's "Greek Reader" which he edited (1836), of which sixteen editions were printed, and a text-book on Latin prosody (1845) which was extensively used for two generations in classical schools. He also wrote a pamphlet, "New England Critics and New York Editors," in reply to an article on six Greek lexicons in the North American Review of March, 1845. Besides this he translated "Of the Little Garden of Roses and Lilies" of Thomas à Kempis and the "Sublime and Beautiful" of Longinus.

In November, 1828, he opened a school in New York. A curious advertisement which he inserted in the Truth Teller, for the first time, on December 6, 1828, gives us an inkling of his character, social conditions and of the polite education of that time. The announcement reads in this style:

> CHRESTOMATHIC INSTITUTION, or Seminary for General Education, No. 36 Cherry street, a few doors from Franklin Square, P. S. Casserly, T. C. D., Principal.
>
> At a time when there are so many respectable seminaries for the education of youth in this city, many of them too conducted with judgment and success, it may seem intrusive to call on public patronage for the encouragement of one more. But without drawing any invidious comparisons or seeking to depreciate the pretensions of others by extolling his own, the subscriber trusts, he now comes before a discerning public with peculiar claims on its support.
>
> Born and educated in an academy of long standing in his native land, carefully instructed in all the branches both of a Classical and an English education in that solid and withal elegant manner for which the old countries are so remarkable, constantly adding to his stock of acquirements by perusing the best works on education, personally examining the different system of Bell, Lancaster, Feinagle and Edgeworth, operating on each of these systems in his own seminary, over which he presided for many years, and added to these, having the paramount advantage of being practically and critically conversant with the Sizarship course of Trinity College, Dublin, allowedly the most difficult in Europe, Mr. C. may assert with confidence that he can offer the enlightened citizens of New York an extensive course of useful as well as polite education not surpassed by any in the United States. From all these varied advantages, from his intimate acquaintance with the best modes of education now followed in England and Ireland, from his long experience in the art of teaching—for it is an art—from that well-grounded confidence in his preceptorial capability which a lifetime's familiarity can alone bestow, and from the honorable testimonials which he has received from some of the most eminent literary characters, both in England and America, Mr. C. presumes to look for the fostering hand of the intelligent and enterprising emporium of the western world.
>
> The most undeviating attention shall be paid by conciliatory monition to inculcate habits of mental discipline, gentlemanly deportment, strict propriety of correct and unremitted application. The best masters in the several departments are engaged; but the classics can in no instance be confided exclusively to assistants: as consistently with his plan of teaching they must be individually subjected to the personal examination and instruction of Mr. C. himself, whose interest and reputation are mainly dependent in the character of his establishment.

The location of the seminary is in a healthy and retired situation free from the noise and interruption of public streets. The course of instruction is divided into two departments: the English, embracing Spelling, Reading, Explanation, Elocution, Writing, Arithmetic, English Grammar, Parsing, Exercises, Composition, History, Geography, use of Globes and Maps, Astronomy, Book-keeping, Mensuration, Surveying, Geometry, Trigonometry, Navigation, Algebra, etc. The classical or collegiate containing the Greek, Latin, French, Spanish and Italian Languages, with constant reference to grammar, syntax, exercises, prosody, derivation and peculiarities.

The terms for imparting all this erudition were, per quarter:

Spelling, Reading, Tables, etc	$5.00
Writing, Arithmetic, Elocution, etc	6.00
The above, with Grammar, Geography, History, etc	7.00
Do. with Globes, Bookkeeping, etc	10.00
Do. with Geometry, Algebra, etc	12.00
Junior Classics as far as Caesar and the Greek Testament	10.00
Intermediate do. in Sallust, Virgil and Greek Testament	12.50
Collegiate or entrance course	15.00
French, Spanish and Italian, each	5.00
Quills and ink per quarter	.50
Fuel for the season, payable on 1st November	1.00
Boarding per annum (paid quarterly in advance)	200.00

It is further announced that

A select Female School has been established at Mr. C.'s residence, No. 6 Pell Street, next door to the Bowery, under the superintendence of experienced Ladies, one of whom will teach French and Music in a superior style. They will also have the assistance of the masters employed in the Institution.

Later the Institute was moved to No. 46 Harman Street, a few doors from Chatham Square, where "an Infant Preparatory School" was added, with the statement:

> To this children of 3 and 4 years will be admitted and instructed in Alphabet, Spelling, Reading, etc. They will be under the instruction of a lady who is herself a parent and who will treat them with maternal kindness. The location of the institution in a genteel, open and elevated street, is decidedly one of the most healthy and eligible that New York affords. The school rooms consist of 3 spacious airy apartments 65 feet long by 25 broad; one for the classical department; one for the Senior English and mathematical; (Between these are large folding doors) and the third for the Female and Infant Departments. The entrance to the girls' room is different than that of the boys'; there is also a separate yard and accommodation. Parents are invited to call and view the arrangements of the Institution. Hours in Winter from 2 to 3; in Summer from 9 to 12 and from 2 to 5.

The terms according to the branches taught were: In the infant school from $3.00 to $4.00; female department, $4.00 to $10.00.

Cherry Street, where the seminary of 1828 had "a healthy and retired situation free from the noise and interruption of public streets," has undergone more than a radical change, and "No. 6 Pell Street, next door to the Bowery," the site of the "Select Female School," is now the heart of Chinatown. But strange as are these social and topographical mutations, the old schoolmaster, could he return, would probably not think them half so startling as the education which he would find offered as the prevailing model of an English and classical training. He would discover that there are no faculties, that "formal discipline" is a relic of the "Middle Ages," that a set course of studies is a mold which cramps the youthful soul and renders progress impossible. His beloved Sallust and Virgil would not be in sight, for they have been displaced long since by "Fourteen Weeks in Botany" or by lectures on travel or art or by some other conceit.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

The Excellent Gift of Charity

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There seem to be a few Catholics writing for AMERICA who apparently are so proud in their possession of the holy Faith that they have no time to concern themselves with St. Paul's words, "If I should have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing." And I imagine that H. W. was among that number when he reviewed Professor Gerould's "Saints' Legends" for the issue of November 11. It is against this attitude, appearing from time to time in your paper, that I should like to raise my voice in protest. If we as Catholics are the salt of the earth, is it well for us to ignore that most excellent gift of charity in our dealings with others, especially since unto us has God given of His abundance? Thackeray's "Vanity Fair," chapter thirty-two, in which Jos takes flight, and the war is brought to a close, especially the last paragraph but one, is sufficient to acquit Professor Gerould from H. W.'s charge that he "is not up even in the matter of his chair."

New Haven. CORTLAND VAN WINKLE.

What Becomes of Them All?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read with interest the article by Hilaire Belloc, entitled "What Becomes of Them All?" published in the October 21 number of your admirable weekly, and am prompted to attempt a partial reply to the query.

The rapidity with which the stone-paved ways of later centuries have gone to ruin, suggests a possible explanation of the disappearance of the Roman pavements. In addition there may be offered the further suggestion that as a result of disuse, the penetrating roots of plants would soon leave the surfaces of such highways but a mass of jumbled stones which eventually would be hardly distinguishable from the surrounding fields, or forests. That such stones would provide convenient material for building purposes offers still another explanation for their disappearance.

The inflammable nature of woodwork is of itself sufficient explanation for the disappearance of objects made of that material. In regard to the vanished fleets and their metal-work, one has but to observe the destiny of discarded vessels today. Their metal-work is removed, their wooden hulks broken up, and the material used or destroyed. The humble junkman must have flourished in all ages, gathering up the discarded pieces of metal whose value is recognized and whose destiny is the melting pot, from which it comes forth again to form other objects, new and often of great price. Time after time the bronze fragment that came from some wreck of a Roman galley has been melted and remade until today some of its particles may form the fuse-cap that tips the screaming shell, or perhaps the bronze bookrest that sustains the volumes on the student's table. The countless suits of armor that clothed the battling knights of long ago no doubt found their way into the sack of the junkman, and thence to the nearest foundry, to be melted and remelted many times again.

And as for the decay of buildings, one has but to inquire of present-day owners to learn what constant care and expense are required to keep them habitable. Without this ceaseless attention, these structures soon crumble to decay. The fragments of the buildings of ancient Rome illustrate how such structures not only fall apart of their own decay, but, in addition, serve as quarries from which later, unmindful generations secure materials with which to erect their buildings. This latter propensity of mankind accounts for much of the disappearance of the buildings of the past. As the metal passed through the melting-pot to be recast, so have the stones repassed through the stone-cutter's hands to be remade and relaid.

The Temple was torn down and rebuilt, but to be again destroyed. The Pyramids themselves have served as quarries for several centuries. but they are so vast that not all the building activities of many generations of men have sufficed to more than remove the outer coating of polished stone.

And so it is with man! In endless change his destiny he fulfils! Himself forgetting, he is himself forgot; and as from mother earth he came, thereto he must return, that from his bones may rise again the grain that feeds his progeny.

Chicago. EBER COLE BYAM.

Other Aspects of Mormonism.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

To begin with, I am a Catholic, and no one belonging to me has ever been anything else, so far as I know. I have never been related, or had any affiliation in any way, shape or manner with any Mormon; nor do I expect to have any relation or affiliation, except as their fellow-citizen. I hold no brief for the Mormons. After twenty-five years' residence in this city I have made the following observations: The Mormons are an industrious and law-abiding people. Their leaders denounce divorce, race-suicide, secret societies and Socialism. From the highest to the lowest in the social scale, it is their family custom to say prayers before and after meals. They are a prayerful people. They pray to a personal God in time of trouble, to a God who, they believe, rules the universe and to whom they are accountable. They do works for their dead and believe in the resurrection of the body. That is all I know definitely about their belief. They have certain church laws, and one of them is to pay tithes; like members of all other churches, some pay and some do not. I don't know what happens, if anything, to those who do not pay. Out of the tithing money they erect churches all over the State. They take care of their orphans, destitute, infirm and aged, in their own homes mostly. They take up no collections at any of their meetings, no collection is taken at the door, no one owns a pew, and no chains are strung across the aisles.

On Bishop Scanlon's arrival in this city, Brigham Young welcomed him, and, I understand, presented him with the land on which our old church was built. About fifteen years ago, Father Younan gave a mission here, and the Mormons invited Bishop Scanlon to use their assembly-hall and tabernacle for the mission, as they wanted to attend, and our church would be too small to accommodate the crowds. The invitation was accepted, and the mission was given in their buildings for one week. Our Church had the distinction of being the only church which did not abuse the Mormons. I have found them the most charitable class of people in this city, charitable in every sense of the word. I have found that a family with a lot of little children is unwelcome in any but a Mormon neighborhood. Strangers though they may be, in time of sickness they come and give more than expressions of sympathy, they do things.

The Mormon women were the only women I met who did not express surprise and pity as year after year my babies came; on the contrary, they congratulated me and assured me God would bless me. I have never met a Mormon woman who believed in or practised birth-restriction. As a general thing they are just as refined and cultured as any other people in this city, in the same class of society. There are just as many educated and wealthy men and women in proportion to their numbers as there are in any denomination. Their converts are "lured" here, very likely, for the same reason the rest of us are, in hopes of bettering themselves materially. I do not believe that it is part of the religion of Mormons not to trade with "Gentiles," because my husband has always done business with them They go where they can get the best bargains, just as the rest of us do.

As for that tirade of Hiram Smith's, the only unique thing about it was the delivery; others do it in a more refined, subtle and devilish way. Besides, the Mormons, perhaps, are no more responsible for it than many another congregation is responsible for brutal and stupid remarks made by ministers. It is not the Mormons that have kept the city back, but abuse like that contained in J. C.'s letter. That it contains a misrepresentation, you may judge for yourself, and also how to value the other statements in his letter, when I assure you that it was not the Mormon College that gave that ball referred to, but the State University, the then president of which was a Unitarian, and the faculty of which is made up of Mormons, Catholics, Protestants, agnostics and Socialists. Moreover, the society columns reported even Catholic names on committees for "affairs" going on that night. The Mormons control two newspapers in this city, and they are keen-eyed and sharp-tongued, and people who live in glass houses should not throw stones. Finally, that letter itself is so like talk that is going on in some part of the world all the time about Catholics, that I am surprised a high-class journal like AMERICA made room for it in its columns.

Salt Lake City. M. C.

[The Editor takes this occasion to rectify a misprint in the letter referred to. The annual tithes of the Mormon church were rated by the writer at between $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, not between $300,000,000 or $400,000,000.—Ed. AMERICA.]

Antiquity of Prayers for the Dead

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The recent action of the Protestant Episcopal Convention in approving of prayers for the dead was the occasion of a very heated discussion about the antiquity of such prayers. Catholics and Protestants participated in the argument, the latter stating that intercession for the souls in purgatory was introduced in the Middle Ages by money-grabbing priests, the former denying this absolutely. Where does the truth lie?

New York. A. M. L.

[The first and rather obvious retort to this query is, that the prayers in question follow from a doctrine always taught in the Church. Therefore they were not "introduced in the Middle Ages by money-grabbing priests." For anyone who believes that the Holy Ghost "is living in the Church" this is a sufficient answer. Moreover, history disproves the assertion about the venal priests of the Middle Ages. Prayers for the dead obtained among the Jews, long before the Christian Dispensation began. And evidence seems to point to the fact that in the second century the custom of interceding for departed souls was widespread. Thus the "Leucian Acts of St. John," a Gnostic work, mentions a memorial Eucharistic service on the third day after the death of Drusiana. Modern Catholics will recognize the significance of this item. Then too, Tertullian, born about 150 A. D., says that the faithful widow, not forsaking her late husband, "prays for his soul," "and offers on the anniversary of his falling asleep." In the fourth century Arnobius protests against the destruction of churches in which "prayer is offered for the living and for those delivered from the bondage of the body." In the same century Cyril of Jerusalem speaks thus of the efficacy of the Mass, for the dead: "Believing that there will accrue the greatest advantage to the souls for whom the supplication is presented, while that holy and most awful Sacrifice is lying before us." Finally in the "Sacramentary of Serapion" is found this liturgical prayer: "We intercede further on behalf of all fallen asleep, whose memorial we are offering." At that place in the liturgy the names of the dead were inserted, just as is done today. So there is some evidence that prayers for the dead were, in all probability, quite widespread as early as the second century, and they were certainly common in the fourth century. The Middle Ages begin a bit later.—ED. AMERICA.]

Centralizing Missionary Agencies

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Rev. Bruno Hagspiel's article on "Centralization of Missionary Agencies" is very timely. It seems to me that his cooperative plan, an annual or semi-annual convention, with a liberal allowance of individual liberty and enterprise, would produce wonderful results. We need vocations and means, and we shall have plenty of both, if we can get every American Catholic interested in the cause. To do so, we must appeal to human nature as it is, and not as it might or should be, to personal tastes and preferences. Some are attracted by one part of the work and others by another, and can be sufficiently interested to become enthusiastic and zealous workers for this or that field, whilst the mission cause in general appeals but little to them. There is plenty of room and work for all, but along various lines. For years we have had a general collection for the Indians and Negroes; but how little would have been accomplished without the special efforts of the Indian Bureau, the Josephites, the Holy Ghost Fathers and the great work of Mother Drexel?

Why should not the Jesuits, Franciscans, and other religious families make special efforts for the foreign missions in charge of their Fathers, whose needs are so well known and so dear to them? The same is true of the Church Extension Society, the Maryknoll Seminary, the Mission House at Techny, Ill., the St. Peter Claver Society, the Catholic Women's Missionary Association and similar organizations. While some of these appeal to many, others appeal only to a few; but all of them contribute toward spreading more knowledge, more interest and, therefore, to producing greater results for our missions. I dare say that where these flourish most, the Propagation of the Faith and the Holy Childhood will also prosper most. If our clergy and people were in more direct touch with the missions, houses for students and catechists would be established, and chapels, altars, statues, vestments and other needs would be supplied in abundance.

A single sermon or even a letter from a missionary to a parish would bring better results than the strongest exhortation from the most zealous pastor. Most people love to do special things for special purposes, especially when they are given their own way in such matters. The conventions could be made very useful in guiding zeal and in making practical suggestions. Advertising and appealing to individuals for special purposes has made the Church Extension Society very successful. Nor has any other worthy cause suffered thereby. Therefore, let us have more specializing, more advertising, more individual appeals, more enthusiasm, more spreading of missionary literature, and, above all, more cooperation among these various activities. Then we shall surely have greater and better results.

Grand Rapids. JOHN A. SCHMITT.

156 Fifth Avenue

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I count myself among the wise few who seek the seashore in the autumn, and find there a pleasure and delight unknown to earlier sojourners. Here on this annual quest, I find staring at me from the editorial page of the local daily the following appeal, addressed by the new minister in charge of the Presbyterian Italian mission, to the Christian people of Asbury Park:

> My dear Christian friends: Knowing the interest you have kindly shown in the work done by my friend, the Rev. Mr. Fornataro, I wish to announce myself as his successor in the work. I am positively of the opinion that the first great need in this work is an adequate place for the Italians to worship in. The hall now in use is most unsuitable and experience has shown that our people, brought up in fine churches, are attracted to a suitable church building rather than to a hall. My great longing is to begin plans at once for this building on the lot that James A. Bradley has donated to us on Springwood Avenue.
>
> I am writing to you, therefore, to appeal to your generosity in Christ's name for this great cause. I do most earnestly solicit your help to whatever extent you may feel inclined to give it. By a mutual sympathy and Christ-like spirit, you as Protestant Christians, can do mighty things for our Italians, whose forefathers, long years ago, gave your fathers the Gospel, and who now themselves need the same old Gospel of mercy, compassion and love. Wishing you every blessing of God, I am yours most gratefully, DOMENICO A. PORFIRIO.

Where the quarry is, we are told, there also will the vultures be found circling above. Asbury Park is now one of the great summer resorts of the country. During its development in the past quarter of a century, there have come here, as to other progressive communities, a number of thrifty, industrious Italians. Little Italy, in the unfashionable section, "on the other side of the railroad," has grown steadily, and the colony now has a church and a pastor of its own. Hence the foregoing "appeal to the Christian people of Asbury Park."

About forty years ago James A. Bradley founded Asbury Park. He is, he tells us, in an oft-repeated biography, the son of intemperate Catholic, Irish parents, victims of the baleful influence on their race of a demoralizing New York tenement environment. Picked up by Methodist "rescuers," he has been, in prosperous manhood, the dominating factor in the success of this worldly adjunct of the strong New Jersey citadel of intolerant Wesleyism. He is an example of the results of the forays of soul-hunters among the unfortunate children of the Irish who came to this country after "the Black '37." The Irish are no longer available, and the energies of the Board of Home Missions, radiating from 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, are now turned to such fallow ground as the Asbury Park Italian colony. Is the result to be future Italian Bradleys?

The activity of 156 Fifth avenue, now exercised in respect to the "foreign" residents in Monmouth County, New Jersey, might better be directed to Madison County, New York, described by the stanch Protestant organ, the Living Church, as "a typical New York county, with a sturdy native population, with many well-to-do farmers of American stock, and a comparatively small foreign element"? Yet, adds the Living Church, a census "undertaken by Protestant organizations" discloses that > Twenty-one per cent of the population of a county in the very center of the Empire State are practical pagans. . . . In one of the schools a class was asked last April why Easter was kept, and the only answer was that it was Grant's birthday. The children all showed in their faces a blank ignorance.

You could not say "Buona Pasqua" to any little "dago" along Springwood Avenue, where the proselyting Porfirio wants to erect his "suitable building," without getting an intelligent explanation of such a salutation.

Asbury Park, N. J. T. F. M.

Protestant Texts on Christmas Cards

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Millions of Christmas cards are now in preparation, and on many of them texts taken from the Protestant Bible are being printed. The use of such cards by Catholics, through inadvertence or ignorance, is common. But it is regrettable, for it is incongruous, to say the least, for a Catholic to send Christmas greetings in words that may not be read from the altar, nor indeed in private. The case is worse when the sense of Scripture is not retained, as happens in the text most frequently quoted. The version of St. Luke ii: 14, usually printed on the cards, is taken from the Protestant Bible, and reads: "Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace and good will to men." The Catholic and correct reading is "Glory to God in the highest; and on earth peace to men of good will." We should insist that cards be provided with Catholic texts.

San Francisco. R. R. F.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

The "World" and Religious Liberty

ON the morning of November 8, the New York World published an editorial which for supercilliousness and sheer ignorance of current Catholic opinion, has rarely been equaled, even by the Evening Post. This statement is advanced in the consciousness that it is dangerously like hyperbole, but it is borne out by the facts. Smarting under the blow of the supposed defeat of Mr. Wilson, the World proceeded to catalogue the members of the "motley group," forming a "coalition of the most heterogeneous elements that ever combined to punish a President." One of these groups was, of course, "Wall Street"; another, those "Catholics who want to overthrow the Carranza Government in Mexico, and make the United States the official protector of the Catholic Church in Latin-American countries."

The "Catholic vote," here referred to, may be curtly dismissed as a myth. Even to the maddest partisans this fact should, by this time, be plain. As to the editorial in question, one of two conclusions seems inevitable. Its author either has been released, prematurely, from a sanatorium, or he has assumed the office, grateful to sordid minds, of stirring up religious hatred. Catholics, it is true, have protested against the riot of blood and lust which has raged in Mexico, under leaders like Villa and Carranza, the one the discarded, the other, the reigning favorite of this Government. So, too, have Protestants, Jews, Masons, men of all religions, and men of none. Catholics have shuddered with horror, when brought face to face with innocent children, young maidens, and religious women devoted to the works of charity and education, who have been maltreated in a manner worse than bestial. Nor are these inhumanities isolated instances. They have been enacted repeatedly; they have flourished in regions officially "at peace," under the benign reign of Villa, now admitted to be an unspeakable ruffian, and of Carranza, still basking in the sunlight of official favor.

Is this just protest against crimes which cry to Heaven for vengeance, made not only by Catholics, but by men of every variety of religious faith, a bid "to make the United States the official protector of the Catholic Church in Latin-American countries"? An affirmative answer suffices to indicate mental deficiency. The present Mexican régime, misnamed "Government," denies to a large number of Mexican citizens, the right to liberty, the pursuit of happiness, and the enjoyment of the fruits of their industry, for the sole reason that they are members of a Church banned by a diabolical hatred of religion. It proposes to continue this denial. Can this nation, or any nation "conceived in liberty," give the seal of its sanction to a government which by force of Constitutional writ, proscribes religious liberty?

"Worse Than the Inquisition"

"TIME Clock for Rectors—Proposal to Keep Tabs on Activities of Priests—Offered in Convention" were the startling headlines that appeared last week in a New York evening paper. The captions were suggested, it transpired, by a resolution offered at the annual convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the New York diocese that a committee be appointed "to petition the legislature to amend the Church-Corporations act so that rectors shall be required to report to their vestries or their trustees the manner in which they spend their time during the week." Regarding the mover of this subversive resolution the paper gave no information, but it is safe to say that he is a keen Erastian layman of a most uncompromising kind, fond of good sermons and sharp-eyed for the cloth's little weaknesses.

No one, however, who has with holy bell been knolled to church, and sat at good men's feasts and wiped his eyes of drops that sacred pity has engendered will refuse to compassionate the ill-starred pastor's lot, if that dread resolution becomes a law. Picture the wretched man as, all pale and trembling, he comes before a hard-headed and unsympathetic board of trustees every Monday morning to render a detailed and tabulated account of the way he passed each hour of the preceding week. "That sermon you preached yesterday put me to sleep," one of the merciless inquisitors would perhaps remark. "I was wondering how much time you devoted to its preparation." "This report indicates," another trustee would coldly observe, "that you passed more time last week in your motor-car than in your settlement house." "Yes," another member of the board would heartlessly agree, "and I perceive by this schedule that golf has been receiving more of your attention than the boys' club gets." The condition of the hopeless pastor after several examinations of this kind can be better imagined than described. In all probability he would either abandon altogether the cure of souls and retire to a nook merely monastic or else, ever haunted by the thought of that hebdomadal inquisition, would become so feverishly devoted to the care of his flock, that his shattered nerves would soon force him to resign his pastorate and take a prolonged vacation. However, if, backed by influential laymen, that very inconvenient resolution offered in the Protestant Episcopal convention should be embodied in the Church-Corporation act, the ministers cannot reasonably complain. For lay-control of the church has been an accepted principle of English Protestantism ever since Queen Bess and her worthy father set up their own religion.

A Word to "Realists"

"NEVER, never write anything you would be ashamed to read to a woman," was the advice which Mr. Howells received when a young journalist from the editor of a successful Ohio paper. Our most eminent novelist modestly owns that he has always tried to observe that admonition and then remarks:

> It seems not to be so now with our novelists, begun or beginning: they write many things they ought to be ashamed to read to women, or if they are of that sex, things they should be ashamed to read to men. But perhaps they are ashamed and only hold out writing so for art's sake; I cannot very well speak for them; but I am still very Victorian in my preference of decency.

The irony in the latter part of the citation is very delicate. For we have lately been hearing the indignant protests raised by certain prurient novelists against the exclusion of their books from public libraries, and are led to infer that these authors would suffer their literary martyrdom in silence, were it not for the fact that they are the sworn champions and defenders of freedom-loving "Art." "Whether this or that book of mine is banned is to me personally a matter of trifling moment," we hear these noble altruists tearfully explaining, "but if we allow these narrow-minded prudes to have their way, what in the world is to prevent the maiden goddess of Literary Art from becoming the slave and thrall of the Philistines? Unless we can secure space on the open shelves of the public libraries for our highly artistic works of erotic realism, the future of American letters is dark indeed!"

The deep concern these men show for the untrammeled freedom of tomorrow's American literature doubtless does them great credit. But as their noisome stories are far inferior in literary worth to the works of "prudish Victorians" like Mr. Howells who obstinately manifest a preference for decency, perhaps the enslavement of American letters is not so complete after all. The vociferous demand that the reading public should show unclean third-rate novels of today the same indulgence that a transcendent genius like Shakespeare receives, despite his occasional lapses from decorum, is ridiculous. If this new school of realists would but take to heart the motto that Mr. Howells has faithfully observed during his long career as a novelist, their books would not only improve in quality, but good women could read them. Meanwhile these novels are wisely banned.

Socialism in 1922?

"ARE we six years from Socialism in the United States?" The question is not without a certain justification. The writer who asked it in the New York Call shortly before the recent elections, arrived at an affirmative answer by a strictly mathematical process of computation. His calculation was correct, on the supposition that Socialism would continue to increase at the rate of growth it has manifested in the past twenty-four years. That such would actually be the case the writer was not sanguine enough to consider a probability. Yet he has cleverly scored a point in proving the vitality of Socialism, and his figures are evidently gathered from the most reliable sources.

Socialism, under the name of the Socialist Labor party, entered the presidential field in 1888, polling an insignificant 2,068 votes. At the next presidential election it had already increased 750 per cent, although it was still too small to be seriously regarded. Passing over this large percentage, we find that from 1892 to 1912 the total vote cast in each election for the Socialist party shows an average increase of 131 per cent! In view of this increase the election of 1916 should have scored for Socialism 13.84 per cent of the total vote. The election of 1920 should increase it to 31.97 per cent, and that of 1924 to 73.85 per cent. Thus the Socialist party would actually have a majority in the United States by 1922. That such will be the case Socialists themselves do not believe, but neither can the steadiness of their growth be denied.

The Socialist vote in 1912 was 901,062. The vote at the present election is not yet certain. Don Martin of the New York Herald, a political expert, definitely says that it exceeds 1,300,000. The Times' estimate places it at over 1,400,000. And the secret of this success? Socialists have but one reason to give. That is, literature. In assigning this cause they are apparently unanimous. "I attribute it," the Socialist candidate wrote, "to the 20,000,000 leaflets we put out. I attribute it to nobody's speaking." The two cities that elected the greatest number of Socialist public officials have each a Socialist daily paper. Moreover the gains formerly recorded in Chicago were made when that city had a Socialist daily newspaper, and today districts high on the Socialist list have enterprising weeklies. Need the moral be pointed more clearly for Catholics?

Surgeons Instead of Cells

ONE of the rational departures from traditional methods of dealing with youthful delinquency has been the creation and development in recent years of the juvenile court. It used to be thought, at least in the court, that the sole function of the judge was to punish, and that he had done his full duty by the State when he had condemned vicious minors to reformatories. This system is being replaced by a more humane and sensible treatment of young criminals. Prophylaxis and correction are taking the place of mere punishment. The Big Brother movement, the activities of societies like the Ozanam Association, and the practice of paroling demoralized but corrigible youngsters, during good behavior, under sympathetic supervision, have been rewarded in many cases by satisfactory moral regeneration.

Another step in the right direction has been the employment by the officers of juvenile courts of the methods which have proved beneficial in the classroom. Many a child has been transformed from a state of retardation to one of normal development, and from a chronic condition of insubordination to one of willing submission to discipline and order, by the application of some simple medical or surgical treatment. Physical abnormalities rather than moral depravity have been found to be the occasion, though not the cause, of much childish aberration. With the removal, for instance, of adenoids or the alleviation of eye-strain, the child has become sweet-tempered, virtuous in tendency and eager to learn. Profiting by this lesson, the juvenile court of Indianapolis recently employed the services of an eminent specialist to examine the pathological condition of four refractory boys. In all four cases the examination showed depression of the skull. This condition was remedied, and in three instances moral reformation followed.

State paternalism, with its purpose of reducing the citizen to increasing dependence on the Government, is to be resisted, and the assumption on the part of officialdom of the right to perform operations on the wards of the State, for eugenic or experimental purposes, cannot be tolerated. But, due regard paid to the legitimate wishes of parents, the employment at the public expense of the resources of science in the interests of poor children suffering from irritating defects is quite within the functions of the State. The anxiety therefore of those who see in the surgical treatment given at the order of the juvenile court another invasion of human rights is ill-founded. The movement, since it is susceptible of abuse, will bear watching; but it has not yet become, as some have styled it, "a radical departure from sound ethics."

A "Sacred" and a "Profane" Letter

THE issue of AMERICA for November 4 contained an editorial on an article about Mexican Masonry, contributed by Eber Cole Byam, himself a Mason, to the October Builder. This editorial called forth the following communication, to which a reply is appended in the form of an open letter:

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My attention has just been called to your references to my Mexican articles also the reply to same by Bro. Eber Cole Byam in the Builder for October. I endeavored to purchase a copy of your paper at a number of local bookstores but found they did not handle on ground "non-returnable." The one store that did carry, had sold out that particular issue of November 4th. However through the courtesy of Dr. Hart, editor of the Catholic Telegraph, I was permitted to read his copy, which I did with interest. I have fully replied to Bro. Byam's article in the Builder for November which I presume has come to your notice. In regard to the whole series of Mexican articles will say they were not written with any wish to engender any controversy either with a brother Mason like Bro. Byam or the profane, as you will understand from their appearing solely in a Masonic publication. I was greatly surprised when I read Bro. Byam's article in proof that he should call Dr. Castellot a clandestine Mason, inasmuch as that gentleman was long and several times referred to as head of the Mexican Scottish Rite by the New Age, official organ of the A. & A. S. R. of U. S., southern jurisdiction. What most surprised me was that Bro. Byam should call the present Mexican Revolution an I. W. W. Revolution, and his unjust condemnation of the Mexican Laws of Reform. His article led me to some rather plain speaking in my article "Masonic Light on Mexico," but I wish to reiterate what is said in prefatory note, any allusions made refer only to Mexican Catholicism condemned by some of your own brilliant writers.

If not trespassing upon your courtesy kindly mail me a copy of your November 4th issue, as I should like it in my file.

Cordially,

JOHN LEWIN MCLEISH, M.D.

Mr. John Lewin McLeish,

SIR: I beg you to accept the assurance of my very sincere thanks for your letter under date of November 11. Grateful as I am, yet I fear that I do not fully appreciate your courtesy, for despite my best efforts to remain in a thankful mood, I find myself disturbed by the doubt that perhaps your communication was meant, not for me, but for Mr. Byam. Certainly the jolt which you seem to have experienced was caused by him, and, as a consequence, I feel under no obligation of justice or charity to pour oil and wine into your soul. Nor, on the other hand, do I intend to come to Mr. Byam's defense. Such an action were an impertinence on the part of "the profane." Moreover, he seems quite able to take care of himself. Apparently he is a man of character and ability and, unlike many others more "sacred" but less versed in the ways of scholarship, he writes out of the fullness of unbiased experience. Whether or no Castellot is a clandestine Mason does not weigh a straw in the balance of truth and justice. Nor does it affect the fact that he has made open and blatant confession of the responsibility of Mexican Masons for a revolution unparalleled in savagery, a riot of blasphemy, blood and lust. However, the circumstance that he is "Past Sovereign Grand Commander of the Supreme Council of the Scottish Rite" gives such significance to his words that the "profane" like myself and the "sacred" who resemble your "Brother," Mr. Byam, blush for very shame over them, remembering, as we do, the fate of Mexico's women and innocent children. You are surprised that Mr. Byam speaks of the Mexican turmoil as an "I. W. W. Revolution"; Mr. Byam and all men who know anything about the affair, will smile at your ingenuousness. Evidently you have missed many of the manifestos and programs issued in Mexico during the last four years: you appear not to have seen the circulars signed by the I. W. W., nor to have noted how thoroughly the principles of that nefarious society have been put into practice. Mr. Byam has been more observant. Or is it that his standards are different from yours? At any rate his statement is accurate and should be neither a cause nor an occasion for surprise. The same is likewise true of his strictures on the Reform Laws, an infamous code conceived in iniquity and carried to completion by men whose chief concern was spoliation of the venerable institution which rescued their ancestors from a dismal and cruel paganism.

I trust I may remark without offense that I am not at all impressed by the announcement about the "plain words" evoked by the article of your worthy opponent. I have wit enough to realize that plain and accurate are not synonyms. Moreover, if the practice of many popular writers were my norm of judgment, I should be forced to conclude that the expression, "plain words," has a sinister and altogether unwholesome signification. Only too often it connotes a phase of subjectivism suggestive of moods and habits quite foreign to the scholar and gentleman.

It was indeed good of you, Sir, to attack only Mexican Catholicism. The "profane" of the United States are, I am sure, duly grateful for your highly discriminating delicacy. Nor will they admire your tactics less. They will recognize the admirable strategy displayed by you in fixing the brand of infamy on Catholicism as it is taught and practised in a part of the world about which the bulk of the American people know little or nothing. True, some may think that you should have excurred to the Brazilian swamps and Chilean mountains, but such folk are not so "profane" as the ordinary citizen. And a few of us, more perverse than the rest, will simply smile once again, and allow Mr. Byam to answer.

For the rest, though I know some Mexicans who have attacked "Mexican Catholicism," yet I must confess ignorance of our own brilliant writers who have done so. In my simplicity I had thought that if a man attacks the Faith, he ceases to be a Catholic. And cannot Lucifer still boast that he is an angel? Does it therefore follow that his judgments on the cohorts of heaven must be accepted without demur? As I write I seem to see uplifted on a naked, blood-stained rood a pathetic, broken man, a Jew, accused of blasphemy and gluttony and subversion of authority by "some of His own most brilliant writers": and His name was Jesus.

With sentiments of esteem, I am, Sir,

Very respectfully,

R. H. TIERNEY.

All else is committed to Mr. Byam, a distinguished Mason who has had the honesty and courage to expose Mexican Masonry for what it is, a "revolutionary," "contentious," "anarchistic," "murderous" organization.

Literature

THE NOVELS OF SIR WALTER SCOTT

"SHAKESPEARE," the high-school student scratched dogmatically on his examination paper, "wrote four plays: 'Macbeth,' 'Julius Caesar,' and I forget the other two." Though creator of as many novels as Shakespeare of plays, Walter Scott is personally unknown to most modern readers except by his "Ivanhoe" and "Talisman." If the Waverly novels were generally read, there would be less discussion no doubt, as to whether or not they are read. The reason for this present neglect of Scott is not far to seek. The old have not the vision, the young have not the patience to appreciate him. If the more mature reader can use a broom for a lance and storm impregnable castle walls in the garden, he may enter the charmed circle of Scott's coterie. His imagination must be wild and adventurous; he must be able to transform himself into a border chieftain or a feudal baron. He must hear the clarion call to battle and the tramping of armed troops; he must scale craggy cliffs to rescue beautiful maidens. Our busy generation prefers literature more typical of our age, the psychological analysis, the lust of wealth, the lure of the passions luridly told. The young are of course urged to become familiar with Scott, but for them, also, the hero of that football game and the young aviator are not nearly so dull and stupid as Waverly nor are the descriptions so unsufferably long, nor the dialect so hopelessly unintelligible. Forlorn, Sir Walter rests, a relic of the past.

With fame as fickle as fortune, it is not surprising that Scott's voluminous works, the "best sellers" of their day, should have become to us a series of half-forgotten titles and a few school "classics." A new novel by the author of Waverly was a sensation in the literary world, a joy to book-lover and to bookseller. Lord Holland, when asked his opinion of the "Tales of the Landlord" exclaimed "Opinion! we did none of us go to bed last night—nothing slept but my gout." All England and the Continent agreed with this criticism and nodded in approbation of the "Great Unknown." Even Jeffries, who is said to have dined off slaughtered authors, spread fulsome praise on the anonymous romancer. For such unheard of popularity, excellent reasons may be assigned; but none to enlist our gratitude more than the fact that Scott was one of the originators of the Romantic movement in literature and applied it to his novels. He bolted the stilted conceits of the later eighteenth-century writers. His breezy, out-of-doors atmosphere could not be constrained in their painted flower-gardens. Refusing to be artificial, he was genial and natural, with no message to deliver, no lax morals to scourge, no reforms to enforce. Scott wrote just to please and to amuse. The romancer was never lost in the preacher.

From a Catholic viewpoint, the honor due to Scott is doubtful. Because of his numerous attacks on the institutions of the Church, it was felt necessary, some years ago, to publish an expurgated edition of his works. Augustine Birrell, however, finds in him the precursor of the Oxford movement. To Scott this would be doubtful praise. His love for Catholicism was as shallow as his knowledge of it. He was a Scotch Protestant who used Catholicism as he used the deus ex machina: for its dramatic value. He saw but its scenic side and read its spirit from dead memorials and ruined chapels. By shaking the dust of centuries from medieval times, by locating his tales in the days when Catholicism was flourishing or when it was weathering the Reformation, he no doubt created an interest in the Church, and paved the way for serious investigation. Beyond that, Catholicism owes him scant gratitude. The monks were not all sensualists or hypocritical plotters. Piety was not mere superstition, nor was prayer a meaningless jumble of garbled words. The spoliation of church property was to him deplorable; but only as an antiquarian. Otherwise it was progress, mayhap justice. It may soften our regard for him to believe that he was sincere, but ignorant of things Catholic, and that the Catholic heart of the six centuries which he visualized was never revealed to him.

In other matters, Scott did not deny that he sometimes perverted historical truth. The Duchess of Devonshire, in "Peveril of the Peak," though in fact a stern Huguenot, is made a Catholic and placed in scenes that happen twenty years after her death. In "Ivanhoe," eleventh-century characters are dressed in thirteenth-century costumes. Countless instances of graver lapses might be adduced. Nevertheless, Scott has endeavored to present the main outlines of history truthfully. He has succeeded in visualizing and vivifying the ages gone by not by dusty tomes and state papers, but by a series of brilliant tableaux vivants. Because Shakespeare has thrown the spotlight of his genius upon it, the England of the Richards and the Henrys is better known to us than almost any other period of English history. The novels of Scott teach us more of Louis XI and the Stuarts and Cromwell than any scientific array of documents. Though there are few readers whom he will inspire to make more thorough investigation, for the majority of readers he writes history better than most historians.

Scott's main claim to immortality is not in his history. Neither is it in the public themes and the strife and passion of the conflicting parties which he so magnificently portrayed. Nor is it in the personages that play the leading role in such scenes. It required all of Scott's genius to prevent those characters which he has garnered from his antiquarian and historical studies from being failures. Too often, they are stiff-backed gallants, and bloodless ladies, perched on the high back of conventionality, unemotional as carved statues, exasperating creatures, who never for a moment forget that kingly or knightly blood is congealed in their veins. Such too are characters like Flora of "Waverly" and Diana Vernon, "a girl of eighteen" says Jeffries "with more wit and learning than a man of forty, and more sound sense and firmness of character than any man whatever." Under this class, might be grouped his supernatural agents. Norna of Fitful Head, calling down the storm, the White Lady of Avalon with her alabaster cavern and her altar blazing with cold flames, are childish figments of the mind, fairy tales from forgotten legends. Meg Merrilies demands to be excused from such company. She must be classed with those delightfully accurate and natural characters whom Scott knew in the flesh, and to whom he has imparted such humor and pathos. The marvelous Jeanie Deans, the soul of womanhood; Evan Dhu, with his inimitable answer, "My master?—my master is in heaven; you mean my chief." Dandie Dinmont, and the lawyers good and bad; that whole gallery of Scotch celebrities whom he met in his Highland excursions and with whom he hobnobbed. By such characters will he live. He does not analyze them or apply the dissecting knife of the modern psychologist. His power lies in his extensive range over all the emotions. He has that universal appeal of loyalty and chivalry and nobility, which one must appreciate and feel rather than analyze.

Scientific principles of literary criticism, especially modern ones, find even more fault with Sir Walter than they do with most classical authors. Certainly, his former immense popularity and its reflex, its present desultory glory, are not founded on the principles that govern our contemporary making of books. His blocked pages of description, his laborious explanation of things not worth explaining, his hasty and in many places unskilful style, his rampant military atmosphere of joust and battle, diverge far from our modern canons of romance. It may be that our notions of literature are decadent and unwholesome. But it is still true that no novel which founds its interest on pageantry and costume and strangeness of incident can ever take the highest rank in literature. Criticism, however, has little power to smirch the glory of Sir Walter Scott. His works have taken a lasting place in literature, and though his readers be not many, he remains for those who know and can appreciate him, the Shakespeare of the novel.

FRANCIS X. TALBOT, S. J.

REVIEWS

Cicero: A Sketch of His Life and Works. By HANNIS TAYLOR, LL.D. Chicago: A. C. McClurg. $3.50.

To know Cicero well is a liberal education. With all his faults, in spite of weaknesses of character, of his heartless divorce from Terentia and his subsequent mercenary marriage with his ward Publilia, Cicero in his principles and his ethical system, is one of the soundest representatives of pagan Rome. As the distinguished author of this study observes, when evil times were about to fall on his country Cicero was the very embodiment of the departing spirit of Roman virtues and Roman republicanism. Louis XIV is reported to have exclaimed: L'Etat, c'est moi. If at certain crises in the history of the Eternal City of his day, Cicero looked around him and examined its statecraft, literature, oratory and philosophy, he could justly have exclaimed that he was Rome. In many ways, in his orations, one of the best schools of eloquence to which the young man can go, in his sturdy patriotism, in his love of liberty, of law, order, in his hatred of tyrants like Verres, Catiline, Clodius, Antony, he is one of the finest legacies of ancient civilization.

To Dr. Taylor, Cicero is all this and more. It is quite evident that for him the task of writing the volume has been a labor of love. Here and there, while the defects of his hero are by no means glossed over, the tone of the panegyric may appear to encroach on the sterner voice of the historian's verdict. But the author always brings to his work the qualities which he displayed in his "Science of Jurisprudence" and "The Origin and Growth of the English Constitution." He presents a well-ordered brief for his client, based on facts, backed by sound testimony and written with a warmth of personal affection which wins our sympathy. He studies Cicero from many angles as the herald of antiquity, as the most popular teacher Rome ever had in her great University of the Forum, as an apostle of morality, the upholder of the ideas of the existence of God, of a wise and beneficent Providence, of the immortality of the soul, of the beauty of virtue and the inherent foulness of vice and crime, as the champion of the people, the bulwark of the Constitution, and the "pen and the mirror" of a great transition. With the one exception referred to above, the great crises of life did not find him wanting and his noble death makes us almost forget his frailties. Dr. Taylor has done well to call attention to the unfair attacks of Dio Cassius, Drumann, and Mommsen on the character of the Roman statesman. He gives the reason why they should be regarded with suspicion, and the fairer verdict of men like Ritschl, Freeman, Merivale, Tyrrell, Lange, Boissier, Weissenfels and Sihler are accepted.

The book is supplemented by "The Sayings of Cicero," a collection of aphorisms in the original Latin, followed by an English translation, judiciously culled from the great Consul's oratorical, literary and philosophical compositions. The first one on which the reviewer's eyes fell on opening the book was the following: Omme consilium Themistocleum est: existimat enim, qui mare teneat, eum necesse rerum potiri. The whole theory of Captain A. T. Mahan's "The Influence of Sea Power in History" is found here. J. C. R.

Years of My Youth. By W. D. HOWELLS. New York: Harper & Bros. $2.00.

Letters of Richard Watson Gilder. Edited by His Daughter, ROSAMUND GILDER. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $3.50.

These volumes contain valuable biographical material about two of the foremost American literary men of our time. Those who have read with pleasure "A Boy's Town," "My Literary Passions," and "Literary Friends and Acquaintances," Mr. Howell's other books of personal reminiscences, will be glad to learn that in "Years of My Youth" he has the same modest and engaging way of telling his recollections, the chapters which describe the social life of the Middle West prior to the Civil War being particularly interesting. As he was the son of a hard-working and poverty-stricken editor and printer, the little Howells boy had to set type as soon as he could read.

When only twelve he would help set the telegraphic dispatches till nearly midnight and rise next morning at four to carry the paper to subscribers. Indeed, the printing office was the author's school. He graduated from the case to become a newspaper correspondent and reporter, began to scribble verse, learned to read several languages, wrote for campaign purposes a life of Lincoln, had his poetry accepted by the Atlantic Monthly, and by securing the post of United States Consul at Venice was a made man. For Mr. Howells used so well the abundant leisure of that office that he developed while in Italy his talent as a writer of essays and novels. The young people of the fifties, in the author's opinion were more interested in the things of the mind than are American youths and maidens of today, and he draws a fascinating picture of an Ohio town's social activities some sixty years ago.

As poet, editor and publisher Mr. Gilder had a varied and active career. From the time he was put in charge of the newly launched Century Magazine in 1881 until his death in 1909 he was particularly prominent in the social, civic and literary life of the country. Perhaps the most interesting pages in the book are those describing his aims and methods as the editor of a great magazine. The "elaborate discussion of living practical questions" and "popular studies of history" were novel features he introduced into the Century, and he possessed the three essentials of a good editor: taste, conscience and "ideas." Moreover he was able to maintain toward his contributors the "position of critic and judge with the least possible pain to those he had to rebuff." Indeed "he could return rejected manuscripts in such a kind and caressing way" that he made their authors friends forever. Though a number of the letters Mr. Gilder's daughter has published in the volume are not especially interesting, they show what an active part he took in the public movements of his time and how much his help and counsel was valued by all his friends, particularly by Mr. and Mrs. Grover Cleveland. W. D.

The Facts about Luther. By Rt. Rev. Mons. Patrick F. O'Hare, LL.D. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. $0.25.

At a period like the present, when the world is reaping the cockle of four centuries of anti-Catholicism and sectaries are striving to reconstruct their shattered idols, a trustworthy book on Martin Luther cannot but prove of intense interest to loyal Catholics and truth-seeking Protestants: to the former, because it offers a deadly weapon against long-lived misrepresentation and calumny; to the latter, because by turning the searchlight of knowledge on the rough days of long ago it brings into clear vision every lineament of those whom unreflecting partisans still number amongst the great. There are at least three modern trustworthy studies on the life of Luther, for which the scientific world owes a more than ordinary gratitude to Janssen, Denifle and Grisar; but these are of interest and advantage rather to the scholar than to one whose daily occupations preclude the possibility of learned leisure.

Mgr. O'Hare realized this state of affairs and, stealing an hour here and there from the labors of a busy pastor, has popularized in his "Facts about Luther" what others have gleaned. All sincere readers of this book will own that the author has done his task well. After an introduction on modern Luther literature, he enters on a psychological study of the heresiarch's early years, which is followed by a close and readable investigation of Luther's attitude on indulgences, justification, the Church and the Pope, the Bible, rebellion, free will and liberty of conscience. A final chapter is entitled "Luther the Reformer." To write a book of this character is by no means easy, for the author has had in turn to play the role of an historian, a theologian and an apologist, and withal to present indelicate facts delicately, offensive facts inoffensively, subtle facts concretely. But in his "Facts about Luther" Mgr. O'Hare has admirably succeeded in doing this. J. T. L.

Mount Vernon: Washington's Home and the Nation's Shrine. By Paul Wilstach. Illustrated. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. $2.00.

Reverence for historical places is hardly reputed a cardinal American virtue. The devotedness, however, with which Mount Vernon is visited and cared for seems to justify the author's sub-title, "The Nation's Shrine." So great was the stress of visitors and entertainment during the private ownership of the place that it threatened to impoverish the Washington family. Even during the Civil War, when military movements were going on near the capital, by common consent of the North and South, Mount Vernon was neutral ground. Today, ships in the United States navy give the hallowed spot a full salute as they pass. It was not due to a grateful Government, however, that the estate is now restored to the order in which it was during the lifetime of Washington. Shortly before the Civil War, the Government refused to purchase the property. So to save it from exploiters, a body of patriotic women was organized, and funds were collected to buy the estate. Continuing the work, they have gathered the interior furnishings, willed far and wide after the death of Martha Washington, and have remodeled the grounds according to the plans which Washington himself drew up.

The book is not only an interesting record of minute details, but a human story that seems to have caught the atmosphere of the place. The dull recital of purchases and improvements has been enlivened by bright incident and neighborly gossip. The reader almost forgets Washington as a general and statesman, and considers him only as a devoted husband and a scientific farmer. His fields were his hobby. When at home, till a few days before his death, his daily morning duty was a visit to all his farms. When away, part of his mind and all his heart were there. Even during the Revolution and while he was President, Washington demanded frequent reports from his steward and sent him most detailed instructions. Mr. Wilstach has made a creditable book, and has performed a real service for the curious or patriotic sight-seer. F. X. T.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The Catholic Mind for November 22 is a particularly readable number. It begins with M. J. Riordan's merciless indictment of "Agenics," an excellent word he has coined to describe the crime of birth-control. Then follows the Bishop of Northampton's exposition of what the attitude of "The Secularized State" should be toward the Church. In the next paper Mgr. William T. Russel reminds "The Pan-Protestant Conference" what a wide field for their reforming zeal they have here at home among non-Catholics, and the issue closes with an article by M. P. Hayne which points out to Catholics the dangers in the modern cult of "The Gospel of Humanity."

It might be questioned whether L. H. Hammond's new book, "In the Garden of Delight" (Crowell, $1.00), is a novel or a nature-book. The narrator, an invalid, sees the world big and cheery from her wheel-chair. Outside of the struggle, she observes the birds, the landscape, and the growing affection of two young people. Everyone and everything are good to her and nothing more terrible happens than a little tilt with "Aunt Jane." The characters in the book are country folk, true to type, while delicate descriptions of nature and clever observations on human foibles abound.——Oswald Kendall was recently wounded in action and now lies in a London hospital, exemplifying in a personal manner, some of the incidents and accidents of his interesting book, "The Romance of the Martin Connor" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.25). Those boys of smaller as well as those of larger growth who enjoyed "Two Years Before the Mast" will make with as much enthusiasm the cruise with this new boat up the great Amazon to meet a series of vividly narrated adventures, and to view well-described scenes of nature.

"A Story of Love" (Herder, $0.75), an attractive little book by Father Francis Cassily, S.J., the author of those widely-read pamphlets, "What Shall I Be?" and "Shall I Be a Daily Communicant?" is not, as might be inferred from its title, a romance that is likely to be numbered among next month's "best sellers." For the story Father Cassily tells is a true one, yet, in a sense, highly romantic too, if his readers would but realize it. "A Story of Love" is a good development of the thoughts suggested by St. Ignatius's renowned Contemplatio ad Amorem, the crowning meditation of the "Exercises," which sets forth so well the marvels of Divine condescension and leaves the exercitant full of thankfulness for the wonderful gifts of God. Under sixteen chapter-heads such as "My Divine Friend," "God's Home Within Me," "Face to Face," etc., the author provides the reader with matter for spiritual reading which will be found particularly suitable in the time of retreat.

Dan Burnet in "The Shining Adventure" (Harper, $1.30), his first novel, tells how an eight-year-old boy who was one of the privileged children that have access to Gramercy Park, New York, rambled all alone one day over toward Second Avenue, and found there an astonishing number of little boys and girls who never get into Gramercy Park. The author describes in a charming, Dickensian way the wonderful adventures "his Majesty" had in that foreign land, how he first vanquished in battle, and then won as a loyal follower, Mickey Flynn, "de leader of de gang," how he made "Lamey Maggie" Queen of Gramercy Park, and how near to tragedy the end of his expedition was. The dialogue in the book is true to life, and the candidate's call on the King's aunt is very amusing. But was there nothing better than the river for "the good Bad Women"?

In a recent number of the Living Church the Very Rev. Charles N. Lathrop has a lengthy and very favorable review of "A Primer of Peace and War. The Principles of International Morality" (Kenedy), a little book edited by Father Plater which was praised in our issue of November 27, 1915. Dean Lathrop ends his review thus:

> This book has two special merits. It presents clearly and simply the judgment of the Catholic conscience of the ages on war and its related problems. It presents this judgment with a spirit of appreciation for contributions to the problem from those who differ from the authors in religion. Indeed, it makes its appeal to all "men of good will" and will be a help to every honest man who wants moral guidance in deciding what is right for him in the present confused condition of the world.

Sister Mary Antonia, an American member of the Convent "Des Filles de Marie" Willebroeck, Province of Antwerp, Belgium, describes in a book entitled "From Convent to Conflict" (Murphy, $1.00) how the community fled to England when the Germans invaded Belgium. The volume is not merely a catalogue of horrors but an account of the educational work the Sisters were doing, how it was suddenly interrupted, and how they all made their way without serious mishaps to places of safety, the author reaching this country. The profits derived from the sale of the book will be devoted to the repair of the Sisters' convent.——Mildred Aldrich, the author of "A Hilltop on the Marne," one of the more notable war-books, has now written nine short-stories "Told in a French Garden" (Small, Maynard, $1.25). She describes a house-party of ten Americans staying during August, 1914, at a country place not far from Paris. To keep the war from being discussed, the hosts and guests tell stories until the approach of the German army breaks up the gathering. Many readers will consider "The Son of Josephine" the best of the tales. Let us hope that the subversive "philosophy" in "The Divorcée's Story" is not that of the author.——"The Brown Mare" (Knopf, $1.00), the title of the first and best story in Alfred Ollivant's little book of tales bearing on the war, gives a name to the volume. In another place the author brings out well the Belgians' devotion to their democratic king.

Christmas books for children are pouring from the press. Harper and Brothers have out a new edition of the perennially interesting "Arabian Nights' Entertainments" ($1.50), illustrated with more than a hundred excellent pictures by Louis Rhead. Carlo Lorenzini's "Pinocchio" ($1.25), with its eight fine pictures in color by Maria L. Kirk, is published by J. B. Lippincott. This famous Italian story about a wooden puppet that came to life and then had a series of most marvelous adventures is sure to interest little American children keenly. G. P. Putnam's Sons' book about "Betty's Beautiful Nights" ($1.50), which numbered twelve, one each month, is written by Marian Warner Wildman Fenner and copiously illustrated by Clara M. Burd. When the moon is new, the queen of the fairies entertains Betty by showing her what a beautiful world we live in. "Moni the Goat Boy" ($0.50), a Lippincott book, is Johanna Spyri's pretty story of Alpine life. She explains just why he stopped singing and what made him begin again.

The following sonnet, entitled "The Heavenly Keepsake," is contributed to the current Month by Desmond McAuliffe:

This soul is not mine own! Meseems God said
  Take thou this flower and tend it lovingly
  Through all the years; when I shall summon thee
Thou shalt restore the rose for which I bled
Alas, those years! Exceeding great my dread
  Lest God should find the flower He wrought for me
  Shrunk, faded, cankered, piteous to see
With all its old-time beauty forfeited!

Shall I despair at failure and repine?
Great God of Love, at rumors of Thy Power
The Cana-waters burned with strange delight
And trembled into fire-enchanted wine.
Are souls less wonder-worth? Come, bid my flower
Unclose with life immortal in Thy sight.

"Morning Face, Her Book," by Gene Stratton Porter (Doubleday, Page, $2.00), is one of the year's most beautifully illustrated nature-study books for children. Perhaps the text is not quite up to the standard of the illustrations, but it is probably the appeal to the eye which will most interest the small folk for whom the volume is intended.——"The Wishing Moon" (Doubleday, Page, $1.35), by Louise Dutton, is as dull as ditch-water, and very much like ditch-water in other respects.——"A Circuit Rider's Wife," by Corra Harris (Doubleday, Page, $1.50), stresses in kindly fashion, the deadly formality to which some forms of Methodism may drop, but one cannot escape the impression of an undercurrent of hostility to all revealed religion, running throughout the book. The author's comments on divorce and feminism are replete with common-sense. Those "who believe in a Scriptural marriage," she holds, "cannot believe in divorce," and while in favor of suffrage, she thinks it of immeasurably greater importance for women, to defend "the statutes of virtue and honor, which are better protection for women than all the votes in this country." Nor in further criticizing "feminism" is Mrs. Harris afraid to say that there are "too many women flirting round in the movement who should be in institutions of correction." Perhaps the criticism may not be generally applicable, but it is surely not pointless, particularly in New York.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

American Book Co., New York:
A Greek Grammar for Schools and Colleges. By Herbert Weir Smyth. $1.50; Ancient Civilization. By Arthur Mayer Wolfson, Ph.D. $0.60.

Benziger Brothers, New York:
Her Father's Share. By Edith M. Power. Illustrated. $1.25.

Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis:
A Strong Man's House. By Francis Neilson. $1.35; Prudence Says So. By Ethel Hueston. $1.35.

Bloud & Gay, Paris:
Lettre de L'Episcopat Belge. Texte Officiel; Pour les Arméniens. By S. G. Mgr. Touchet; La Mission Catholique de la France; Le Clergé et la Guerre de 1914.

Burns & Oates, Ltd., London:
A Century of Scientific Thought and Other Essays. By Sir Bertram C. A. Windle. 5s.; Poland, a Study in National Idealism. By Monica M. Gardner. 4s.

The Century Co., New York:
A Country Chronicle. By Grant Showerman. $1.50.

Columbia University Press, New York:
The Rise of Ecclesiastical Control in Quebec. By Walter Alexander Riddell, Ph.D. $1.75.

M. A. Donohue & Co., Chicago:
Uncle Frank's Mary. By "Clementia," Sister of Mercy. With Frontispiece by Charles Chambers. $1.35.

George H. Doran Co., New York:
Local Color. By Irvin S. Cobb. $1.35; Fibble, D.D. By Irvin S. Cobb. $1.20; The Lion's Share. By Arnold Bennett. $1.50.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
A Christmas Meditation. By Lawrence Gilman. $0.25; The Know About Library. Illustrated. 20 Volumes. $0.10 each; The Owlet Library. Illustrated. $1.00 a set.

Paul Elder & Co., San Francisco:
The Clever Mouse. By Stella George Stern Perry. $0.50.

Ginn & Co., Boston:
The Corona Readers. Book I. Based on the Beacon Primer. By James H. Fassett. $0.32.

Harper & Brothers, New York:
Years of My Youth. By William Dean Howells. $2.00; Arabian Nights Entertainments. Illustrations by Louis Rhead. $1.50; The Way to the House of Santa Claus. By Frances Hodgson Burnett. $1.00.

Houghton Mifflin Co., Boston:
Letters of Richard Watson Gilder. Edited by His Daughter, Rosamond Gilder. $3.50; How to Read. By J. B. Kerfoot. $1.25; Charles the Twelfth, King of Sweden. By John A. Gade. With Illustrations. $3.00; A Brief History of Poland. By Julia Swift Orvis. $1.50; The Pleasures of an Absentee Landlord and Other Essays. By Samuel McChord Crothers. $1.25.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
The Seminarian. His Character and Work. By Rev. Albert Rung. $0.75.

John Lane Co., New York:
In Spacious Times. By Justin Huntly McCarthy. .$1.35.

Little, Brown & Co., Boston:
The Whale and the Grasshopper. By Seumas O'Brien. $1.35.

J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia:
Pinocchio. The Story of a Puppet. By C. Collodi. With Illustrations in Color by Maria L. Kirk. $1.25; Moni the Goat-Boy. By Johanna Spyri. Translated by Elisabeth P. Stork. Illustrations in Color by Maria L. Kirk. $0.50.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
The Penitent of Brent. By Michael Wood. $1.35; Coram Cardinali. By Edward Bellasis. $1.25; Maxims of the Foundress of the Faithful Companions of Jesus; Masters of the Spiritual Life. F. W. Drake.

John W. Luce & Co., Boston:
Six Days of the Irish Republic. By L. G. Redmond-Howard.

The Macmillan Company, New York:
Distributive Justice. By John A. Ryan. $1.50; Responsibilities and Other Poems. By William Butler Yeats. $1.25.

Mission Press, Techny:
Lights and Shadows. Compiled by the Rev. Joseph Spieler, D.S.M. Translated by C. Lawrence, O.M.Cap. $0.75.

The New York Evening Mail, New York:
The Gravest 366 Days. Day by Day with the Editors of the "Evening Mail."

Frederick Pustet & Co., New York:
Brief Discourses on the Gospel. By E. Leahy.

G. P. Putnam & Sons, New York:
The Commonitorium of Vincentius of Lerins. By Reginald Stewart Moxon, B.D. $2.75; Betty's Beautiful Nights. By Marian Warner Wildman Fenner.

Societe Saint Augustin, Paris:
Manuel de Perfection Chretienne et Religieuse.

The University of Chicago Press, Chicago:
History of the Working Classes in France. By Agnes Mathilde Wergeland, Ph.D. $1.00; Slavery in Germanic Society During the Middle Ages. By Agnes Mathilde Wergeland, Ph.D. $1.00.

Yale University Press, New Haven:
The Social Criticism of Literature. By Gertrude Buck, Ph.D. $1.00.

EDUCATION

What School for Your Boy?

FROM the library window Judge Thornton waved a good-by to Mrs. Thornton and Bob, as the limousine raced down the drive and whisked them off to Ruffo's last performance of "Rigoletto." Judge Thornton was spending the evening at home. He was no child of Melpomene. Ivory flutes and throbbing cellos drew no sympathetic response from his judicial breast, though, on a quiet evening when Bob was away, he would ask Mrs. Thornton to play "The Banks of the Wabash," preferably with one finger, that he might catch the tune. A "good time" he liked, but this grand opera with its complexity of rhythm, its warring of vocality, its noisy fanfare of brass and drums, and all heard from a stuffy little box until midnight, was quite unintelligible. Between a plush seat at the opera and a plush seat in a dental parlor, Judge Thornton saw no specific difference. That is why he stood at his library window this cold, snowy night of January 2, waving good-bys to his wife and son.

The Sowing

HE watched the car till it spun out of sight, and then fell to musing. Surely Providence had smoothed his life's path with a wonderfully loving and generous hand. Worldly success had come to him early, and the best and dearest woman in the world was his wife. But, most of all, as he thought of his unhappy neighbor, Dr. Cavanagh, he had been blest with a son whose equal one might not easily find.

Bob, the son in question, was twenty, a tall, upstanding lad, the masculine replica of his handsome mother. He had been at the "big eastern University" only a year and a half, but his career there was meteoric. It had been his father's intention to educate him at St. John's University, the Catholic college he had attended as a boy, but Bob, in the bright dreams of a more callow youth, had set his heart upon the "big eastern University," and its stalwart "eleven." In pursuance of this plan, he coaxed, pleaded, begged, and finally conquered his mother, and when these twain turned their engines of war upon the head of the house, Judge Thornton surrendered helplessly. Perhaps, after all, he was just a trifle old-fashioned in his ideas.

"Taking Care of Himself"

AT any rate, so reasoned the Judge, Bob was a good boy, well able to care for himself, and not a type like Dick Cavanagh, his neighbor's son, who, in his senior year at the same "big eastern University," broke his father's and mother's heart by throwing religion overboard and marrying outside the Church. As he stood at the window this cold night watching the powdery snow sift through the gaunt trees, the Judge thanked God from the bottom of his heart for the blessing of a good son.

The logs in the grate fell, crackling and sputtering, and Judge Thornton realized that he had been staring out of the window several minutes since the car disappeared. Approaching a bookcase he took down Benson's "The Friendship of Christ," lit a cigar and sank into the soothing depths of a big leather chair.

During the solemn ceremony of polishing his glasses, his eye caught a strange pack of books on the library table. Then he remembered, and smiled. They were Bob's. With an unusual ambition to keep ahead of the class, Bob had brought them home from the "big eastern University" for the Christmas holidays together with some pious resolutions relative to their actual use.

The Demi-Gods

NOW, whether it was the prompting of his Guardian Angel or mere human curiosity on his part, the Judge never could say. But he reached out and took a neatly bound volume from the top of the pack, opened it, and read. Incidentally, Catholic parents, this book may be found in the library and the classrooms of any non-Catholic college. Perhaps your son or daughter is using it. "As psychologists we cannot accept the freedom of the will unless we throw away our scientific definition of mind and return to the popular notions held about it." [Titchener, "Primer of Psychology," p. 255.]

Judge Thornton started suddenly at this frank statement of a most perverse doctrine. He read it too, from a book Bob was studying. The pages fluttered through his fingers, and he read again: "Morality is custom regulated by 'public opinion,' by the approval and disapproval of the community." [Page 294.]

The Judge dropped the book from his hands with a hastiness suggestive of scorched fingers. Now thoroughly aroused, and almost afraid to believe his senses, he seized eagerly on another volume, opened it, and read: "To other arguments which would prove the need of a soul, we may also turn a deaf ear. The arguments from free will can convince only those who believe in free will." [James, "Primer of Psychology", I, p. 346.]

"So, this is what they are teaching my son at the university! No soul! No free will! This is the return I get for delivering my son into the hands of highly paid specialists! Morality depends on the shifting whims of the public, does it?" His eyes burned with a just anger, as he continued this audible expression of his wrath.

The Reaping

BUT he knew he was reaping the bitter fruit of his folly. His book, "The Friendship of Christ" lay unopened on the table. Torn with bitter remorse, he awaited Bob's return. At one o'clock the klaxon sounded, and in a few minutes Bob rushed into the room, still flushed with the keen joy of his favorite opera.

"Hello, Governor! Up yet? Well, you missed it. Honest, that Ruffo is some——"

Judge Thornton made no effort to conceal the state of his feelings. He bluntly interrupted this incipient rhapsody.

"Bob, do you go to Mass every Sunday, when you are away?" he asked sternly. Bob's excitement calmed.

"Why, Father, what a question! I—well, not always."

"Not always?" shouted the Judge.

"No, Father, I do sometimes. But most of the fellows in the hall don't go to church on Sunday morning. I did at first, but I've let it go for some time lately. I didn't want to say anything to you and mother about it, but to be real candid, Father, why should I go to church? If we have no soul, as James says, what's the use of it? If we have no free will, what good does it do us? If——"

The Winnowing

"BUT you have a soul," thundered the Judge, "an immortal soul, and a free will too. If you haven't, then the whole world goes to smash."

"But the professor says that's a much-disputed question, Father."

"I don't care a snap what your professor says about that," retorted the Judge. "If he denies the existence of an immortal soul and the possession of a free will he is either a hypocrite or a fool. Personally I think he must be a hypocrite."

"But, Father, he's very clever. He's written——"

"Clever? So was the devil when he got Eve to eat the apple. But I don't suppose your professor believes that old fable, does he?"

Bob was silent. In all his life he had never seen his father in such a rage. "What time," asked the Judge after a minute, "do you intend to leave for the East tomorrow?"

"About noon, Father," answered Bob.

"Well, telegraph tonight that you are not coming. Have your things shipped directly to St. John's. You leave for there tomorrow morning."

The Garnering

THE brilliant scholar and star of the best "eleven" in the country stood helpless at this unexpected and most unwelcome news. He made no reply, offered no objections. He knew his father too well for that. Besides Bob had not as yet unlearned the fundamental precept of parental obedience.

The following night saw a new adjustment of things in the Thornton family. In his room at St. John's, Bob sat up late with his new professor of philosophy, discussing matters psychological in the derivative sense of that word, and not in the soulless sense attached to it by many of our modern blasters at the Rock of Ages. At home Judge Thornton asked for "The Banks of the Wabash." Then far into the small hours, he sat up in his library reading contentedly from a favorite book, for tonight his soul was at peace. He had done his duty, and he could enjoy "The Friendship of Christ."

JOHN F. QUINN, S. J.

SOCIOLOGY

Supermen and Superwomen

"NOW giants were upon the earth in those days . . . men of renown." They were the Nietzsches and Shaws, the Strindbergs and Ibsens of their time, in the generation before the deluge. They were the supermen who had emancipated themselves from the law of God. Their daughters and wives were the superwomen who laughed to scorn the "conventionalities" of earlier days. Materialism and sexuality had won a complete triumph. The Scripture plainly expresses this when it says that man was "flesh." The things of the spirit were dead to him. Self-aggrandizement, self-expression, the complete evolution of his physical nature unhampered by the restraints of any spiritual religion, the cult of the sensual and sexual, new thought and progressivism, Nietzscheanism, Shavianism and Ibsenism were the advanced doctrines of the day.

It was a society in which eugenists and birth-controllists could have been perfectly at home, in which the captain of industry and the I. W. W. might freely have fought out their quarrel; in which Socialism would have found the completest sympathy for its defiance of authority; in which the circulation of forbidden information, obscene literature and blasphemous tracts would have met with the fullest approval from the enlightened and emancipated men and women of an age in which the only obscurantists were Noe and his family. What our progressive writers picture as a happy dream, to be fulfilled in some future eon, had here been actually accomplished: the ultimate evolution of the superman and superwoman—and after that, the deluge!

The Triumph of "Obscurantism"

JUDGED from the viewpoint of our most advanced thinkers, ranging from the free-love advocate in Madison Square to the dapper rationalist professor, drawing his salary from some millionaire endowment fund, we have sadly retrogressed since the days of that perfect paradise of the superman and the superwoman. Heroic efforts are however being made to restore that paradise to earth again. In Noe's escape from the engulfing flood such propagandists doubtless can see only the survival of the most unfit, the triumph of obscurantism. Fortunately, the judgments of God are not the judgments of superman and superwoman, but directly the reverse. This they will come to find out to their own cost, if not in time, at least in eternity.

The New Superman

THE triumph of obscurantism, however, was not final. Though Noe "built an altar to the Lord," and offered up a holocaust upon it, of sweet-smelling savor, men were soon found who were sufficiently in advance of their times to emancipate themselves from the yoke of superstition. With Cham, the evolution of the superman was slowly and painfully to make a new beginning. Neither authority nor purity were sacred to him. The mystery of life was guarded by no Divine commandments written in the nature of man himself. He had freed himself from the tyranny of tradition. His sight was undarkened by the veil of religious prudery. He had evolved to the height of modern unabashedness. He had already achieved his emancipation. Was he the modern eugenist and revolutionist in the making only, or already the finished original? Were Babel and Shaw anticipated?

We are dealing here with a matter profoundly sacred to every true Christian: the virtue of purity. It is intimately connected, as we see, with that other Christian virtue: respect for all rightful authority and due obedience to it, rendered for the love of God, and given as to the Lord and not to man. When the virtue of obedience, submission to authority, is disregarded the virtue of purity will likewise be flung aside. Obedience to the Divine Commandments alone can keep in restraint the lust of the flesh and the promptings of concupiscence. We are not in the least surprised therefore that free love should be preached loudest in the revolutionary camps of our day, and that the anarchist Emma Goldman, should become the glorified martyr of the birth-control movement. We may be certain that the same conditions hold in the ranks of the idle or the unjust rich, where wealth has usurped the place of God. No sooner was the golden calf worshiped, instead of the Creator, than orgies of impurity broke out among the people of Israel.

Satan's Definition

FOR a definition of supermen and superwomen, which to them will seem flattering to the highest degree, however much they may differ among themselves in regard to minor details, it suffices to refer to the first chapters of Genesis. Remarkably enough, that definition, too, was given by the original rebel and revolutionist whose non serviam, "I will not serve," plunged him into eternal perdition. But that is a pleasant myth for modern supermen and superwomen. Like them, Adam and Eve, too, were first to be emancipated by him from superstition, before he could hope to make of them the true superman and superwoman: "No, you shall not die." Their fear, he sought to persuade them, was purely the result of dogmatism on the part of Almighty God. It was possible only in their state of benighted ignorance, or "medievalism," as he might preferably say in our day. All revealed religion is mere dogmatism to the true superman and superwoman.

Then follows Satan's definition, indirectly given, of the goal which is to be reached as the ultimate evolution of the superman: "Your eyes shall be opened: and you shall be as gods."

Olympians upon Earth

RETICENCE, humility, modesty, chastity are virtues to be held in contempt by a superior and emancipated race. Indecency may strut unabashed and be viewed unshrinkingly. License of speech, obscenity upon the stage and in the "movie," the propagation of criminal information are all defended in the name of liberty. Their eyes shall be opened. But they shall likewise be as gods. Denying the eternal Creator, each one becomes a law and a god unto himself. He is perfectly consistent, for there is then no higher authority than himself. Obedience to social conventions depends upon his whim. The roseate dream of aiding towards the evolution of humanity is of no binding force. Self-evolution, complete self-expression, "the will to power" or "the will to pleasure," in the jargon of the day, these and the like are his aims. Why should he submit to laws, whether of man, of nature or of God, when his will is opposed to them? The self-realization he is striving for is that promised by Satan in paradise: "Your eyes shall be opened: and you shall be as gods." A civilization based upon these doctrines would not differ in the slightest from the civilization that was swept away by the deluge.

It is, therefore, an old, old tale: that story of the superman and superwoman. But it is a tale, too, that at every turn ends in ruin and desolation. Even now the falling birthrate of Europe has been answered by a deluge of blood. America is rapidly preparing a scourge of God for herself. With the millions of children receiving no religious instruction in school or out of it; with Socialism and anarchism sounding their trumpets and winning their victories, as in consequence we might well expect; with birth-controllists demanding that what is practised by the rich should not be withheld from the poor, we are rapidly preparing the way, as they proudly tell us, for a race of supermen and superwomen—and after them, the deluge!

The Specious Argument

THE universal evolution of this race, we are taught, is not possible except by the limitation of births. Fewer and better babies, is the demand. Families are to be strictly limited, even by law, "so as to give each child a fair physical as well as a fair economic start in life, that a race of supermen and superwomen may guide the destinies of the nation in the future." To this specious argument we need only answer that there can be no hope of improving our civilization by adding to poverty, where such exists, the curse of God. The supermen and superwomen who will be developed by such a system are those we have sufficiently described, and their fate will be as the fate of their kind in the past. The problem that vexes us has long ago been solved by Christianity. There is indeed the possibility of self-restraint where both parties consent and the restraint is practised in the spirit of Christian purity, but it is the duty of the State to provide that the child can be properly cared for by the parents in cases of misfortune. A godless world has been responsible in many instances for entirely false social and economic conditions, and the miseries consequent upon them that same world would now cure by adding to them the violation of a most sacred commandment of God.

The danger to civilization lies not in the large families, however poor, with the blessing of God upon them and their unfailing trust in Him who provides even for the young of the sparrows, but in the families, whether large or small, that have cast aside the law of God and are brought up in ignorance of His saving and humanizing doctrines.

Joseph Husslein, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A New School of Agriculture

ACCORDING to the Chicago Tribune, a school of agriculture was opened at St. Viator's College, Bourbonnais, Illinois, on November 20. Associated with the faculty are professors who have been doing excellent work at Notre Dame, Harvard, and Nebraska, and the new school begins its course with every prospect of a long and useful career.

> In a recent address before the farmers of Kankakee county, President O'Mahoney declared that it was inconsistent for farmers to educate their sons for a commercial or professional life, and then expect them to be content to remain on the farm. The young man who will be content to remain on the farm must have his training in the direction of the farm, and not away from it.

There is great need for institutions of this kind, particularly in the great farming regions of the Middle West. In this section of the country, but particularly in the South, a well-developed school of agriculture under Catholic auspices would effect untold good. It is greatly to be regretted that many suitably situated Catholic colleges in the West and South, are prevented by lack of funds from this undertaking this work. As pointed out by A. C. Minogue, in a recent number of AMERICA, the country has its social and economic problems no less than the city, and the Catholic agricultural school, with its appeal to those young men and women not reached by the classical college, would prove a factor of great value in their solution.

A Loss to American Letters

MISS MOLLY ELLIOT SEAWELL, novelist, playwright, and biographer, died in Washington, on November 15, at the age of fifty-six. She was a writer of singular grace and charm. A few of her minor novels show the influence of the lighter school of French literature, but in her best work the Catholic note, while never inartistically obtruded, is clearly dominant. "The House of Egremont," perhaps her most finely conceived novel, is a stirring tale of the days of persecution in England, and of the fortunes of the Catholic yeomen and gentry who followed the unhappy James to France, to become pensioners of his Most Serene Majesty, Louis XIV. Although not written with that end in view, one of her books, "Twelve Naval Captains," attained the unusual distinction of being adopted as a text at the Naval Academy. An uncompromising enemy of feminism in all its forms, Miss Seawell was a valued aid to many charitable and religious associations.

Oblates of Mary Immaculate

THE Oblates of Mary Immaculate have fittingly celebrated the centennial year of their foundation by the dedication of a new house of studies at the Catholic University in Washington. During the century which elapsed since the establishment of the Congregation by Mgr. de Mazenod, afterwards Bishop of Marseilles, its missionaries have gone forth to many parts of the earth, laboring with heroic zeal to spread the light of the Gospel. Even in the first ten years of their existence, as their historian records, "they carried the banner of Mary Immaculate, side by side with the Cross, from the Atlantic seaboard of Labrador to the Pacific slopes of British Columbia and into England, the United States and Ceylon." Another decade of years passed and they had extended their labors to Ireland, Scotland, Belgium and South Africa. Later flourishing communities were founded by them in Italy, Spain, Holland, Germany, Mexico and Australia. Father Lucien Lagier was the first Oblate to enter the United States. In 1842 he was sent from Canada to look after the interests of the French Canadians resident here, having almost half a continent for the field of his missionary zeal. The first Oblate community within the States was founded at Brownsville, Texas, in 1849. Two years later five Fathers came from Canada to establish the second community at Buffalo, a barn serving them for church where the poorest laboring classes assembled on Sunday to hear Mass and receive the Sacraments. To teach the Gospel to the poor is the Oblate's mission. In 1853 they settled at Plattsburg, N. Y., and in 1868 took charge of the fast growing colony of French Canadians in Lowell, Mass. In 1883 the first American province was formed, distinct from Canada, with its novitiate at Tewksbury, Mass., and in 1904 the expansion and development of the Congregation in the United States made the division of its territory into two provinces necessary, each with its own house of preparatory studies, its novitiate and scholasticate or seminary. The blessing of Pope Leo XII, addressed to the Founder at the close of the solemn ceremonies of the ratification of the rules and constitutions of his Congregation, has thus been realized: "Increase and multiply."

Death of Poland's Great Novelist

NEWS was received in New York on November 16, of the death at Vevey, Switzerland, of the famous Catholic novelist, Henryk Sienkiewicz. Born in Poland in 1846, the son of a country squire, the future litterateur gave early promise of unusual ability. He witnesses the attempts of Russia to denationalize his country, and was a student at the University of Warsaw at a time when the Polish language was officially proscribed in Poland's chief seat of learning. At the age of twenty-two, he began a career of travel, usually on foot or by stage, which took him to every part of Poland, and later, drifting into Russia, at one time edited a newspaper in Petrograd. In 1877, he came to the United States as a member of a colony of musicians and artists, near Los Angeles. The colony lasted but three years, and on its dissolution, he returned to Europe, and began the publication of his great historical novels. "Fire and Sword," "The Deluge," "Pan Michael," and "Quo Vadis," the last-named of which has been translated into thirty languages, are his most notable works. He was happy in his American translator, the Catholic linguist Jeremiah Curtin, whose transcriptions are not unworthy of their great originals. By competent critics, Sienkiewicz has been ranked with the master figures of literature. From the outbreak of the war, although broken in health, Sienkiewicz took an active part in organizing associations for the relief of his devastated country.

Catholic Educational Association

THE successive annual reports of the Catholic Educational Association form a valuable library of pedagogy. They represent the status and development of the Catholic educational thought of our country. The various subjects assigned for papers and discussions are treated with sufficient detail to offer serviceable suggestions for teachers and for all interested in education. The thirteenth volume is now added to this series. It contains much that is of unusual merit and a proper insistence is placed upon giving to our teaching that distinctively Catholic tone which is the only reason for its existence and at the same time the cause of its undoubted superiority over every other form of pedagogy. Thus in the formation of American citizens, as Dr. Shields points out in his contribution, the cultivation of the natural virtues is the highest aim of the State schools; while the Catholic school "aims at the cultivation of these virtues as intensified and exalted to the supernatural order." It is impossible to achieve this same result by a combination of public school and Sunday school, for, as he rightly adds, "the unitary character of life and the inseparable relations of nature and grace, demand that the natural and the supernatural unfold in the child-mind simultaneously and in their true relations." In literature, in art, in social culture and refinement of every kind a thoroughly Christian training alone can give promise of the highest perfection attainable through education. But to guard these ideals is not the only duty of the Catholic Educational Association. It must likewise stand as a watchman in Israel to point out the dangers from without. "Our schools have now complete liberty and independence," said another of the speakers at the Thirteenth Annual Convention. "We are better situated than Catholics in most countries of Europe, although we suffer from a double tax. The essential thing for us is the complete preservation of the liberty and independence of our Catholic education. We must above all things, then, hold to this essential liberty and independence, and not barter it for a mess of pottage."

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVI. No. 8
WHOLE No. 399

DECEMBER 2, 1916

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—The week has been unproductive of results except in Macedonia and Rumania. In the former place the Allies have continued their advance in the vicinity of Monastir. On the west bank of Lake Presba the French have occupied Leskovetz; the Italians have taken Nijipole, about five miles west of Monastir; north of this city the Serbians have occupied Kirklina; northeast of Monastir the Serbians have captured Paralovo, not Debrimir; and still further east the Serbians have crossed the Bella Voda and taken Budimirtsa.

Bulletin, Nov 20, p.m.-Nov. 27, a.m.

By far the most important event of the week has been the rapid success of the Central Powers in western Rumania. Having marched down the Motru Valley and cut the Orsova-Crajova railroad, they moved south and attacked Crajova from the west; at the same time they advanced along the Jiu River and attacked it from the north. The city was evacuated after a short struggle, and the Rumanians fell back on a front of 100 miles toward the Alt River, a distance of from twenty-five to forty miles. By so doing they abandoned the army at Orsova. This place was soon taken by the opposing army, which crossed into Rumania and captured Turnu-Severin. All of Little Wallachia is now practically in the hands of the Central Powers. The Alt River, it was thought, would offer the Rumanians a strong line of defense for eastern Wallachia; but their opponents are striking hard at this line in the north, they have already forced the Rumanians in the center to retire to the east bank of the river in the vicinity of Dragachani and Slatina, and further south they have succeeded in crossing the river and are pressing on towards Bucharest. At the mouth of the Alt the Central Powers crossed the Danube from Bulgaria at Islacz and Simnitzea, and advancing toward Bucharest, have reached Alexandria and Rosiori. Further west the Bulgarians have seized islands in the Danube near Widin, Lom, Rahova and Gigen.

In Dobrudja the Rumanians and Russians have made practically no progress near the Danube north of Cernavoda; but they have advanced to within fifteen miles of Constantsa, having taken Tasaul, Tatarpalas, Gelengio, Bazarlia, Ester and Palasumia, and crossed the Kartal river.

Austria.—Emperor Francis Joseph, who for some time had been suffering from a catarrhal affection, died on the night of November 21, at nine o'clock, at Schoenbrunn Castle, Vienna. He was in his eighty-sixth year. On December 2 he would have celebrated the sixty-eighth anniversary of his accession to the throne. His successor is his grand-nephew, the Archduke Charles.

Death of Francis Joseph

The deceased Emperor was born in Vienna, August 18, 1830, the eldest son of Archduke Francis and a nephew of Ferdinand I, Emperor from 1835 to 1848. As a child he was taught to speak the many languages of his polyglot Empire and Monarchy. In 1848 he served under Marshal Radetzky in Italy. On December 2, 1848, Ferdinand abdicated, his brother, the Archduke Francis, gave up his claims to the throne, and Francis Joseph became ruler of a vast territory, a burden which was to grow in weight and responsibility with the succeeding years. Hungary was in revolt, and in 1849 declared itself a republic with Kossuth as President. In Italy Charles Albert of Sardinia took up arms against Austria. Both in Hungary and Italy Austria triumphed and the Emperor devoted himself to the reestablishment of his authority. In 1853 an attempt was made on his life by a Hungarian, but he escaped with a slight wound. Two other attempts followed at different periods, equally unsuccessful. In 1855 a concordat was concluded with Pius IX, which restored to the Catholic Church many of the liberties of which it had been deprived since the reign of the Emperor Joseph. In 1859 Francis Joseph was called to face a war with France and Sardinia. It ended disastrously with the loss of Lombardy. In this campaign the Emperor displayed the greatest gallantry at the battle of Solferino. In 1866 Bismarck forced him into the Seven Weeks' war, the pretext of which was a dispute with Prussia over the succession in Schleswig-Holstein. The Emperor's troops defeated Italy, Prussia's ally, on land and sea, but sustained a crushing defeat by the Prussians at Sadowa or Königratz in 1866. As a result he was forced to cede Venice to Italy through Napoleon as intermediary. To Prussia he lost the last vestige of the Hapsburg hegemony over the German States and his prestige as head of the Holy Roman Empire which now became a thing of the past.

The Seven Weeks' War was followed by disaffection at home. The Emperor counterbalanced it in some measure by promulgating a constitution for the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy. Under it the Emperor was crowned King of Hungary in 1867. In 1878 the Congress of Berlin gave Austria the former Turkish provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina under certain restrictions. In 1908 the two provinces were annexed to Austria. On June 28, 1914, as the outcome of a Serbian plot, Archduke Francis Ferdinand, the Emperor's nephew and his appointed heir, was assassinated at Sarajevo. Austria declared itself dissatisfied with Serbia's explanations and apologies, and on July 28 declared war.

In spite of his faults, Francis Joseph was one of the simplest, most industrious and shrewdest monarchs in Europe. If for so many years the Austrian Empire has held together, it is undoubtedly due to his magnetism and strong personality. The Austrian system had many enemies, Francis Joseph had none. He had been sorely tried. His wife, the Empress Elizabeth, was assassinated by an anarchist in Geneva in 1898; their only son, the Archduke Rudolph, either committed suicide or was murdered in 1899 at the hunting lodge of Meyerling. The Emperor's brother, Maximilian, was shot by orders of Benito Juarez after the successful revolution against him as Emperor of Mexico. Other tragedies of almost equal gloom and horror crowded upon him. He bore them all with wonderful faith, resignation and dignity.

The successor of Francis Joseph, the Archduke Charles Francis, was born on August 17, 1887. He is the son of Archduke Otto, the younger brother of the victim of Sarajevo. His wife is the Princess Zita of the Bourbon House of Parma.

On his accession the new Emperor issued a proclamation declaring that it is his decision to maintain the war until "a peace assuring the existence and development of the Monarchy" can be secured. He has formally confirmed Prime Minister Koerber, Baron Burian, the Foreign Minister, and General Ritter von Krobatin, Minister of War, in their posts. The new Emperor is already known as an efficient and resourceful commander, is said to be a man of strong character, of simple and democratic tastes. The Empress Zita is distinguished for her varied accomplishments. Both are practical and devout Catholics.

Belgium.—The following telegram, widely reproduced in the press, has been sent from Havre by the Belgian Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Beyens, to the Belgian Minister at Rome and Madrid, to be communicated to his Holiness, Pope Benedict XV, and King Alfonso of Spain.

A Protest

The situation in Belgium is becoming day by day more frightful. The raids on able-bodied Belgians now extend throughout the whole country. If they are not sent to work in Germany in munitions factories they are sent to the occupied parts of France to work on systems of trenches and the strategic railways of Lille, Aulnay, and Givet. The Germans boast of having already deported 350,000 men. Requisitions of materials continue, with the object of hindering after peace a resumption of work, to suppress competition, and ruin the country. Machines which could be used have been carried off or sold as old iron. The Governor-General pretends, in declarations made to a reporter of the New York Times, that deportations in mass pass without incident, and even that the Belgians go joyfully. In reality they suffer at the same time moral torture and the physical pains of slavery. The German Government tries to excuse itself by the necessity of combating the unemployment which they themselves created by forbidding the communes to employ unemployed without their authorization and by preventing them, as in Luxemburg, from being used for public works or in exploiting the coal fields of Limburg. Belgium is delivered over to the violence of the military authorities, while the civil authorities approve and stand aside.

The Belgian Minister concludes his telegram by asking the Belgian representatives at Rome and Madrid to insist strongly that the Governments to which they are accredited "invite the German Government to reflect on the consequences of the treason to humanity committed in its name."

France.—M. Albert Claveille, formerly Under Secretary of Munitions, assumed office a few days ago as Director General of Transports and "Ravitaillement," with supervisory powers over all matters connected with traffic by rail or water. A few hours after his appointment he had already taken hold of his office with the greatest energy, had summoned the general managers of railway lines and outlined to them a comprehensive scheme of government-control. The new "Dictator" as he is popularly called, although the first French official to take orders from more than one department and under the control in some respects of the three Ministries of War, Navy and Public Works, is given a large measure of initiative. It will be his duty to give greater impulse to measures already taken or to be taken by the Ministries to relieve the congestion of railways and water traffic and also to supervise the execution of decrees dealing with transportation.

The New "Dictator"

M. Claveille is neither a member of Parliament, nor a graduate of the Ecole Polytechnique. Despite the latter fact, he is probably without a superior in the country, as an engineer of roads and bridges. He has built one of the largest hydraulic power-plants in France and was director of the staff of the Ministry of Public Works when the Government bought the Western Railroad and made him the general manager. Since the outbreak of hostilities, he has been directing production of artillery in cooperation with M. Albert Thomas, the Minister of Munitions. He is a man of great energy and decision of character and his appointment as "Dictator" of Transports has given general satisfaction.

Germany.—On November 21 the restoration of the Polish Kingdom was debated in Parliament with the result that a motion of the Conservative, Independent-Conservative and National Liberal members, requesting guarantees that no portion of Prussian Poland would be incorporated in the future Kingdom of Poland, was adopted by a vote of 180 to 104. The Center, the Poles, the Progressives and the Socialists voted in the minority. In answer to an interpellation Count von Loebell, Minister of the Interior, said:

The Polish Problem

> The Government takes its part of the responsibility for this step of world historical importance in the confident expectation it will be to the advantage of the German Empire by closely connecting the Polish State with the German Empire, and with the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy. We hope the German Empire's safety will forever be secured against the East. It is unnecessary to say that every inch of ground in the eastern frontier districts of Prussia is sacred and inalienable. No Prussian can think otherwise. The Government confidently expects that Prussian Poles, without prejudice to the Polish national feeling, will live more and more up to their duties as Prussian citizens.

Proceeding, the Minister of the Interior promised more satisfactory conditions for the Poles, after the war. He was followed by a Polish member, Shyczynski, who declared:

> The manifesto of the Emperor fills us with satisfaction because it acknowledges in principle the right of Poland to be an independent State. But there still is much apprehension that only a portion of the Polish people will have national freedom, and that only nominally. There is fear that, according to the wishes of those submitting the motion, so many restrictions will be imposed upon the Poles in military, economic and political affairs that their independence will be only a pretense.

The Socialist, Herr Stoebel, was even more outspoken, as follows:

> We also are for liberation of the Poles, but for their self-liberation without foreign assistance. It is desired to hold the Poles firmly in hand. Such liberation means nothing but annexation. The Poles fear the new State will fill gaps in our army.

Von Loebell refused to meet the point raised, contenting himself with the comment that he would degrade himself by answering such a speech.

As yet it is impossible to tell what is the attitude of the Russian Poles towards their new Kingdom.

Great Britain.—Like the lower schools, but to a more marked degree, the universities reflect the change in English public life. Cambridge, for instance, although the activities of the University have by no means been discontinued, presents many aspects of a military training school. The council of the Senate recently excused from the classic "Little-go" those students who have been engaged for not less than six months in some service connected with the war. About 12,500 Cambridge men are in military service, the percentage being almost the same as that of Oxford. Of this number, 1,263 have lost their lives, 1,730 have been wounded, and 130 are reported missing. The list of resident members at Cambridge catalogues only 152 freshmen, as compared with 1,171 in 1913-1914, the last normal year, and many of these students are either from foreign countries, or from parts of the Empire where the military requirements are not rigid. At Oxford, the diminution is even more marked. Including thirty Rhodes scholars, most of whom are Americans, there are fewer than 150 freshmen. Some of the colleges have only one freshman, while Queens has none. A similar decrease is noted in the Catholic schools. It is to be hoped that material will be gathered for the future historian, by the preparation of a complete catalogue of Catholic alumni who have given their lives for their country. Partial lists have been published from time to time, which should be carefully tabulated.

Universities in War Time

Ireland.—The failure of the potato crop, as already announced in America, is causing increasing alarm; some maintain the country is facing a severe famine. Potatoes are now selling for $5.00 a barrel, the poor are out of work and have no money, and the food shortage in England threatens to draw off a large percentage of the Irish supply. At such a time the lack of a national Home Rule Government, fully alive to the needs of the Irish people, is keenly felt. For there is no Irish Government in the country to regulate and control distribution and prices and to prevent export, in the interest of the suffering Irish poor. If an export of potatoes follows that of meat and grain to England, the conditions will become intolerable. To the question: What must be done to remedy the situation, one paper, the Donegal Vindicator, quoted by Ireland, makes the following suggestion:

The Famine Specter

> The crisis has found Ireland as unprepared as the war found Great Britain. The potato famine is upon us and so also are the exporters. In the famine years there was plenty of food to support the people, but it was exported. Let not the mistake occur again. The farmer who sells his potatoes for export today must be restrained by his more sensible neighbors. There is a food crisis and it can only be prevented by prompt action. If necessary, vigilance committees for the preservation of the people's food must be organized at once, and the stern coercion of the unpatriotic taken in hand. In time of war, little heed will be paid to a starving Ireland.

Mr. Runciman has announced that measures equivalent to a food dictatorship will be taken. If such a course is followed, the first thing to be done is to find speedy and effective means to save the Irish people from the terrible calamity which threatens them.

Mexico.—After a session of twelve weeks the Joint Commission on Mexican-American affairs has come to a conclusion on one point, the border difficulties. The protocol which has been sent to Carranza for approval is substantially as follows. The American troops are to be withdrawn from Mexico within forty days after the approval of the agreement, in such a manner that the Carranzistas will be enabled to occupy the evacuated territory. Should northern Chihuahua become unduly turbulent, before the retirement of General Pershing, the American troops, alone or in conjunction with the Mexican forces, may disperse the marauders. The time taken to accomplish this is not to be counted in the forty days set for the withdrawal. General Pershing is to have full control of the plan for the retirement of his troops, with permission to use the railroad to Juarez, if necessary. The Mexican commander is to control the plan for the occupation of the evacuated territory. The scheme for the control of the border by a joint military force was rejected; so too, was the proposal about a border zone to be patrolled by Mexican and American soldiers. However, the commanders on both sides of the international boundary may enter into an agreement for cooperation against bandits. And though each nation is to care for its own side of the border, yet the United States Government reserves the right to pursue Mexican marauders across the line, so long as conditions in northern Mexico remain abnormal. When this protocol was signed, negotiations were suspended till December 8, pending Carranza's acceptance of the document. Should he refuse to acquiesce in the findings, the Joint Commission will be dissolved automatically, unless the President of the United States changes his mind. Should Carranza accept the protocol the Commission will proceed to the consideration of certain international problems of Mexico, where according to the statement issued, "typhus is making headway and death by starvation is common." Before leaving Atlantic City Secretary Lane made a significant statement to the effect that

The Protocol

> The miseries of Mexico must be assuaged. Her poor, naked, starving, dying peons call out for help. They do not wish constant war, and only one per cent of her people are actually in the war, but all are suffering. We cannot maintain our self-respect or be true to the highest dictates of humanity and see these people suffer as they do because of the chaos that has come from civil war.

Thus after November 7, 1916, "lies," "exaggerations," "incredible reports trumped up for partisan purposes," suddenly became facts. A few more sessions of the Joint Commission may convert more lies into sober truth, without a change in Mexico.

Religious Conditions

If press dispatches are to be given credence, the long expected attempt to set up a national church in Mexico is about to be made. There is much nonsense in the account wired to the United States, but the main fact that "an effort will be made to establish a church purely national, that will not be subordinate to the hierarchy (sic) at Rome," is most probably true. Meantime persecutions still continue with unabated vigor, as is clear from these abstracts from a letter written in Mexico City:

> Friends write from Leon, Guanajuato, that not a single church there is open for worship. We seem to be moving the same way in the capital. St. Teresa's was closed recently. On October 2 Corpus Christi suffered the same fate, likewise San Juan de Dios, on October 5. The Carranzistas forced their way into this church, and hardly had they entered when they closed the doors, refusing admission to the priests. Finally they allowed one Father to enter and carry off the Blessed Sacrament. He was placed under a guard of soldiers, however, and ordered to bring back the ciborium. Meantime soldiers tore the silver ex-votos from the statue of St. Anthony and divided them amongst themselves. I am informed that Santa Catalina has also been closed, and it is commonly said that Jesus-Maria and San Hipolito are to be shut tomorrow, while San Felipe de Jesus will, according to present plans, be turned into a mausoleum for Madero. . . . The persecution grows more violent each day. Indeed, if the Carranzistas have their way but few churches will be available for worship. . . . At present, however, they are beset by enemies on all sides. The Zapatistas have been most active of late, and Puebla and Pachuca are menaced. Assaults in the streets are of daily occurrence, so, too, are theft and burglary. The police are quite indifferent; but then we are to have a Constitucion y Reformas.

In view of this it will be interesting to note the attitude of our Government towards the promised religious liberty.

Russia.—On November 25 the news came from Petrograd that Alexander Trepoff, Minister of Ways and Communications, had succeeded M. Stürmer as

The New Premier

Premier, the latter becoming Grand Chamberlain of the Imperial Court and retaining his place in the Council of the Empire. M. Trepoff's appointment is regarded as a triumph of the Duma over the Cabinet, and as a successful protest of the Russian people against high officials who were reported to be favoring a separate peace with Germany. According to the Retch, a Liberal paper, M. Stürmer's resignation clearly establishes, for the first time in Russia's constitutional history, the power of the Duma between the Government and the majority. The Retch explains:

> The Duma has accomplished its first object, but it does not necessarily follow that the rest of the program will be executed. The changes in the Cabinet desired by the majority in the Duma have not been fully carried out. Only the chief figure has been put aside. Further changes must follow, the most important of which is the dismissal of the Minister of the Interior, and the appointment of a proper person as Foreign Minister.

The new Premier is hailed as a "progressive and reformer." When Under-Secretary of the Chancellery in 1895 he brought about an improvement in the relations between landowners and tenants, and ten years later he promoted several reforms granted by the new Constitution. In 1914 M. Trepoff became a member of the Imperial Council and has discharged efficiently the duties of the Minister of Ways and Communications. The separate-peace movement with which M. Stürmer was suspected of being in sympathy, was declared by Czar Nicholas on November 16 to be non-existent. "Russia," he declared, "will maintain intact the intimate union which binds her to her valiant allies, and, will fight by their side the common enemy."

Mr. Sunday and the Unitarians

MARTHA MOORE AVERY

SOME weeks ago a Boston paper gravely cautioned Mr. Sunday not to attack the Unitarians. The paternal editorial was indeed more than a caution. It listed well over into a threat of untoward things, should the good neighbors and honest trustees of our community receive the hell-fire treatment generally accorded by this most strenuous evangelist to those who never look back to whence they came, so engaged are they going onward and upward forever, with never a hope of getting there. Returning to the persuasive, the Herald felt that if Mr. Sunday were to put his feet "under the mahogany" with these genial and up-to-date theologians his antipathy would be put to flight and his dogmatism to the blush.

The hint was taken, and forthwith upon his arrival in Boston, to drive the devil out, Mr. Sunday was invited to express his mind freely, behind closed doors, to his Unitarian hosts, gentlemen who have inherited from Channing, Emerson, James Freeman Clarke and Theodore Parker a rapidly declining knowledge of Christian doctrine, a dwindling measure of Christian belief, together with a steadily increasing confidence in human ignorance and a positive conviction of the irrational origin of man. A secret meeting would not do. Why should a man with more truth run to cover from men of less truth? The doors must be open to the press or Mr. Sunday would not accept.

As Unitarians regard their theology as gravely as Don Quixote did the windmills, something more than moral courage beating high, and plenty of language bursting loud, is wanted to topple over the Unitarians' complacent reliance upon what is not so. "Billy" is a good fellow "they say." He came, but he could not conquer. He cannot conquer because he does not see the Protestant mote in his own eye, and so he has not light enough to reason out the cause of the Pantheistic beam in his brother's eye. Happily, he half sees that he does not see, for when he means to strike hard, Mr. Sunday hits all alike with a Catholic club. Of course, it takes truth, whole and entire, to cure the mind so sick with private judgment that it clings desperately to a "teeny-weeny" bit of truth. Full-orbed truth, with its "thou shalt" and "thou shalt not" as the foundation of human affairs comes direct from God. No human theories will do, only the dogmas of Christ are sufficient. No human pronouncements about the origin and the nature of man is complete, but God's word that He created man in His own image and likeness is satisfying. It is the living voice of Christ's Vicar on earth that speaks without a shadow of error, to every man under heaven. Moreover each and every man is morally and intellectually bound to listen, for we are all under the law. As neither Mr. Sunday nor the Unitarians are commissioned by God to speak, why should they follow him? or why should he follow them? Indeed, why should anybody follow them or him?

Consequently, whenever and wherever Mr. Sunday or the Unitarians speak in perfect accord with the law of Christ, it is, perforce, a Catholic doctrine that is uttered. One may be sure that the form of speech will vary greatly. For good taste has long since been the high-water criterion with those whose toleration is so wide that the difference between "Christians, fore-Christians, after-Christians and Jews" has been wiped out with the sponge of pseudo-science. On the other hand it would seem that bad taste is the guiding star of the evangelist who fights the devil with language most befitting the presence of his satanic majesty. Unitarianism, possessing but a feeble, a super-placid stream of life, has no passion and no occasion to flow hot or to flow cold, while Billy with super-abundance of energy goes wild with red-hot shot.

Indeed the confession at the recent Unitarian dinner at Hotel Somerset that "many a parish is on its last legs" met with no denial. Even these "last legs" are not all their very own, for it was confided to all by the Pastor of Second Church that the Unitarians "are the most parasitic denomination in the country," and no man stood up to murmur dissent. This was rubbed in and polished off with "three-fourths of our new ministers come to us unprepared." Having found their way out of "orthodoxy," in middle life, they preach sermons on "Why I Became a Unitarian," though I may be permitted to suggest that "Negation Plus Negation" were a more fitting text.

It is too bad Mr. Sunday did not tell them to their face that from his heart and soul he believes Unitarians are in danger of damnation, as he has done in other cities. Possibly it would have scratched through the tough skin of culture for culture's sake. Suppose he had thrown this bomb into the midst of the gathering: "The priests have said High Mass over the strikingly rotten mess of Unitarianism. Why? Because they have been loyal to the doctrine of God and Christ. I have not found one that disbelieves in God or Christ. I have got to go to the Protestants to find that lot of mutts." Probably the after discussion would have been rather more fortissimo and less crescendo than it was. As Mr. Sunday does not believe in any of the Unitarian ancestors, monkeys, amoebas or protoplasm, "his theology doesn't sound like the theology of professional theologians," for the masterful reason that it is "three or four hundred years old." Really, it is shockingly "antique"; so behind the times that is "exceedingly discreditable." Indeed, it sounded "like that of a negro preacher way down South." Perish the thought that theology is as old as Christianity, as old as the Decalogue: such a fantastic notion is more "amusing than impressive" to those who have been liberal for many years. Positively, theology must be quite fresh to be acceptable to those who rely upon New Thought. Antiques are all very well for mere ornamentation. Such the comment on Mr. Sunday's doctrine. But rational thinking seems not a necessity to those who accept a causeless cosmos, without a pucker of the brow, and, without a sense of loss, admire the picture of their ancestors hanging by their tails on prehistoric trees, well, some 1,500,000 years ago.

Of course, sound thought, however old or new, must confess that so far as scientists really know, man is man in whatsoever age or clime, that so far as data are a proof, and rational theory a guide, the age of man is limited by the glacial period. But human thought about human beings is not fixed by the age of man, but rather by the human constitution given by God and the capability of reason, developed by man. Just as strictly as a rational calculation in mathematics is fixed by the law of numbers and man's ability to reckon rightly, so it is with philosophy that is sound. This test would prove that quite up-to-date Unitarians are far behind Billy in views that are correct. He rightly believes that God created man: that Christ is the Saviour of the race: that hell is the punishment of the wicked: that marriage is indissoluble. But as all this is upon his own authority, human authority, he could well be "received with good-natured amusement." However, be it known that there was at no time and in no sense any spirit of antagonism displayed at the meeting between the Unitarians and Billy. Too bad! but if there are any Protestants orthodox enough to stand this much of Christian doctrine, twentieth-century preachers "shall not think any more of them."

There is a dilemma! Mr. Sunday has the advantage, he was not wanted at the world-center of Unitarianism, where there is little vitality, less unity and no authority to withstand a tremendous onslaught against a brotherhood of man reared upon a utilitarian foundation. For the first time in all its years the want of unity and authority in Unitarianism was voiced. It was forced home that young men are not attracted to a cult in which each is his own authority.

With his splendid energy, Mr. Sunday for the nonce dominates Protestantism in Boston. He is his own authority and his plan of campaign gives unity of action for the time being. To the orthodox sects will go the small harvest garnered by Billy's picturesque slang. The Unitarians will gather not even the gleanings of the evangelist's sowing to store into their empty barns. What can be done? Nothing but to suffer death by slow extinction.

I doubt not, strange though it may seem, that by God's grace the real benefits will come to the Church. For what is Christian comes from Rome and must in time lead back to Rome. Needless to say, Catholic Boston is taking no part in the tabernacle service: to do so would be adding to the fascination of a man who has no commission to preach.

The Lost Towns

Hilaire Belloc

IT is three years ago, almost to the day I write, since I first saw Silchester. I went there to recover the Roman road which runs from Silchester to Old Sarum. I had read in the writings of a don at Oxford that the road had disappeared in the neighborhood of Silchester. This was almost enough to convince me that it would stick out of the ground conspicuously like a railway embankment. When I got there I did not find it sticking out so clearly as that, but I found it distinctly enough marked at short intervals from Silchester onwards. All this is by the way; for I am not writing of the Roman road but of Silchester itself.

I desire to convey to those who read this something of what filled my mind when I first saw the place. I am not hopeful that I shall succeed in that transference of emotion from mind to mind. For there is here a big bridge to be built over a wide chasm. In one state of mind Silchester would seem to be nothing but a very large field with a bit of very old wall around it; in another state of mind it is all Europe.

The scheme of Europe changes exceeding slowly. It changes so slowly that I would rather think of it as a sort of swinging, majestically working forth and back again. Very few of its ancient cities wholly fail. Very few new ones permanently arise. You can go back, back, back in history and see Europe always itself, finding, as at Arles, town under town almost as deep as you can dig a well. But here and there, as though to enhance this permanence, you get desolation. You have it in Silchester. And precisely because that desolation is absolute do you feel more strongly the greatness of the past from which we came and which made us.

For Silchester is but a great field lying open to the sky, with not one fragment left above the stubbles or the plow or the fallow of winter; and round it all about still runs the ruined wall; and outside the wall the ditch, though silted in for centuries, is deep and sharp still.

I may put it this way: any man coming to Silchester from without would see that he was coming up at the ruin of something. But once past the low boundary of that ruin, past the remaining lower courses of the stone wall there is blank emptiness. Everything has gone.

Outside the wall to the north the amphitheater stood, the place where the games were, the necessary symbol of fellowship in every Roman city. It had an arena fifty yards across. It was a great thing, for Silchester was in its way a great city. How many families it guarded we cannot tell, but converging on this place came at least four of the great roads, perhaps five, and the feast days must have been crowded things. This old theater is now wholly hidden by earth and on one side entirely broken down. It looks, as you come upon it, like a big mound such as are the mounds upon which some of the English castles were built, Oxford, for instance. It is covered with trees, and it is only when you have climbed the ridge so wooded, which wholly covers the ruined stones, and have looked down upon the arena within that the model of the thing strikes you. It gives one, after Nimes, Orange, the Paris ruins, an amazing effect of silence, seeing how full it once was, and for how long, of cheering thousands, and how now it is perfectly abandoned fields.

From here, as, indeed, from every part of the wall and its neighborhood, you look over a grand view. Not that Silchester stands very high, but it was cunningly chosen by the tribe which first made that place its stronghold, for survey. There is here something which you will see repeated in other similar centers, Bavai for instance, Bavai the hub of a whole wheel of roads. Bavai is not deserted today; it is only very much decayed. Yet it suggests the site of Silchester; standing on the flat top of a roll of land that is rather low than high, that is approached by a very slight long slope every way and that none the less commands the countryside every way for miles and miles.

How well one can understand the manner in which the place must have been the goal and object when all these roads were used and when Silchester was the capital of its district. How men must have come up those miles of plumb straight highways and have seen, half a day before they reached it, the roofs, perhaps, at the end of the Empire, the domes, of Calleva. There was a magnificence about the place which its size and sundry things discovered teach us still in spite of that fashion for denying the Roman basis of England; a fashion which, like so much which has sprung from religious fanaticism, warps English history still.

For Silchester when it was alive was only not larger than, or as large as, the Paris of Julian, but it had splendor in its public buildings. The great courthouse was not much shorter than Westminster Hall as we see it today. If we are wise we will believe that the Roman town was always upon this scale.

It is one half a mile as you look from the north wall southward to the southern gate. It is one half a mile as you look eastward from the western wall towards the church and the farmhouse which are the solitary roofs beyond the emptiness of the farther side. You had there, then, something like one third of Roman London; or perhaps more like one quarter, for the outline is not square but irregular. All the great place has utterly disappeared.

I have said that complete desolation of this sort is very rare in Britain. I think that there is only one example of it, which is Wroxeter, under the Wrekin. The towns maintain their continuous life; Lincoln and London and Winchester and Canterbury and York and Manchester and Carlisle and Gloucester and Worcester and Colchester and I know not how many others. But Silchester has gone altogether. How did it go? No one can tell you that. So far as one can make out it decayed and was at last deserted; largely, I should fancy, through the breakdown of the roads. But at any rate it did decay and it was deserted. And when the Middle Ages arose after the enormous gap, with their fairly full records, Calleva of the Atrebates had gone forever.

Still the question recurs and recurs to me, I write of it again and again, and never have been able so much as to begin to solve it. How did these towns disappear; the two that went in England, the many that disappeared abroad? What happened to Ruscino under the Canigou, big enough to give its name to a whole province? How did Bibracte die? How Alesia? You must not think that they were barbarous strongholds naturally given up when the Romans taught men to build better and in better places. In each of these you may see by its remains that the town was one of the places of the Empire, yet each has altogether gone!

How utterly Hippo has disappeared I have already written in another article. Also, how almost as utterly has Caesarea of Barbary.

Some say that the stone is carted away for local use, and like enough! But what of the foundations? And how is it that you so often find in these lost towns of the Empire nothing but little weak foundations which were obviously nothing more than the supports of huts and ramshackle houses in the last stages of the decline? It is a common thing to discover, whenever a Roman town has disappeared, that the traces left are those of a few very flimsy walls and large gardens about every house. That is, whenever so much evidence remains. What came before that last stage? Why was the magnificence of the place abandoned? Where, and most puzzling of all, did the materials go? They seem in Silchester to have preserved something of their great Town Hall till quite, quite late. Perhaps they had a religious feeling about it; perhaps the fragments were too big and too splendid for the use of marauders. Some of the slabs of the marble that incrusted it have lain there all these hundreds of years, part of it from Purbeck, part of it from the Pyrenees. They have found some drums of the pillars too, but where is all the rest?

Where, for that matter, is the town that there was about Lugdunum high in the Garonne, and who could steal, or for what purpose, the massive barracks of Lambese? Yet they have gone. Many lessons of mortality have been drawn by men, many emblems, many mysteries of it noted. None as a lesson or an emblem or a mystery is like these few lost towns. Of them, in England, Silchester is the chief marvel, a marvel to any man's hand in reach of every man.

Manners and Morals in the Philippines

JOHN J. THOMPKINS

A MARKED change has taken place in the character of the Filipino. His gentleness, the respect of the young for the aged and of all for those in authority were beautiful traits which are fast disappearing. Referring to the "apparent forwardness and boldness" of the English-speaking young men and the unrestrained conduct and manner of the "Americanized" girls, a writer in the Manila Free Press sees in these developments only the fruit of a more liberal "Anglo-Saxon system." Yet with all his latitude he feels constrained to issue the warning that liberty may not be turned into license. For many that warning has come too late.

Recently one of the nurses in the Manila General Hospital, which is conducted under Government direction, committed suicide. The papers bitterly attacked the head nurse for excessive discipline. In his answer the director of the hospital, Dr. W. E. Musgrave, completely vindicated the institution and its authorities. The hospital is open to inspection, its rules of discipline are published and no steps are taken to inflict punishment until all the facts of the case have been placed in writing. A complete record is also kept of every case where penalties are imposed. Yet a section of the press maliciously carried on a campaign of defamation against this institution without making any investigation. The halo of martyrdom already cast about previous deeds of suicide has stimulated similar tragedies and within a few months more than twenty suicides or frustrated suicides were registered in the General Hospital. "All but four of these suicides," writes Dr. Musgrave, "were persons under twenty-one years of age, and nearly fifty per cent of them were students." (Manila Daily Bulletin.)

Again on another occasion 139 student nurses, urging severity of discipline as the cause, organized a strike in this same institution. They were seventh-grade graduates, boys and girls, from all parts of the Islands. These pupils were being given the splendid opportunity of securing a professional education, and besides were receiving a stipend from the Government, with additional free board, etc. Has any nation ever done more for the people? Yet, see the results!

The Filipino of fifteen years ago was gentle, polite, respectful and submissive to lawful authority. It is pleasant and admirable to meet even now representatives of the former type in the distant barrios withdrawn from the triumphant march of American civilization. More than one American has spoken to me of the sad deterioration which has so rapidly come about in the Filipino character. The late elections for governors, assemblymen and so on, had hardly taken place when from all parts of this section of the country cries of protest arose against the elected candidates. One leading lawyer attached to the Government service expressed surprise that the Filipinos had learned to perpetrate frauds in the short time that they have had the ballot. He was speaking of a place where mayoralty elections were annulled because of the fraud that had been practised.

If the moderate ideas inculcated in the public schools are partly at least accountable for such conditions, what may we expect from the more "advanced and modern" methods of the Government's Philippine University. The really demoralizing instruction given there is sufficiently evident from the following facts contained in a letter to Manila Free Press, July 15, 1916:

> Last year students were required to study inter alios Ibsen, G. Bernard Shaw, Thomas Hardy, and George Meredith; two ephemeral decadents, one sexual pessimist, and the last that splendid but abstruse genius who devoted his intellect to gilding the philosophic pill. Today, my heart is hot within me at the sight of this year's amazing syllabus, a Barmecide mental feast indeed. The student is to make acquaintance with the Buddhist doctrine. Why? To what end? We have ignored and therefore slighted the Christian Faith in our schools, the one and only spiritual plow which has tilled the Malayan mental soil to produce the harvest of Malayan Christians called Filipinos. We insult the Filipino student by inviting him to ignore the Faith of his fathers and to devote his attention to Buddhism. This in passing. I prefer a more serious charge. To put the autobiography of Benvenuto Cellini into the list of books required to be studied by the University students is a sin against youth, which is unpardonable. The Filipino is mentally docile, imaginative and sympathetic. He is going to accept Cellini as a hero worthy of imitation, or recognize him as a damnable scamp who has initiated him into a knowledge of vice which he never would elsewise learn.

Protestantism, or rather its offscouring in the Philippines, has produced in Vigan a vile, filthy sheet of the Menace type which respectable Americans would not wish to touch even with tongs. The Menace, too, finds its way into the Manila Custom House where it is eagerly read and "passed along." The latest arrivals in Vigan, to discredit religion still more, are the Sabbatistas or Seventh Day Adventists. The predicadores of this sect, young fellows with scarcely a high school education, and the predicadores of the Christian Mission, equally advanced in theology, had quite a vigorous and laughable discussion on the observance of Saturday as the "Lord's Day." I believe the discussion ended by a general appeal to arms. On the following Sunday the allied forces of the Methodist and Christian Mission were to battle in public with the Sabbatistas.

A greater element of evil in this proselyting are the young ladies who have taken up preaching. Most of them, I think, are from the poorest classes. Some have not gone to school at all, or have been through only a few grades; others have finished the seventh grade and then, for lack of support, have taken to preaching. Whereas before they were in utter destitution, their new occupation now enables them to dress like senoras. Meantime they make a house-to-house campaign and attack Catholic doctrine. If they have few followers or "converts" they nevertheless leave the black trail of doubt and indifference behind them. Poverty is offering its victims to Protestantism, and many of them become in time its well-dressed and loquacious predicadores.

With this incessant proselyting; with 500,000 children in our public schools growing up, I may say, without any religious training, with the open denial of hell in the Vigan Protestant paper; with the fear of God and of eternal punishment disappearing, need we be surprised if suicide and other vices increase? An appalling indifferentism is hovering, perhaps surely settling, over the Philippine Islands.

Are Citizens Voters?

JOHN WILTBYE

SINCE the Hayes-Tilden imbroglio of 1876, few elections have passed over our weary heads, without a flare-back of letters to the press from Veritas, Vox Populi and Pro Bono Publico, advocating with tremendous seriousness, the abolition of the electoral college. Confessedly, there is nothing sacrosanct about the present system, nor is it in the least exempt from constitutional amendment. Five amendments have been adopted since 1865, and if our reformers have their way, one need not vie with Methusalem to see the day of a thirtieth or fortieth amendment.

The opinion of these newspaper enthusiasts is that the direct vote for President leads without a stumble, into the promised land of absolutely "above-board" politics. One wonders if they have ever considered the indifferent effects of the "popular vote," in elections to the United States Senate, or the exceedingly serious objection to the direct vote, involving as it would, a Federal board of directors and counters at Washington. Be this as it may, political sentiment has given up many an ancient landmark without a sigh. The modern plea for the abolition of the electoral college would have sounded like revolt to the citizen of an older day, who, however much he might quarrel with the system, never dreamed of forcing a change in the right of the several States to appoint electors "in such manner as the Legislature may direct." So absolute did he deem this right, that, in the language of H. R. Storrs, a New York statesman of the early nineteenth century, the State might delegate the appointment "to a board of bank directors, a turnpike corporation, or a synagogue." True, this constitutional right is subject to abuse; so too, is every constitutional provision. Constitutions are formed by men, to direct the affairs of men; and with the introduction of the human element comes the possibility of malice and error. Humanum est errare, were it not already taken for granted, might well be written in the prologue of every such document.

An argument frequently urged in favor of an amendment, delegating the election of the President to a popular vote, rests on the statement, that since the United States is a republic, it would seem necessary, or at least fitting, that the chief ruler be chosen by a majority of the citizens of the republic. Proposed in the glowing language of an orator at a county fair, the argument is not lacking in effectiveness. It labors, however, under a series of misconceptions. The President is not, strictly speaking, a ruler, but an individual in whom, according to the Constitution, "the executive power shall be vested." Nor is it true that a direct election by the people is necessarily demanded by the republican form of government, as it has been understood in its most notable example. Finally, so far as the Constitution is concerned, a voter need not necessarily be a citizen of the United States; nor is a citizen of the United States, by that very fact, a voter.

It is well to recall that, in the opinion of eminent commentators, the voting franchise is not a right attached to citizenship, or to any political function. In Cooley's words, it is "a privilege rather than a right. . . to be granted or denied . . . on grounds of general policy," not by the Federal Government which, as the Supreme Court has affirmed at least once, "has no voters in any State of its own creation," but by the several States. "The due qualifications of voters," writes Story, "has been deemed a matter of mere State policy," and he adds that no "absolute right to elect or to be elected" can be claimed by anyone. Pomeroy, after stating that Congress has no direct control over electors, observes that "the organic law nowhere attempts to define what persons may exercise the right of suffrage," and concludes, "Not a vote is cast, from one end of the country to the other, by any person in virtue merely of being a citizen of the United States." Pomeroy here uses the term "right," but from the context, it is plain that he does not differ from Cooley or Story in the meaning assigned to it. With them he holds that the franchise is to be granted or withheld by the State, "on grounds of general policy."

Although the present tendency is to extend the franchise, the State always imposes some restrictions, not in conflict with a republican form of government, which, by the way, is nowhere defined in the Constitution. At the formation of the Union, many of the States exercised the right of exclusion to a point which today would seem to violate this saving clause, and continued the exclusion well into the new century. Thus in New Jersey, it was required that the elector be "worth fifty pounds, proclamation money," and in Massachusetts, that he enjoy "an annual income of three pounds, or any estate to the value of sixty pounds." A property requirement of some kind, was common; while beyond the "forty shillings freehold, or forty pounds personal estate," the godly State of Connecticut exacted from the prospective voter, by certificate of the selectmen, "maturity in years, quiet and peaceable behavior, and a civil conversation." This last qualification would have worked havoc in the voting ranks of some later communities.

The distinction between citizenship and the franchise is sharply drawn by two directly varying phenomena of the American electoral system. The first is that some States permit persons who are not citizens at all, to vote. In Missouri, for instance, aliens who in due form have declared their intention to become citizens, may under certain circumstances, receive the franchise. The same concession is found in Alabama, Arkansas, Indiana, Oregon, South Dakota and Texas, and was at one time allowed in Florida, Georgia, and Minnesota, and perhaps in some other States as well. In the next place, beyond all doubt, women are not only "persons" in the eyes of Federal and of all State laws, but "citizens." Yet in the majority of States, they enjoy no franchise whatever. On the other hand, in Illinois, they may vote for President and for municipal officials, while the complete franchise is granted in eleven States.

An amendment directing the choice of the President by popular vote would, of course, call for uniform qualifications to be fixed by Congress, for electors in all the States. It would require the establishment of an electoral bureaucracy at Washington; and that way lies peril, "Too much centralization," wrote John Fiske, a keen observer of American life, "is our danger today." With the adoption, under circumstances hitherto unknown to a Congress, of an eight-hour law, already subjected to the slur of a Federal Court, and a child-labor bill which besides the weakness of a doubtful constitutionality, strikes but an impotent blow at one form only of an industrial disgrace, we seem to have welcomed without reserve, the theory that no community can govern itself. Now it is proposed to establish a national university, the beginning of an educational monopoly by government, soon to be followed by governmental authority over defective, delinquent and dependent children. Are we to promote a new republic, unknown to the founders, in which, to quote Fiske, "the people of the different parts of our country shall allow their local affairs to be administered by prefects from Washington"? In the same anxious mood, Jefferson pointed out in 1823, the danger of having "all offices transferred to Washington," to become the stronghold of Federal incumbents who if originally disinterested, might be succeeded by unworthy partisans, lusting for the spoils. The spirit of this great statesman was never more needed than in this day of experimental socialized government. It is expressed in a sentence in his autobiography, pregnant with political wisdom. "Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we should soon want bread."

The Volpi Collection

HENRY C. WATTS

ARE we not, after all, the heirs of the ages? Have not the centuries travailed for us; the craftsmen toiled for us? Has not the search for beauty continued unceasingly just that we may have a little pleasure? There are times when some few of the teeming millions in the metropolis of the West must stop to think whether, after all, everything that is in the world has come into being in order that, sooner or later, it might find its way to New York.

There has just passed under the auctioneer's hammer in New York City a famous art collection, which has been declared by no less an authority than Dr. Bode of Berlin, the most important and complete collection of the art of the Italian Renaissance ever shown in America. This collection which included ancient paintings, some wonderful Gothic and Renaissance furniture, rugs and tapestries, art treasures and antiquities, was contained in the famous Davanzati Palace, in Florence, and was brought to this country by Professóre Commendatóre Elia Volpi.

It is dispersed now, and America is the richer for its dispersal. But there is a side to an incident such as this which is not without a certain pathos, a side that means so much more than the fact that so many hundreds and thousands of dollars changed hands. For the Renaissance was the result of a tremendous intellectual and spiritual upheaval. Old landmarks were changed, old values cast aside: it was a rebirth, and it was not without the pangs and travail that must accompany all birth. And as the auctioneer sits, with hammer poised ready to fall, as the bidders cry out an advance on the price called for some wonderful piece of pottery or work of art, as a voice calls out "Seventy-five!" or some other such figure, it is possible to stop and think whether the Renaissance came to pass in order that centuries after America might set a price upon its achievements.

These are unique occasions, these auctions that occur in this country, when we are allowed to estimate in certain money values the genius and talent of the Renaissance; to buy something that is without a price, something that was made for the very love of art and the beautiful, something, too often true, that was made for the adornment of the sanctuary as an expression of love and devotion, and therefore can never be brought within the bounds of commercial value.

There were three objects in particular in the Volpi collection that stand out in this way, three objects that can only be incongruous in the home of the millionaire, no matter in how splendid surroundings they may be placed. They are a huge Florentine lectern and two vesting-presses.

Now it is a matter of ordinary common-sense that the craftsmen of the Renaissance did not put their best work and the splendors of wood-carving and gilding into a vesting-press in order that some hundreds of years later it might furnish a buffet in a rich American's dining-room. There is a sense of the incongruous in thinking that a solemn butler will hand the finger bowls from the very same piece of furniture at which countless numbers of priets vested for Mass; there is something unsatisfying in the thought that the sharp edges of these vesting-presses, which are worn smooth because for hundreds of years chasubles hung over their edge, will be worn still smoother from their contact with the dress-coats of twentieth-century men-servants. Of course this does not affect their marketable value, rather the fact that they are the spoils of some cathedral or church gives them an added commercial significance.

So too, with that great Florentine lectern. It will probably find a home in some gallery or library, and maid-servants will polish it well with cedar oil, and no one will think of cheering its wooden soul with such ditties as: Virga Jesse floruit or Dulce lignum, dulces clavos, or many another sound it heard before it became a piece of antique furniture.

However, the principal reason for the being of works of art is to fetch a good price, but there are many persons who have much real affection for them, quite apart from the price they might fetch. So among all the rugs and pictures and antiquities that gave joy to the eye of Professor Volpi, there are some that call for special mention on account of their exceeding loveliness.

Perhaps the most notable of these is a Madonna with the Holy Child and Saints by Francia. The picture is dated 1506, and was painted when Francia was more than fifty years old, and had arrived at the fullest expression of his artistic powers. The painting, which shows remarkable freshness in its colors, represents Our Lady seated, with the Holy Child on her lap. There are saints standing on either side, and the indications are that they are St. Benedict and St. Bernard; the former is bearded and wears a black cowl, while the latter is clean-shaven with just the hood and upper part of a white garment, evidently a cowl, showing. The background stretches away to hills in the distance, which are slightly wooded. There are certain items in this collection upon which Professor Volpi placed a reserve price, on account of their unique character and great value, and this painting is among the number of items so reserved.

When Gonzaga was Duke of Mantua, in the fifteenth century, the bronze doors of the Church of St. Anthony at Mantua were being fashioned by Donatello, who was assisted by a fellow-worker named Andre Briesco, or more familiarly Il Riccio. And because of the excellence of Il Riccio's bronze work he was commanded by the Duke to make a thurible, which remained in the ducal family's possession, and finally passed to the Marquis del Bagno, and was sold some days ago for $66,000. The top of this censer is surmounted by the seated figure of a bearded faun, resting on one hand a bunch of grapes and holding in the other Pan's pipes. The bowl of the censer is supported by three male caryatid figures with uplifted arms, holding acanthus leaves at the extremities. This glorious piece of work shows very strongly the paganizing influence of the Renaissance, and not only in the richness of its lines and the voluptuousness of its curves, but in its expression and spirit show more than anything else the unity of thought with pagan Greece which distinguished so many workers of this period.

There is a little treasure also which is ascribed by competent critics to the golden period of Greek art. This is a statuette of Sappho, which was discovered during the course of some excavations at Melos a short time ago. It is conjectured that this statuette dates from the fourth century, B. C. It presents in the most perfect form the idealization of the Greek love of rhythm and harmony.

A wonderful collection of chairs and faldstools of the Renaissance period showed that the Italian craftsmen were no whit behind the ancient Greeks in their love and appreciation of the beauty of line and form. Indeed there is food for reflection in comparing the Greek statuette and the Renaissance furniture to see to how great an extent the love of rhythm dominated the workers of both ages. And this same sense might have been seen in a wonderful collection of bronzes, and especially of brass candlesticks, many of which had begun life as ornaments for the altar before they entered on their dignified career as art treasures and antiques.

But the breaking up of this collection means that many treasures will find a permanent home in this country, and it appears to be increasingly the custom for wealthy men and women to leave, some at least, of their treasures for the use of the people in exhibitions and museums. So perhaps, after all, the workers and craftsmen of the Renaissance will not have worked without a purpose. In an age of so much machine-made work we need more and more to have brought to our minds the handiwork of the craftsman, to have before us the ideal of the dignity of labor as a means of perfect self-expression; and the Renaissance was before all else the culmination of self-expression. So those of us who have not seen the Volpi collection and those of us who, having seen, will not be found among the buyers, can take comfort in the knowledge that somewhere in America these treasures are to be found, and in the hope that they may be brought forth to give joy to all who gaze upon them.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

A Challenge to the Socialists.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The following letter is the challenge I recently sent to Mr. Adolph Germer, the National Secretary of the American Socialist party. Perhaps the communication will interest the readers of AMERICA.

Boston. DAVID GOLDSTEIN.

November 16, 1916.

National Office, Socialist Party,
Mr. ADOLPH GERMER, Secretary,
Chicago, Illinois.

Dear Sir:

My association with the Socialist movement and my study of its doctrines, as set forth by its foremost exponents, have firmly convinced me that Socialism is fundamentally hostile to the basic principles of Christian belief. Consequently no one can consistently accept the doctrines of the Socialist movement and those of the Christian Church at one and the same time.

In my travels from city to city, lecturing under the auspices of Catholic societies, I frequently meet members of your organization, who, through ignorance of the philosophical foundation of their party, or by their politic use of the Socialist now-you-see-it-and-now-you-don't-tactics have taken issue with me. They have gone so far as to say that my exposé of Socialism is false; that Socialism is in fact the further development of Christian principles, rather than a divergence from them.

In order that this most vital issue may be made plain, in order that the line of demarcation that logically exists between Socialism and Christianity may be clearly defined to the satisfaction of those who may be in doubt, I respectfully submit a proposal that this matter be tested out on this one phase of Socialism—the family.

I shall present evidence to prove the following contentions before a competent committee to be decided upon by you and by myself at any date that may be mutually satisfactory.

(1). That Socialism assumes private property to have brought into existence the present form of the family, the monogamic family, one man, one wife and their children.

(2). That the Socialist theory of the present family assumes it to have evolved from the time when men and women lived in a state of promiscuity, when "all the women (in a tribe) belonged to all the men and all the men to all the women."

I hold that the Socialist theory regarding the family rests upon these two propositions and that they are diametrically opposed to historic testimony and Christian teachings.

It is a fact universally acknowledged that Christianity recognizes that Almighty God established monogamy when He created our first parents; when He declared: "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they shall be two in one flesh." My contention is that the evidence of the world's greatest ethnological authorities sustains the Christian doctrine that monogamy existed in the earliest known days of the race. That the investigations of these scientists prove that there is no evidence extant to substantiate the Socialist notion that promiscuity ever formed a general stage in the history of the human race. Their express understanding is that the race never could have outlived the degenerate condition of conjugal association from which Socialism assumes the family to have evolved.

I hold that Socialism stands for loose marital association, "an association terminable at the will of either party," thus doing away with the "interference" of "a third party," the Church or State. This is diametrically opposed to the Christian law which declares that a marriage once entered into and consummated is binding until death. Moreover an association terminable at will is contrary to the civic law which presumes marriage to be a life contract, subjecting the parties to the contract to its restraints, notwithstanding that the State has, since the days of the "French conflagration," permitted divorce.

I shall present as evidence in proof of these fundamental differences (on the Christian side) the writings in the New Testament, the "Catholic Encyclopedia," the proceedings of the Council of Trent, and the Encyclical of Pope Leo XIII on "Christian Marriage"; also some writings of leading Protestant doctors. On the Socialist side I shall substantiate the indictment I bring with the writings of Morgan, Engels, Marx, Bebel, Bax, Morris, Rappaport, Meilly and other recognized Socialist authorities whose writings on the family are circulated by Socialist organizations, not alone in this country, but throughout the world. I hold, with your International Representative, Mr. Morris Hillquit, that "the utterances and acts of such writers and representatives, unless formally repudiated by their party, must be considered as legitimate expressions and manifestations of the Socialist movement, and its defenders and opponents may properly refer to them in support of their contentions."

As an evidence of my good faith I have placed on deposit with the Federal Trust Company of Boston the sum of one thousand dollars to be forfeited to the Red Cross Society in the event that the differences herein set forth are not proved to be fundamental to Socialism and to Christianity and that as a logical consequence no one can be adjudged an intelligent Christian and at one and the same time consistently support Socialism.

Sincerely,

DAVID GOLDSTEIN.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS

Suffolk, ss. November 17, 1916.

There personally appeared the above named David Goldstein, known to me personally, and made oath that he has now on deposit in the Federal Trust Company of Boston, Massachusetts, the sum of one thousand dollars in trust for the purpose hereinbefore set forth; before me,

AUGUSTUS ANDREWS,
Justice of the Peace.

Is There a Santa Claus?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"Is there a Santa Claus?" Discussion is again rife as to whether we should answer that question of little doubting Thomas, or of his no less skeptical sister, in the negative or in the affirmative. At times we feel that we should disabuse their young minds altogether. But we hesitate, lest in disillusionizing them we shatter Christmas for ourselves as well as for the children. But "Is there a Santa Claus?" The question will not down.

Too bad that we should think it necessary to sustain a myth, when we have "the Word made Flesh," the Divine Saviour Himself as the "really and truly" central figure of the great festival. What is Christmas, anyway? Is it not the commemoration of the Incarnation? Is it not the anniversary of the Nativity? But, Alas! how few of the little ones now awaiting "Santa Claus" know of the Divine Infant. To them the real story of Christmas is as a closed book. They have learned the fable, not one whit less difficult of comprehension, and in no respect so well adapted to inspire and give joy as the fact. Childish fancy has been guided over the empyrean course of the reindeers and sleigh, and into the mystical realms of toyland. Our boys and girls are as familiar with the appearance of Santa Claus as they are with that of their own grandpa. They have seen and marveled at the pictures of the big books in which the names of all good children are recorded for reward; they have seen the great boxes into which the letters to "Santy" are delivered; they have been shown—well, everything!—everything but the Stable at Bethlehem, the Virgin and the Child.

There was a time, within the memory of many of us, when childhood looked forward to the Christ-kindlein, the Christ-child, for all that they now expect from Santa Claus. And did Christmas mean less to childhood then than it does now? We leave the answer to those who recollect. If there is a Christ-kindlein, and we are sure there is, else there would be no Christmas, what need have we, especially we Christians, of a Santa Claus?

Erie. EDMUND A. KNOLL.

The Schoener Scientific Gardens

To the Editor of AMERICA:

At the close of the article, "Roses or Regrets," in AMERICA for November 18, Mr. Francis A. McCloskey asks if there are no Catholics who will join a movement to make the Schoener Scientific Gardens a reality. There are such Catholics, I am sure. Would not the following be a practical method of reaching them? By appealing to the bishops, and, with their approval, to the parish priests of all the parishes in each diocese of this country, for an annual offering of five dollars, a considerable sum could be raised. There are many priests whose interest in other fields of science would inspire them with friendliness for this work and a desire to help in it. After unusually successful church entertainments, many pastors would be willing to put aside a small sum to be added to the annual donation. Then, too, they could speak of the work from the pulpit, and thus rouse the interest of their parishioners. In some localities, leagues under the patronage of the Blessed Virgin, the Mystical Rose of the Litany, could be formed, with small annual dues and an occasional entertainment to secure funds for the work.

Brooklyn, N. Y. G. M. R.

Prohibitive Fees in Catholic Colleges

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The question of "Which college?" is settled now for another year—satisfactorily settled for many; for many more, unsatisfactorily. The higher education, as well as what precedes it, should be open to all who wish to avail themselves of it; and the day is coming when this will be the case. While, under certain conditions, free colleges are out of question, the fact remains that the rates charged by many, not to say most, of the leading colleges and universities are unnecessarily high. That there is in some of the non-Catholic colleges and academies a tendency to trade on the reputation of the institution, to tell its name to those best able to pay, and incidentally the advantages, whether solid or ephemeral, that it stands for, is undeniably true. That our Catholic colleges should follow them in this and seek to be "fashionable" institutions, catering to the rich or well-to-do is unthinkable.

We are constantly being urged to give our sons and daughters a Catholic education, a Catholic college education. And this every Catholic worthy of the name is eager to do. But in how many cases are the fees prohibitive? Examine the roster in dozens of non-Catholic institutions of learning, women's colleges in particular, and find the answer: the names of hundreds of ambitious Catholic girls, the flower of their generation. They are struggling against unequal odds, handicapped for their whole future. Why? Because their parents cannot afford to pay the price of their education in first-class Catholic colleges. Is this as it should be? Should a Catholic college practically close its doors to a student in order to maintain a high-priced exclusiveness? How much more meritorious to acquire a reputation for inclusiveness! To open its doors to every worthy applicant who can pay the minimum cost of maintenance and schooling. What a difference such a course would make even in one generation! What an impetus the Church in America would receive, and what a blessing these pioneers would draw down upon themselves!

Wilmington. A. B. L.

A Monument to Harris

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It will afford me great pleasure, if I am permitted to say to Lillian Bell and the readers of AMERICA, that there is a book "for intelligent children and uncomplaining grown-ups," and to add, that "no library is complete without it," namely, "Uncle Remus, His Songs and His Sayings." I often wonder, will our Catholic people ever appreciate the world's indebtedness to Joel Chandler Harris, or will the Knights of Columbus some day build a fitting monument to his memory. In a preface to the fifteenth addition of his book, the author says:—

> I seem to see before me the smiling faces of thousands of children—some young and fresh, some wearing the friendly marks of age, but all children at heart—and not an unfriendly face among them. And out of the confusion, and while I am trying hard to speak the right word, I seem to hear a voice lifted above the rest, saying: "You have made some of us happy." And so I feel my heart fluttering and my lips trembling and I have to bow silently and turn away, and hurry back into the obscurity that fits me best.

If he were here to speak for himself he surely would say: "If you want to show your appreciation of my work, build a home for those little ones." And should we not make it worthy of him and the Master who inspired him? If I were asked to recommend a book for old and young, a book to give for Christmas, that will bring the greatest amount of innocent enjoyment to the greatest number, I would say, by all means, "Uncle Remus, His Songs and Sayings."

The Negro dialect is easy to read interestingly. It appeals strongly to children, and a book like "Uncle Remus" might be made to work wonders in weaning children of school-age from the "movies," which are causing the ruin of so many.

Chicago. JOHN MCINTYRE.

Dignified Delay and Defeat

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My friend, Owen Brannigan, who toils in the rolling mills, is a vigorous pleader for Catholic organization. His desire is to awaken Catholics to a realization of the feebleness of their condition. This is sufficient for his condemnation by his acquaintances, clerical and lay, who denounce him as a "radical" and say that he is not sufficiently humble.

The advocates of dignified delay and defeat say that organization is not necessary, yet they know that on our street-corners infidels, Socialists and Jews are blaspheming God and His Blessed Mother, shouting foul attacks upon the holiest mysteries of the Catholic Faith, and inciting to assaults upon Catholic edifices, while Catholics stand by paralyzed, never having been taught the idea of organization, offensive or defensive. The paragons of sloth assert that Catholic leaders are not needed, yet they see seekers after or holders of political jobs masquerading as Catholic leaders while keen to play the part of Judas.

Will not AMERICA give us a series of articles on the real Catholic leaders of other days; or inaugurate a correspondence course of instruction in organization for those who should be Catholic leaders, yet are not? Mr. Brannigan is working to organize a band of militant Catholics who will deal in forcible fashion with the imported Socialist rabble. More power to him!

Brooklyn, N. Y. JAMES V. SHIELDS.

Complaints from Catholic Politicians

To the Editor of AMERICA:

For some weeks I have been subjected by certain Catholic politicians and their friends to tirades against damn priests, Catholic papers and magazines. Among them AMERICA was mentioned as the worst offender. These gentlemen found fault with the manner in which the Administration's policy in Mexico had been judged. Is it not about time to proclaim loudly that Catholic papers and magazines exist principally to defend Catholic interests at home and abroad?

Hartford. W. GILBERT.

[Quite unnecessary. Religion and morality are always the first and last interest of Catholic politicians.—Ed. AMERICA.]

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

St. Dominic and His Brethren

TO have had a saint for a mother, not merely a saintly mother, but one actually raised to the altars, to have one's own brother beatified, and to have enjoyed the friendship of men like Simon de Montfort and Francis of Assisi was a distinction, not altogether unusual in the early centuries of Christianity, but extremely rare in the Middle Ages, ages of faith though they were. Yet this was the distinction given to Dominic Guzman. All that was necessary to complete the story was that he should be canonized himself, and leave behind him a posterity of saints. Both of these privileges were accorded the founder of the Order of Preachers. Children in the flesh he had not, for he consecrated his virginity to God; but children in the Lord were his in legion; the day would fail the tongue that would attempt to tell their names, for they literally crowd seven centuries of the Church's calendar. Not the least of them is our first American saint, the gentle Rose of Lima.

It was a high mission that Honorius III. intrusted to the little band of men, solemnly approved as a Religious Order on December 22, 1916. They were to be, in the words of the Pope, "champions of the Faith and lights of the world." During the seven centuries that have come and gone since he defined their work, they have manfully stood to their task. Dauntless, uncompromising defenders of orthodoxy, ever battling for the truth, they have been Crusaders in the best sense of the term, they have dealt valiantly with heresy, and had a lion's share in preserving the integrity of the Faith. Some idea of their devotedness to the Holy See may be gained from the fact that three thousand members of the Order have been bishops. Of these ninety were cardinals; twenty-five, legates a latere; ninety, apostolic representatives in the courts of kings and princes; while four were popes. Such was the gift of St. Dominic to the Church, or rather a small portion of his gift, for greater than all these are the unnumbered saints and scholars who have lived and toiled and suffered and died for Christ, and have wished their names to be forgotten and unknown.

They were also to be "lights of the world," keeping alive the spark of revealed doctrine and kindling the fire of charity. The white scapular, which is the distinctive mark of St. Dominic's sons and daughters, not only symbolizes the purity of their ideals, the innocence of their lives and the favor of the Queen of Heaven, it also typifies the white light of truth, which they have contributed so much to keep unclouded and undimmed for so many hundreds of years. The crystallization of the highest ideals of Christian art in the work of Fra Angelico has its counterpart in the permanency of form given to theological thought by the surpassing genius of the Angel of the Schools. And who that has read at all has not wondered at the mysticism of St. Catherine of Siena, counselor of popes, the zeal of Las Casas, defender of the Indians, the labors of St. Louis Bertrand, evangelist of New Granada? St. Raymond of Penafort was one of the most eminent of jurists, St. Antoninus one of the founders of sociology, Lacordaire one of the most eloquent of preachers and publicists. In our own land Edward Fenwick, first Bishop of Cincinnati, and Luke Concannen, first Bishop of New York, were among the most apostolic pioneers of our American episcopate. But these men and women, though more distinguished than their brethren, were, after all, only types of the great body of Dominicans.

With the month of December the white-robed army of St. Dominic will enter on the eighth century of its loyal service of the Church. Throughout the month, and especially in the days immediately preceding Christmas, days that mark the anniversary of the solemn approval of the Order, Catholics the world over will be offering felicitations on the happy completion of another cycle of fruitful labor. AMERICA, speaking for the sons of St. Ignatius and for its editors and its readers, desires to add its voice to the general chorus of congratulation and to express its confident hope and its sincere good wishes for the fulfilment of St. Teresa's prediction, that the Dominicans, because they have been found good and faithful servants, will be set over still greater things until the end of time.

Encouraging Anarchy

IN this country, as in Europe, the curse of organized labor, has been dishonest or misguided leaders. No open-minded publicist, above all, no Catholic, need be told that the wrongs of the worker in America are many and grievous. But it is sheer folly and sin, to proceed on the policy that deep wrongs can be righted by deeper wrongs. It is true that under extreme conditions, well defined and fully verified, revolution may be justified. But do the evils which the laborer now suffers, justify revolt against our Government? That contention can be advanced only by an association or an individual utterly deranged by the bitterness of partisanship. Yet it is, apparently, the position adopted by the American Federation of Labor, in session last week at Baltimore.

After assuming what is by no means a certainty, that interests antagonistic "to the freedom of men and women who labor" are making a mockery of the American courts, the Federation adopted the following resolution:

> We therefore recommend that any injunction dealing with the relationship of employer and employee, and based on the dictum "labor is property," be wholly and absolutely regarded as usurpation, and disregarded, be the consequences what they may.

Happily, with its limited membership, the Federation does not represent a tenth part of the workers. That in this anarchical resolution, it represents a plurality even of its own adherents, is open to serious doubt. The average workingman is not a dolt. He subscribes to the opinion of that eminent jurist, Mr. Taft, stated some eight years ago, that it is not the worker who profits by any weakening of the courts, but "the rich violator of the law, because he can employ cunning and astute counsel to enable him to take advantage of every such weakness." Conceivably, the endowed corporation might exist without the assistance of the courts; but there can be no doubt whatever, that without the powerful protection of the law, operating equitably through the judiciary, the worker is absolutely helpless to maintain his cause against the encroachments of predatory wealth.

But apart from that consideration, the authority of the courts, from the tribunal of first instance to the Supreme Court of the United States, must be upheld, and this despite the complaints of minorities, even when justly aggrieved. This principle is fundamental in the American scheme of government. When laws work to the harm of the community or State, redress is at hand in their repeal by constitutional means. No Catholic can retain membership in any association which by contemptuously disregarding the decisions of rightly established courts, fosters violence and encourages revolt. If to repeal an obnoxious law, or to amend an unpalatable judicial decision, every man is free to arm himself with a brickbat or a revolver, and encourage his fellows to emulate his example, "be the consequences what they may," then government is a farce, and civilization, an idle dream.

Francis Joseph, Emperor and King

THE Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary is no more. On November 21 the merciful hand of death closed his aged eyes in eternal sleep. His life was long and laborious and sorrowful. As a mere boy of eighteen years he was called from the battlefield to ascend a tottering throne beset by enemies both within and without the Empire and Kingdom. And he died a hero. The Italian war passed, the Hungarian revolt was settled, Serb, Czech, Magyar and men of a dozen other races, all with different ideals and aspirations were not only held together for a common end, but were inspired with reverence for the ruler who gave of his life that they might live in peace. His people loved Francis Joseph both for what he was and for what he did. A martyr to duty, he labored incessantly for the welfare of the many races over which he ruled. His was no easy task, but never once did he falter in his effort to accomplish it as perfectly as might be. Just and merciful, at all times he sought not his own aggrandizement but the advancement of his people. His heroism was the more remarkable, for that his life was joyless. He was in very truth a man of sorrows, the greatest perhaps that ever darkened a king's soul. The calamities of the house of Atreus pale into insignificance before those of Francis Joseph. But Francis Joseph bore his grief in kingly fashion and went his way with trust in God. For he was a man of faith, a simple man who did not fear to make public acknowledgment of God's supremacy. Now he is dead and his people of many races and tongues and religions are mourning their King and Emperor who lay in silent peace in the old castle of Schoenbrunn, at the foot of the graceful hill on which the Viennese had gathered so often to do their Emperor honor. As his body was borne into the stately Hofburg, a dense, motley crowd stood in the courtyard, round the great stature of Maria Teresa, and watched the passing of their sometime chief. He is their chief no longer, he has been borne to the humble Capuchin church, where his body now rests on the floor of the crypt, in a great metallic coffin, with those of his noble and ancient line. Sic transit gloria mundi, but Francis Joseph has a higher glory; in later life he was a devout Christian and he died in osculo Domini; in faith, in penitence, in confidence. The King is dead! Long live the King!

Barroom Vision

THERE is a callow youth in one of Dickens's novels, who was wont to boast that he "knew life." "He had looked at it," explains Dickens, "through the dirty panes of a barroom door." Some of our American novelists, particularly two in New York, make the same boast, backed, very probably, by experiences similar to those of the youth at the barroom door. They call themselves artists, but this may be passed over as a mere mistake. Persons who assert this claim are generally suffering from what the alienist terms "ideas of grandeur." Nor are their frantic cries that "art" is suffering because of the activities of Mr. Sumner and the police, particularly impressive. Who ever told these gentlemen that their diseased and enfeebled productions were "art"?

Equally absurd is their assumption that they "see life as it really is." On the contrary, what vision they possess is focused on life's midden-heaps, and so familiar have they become with the gutter, that they deem the perfume of an apple-orchard faint and unsatisfying. There are other things in life besides midden-heaps: violets, for instance, and children, and love and sacrifice, and clear heads and pure hearts. Our novelists are suffering from a vision not too keen, but too weak. They lack the larger vision of man as he is, a being made to the image of God, and for all his frailty, the object of a love that is infinite.

Exit Santa Claus ?

A CORRESPONDENT pleads in another column of this issue for the abolition of the Santa Claus myth and urges that instead greater emphasis be laid on the fact that every Christmas gift which comes to young and old, though the givers may not realize it, is inspired by the world's desire to celebrate in this appropriate way the Birthday of Our Divine Saviour, His Blessed Mother's priceless Christmas gift to us. As the only Santa Claus in existence, therefore, is the Christ Child; let all our little ones be taught as early in life as possible that it is He who brings their presents, and that it is His spirit which gives the Christmas season all the peace, joyfulness and good feeling that time out of mind has characterized it. For Christmas is preeminently a religious feast. The very word shows by its derivation that the Feast of the Nativity is, in a special sense, the day of Christ's Mass. Moreover all the religious services held that day even by those sects that no longer believe that Christ is really the Son of God are nevertheless a sort of acknowledgement of His Divinity. Nay, the most violent atheists, whenever they write a date, unconsciously pay homage to Our Lord, for His Birthday marks the high, central point of all chronology. As for Santa Claus, though he is identified in some European countries with St. Nicholas of Myra, on whose feast, December 6, presents are secretly given to children, he has become in this country a highly mythical creature of the nursery who robs the Christ Child of His due honor on Christmas Day.

The substitution of the Christ Child reality for the Santa Claus fable will do away, moreover, with the necessity of little boys and girls sadly abandoning when they grow older their belief in a benevolent, reindeer-driving, chimney-descending old gentleman, who fills good children's stockings with gifts. It is better far that parents should teach their infant sons and daughters that the Divine Child is the source of all the happiness of Christmas. This will also help them to keep in mind the glad reality of the Incarnation, a fact which the modern world prefers to forget. For outside the Church, as we know, Christmas has long been tending to become merely a day of merriment and good cheer, the giving of presents often degenerates into a shrewd business practice, or into a thinly disguised imposition against which "spugs" indignantly protest. One of our modern pagans has written a book in praise of "St. Friend" with the object of robbing December twenty-fifth of its Christian character; many a "Christmas card" nowadays has about it nothing whatever to indicate the sacred nature of the feast. To show the drift of the age in this respect a secular magazine records that last year in a certain Protestant church, all the songs and exercises of a Christmas celebration "proclaimed Santa Claus" only, Our Divine Lord's connection with the festival being quite overlooked. All the more need, then, that Catholics at least should keep the public in mind that Christmas is nothing less than the Birthday of "the World's Ransom, Blessed Mary's Son."

Calumny by Cartoon

A CARTOON is like a newspaper headline. It is brief, striking; it appeals to the eye and the ready emotion. Rarely does it offer an argument to the intellect. But it usually "gets across" with the crowd. Psychologists know the power of a picture in producing a lasting impression. So too do the engineers of the campaign of calumny against the New York private institutions for children. By grace of a New York organ of "uplift," an instrument of the "charity trust" and a beneficiary of the Russell Sage and Carnegie Foundations, these grimy engineers have been accorded another chance to strike a blow against the New York institutions, founded on the principle that charity is a virtue, and not a trade.

In the cartoon, a beam of cheering light has cut across the gloom of the private institution. With a keen sense of humor, the cartoonist indicates that this beam proceeds from that source of ineffable splendor, "The New York City Charities Inquiry." In the broad path of its brilliance, stands a little girl, ragged, unkempt, miserable, her hands raised in supplication, tears rolling down her cheek. This wretched baby is "The City's Ward." She has been rescued from the unspeakable cruelty and neglect of the private institution, by Mr. Charles H. Strong, a knight-errant who by consent, favor and approval of Mr. Homer Folks, the archenemy of the private institutions, was appointed to conduct a fair and impartial investigation of the private institutions.

Decent men can form but one opinion of this cartoon. It embodies as foul a lie as has yet been conceived throughout the whole course of the campaign of calumny. It gives visual form to a lie sent forth by a beneficiary of Carnegie and Russell Sage, against devoted men and women, whose services are freely dedicated to God in His little children. That it will confirm the enemies of the private institutions in their hatred of charity given without price, is the hope of the factions who have inspired this iniquitous assault, as the holy season of peace and good-will draws near. That it can inspire the fair-minded man with any sentiment other than disgust, is unthinkable.

Literature

JUDGE OR IMPRESSIONIST?

"YOU ought to commend more of the books you review," remarked the Candid Mentor to the Harsh Reviewer. "Why are you so chary of praise? Your book-reviews almost lead me to accept that cynical definition of a literary critic: A failure in life who ekes out a precarious living by finding fault with the writings of better men than he. Every book published has something in it, surely, that is good. You could at least say a kind word about the inerrancy of the author's spelling, pay a tribute to the grammatical orthodoxy of his sentences, or dwell upon the correct taste evidenced in the book's cover-design."

"But a literary critic, as I conceive him," rejoined the Harsh Reviewer, "is a stern judge whose high mission it is to 'learn and propagate the best that is known and thought in the world.' When I review a book I bring to bear on it the reasoned exercise of my literary taste. I compare the book with the best works of its kind that I am familiar with, test it by rigorous canons of criticism, then appraise its value accordingly."

"But judicial criticism of that sort has become obsolete," said the Candid Mentor. "Impressionistic reviewing is now in high vogue. The critic's whole duty is to record the effect the book under review has had upon him. He is an investigator, not a judge. He considers the work by itself. Instead of asking what the book ought to be, he inquires what it actually is. He tries to understand what the author aimed at and then determines how well or ill that object was achieved. So a sensitive, sympathetic soul is the modern critic's chief requirement."

"That wonderfully simplifies the reviewer's task, to be sure," admitted the Harsh Reviewer.

"Of course. All he needs to say is something like this: '"The Blue Poppy,"' Ella Spindriff's latest novel, 'I liked very much because it pleasantly brought back to me the days of my innocent childhood, which is the obvious purpose of the book and the author successfully achieves it. You ought to read the story.' He would mercifully forbear, you see, calling the author another George Eliot or Jane Austen, would refrain too from proclaiming the book the most important story of the year, and would even avoid making an elaborate comparison between the volume under review and the author's seven previous books."

"Those latter qualities of the impressionist critic are very attractive ones, I admit, for I am tired of reading every now and then about the new Dickens, Thackeray, Keats, Lamb, or Maupassant that has just been discovered. But what assurance have I that your impressionistic reviewer's opinion of the books he undertakes to appraise is really worth having? Of what value are his 'impressions'? Why, he may be a neurotic person who is violently moved by commonplace trifles. How shall I know what training he has had to fit him for the office of literary critic? Why should I accept as final the judgment of an anonymous impressionist who seems to praise most highly the books brought out by the publishers that advertise most extensively in the periodical he writes reviews for? What guaranty have I that he has even read with any care the books he commends?"

"Absolutely none," answered the Candid Mentor, "except the literary reputation of the magazine in which the reviews appear. But if it comes to that, what guaranty have you for the critical competency of your 'judicial' reviewer?"

"None," admitted the Harsh Reviewer sadly, "save perhaps the internal evidence of the book-review itself, reinforced by my own subsequent judgment of the work criticized."

"Tell me what you would consider the qualifications of an ideal judicial reviewer?"

"The ideal judicial reviewer? Perpend: He would be a man of broad culture, and a specialist too in his field. He would be familiar with the world's masterpieces of literature and would know what the keenest minds have thought of them. He would be able to tell what qualities should be found in perfect examples of the class of books he undertook to criticize and he would have read with discernment the preceding works of the author under review. Our ideal critic, needless to say, would give without fear and without bias his candid opinion of the book in question, and deliver his verdict of course with consummate literary skill."

"Like a cold and merciless Aristarchus, no doubt!" exclaimed the Candid Mentor. "Would your dread 'ideal judicial reviewer' ever be permitted to praise a modern book?"

"O yes," answered the Harsh Critic indulgently, "provided his encomiums were duly restrained. For excessive rigor is hardly the salient defect of the average reviewer in this country today."

"That is true. Fresh novels are exploited for their news value. The fact that a writer of 'best sellers,' after only two months' work, has produced another book; that the first edition of 200,000 copies was exhausted before leaving the press; and that the plot is 'exceptionally daring,' even for this author, are all enlarged upon and emphasized. But of judicial criticism, I must admit, there is precious little."

"That is because both our reviewers and those who are guided by book-notices are in such mortal fear of being thought 'high-brow' and of seeming to appraise a book according to 'obsolete critical rules.' But as Mr. William Crary Brownell well observed in his recent address before the annual meeting of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, nowadays 'terribly little learning is enough to incur the damnatory title of "high-brow."' He then asked very pertinently: "'How are we to have a standard of culture, of solidity, of intellectual seriousness . . . if our public is so given over to the elation of emotion as to frown impatiently on any standard of severity, or, owing to its dread of conventionality, on any standard whatever?'"

"Do you maintain then," asked the Candid Mentor, "that the impressionistic book-reviewer ought to give place to the judicial critic?"

"Not altogether," answered the Harsh Reviewer. "A blending, in the same person, of the qualities of each, with those of the judicial critic strongly predominant, would be best. He could then read with an impressionist's eye, the unconventional output, for example, of the new literary movements, but he would not fail to be judicial in his appraisal of such works. He would always keep in mind for what end each book is written and what its effect would probably be on the average reader. He will not countenance the so-called divorce of literary from ethical beauty, and the stylistic or poetical charm of a book will never blind him to its moral dangers. He will praise heartily when he can, but he will remember that, advertisers and press-agents to the contrary notwithstanding, masterpieces are always few and the best is necessarily rare. He will realize, moreover, that there is a vast deal of worthless and harmful literature scattered broadcast through the land, but good books are seldom adequately published at all. So if the judicial critic can persuade people to read less about poor books, but more of good books, he will admirably discharge his office of propagating 'the best that is known and thought in the world.'"

WALTER DWIGHT, S. J.

REVIEWS

The Boy Scout Movement Applied by the Church. By NORMAN E. RICHARDSON and ORMOND E. LEWIS. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

To all who come in contact with the growing boy, this is probably the most useful book of the year. Despite incidental statements, not essentially affecting the main thesis, it is safe, sane, practical and satisfying. The authors recognize the immense value of proper recreation in supplying the boy with healthy interests at a dangerous period; but they have no countenance for the theory that organized play alone can safeguard morals or shape character. "The boy's morality is insecure, unless it is based on religion." This is the principle upon which the authors have built, and one chapter in particular seems dictated by the spirit of the famous Ignatian meditations on the Two Standards and the Kingdom of Christ. What will restrain the boy, they ask, when, tempted to disregard the voice of conscience, he is aware that "there is little or no danger of being found out?" The answer is, that faithfulness is best secured by an intense loyalty to some model which has awakened the boy's admiration and love.

> A boy needs to be put into intelligent and sympathetic relations with that which he believes to be ultimate truth, love and power....Where can he find a character—a person—who will stand the test of his most severely critical study? There is but one answer to this question. There is only one historic character who can satisfy these demands. It is because Jesus Christ lived a life without moral imperfection....that loyalty to Him makes the highest step in character-building....A boy's imagination needs to be nourished and stimulated along moral lines....It is religion that says to the dreamer: Follow on in the direction of honesty, unselfishness, helpfulness, purity, as far as your imagination can take you, and there you will find Jesus Christ.

That is, the boy must be led to know Christ, his perfect Leader, that out of this knowledge may arise the desire to imitate Him more closely, and to love Him more ardently. That this principle can be applied through religious instruction, and particularly by bringing the boy into touch with his King and his Friend through daily Holy Communion, is the great advantage possessed by the Catholic director. Very properly, the book is not exclusively concerned with the boy's spiritual welfare. The suggestions for the conduct of games, club meetings, "hikes" and camps, are extremely practical and detailed. But the volume is very much more than a professional plea for the Boy Scouts. It is a clear and, for the most part, an acceptable presentation of the philosophy underlying the great work of saving the boy, morally and physically. As such, it is heartily recommended. P. L. B.

Coram Cardinali. By EDWARD BELLASIS. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.25.

In this attractively bound and illustrated volume, the son of that Mr. Serjeant Bellasis who was so closely associated with Newman, records his own recollections of the great convert. The author attended the Oratory School, knew the Cardinal intimately, and has here set down many an anecdote that brings out the charm and beauty of Newman's character. In his first chapter the author treats of "Cardinal Newman as a Musician," and tells how fond he was of playing Beethoven on the violin. Faber's "Eternal Years," in Newman's opinion, is a better hymn than is his own "Lead, Kindly Light." The former hymn, he said, "is one with full light, rejoicing in suffering with Our Lord, so that mine compares unfavorably with it."

The wealth of reminiscences in the chapter called "Obiter Scripta" makes the Cardinal's amiable personality very real. We are told just how he preached, said Mass., and read the Gospel, what pictures adorned his rooms, and what his literary preferences were. He considered "David Copperfield" Dickens's best novel; "The Deserted Village" "one of the most beautiful poems in the English language"; for power of words, he preferred Dryden even to Shakespeare; and acknowledged his own indebtedness for style to Cicero's "Academics." The author also has some delightful pages on Newman as a converser. The Cardinal liked to talk with those who were simple, natural and unaffected, and he had no wish to be always arguing. Mr. Bellasis writes:

> Here is one who for all his genius is the last to look down upon you for not being clever, or learned, or a coiner of "unreal words," and you, eschewing airs of any kind, may be rewarded or startled on a visit by, "As they say sometimes in America, I guess I'm chock," or "We've had enough of (so and so's) gooseberry"; or be condoled with over confusion about curacoa or maraschino, "I never know which it is"; or be playfully put at your ease, when he was engaged, with, "No doubt you will be here long enough to be interviewed," or be quietly paid out, if you half praised a thing, with a playful, "Of course, we know they didn't do so well as when you were in it"; or hear slyly interjected the disturbing question, "How about oyster soup?" in the midst of a learned dissertation on vegetarianism by his brother, an expert on the subject; or see a country caller, a Nonconformist minister, confounded with charitable service by his Eminence kneeling to wipe his boots with a handkerchief.

The two other chapters in "Coram Cardinali" give Newman's "Impressions of Heaven in Infancy and Age" and describe his "Mediterranean Voyage." W. D.

An Introduction to Economics. By FRANK O'HARA, PH.D. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.00.

In style and general arrangement of matter, this volume by the Associate Professor of Economics at the Catholic University, is a model among text-books. It is clear, concise in statement, and fairly comprehensive. To have attained this within the compass of 260 pages, is a notable triumph. The chapters on Wages, Labor, Supply and Demand, Single Tax and Socialism, are particularly good. While brief, they contain an admirable statement of the fundamental principles involved, and the manner in which the application of these principles to concrete facts is indicated, will stimulate the student to private investigation and research.

The concluding chapter, "Practical Economic Problems," will, of course, be very largely appraised in the light afforded by the particular school of thought favored by the critic. Dr. O'Hara takes "the activity of the State" in the economic field "for granted," and frankly disavows any sympathy "with the school of economic thought which would attempt to assign the State simply the role of policeman in economic affairs, with the duty merely of preserving order among the contestants in the economic struggle." Probably there are few today who would advocate the position of the school rightly condemned by Dr. O'Hara; on the other hand, there are many who seem utterly blind to the real and serious danger inseparable from the plan of State-control, in many departments of human activity, insistently urged by powerful influences at the present time. It need not be said that Dr. O'Hara would find himself quite out of sympathy with these plausible extremists, for there is no room in his philosophy for a State either servile or tyrannical. Yet, while perhaps inevitable, it is to be regretted that "the plan of the present volume," precluded an incisive criticism from his pen, of the modern social factors which tend to exalt the State, at the peril of crushing proper individual initiative and activity. An excellent addition to the bibliography of the final chapter would be the Leonine Encyclicals "On the Condition of the Working Classes," and "On the Christian Constitutions of States." P. L. B.

The Golden Book of the Dutch Navigators. By HENDRICK WILLEM VAN LOON. New York: The Century Co. $2.50.

The history of Holland is the story of the conquest of the sea. To the adventurous spirit of her intrepid mariners does that originally "small mud-bank along the North Sea" owe her mightiness as a commonwealth, which even today, after the lapse of two centuries, proudly holds her own among the nations. Though the Spaniards and Portuguese had discovered and, to their undying honor, had brought the light of civilization to many distant parts of the world almost two centuries before the Dutch navigators sailed forth in search of the romantic adventures described in this book, to these latter we owe not only the discovery of Spitzbergen and many new islands in the Arctic, but also the first reliable information about the impracticability of the north-east passage. To them is due the finding of a new route to the Pacific and the charting of its southern part. They made the first scientific inspection of the Australian continent and discovered New Zealand, Tasmania and a number of new islands in the Indian Ocean. Moreover, they established settlements in North and South America, in Asia and Africa, besides getting into relation with Japan and China.

These Dutch navigators were men of an invincible spirit. Those who equipped their expeditions died in the poorhouse, and those who took part in the voyages sacrificed their lives "as cheerfully as they lighted a new pipe." The book is attractively written save for an occasional reference to Almighty God that is wanting in reverence. The author's work would have gained in value had he oftener referred readers to his sources. The assertion that the state of Portugal in the sixteenth century was "rotten," needs much support, while the statement that the Jesuits in Japan "smiled pleasantly upon the Dutch visitors" and at the same time foully betrayed them is far from the truth. A. H. R.

The Tide of Immigration. By FRANK JULIAN WARNE, A.M., Ph.D. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $2.50.

The author of this volume upon immigration has made careful studies of his subject under the most advantageous conditions. As a special expert on foreign-born population he was connected with the thirteenth United States Government census and held the position of secretary in the New York State Commission of Immigration. Whether readers agree with his conclusions or not, it must be owned that he has gathered together many of the important facts and figures upon which a consideration of this question must be based. The analogy suggested by the title of his book is sustained in chapter after chapter. The great tide of humanity, as he sees it pouring in upon our shores and again receding, is for him like the flow and ebb of the ocean, and no less clearly subject to definite laws which can be accurately ascertained. "It has its neap tides, its flood tides, its tidal waves, and its overflows and inundations. It has its tide channels by means of which it gains entrance to this country. It has its tide gates, its tide-rip, its tide mills, its tide basin." Much of this immigration, as he shows, is artificial and stimulated by those who make of it a colossal business enterprise, regardless of the welfare of the immigrant or of the country. "It cannot be too often emphasized," he writes, "that immigration of today, for the greater part, is dislodged from its European moorings primarily by self-constituted and unregulated promoters who stimulate an unnatural outflow into this country." He is an ardent advocate of the literacy test, upon which point many will disagree with him; but he believes it to be the best available practical means of "protecting our country, our people, and our democratic institutions from the very serious dangers that are now attacking all three through the excessive volume of immigration." J. H.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Newly ordained priests and young men who are preparing for the priesthood will find sensible and practical counsel in "The Seminarian, His Character and Work" (Kenedy, $0.75), an attractive little book written by the Rev. Albert Rung, a priest of the Buffalo diocese. The practices suggested by the author are for the most part those that can and should be continued after leaving the seminary and are based on a thorough knowledge of conditions in this country today. He insists, for example, on the high importance of perfect manners in the priest. Under such headings as Prayer, Obedience, Fraternal Love, Study, etc., Father Rung dwells upon the solid virtues that should grace the priesthood and he has excellent chapters on vocation and on the dignity of the priestly state.

Michael Wood, the High Church Anglican whose "mystical" stories have been noticed in AMERICA, has lately written a good novel called "The Penitent of Brent" (Longmans, $1.35). Jesse Cameron, its central character, believed himself an unconvicted patricide as did his spiritual director, Father Standish, too. So he set the young man a penance that would make a Novatian rejoice. With incredible meekness Jesse accepted the penance and was rewarded in the end by finding peace for his soul. The chief persons in the tale have a vision or two and behave for the most part like real Catholics. Monica, Jesse's beautiful sister, becomes a nun and there is a gratifying atmosphere of other-worldliness pervading the entire story.

Here are some Christmas books for children: "The Know About Library" (Dutton, $2.00), in twenty small volumes, and "The Owlet Library" (Dutton, $1.00), in ten, are based on the same plan, for each volume has a varied set of colored pictures to be pasted in by the child, where text and numbers tell him they belong.——"The Way to the House of Santa Claus" (Harper, $1.00), by Frances Hodgson Burnett, is illustrated in blacks, blues, yellows and reds laid on in masses. The story will amuse the little folks.——"The Golden Apple: A Play for Kiltartan Children" (Putnam, $1.75), by Lady Gregory, is dedicated to George Bernard Shaw, and is dull reading, but the quaint pictures in color by Margaret Gregory are diverting. The exciting adventures of Flash, "The Clever Mouse" (Paul Elder, San Francisco, $0.50), are described in separately bound chapters, which children are solemnly enjoined to read on six consecutive days.

Twenty-five short-sermons preached during the past twenty-five years by the Rev. Joseph Gordian Daley of Haydenville, Mass., have been gathered into a volume "as a jubilee memorial" under the title "An Altar Wreath" (Thomas J. Flynn & Co., Boston, $1.25). "These simple moral talks," the author explains, "were delivered for the main part in country and suburban parishes, where a stranger's voice was always appreciated and welcome." The clear and practical discourses are well arranged under the captions: "With the Saints," "With the Year," "With the Master," "With the World" and "With the Home." They are dedicated to Bishop Beaven and have as a frontispiece a portrait of Father Daley.——The importation of a volume of "Sermons on Various Occasions" (Herder, $1.80) by the Very Rev. Dr. Keane, O. P., a well-known Irish preacher, will win him admirers on this side of the Atlantic too. His series of conferences on "The Church" and on "The Christian Character" is especially stimulating.

"Refining Fires" (Kenedy, $0.75), by Alice Dease, is a Catholic novel of the conventional type. Ruined, because his trusted servant has played away his fortune, M. de Barli is abandoned by his relatives at the same time his wealth goes. By pardoning the offender, he merits a legacy at the proper moment to rescue his proud relatives from the poverty into which they were falling. The story is directed against gambling, and shows the power of adversity to purge away sinfulness.——"A Drake by George!" (Knopf, $1.50) by John Trevena, is a comedy of real good-humor. It is a rare collection of odd characters, embracing bluff old Captain Drake, queer as his curiosities, collected from all parts of the world, his wife, who willed her property to all of her relatives and servants, her sister who forgets the things that happen and remembers the things that do not. These and many other amusing characters are continually plotting scenes that furnish a pleasant hour of reading.

The poetry in "Responsibilities" (Macmillan, $1.25), William Butler Yeats's latest volume of verse, is by no means the best he has written. There is music in such lines as

> For men were born to pray and save,
> Romantic Ireland's dead and gone,
> It's with O'Leary in the grave,

but the Wordsworthian title of the following quotation, really seems to have in it almost as much poetry as the verses themselves:

ON HEARING THAT THE STUDENTS OF OUR NEW UNIVERSITY HAVE JOINED THE ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS AND THE AGITATION AGAINST IMMORAL LITERATURE.

> Where, where but here have Pride and Truth,
> That long to give themselves for wage,
> To Shake their wicked sides at youth,
> Restraining reckless middle-age.

"Multitude and Solitude" (Macmillan, $1.35), which is a reprint of an old novel by John Masefield, although written in the form of a story, is really an intensive study of certain moods of solitude, experienced in the heart of London and the heart of Africa. The most beautiful part of the book is the persistent but illusive presence on almost every page of a pure woman, who, though dead, lives in the thoughts of the man who loved her, lifting his ideals, chastening his thoughts, and nerving him to noble action.——In "The Old Blood" (Dodd, Mead, $1.40), a novel of considerable interest but of mediocre power, Mr. Frederick Palmer, who does not admire the Germans much, introduces two girls, both of whose names begin with H and whose voices are so exactly alike as to deceive their own friends. Complications of course ensue, in which Helen and Henriette play a large part. The European war breaks out and Philip Sanford volunteers to fight for the Allies. He is so badly wounded that he becomes blind and deaf, but is brought back to normality chiefly by the devoted care of one of the girls. But he still loves war as did his ancestors and will always feel the call of "The Old Blood."

"A Volunteer Poilu" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25) tells what Mr. Henry Sheahan saw and heard of the great war while ministering to the French wounded in the field service of the American Ambulance. Unfortunately, however, for the purpose of the book, which no doubt is to give a living picture of the sad havoc of war, the author has not succeeded in disguising his character of a one-time student of English at Harvard, or the precepts which he learned at the friendly hearth of Hollis '17 from his "dear Copey," Professor Copeland, to whom the book is dedicated. The dainty touches of description, a little at a time, might well adorn the choice pages of the Atlantic Monthly, but a whole book of such conscious writing conceals more than it reveals of the real deep pathos of war.——"Ambulance No. 10" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.00), by Leslie Buswell, another member of the American Ambulance Service, is on the contrary a real transcript of experiences at the French front of the great war. The personal letters, which make up the volume, were written to a friend in Gloucester, Mass., without any thought of publication. Reading them is as if you were seeing the scenes themselves seated beside the writer on his ambulance.

Proprium de tempore, now that Our Lady's feast is drawing near, are these stanzas "Ad Virginem" which Mr. Shane Leslie has contributed to the Ave Maria:

> Great praise hath Lady Mary won
> For that she bare God's gotten Son,
> According unto Gabriel's word
> At Angelus most meekly heard.
>
> The sun is all her cloth for dress,
> And stars enshrine her loveliness;
> Nor needeth she of mortal shoon
> Whose feet are girded with the moon!
>
> The Lady Mary hath a crown
> Like to a jewel-crusted town;
> And, like a living halo shed,
> The eye of God illumes her head.

The following well-rhymed "Prayer," which should help to make kinder those who say it, is taken from Paul Elder's "Impressions Calendar" for 1917:

> Let me be a little kinder,
> Let me be a little blinder
> To the faults of those about me,
> Let me praise a little more;
> Let me be when I am weary
> Just a little bit more cheery—
> Let me serve a little better
> Those that I am striving for.
>
> Let me be a little braver
> When temptation bids me waver.
> Let me strive a little harder
> To be all that I should be;
> Let me be a little meeker
> With the brother who is weaker.
> Let me think more of my neighbor
> And a little less of me.

A notable contribution to the November-December number of the Poetry Review, the excellent magazine published by Erskine MacDonald, London, is James Mackereth's critical paper entitled "Songs in the Whirlwind." After observing that "the war is apt to distort, in the minds of those who do not actually participate, conceptions of those great and sweet realities by which we live, and of which poetry is the spirit and breath," he proceeds to appraise the work of half-a-dozen young poets. He likes Egbert Sandford's stanzas:

> In the spirit that doth foster,
> Kindly thought for flocks and herds,
> I will covet me the honor
> Of the Knighthood of the birds.
>
> And, whatever else life offers,
> Scarce contented can I be
> Till the Order of the Children
> I have seen conferred on me.

He also quotes with approval several of Theodore Maynard's poems that AMERICA's readers have seen in these pages and he admires the following description of "Humility" by Gilbert Thomas:

> She walks not with uncertain gait,
> Nor hangs her head in shame,
> She knows her strength, if small or great,
> And honors her own name
>
> She kneels before no image rude.
> God is her only law,
> Her altar is Infinitude,
> And there she bows in awe.

EDUCATION

Another La Salle

WHILE we have in English a few sound and practical works where the principles of Catholic pedagogy are explained, there is a dearth of plain and simple biographies of eminent Catholic teachers of modern times. In the light of the adage, "Long and tedious is the way to learning through lesson and precept, short and practical through example," the deficiency is to be deplored. Such examples and models, we think, can easily be found. For hidden away in the quiet of convent walls and the retirement of our colleges and universities, there have undoubtedly been in the ranks of Catholic teachers, men and women whose methods and pedagogical skill deserve to be studied for their own intrinsic worth and for the benefit of others. Such a record would be a practical course in education and would bring to light the unselfish services to science, art, literature and society of that numerous army whose brave soldiers are devoting their energies and their lives to the formation of youth. It would at the same time be a valuable addition to our apologetical literature and answer many of the difficulties and objections brought against us.

JAMES DOMINIC BURKE

THE writer who, under the modest title of a "Christian Brother," has described for us "A Century of Catholic Education" (Browne & Nolan), has understood this. If his volume should serve no other purpose than that of saving from oblivion the name of Brother James Dominic Burke, it would win our gratitude. For this spiritual son of Edmund Ignatius Rice, the Founder of the Irish Christian Brothers, must be considered one of the great educators of the nineteenth century. And the "Series" which describes the lives and the methods of such teachers and leaders as Alcuin, Ignatius of Loyola, Pestalozzi, Froebel and their peers, will be sadly incomplete, if at some future time, it does not contain the story of this large-hearted and clear-sighted Irishman, whose Monastery Schools, at Cork, were the wonder of all who visited them and in some ways were years ahead of similar institutions in England and on the Continent.

From the moment when in 1852, James Dominic Burke, then a mere stripling of eighteen, became a Christian Brother, until his death in March, 1904, his life was one of unceasing toil, of unstinted and unusually intelligent devotion to the cause of Catholic education. The success which crowned his labors and those of his brethren must be reckoned from the spiritual, social and pedagogical standpoint, a splendid achievement.

A PRACTICAL TEACHER

THAT this noble disciple of La Salle and the sainted Edward Ignatius Rice was first and foremost a religious teacher, it is unnecessary to prove. He was a born educator and with keen and unerring instinct went straight to the heart of things. He realized that above all else, it is the soul of the child that must be developed and purified and that in such an important task, the only solid foundation is that which is laid deep and strong in the knowledge, love and service of God. When asked the secret of the scholastic success of his pupils, which puzzled Royal Commissioners and Inspectors, he replied "Religion."

He used to say that the fairest things God had made were flowers and children. The former he loved with a poet's fervor, the latter with the tenderness and the manly strength of a wise and prudent father. To this tenderness, he joined a keen perception of the needs of his children. These were generally the children of the toiler, the tradesman, the artisan, the poor. He realized how necessary it was to adapt his instruction to the social and material conditions in which his pupils would have to live. Gifted with the lively imagination of the Celt, an artist in temperament and in his realization of the beautiful, he was no inefficient theorist or idle dreamer. He was practical and progressive. In his view, education must consider man's spiritual needs paramount in importance to everything else. But it should also prepare him to become a useful and efficient member of society. While teaching the lads of Cork, who, like genuine Celts, troubled little about the morrow, Brother Burke looked ahead for them into the future, and put into their hands the instruments which later on they would have to employ.

One of the first to use electric light for illuminating purposes in Cork, he was an ardent believer in scientific and material progress, in efficiency and organization, in the use of all those methods and weapons which science with lavish generosity was, so to say, thrusting into the hands of the men of the nineteenth century. The times had gone by, he realized, when mere book-learning would win the battles of life. He saw a new field open and was one of the first in Ireland to thrust the plow into its soil and open the furrows. He introduced technical training into its schools. Wood-carving, brass and iron-turning, silk and linen-spinning, printing, electroplating, lithographic printing in colors, to mention but a few items, were studied in the Monastery Schools and the perfection of the output astonished all. Brother Burke was lecturer, demonstrator, jack of all trades, yet master of all.

A PROGRESSIVE CITIZEN

IN 1897 Brother Burke explained his views to the Education Commission with regard to the program for the National Schools. He insisted strongly on the essentials, the time-honored R's. But he believed that the keenly-intellectual lads of Ireland were capable of accomplishing far more. He had a deep trust in the powers and the gifts of his countrymen. For instance he strongly advocated lessons in drawing and considered them of the highest pedagogic value, for they cultivated the taste, developed powers of accurate observation, taught habits of neatness and order.

The venerable headmaster of the Cork schools was also one of the pioneers of scientific agriculture in his native land. At the Cork Exhibition, he suggested a plan now followed by our "corn trains" and "cotton trains" sent out by the Department of Agriculture to educate our farmers. He proposed that expert agriculturalists be sent throughout Ireland to instruct the peasants and dairymen in the care of their stock, in the best methods of feeding and housing cattle, in the latest improved dairy devices, the patent-churn, the lactometer, in the nature and properties of the soil, in the diseases of plants and their remedies.

SOCIALIZING EDUCATION

THIS great Christian Brother loved education in all its phases. He saw the advantages which it procures for the mind, heart and soul of the individual. But he had a secondary end in view. The magic phrase "Social Service" he may not have heard or used. But if ever there was a social worker in the nobler meaning of the term it was this modern La Salle. "The social and moral uplifting of the workingman by means of education was his pet project," and his biographer tells us that his zeal, enthusiasm and ability enabled him to help materially in its accomplishment. He sought to dignify the lot of the tradesman and the toiler. His schools were not only halls where during a few hours of the day, pupils conned their lessons and listened to his teaching and that of his able and equally unselfish brethren, they became the social center of the city.

Without knowing it the Irish educator was using the best and most available part of that Gary system of which we have heard so much in the past year. In his opinion the people, if rightly taught could rise out of their narrow sphere, their minds could be lifted beyond the restricted range of their daily tasks. He had confidence in their abilities to seize the truths of art, science and literature, provided they were brought before them in a way suited to their intelligence and their needs. He thought that the people had a right to the very best that his talents, his time and his heart could give. Hence his loyalty to them and his constant endeavors to improve their social standing. He was opposed to social and educational stagnation.

For the purpose he had in view, he employed the very means which now we consider as peculiar to our own educational improved methods. Industrial and technical museums, where textiles, machinery, scientific apparatus, geological specimens, mechanical models were exposed and explained by competent experts, lectures in which he was not afraid to bring home to his beloved children, old and young, the principles of architecture and music, lessons of history from his own native land and the ancient and modern world, principles of domestic economy and sanitation given in popular form, were some of the means which he employed. He was a believer in educational efficiency and an enemy of educational waste. The Monastery Schools thus became a kind of popular university, within whose halls all were welcome, especially the poor and the worker. They attracted wide attention. Visitors of such varied views as the Duke of Leinster, John Mitchel, Earls Spencer and Cadogan, Lord Haughton, Sir John Gorst, Messrs. Goschen and Asquith and Lady Aberdeen expressed their admiration for their work and their methods.

James Dominic Burke belongs to the fine race of Fénélon, La Salle, Vittorino da Feltre, Démia and St. Vincent de Paul. While teaching others the ways to science, truth and holiness he embodied in his saintly life the noble lessons he gave. He was a worthy successor of the Rices, the Leonards, the Wisemans and the Duggans, his fathers and brothers in religion. In him the Church and his native land had a tender and loving son and the cause of Catholic education an enlightened and devoted champion.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Saving the Boy

"WHAT shall we do with the growing boy?" is beyond all doubt one of the most insistent and thorny questions of the day. To find a satisfactory answer is a task to perplex Solomon. Like the poor, the boy is always with us. We cannot give him away, we cannot in some Christian Science frame of mind deny him an objective existence, and it is against the law to kill him. Besides, modern efficiency engineers have taught us to save the scraps; and apart from this valuable lesson, we have a notion, that even as tarantulas, cyclones, plagues and water-spouts occupy a niche in the ordered scheme of things, so too the boy may serve some worthy but unsuspected purpose, in the vast variety of beings necessary to a complete cosmos.

ARM-CHAIR PLANS

BUT no plan excogitated in an arm-chair, to the purr of a cat and the song of a kettle on the hob, by some slippered pantaloon who has forgotten that he ever was a boy, will save the situation. To indulge in a statement, bromidic to all who have dealt with the tender yet tough stripling, you must take the boy as he is, not as you think he ought to be. By his variety, the boy contributes no small share to the store of the world's spice. It follows then, that you are asked to shape the fortunes of a being, that with bewildering rapidity, can pass from the quiescent stage typified by the little chorister who pipes and looks like an angel, to a shrieking engine of noise and destruction, most like a juggernaut running amuck on the Bowery. To save the postage-stamps of all esteemed correspondents, I will here set down my complete persuasion that a juggernaut cannot run amuck. Also, I am quite sure that although there were and are many odd things on the Bowery, a juggernaut was never found among them; much less a juggernaut amuck. But I have a weakness for mixed figures and inaccurate allusions. Having thus made all plain, I may be permitted to proceed.

THE PROTEAN BOY

I DO not know how the statement may approve itself to the medical men, but to me, a boy seems a being of much bubbling, but quickly exhausted physical energy, very like a siphon of vichy. How he finds an outlet for his charged energy is illustrated by the crowd playing under my window as I type these lines. They are chasing one another about the street; they run, they dodge, they shout; they suddenly embrace, and thus locked, shoulder against shoulder, they roll about on the pavement. One youngster for sheer exuberance of spirit, and with no point of the game to gain, has just drop-kicked his cap across the street, while another is belaboring the shoulders of a laughing companion, with a folded bunch of old newspapers. So far as I can see, there is no definite plan in their movements. They are simply "working off steam." Rather, they are fulfilling a wise provision for the race's welfare. The heady sap of life is rising in their young bodies, as in the slender shoots in the springtime. Nature calls them to aid her in her work; to stretch the limb, to flex the muscle, to set the blood full coursing through vein and artery, to coordinate mind with body; and this play that seems so meaningless and uncouth is the unconscious response that nature asks. In a few moments, the choir-director will summon this boisterous crowd into the "Parish House." There in ictu oculi, will they be transformed into the choristers of the Easter cards, when like angels who from heaven have somehow wandered into Manhattan's unfamiliar scenes, they blend with the music found only in the throat of a boy, the seraphic melody of Elgar's O Salutaris.

THE PURPOSE OF PLAY

THE growing boy simply must have his games. They are not a charity, not a grant by gracious condenscension, but for all, save the rare exception, a physiological and a psychological necessity. Deprive him of them, and you undertake to strive against nature. An explosion is sure to follow. Under the special favor of Heaven, the explosion will react only on the boy's bodily health; but in most instances, the damage will be mental as well, and in nearly all cases, perils to morality will fill the gap, caused by the enforced absence of proper recreation. It was not without good reason that St. Philip Neri set the smudgy gamins of Rome's crowded quarters, singing and playing in his courtyard. Complaints followed fast from pious Fathers composing homilies for the edification of the Faithful, and from learned scholars in the community, perhaps from Baronius himself, then engaged in literary works that are miracles of patient research and accurate erudition. No doubt they had their justification; doubtless, too, the Father Superior, who loved cats and such small deer as well as boys, found a way of satisfying all parties to the contention. "But," said this great Saint, who anticipated by centuries the best in what is deemed modern boy-culture, "I would let them chop wood on my back, if that served to amuse them, and keep them away from harm." It is a pity that St. Philip does not count a larger number of modern imitators. Too many of the wise and great still find their model in the good little boy, who never plays noisy games, and always washes behind his ears.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS AND "GYMS"

THE boy is going to seek and find amusement. That is as sure as taxes. Where will he find it on New York's East Side, for instance, or on the East Side of your own city? I am not quite sure that, taking conditions as they are, a gymnasium would not be far better for his spiritual profit, than a Sunday school. The Sunday school he will probably not attend, holding it "too slow"; but a properly equipped and managed gymnasium will attract him and his kind, as a barrel of molasses draws flies. Then, it may be, in time you can induce him to enter the adjoining parish school or failing this happy ending, you may exercise some degree of influence upon him, beginning by teaching the spirit of "squareness" and self-restraint, so necessary in organized play. This may not be a great deal, but it is an opening, and it is precisely what the boy needs. Grace builds on nature. At present, this youngster is a pupil attached to Public School No. 45. He finds his amusement either in back-alleys, or at the splendid Star of Hope Settlement House, where well-trained, zealous and upright men and women probably regard him as a neglected little papist brand, to be snatched at an opportune time from the burning. Of course, our young brother ought not to be doing any of these things, but he is doing them. It is well to deal, now and then, with actualities. The only question, or at least, the first question that seems appropriate here is, "What are we doing for him, besides telling him to don't?"

Aureate Dreams

WERE I that mythical being akin to the unicorn, a Catholic priest with a million dollars at his disposal, I should put it all in the hands of a wise man, to build me a parochial school and a settlement house. With these erected and in good working order, I should modestly announce myself as a person notoriously fit to receive another million dollars for the purpose of endowment. I take it for granted that no Catholic is so foolish as to suppose that a boy can be saved by a school or a gymnasium. There is One alone who is the way, the truth, the life; our hope, our model, our salvation, and He is Jesus Christ, who speaks to us and gives Himself to us, in His Church. But first you must catch your boy, if you wish to save him, preventing the devil. St. Paul talked philosophy on the Hill of Mars, exhibited to recalcitrant Jews his mastery of the law of Israel, quoted the poets to those who prized them, boasted that he was a Roman citizen or a vessel of election, as he thought the assertion more opportune; and built a fire and suggested breakfast, to hearten the spirits of a shipwrecked crew. We can adopt and adapt some of his methods, even if we can never equal his unquenchable zeal. The boy's response to an intellectual appeal is negligible. His emotions, such as they are, are calculated to answer to stimuli of a totally different kind. He may react to a carefully induced religious motive, but there is danger, I think, in asking the boy always to walk the path of sacrifice. He begins to regard his religion as a handicap, and becomes more easily the prey of the proselyter. If we cannot make our catechism classes, and their adjuncts, interest the boy who needs our help, let us try a football.

Present Opportunities

TO dream of a million dollars is, after all, only a dream. Dreams are worth while, only when they point the way, and stimulate to present action. Until our millions come to us from the stewards of the poor, all of us, in our own way and sphere, can help towards the consummation devoutly to be desired: the alignment of every force in every parish in the United States, for the salvation of the boy in danger, and of his sister. We can help directly by cooperating, readily and generously, with every Catholic boy-saving agency in the community. The Parish School Association, the Ozanam clubs, the St. Vincent de Paul Society, and the sodalities, are associations which will gratefully receive, and use to the best advantage, any assistance you give them. What are you doing to help them in their work of making the boy in danger, a useful citizen and a practical Catholic? Paul L. Blakely, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Millions of "Water"

THE news letter of the American Federation of Labor calls attention to the first results of the La Follette physical valuation law to ascertain the value of railroad properties as a basis for rate-making. In the commission's report on the Texas Midland and the Atlanta, Birmingham and Atlantic Railroads, the latter is described as a system with 444 miles of single track and capitalized at $35,000,000. According to a conservative estimate the road could be reproduced for $22,716,886, while its value, less depreciation, is $18,071,930. Taking account of leases, the present value is put at $24,154,998. Interpreting this condition the news letter says: "This means that over $10,000,000 worth of 'water' has been poured into this property." Other interpretations might be offered, but the fact remains that "watering" has been one of the most effective means by which some of our capitalists have acquired enormous fortunes.

A Grim Tale of War

A WRITER in the Christian Herald for November 22, 1916, is authority for the statement that there are 25,287,000 destitute people in the war zone, divided as follows:

The Armenian Dispersion	1,175,000
Northern France	2,112,000
East Prussia	1,500,000
Albania	1,500,000
Belgium	3,000,000
Poland	11,000,000
Serbia	5,000,000

As a large number of these unfortunate men, women and children are Catholics, it is hoped that some of their more fortunate fellows in the Faith will come to their assistance by contributing to the Holy Father's fund for their relief.

The Ten Commandments in Public Schools

"TWENTY million children in the United States do not attend church or Sunday school, and have no opportunity for religious training; fifteen million children between the ages of five and twenty years have never been to Sunday school at all." Such, according to the Denver Catholic Register, is the statement made by the Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, Superintendent of the International Reform Bureau. In an attempt to find a partial remedy for these conditions the Board of Education of the District of Columbia recently accepted the plan suggested by Dr. Crafts of placing upon the wall of each class room a chart displaying the Ten Commandments, "the same to be those accepted by representatives of twenty-six denominations, including Gentiles and Jews." The effort to hold back by a scroll the wave of paganism that threatens to sweep over the country is pathetic. Of what value are the Ten Commandments if the child has no knowledge of the authority on which they rest and the sanction which accompanies them? The stone tables of Moses himself would not be sufficient to save the land without proper religious training, and this, with rare exceptions, is given in the Catholic school alone.

Divorce in Chicago

AFTER an extensive study of official records, the head of the Chicago social service department has submitted a report on divorce, to the city authorities. The present state of affairs is summed up in the sentence, "The divorce problem is becoming more serious in Chicago every day." In 1914, one couple were divorced to every ten married; in 1915 the proportion was one divorce to eight marriages. During the month of October, 1916, the proportion was one to six, the actual figures being 634 divorces and 3,203 marriages. So lightly is the legal process held, that many of the divorces appear to have been granted, either without complete evidence, or in the ignorance of one of the parties that the suit was being prosecuted. "Statistics show," says the Chicago Tribune, "that during the last two years, ninety per cent of the divorces have been granted by default, those who were sued failing to appear in court."

> Thus in many cases there was no corroboration of the evidence. There is also a possibility of connivance between the litigants, a practice forbidden by law. The same figures show that in forty per cent of the cases, the defendants were notified by publication only. There is no doubt that in some cases, the defendants did not even know they were being sued.

Among the suggestions made by the investigator is that an assistant State attorney be made a party in all divorce cases. The proposal, if carried into effect, would no doubt be found useful in detecting collusion between parties seeking divorce, and would at least lessen the legalized concubinage which disgraces the United States. But the real remedy lies in subscribing to the principles of the only Church in Christendom which has the courage to take an uncompromising stand against this great social evil.

Religious Apathy in Brooklyn

AS a result of a series of investigations into some of the manifestations of religious apathy in Brooklyn, the Reverend William Carter, D.D., pastor of one of the prominent Presbyterian congregations, has come to the conclusion that the City of Churches may no longer with any justice be called a city of churchgoers. Beginning with Greater New York he said:

> There are in the City of New York over 1,125,000 Protestants who belong to no church. There are so many Protestants who attend a church only when the weather isn't fit for golfing, that a minister rejoices when a sort of gray day comes; he knows it is then that he can count on a better audience. The number who go to church occasionally and have no affiliations with the church are double the church membership. But if there are many who do not attend services regularly, it is even more significant that there are 955,000 who never darken the church door at all, who have no church affiliation, and who apparently have no thought of Jesus Christ or everlasting life.

Passing on to Brooklyn's share of these figures, he declared that at "a most conservative estimate" over 125,000 Protestants in the Borough of Queens never attend religious services. The Borough of Queens, he finds, is considerably worse off than Manhattan, it has more registered voters, but 100,000 less Protestant church members. Of its 388,000 children in public and private schools only one-half, 194,000, are receiving religious instruction in Sunday schools, and this number represents the combined enrolment in the Sunday schools of the Catholics, Jewish and Protestant churches. It is to be assumed that these figures are substantially correct; but if this be the case, the religious outlook for the Protestant Church in Brooklyn is far from bright. On the other hand it is a matter for thanksgiving that the Catholic Church in Brooklyn is rapidly growing. In a very real sense it has become under the present bishop the diocese of Catholic churches.

"Fellow Revolutionists"

THE I. W. W. has at last succeeded in securing a public building for its meetings. With the genial salutation, "Fellow Revolutionists," the noted I. W. W. propagandist, spurner of the American flag, and pastor of the Church of the Revolution, Bouck White, recently greeted an audience of 1,500 men and women who had gathered at Civic Forum, Public School No. 84, in Brooklyn. He declared he had come with a message of joy for revolutionists. It consisted in foretelling a new war, sixty times as horrible as the present. He beheld the United States arrayed in it against the entire world and he reveled in the thought of the destruction that would ensue. Describing his speech the Brooklyn Daily Eagle wrote:

> He predicted the next great step in military progress, the artificial cultivation of disease germs as a means of destruction. The deadly chlorine gases now being used were going to give way to squirts of infantile paralysis germs, cholera, cancer and bubonic plague bacteria. He saw the skies giving off deadly fumes and the hills and mountains belching fire and lava. It was going to mean the destruction of civilization and the depopulation of the world. Nothing can stop that war from coming, and it is most desirable that it should not be stopped, according to Bouck White. For a few minutes the pastor indulged in a little swearing and damning.
>
> He said he had not voted, but wished Mr. Hughes elected because that would have hastened even more quickly the destruction of humanity. He guaranteed immortality to all who would enlist in the army of the Social Revolution and hasten the destruction of the civilization of today, that it might give way to the new order of things according to the mind of Bouck White. The meeting was conducted by the president of the Civic Forum who appreciated the allusion to all present as "fellow revolutionists."

A Methodist Comment on "Pastor Russell"

THE death of "Pastor Russell," the preacher of the Millenial Dawn, is commented upon in the Christian Advocate, a Methodist organ. The paper believes that probably the greatest proportion of his following was drawn from the Methodist Church. His Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society flooded the land with literature and won for him a number of adherents who were known as "The International Bible Students' Association."

> Their leader, who made the highest claims to scholarship, lacked even a college education. Though he used the title of "pastor," he was never ordained by any religious body. He is said to have accumulated a fortune in the peculiar business in which he was engaged: namely, relieving people of their uncomfortable beliefs regarding the future life.
>
> "Pastor" Russell ought to have held a chair of advertising. His mastery of the arts of publicity made him one of the best known men in America. Charlatan as he was, a parasite on Christianity, a perverter of truth, and a maligner of the Church, he floated to notoriety and possibly wealth, on a tide of printer's ink. Comparatively few knew him by sight, or had ever heard his voice; but his name, his likeness, his "syndicated" sermons were thrust under everybody's eye. No nostrum or its concocter was so intrusively advertised. The secret of this triumph of religious quackery, apart from his publicity bureau, is traceable to the willingness of people to give a hearing to men who prophesy pleasant things. This man's theology was untenable, judged by reasoning, or by the Scriptures to which he so shrewdly resorted for confirmation. It was a patchwork of notions based on isolated and wrested passages. But it appealed to weak and worldly humanity by roseate promises of future probation or oblivion. They listened to his words, read his books, and even bought his "miracle wheat."

After reflecting upon the thirst for religious novelty and the eagerness of men to escape unpleasant truths, the writer properly calls attention to the one lesson which this wasted life can teach us: the immense influence of the press for good or evil, particularly in the religious field. "In the matter of tracts, leaflets, books, and periodicals, the followers of Pastor Russell, like the followers of Mother Eddy and of Joseph Smith, are using with commendable efficiency that agency of popular religious literature in which the followers of John Wesley should never allow themselves to be outdone."

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVI. No. 9
WHOLE No. 400

DECEMBER 9, 1916

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—There has been vigorous fighting near Ypres, in the Somme district, along the Trentino front, and north of Monastir, but the general situation in these places has undergone no important modification. At Athens attempts on the part of the Allies to force the Royalists to accede to their demands have resulted in several minor engagements between the Greeks and the Allies, assisted by the Venizelists. The King was eventually forced to yield and a truce has been effected.

Bulletin, Nov. 27, p.m.-Dec. 4, a.m.

The Central Powers have continued their rapid progress through Wallachia. In the region of the upper Alt, they took Rimnica-Valcea, crossed the Alt, and a little later the Topolog, and then seized Curtea de Arges. About the same time they forced the Rumanians to withdraw from the middle Alt towards the Arges River. Pressing forward the Central Powers occupied Pitesci, crossed the Arges and took Golesci. These two successes exposed the Rumanian right wing at Kimpolung, and as a consequence the Rumanians abandoned the city and retired to the Dambovitsa Valley, down which they are retreating in the direction of Targovistea. South of Pitesci the Central Powers have defeated the Rumanians, who are falling back on the Arges.

Meanwhile a part of the other army of the Central Powers, which crossed the Danube at Zimnitsea, has advanced from Alexandria to the Glavatziotzu River; further east another part of this army compelled the Rumanians to evacuate Giurgiu, south of Bucharest, and after occupying the city, advanced north along the Bucharest-Giurgiu railroad, crossed the Niaslov lowlands and a portion of the river of the same name, seized the towns of Comana and Gostinari, and reached the Arges at a point about ten miles from Bucharest. They have already brought heavy guns to bear on the city and are fighting to effect a crossing of the river. The Rumanians have recaptured Comana and Gostinari, but their possession of these places is precarious, for the Central Powers have effected another crossing of the Danube, apparently at Oltenitza, have reached Lake Gretza and are advancing on Bucharest from the southeast. Further east violent fighting is in progress at the Rumanian end of the Cernavoda bridge. The Russians claim to have seized the western end of the bridge, and from this it would seem, although there has been no official announcement to this effect, that the Central Powers had entered Rumania at this point.

Finding it impossible to check the progress of the Central Powers in Rumania, the Russians have attempted to save their ally by resuming the offensive on a gigantic scale all along the 300-mile line in the Carpathians from the Jablonitza Pass, in Galicia, to the Buzeo Valley, south of Kronstadt. Their greatest effort has been made in the vicinity of Kirlibaba, in Bukowina, with the evident purpose of invading Hungary. They took, but subsequently lost, Rukada Height, and have reached the outskirts of Kirlibaba; they also report the capture of other heights, but as they give no names and as the Central Powers deny these reports, it is impossible to estimate their progress. Attacks have also been made on the Central Powers in Volhynia and Galicia, but in neither place has much success been gained. In Dobrudja also the Rumanians and Russians have renewed their offensive north of the Cernavoda-Constantsa line, but they have made no appreciable progress.

Austria-Hungary.—The funeral ceremonies over the body of Emperor Francis Joseph took place in St. Stephen's Cathedral and were performed by the Cardinal Archbishop of Vienna, attended by four cardinals and many bishops and priests. Besides the new Emperor and his Queen, there were present the Kings of Bulgaria, Bavaria, Saxony and Württemberg, together with almost a hundred members of royal families. Emperor Charles followed the coffin into the small Capuchin church where it was placed in the crypt. An artillery salute sounded in the distance as Charles I ascended the steps leading from the crypt to the church. An eventful reign of almost sixty-eight years has been closed, and the eyes of the world are turned upon the new Emperor, who now, at the early age of twenty-nine promises to become a worthy successor to the revered Francis Joseph. Emperor Charles I has not merely proved himself fearless as a soldier and popular as a leader, but has likewise given his soldiers an example of true devotion to religion. It is said that on the eve of the Italian offensive he approached the Holy Table with his entire staff.

Emperor Francis Joseph Laid to Rest

Belgium.—According to dispatches, under date of December 1, from Paris, the Belgium Government at Havre announced it had received the information that the Germans had suspended the work of sinking shafts in the coal mines and had caused a stoppage of work in other districts. The workers thus deprived of their occupation, it is said, have been classed among the "unemployed" and have been deported with others for service in Germany. It is reported too by the Belgian officials, that the Germans have just dismantled the Meus distillery and other establishments of the same kind at Wyneghem. Systematic raids on machine tools are said to have taken place at Cockerill and Seraing, where quantities were seized and shipped to Germany. In the communes of Luxembourg province, men employed in repairing roads have been deprived of their occupation, and the Germans, it is declared, after ordering the work stopped, treated the men thus made idle as "unemployed" and gave them the alternative of deportation or voluntary engagement to work in Germany. The pretext given for the stoppage of work in the Belgian mines and the deportation of the miners was that "miners are needed in Germany." Future reports will undoubtedly throw new and perhaps less sinister light on these deportations.

The Deportations

Cuba.—A month has elapsed since the Presidential election took place. The result, however, still remains in doubt, and, according to press dispatches from Havana, months may pass before the outcome is definitely known. Partial reballoting must be done in two provinces, where, it is reported, fraud and coercion interfered with the elections. The returns, according to the provincial election boards, give President Menocal a majority in the provinces of Matanzas, Pinar del Rio and Occidente. His opponent, Dr. Alfredo Zayas, the Liberal candidate, has carried the provinces of Havana and Camaguey, and has a majority of 269 in Santa Clara province, where as in Oriente, partial elections are again to be had. If Dr. Zayas can maintain his majority in Santa Clara province, he will win even if he loses Oriente. The Conservatives claim, however, that their supporters in several precincts in Santa Clara province were intimidated and kept from voting by the Liberals and that a fair election will give a majority to President Menocal. To these charges of intimidation, Liberal sympathizers retort with accusations of illegal use of the post office and telegraphs by the Conservatives. Extremists talk of revolution and the destruction of the sugar crop, in order to force intervention by the United States. The Government is shifting troops and munitions, and whatever the final result, seems determined to preserve order.

The Presidential Election

France.—Everywhere there seems to be a splendidly organized mobilization of the country's resources. The last three or four months have witnessed a series of financial, economic and industrial schemes, clearly and practically outlined and in some cases begun. In spite of the drain upon the money-resources of the country, the financial situation continues excellent. It is true that there has been a decrease in the gold-reserve of the Bank of France. But this is coincident with the enormous increase in gold held for the bank in foreign countries.

The Merchant-Marine

One of the questions attracting attention at the present time is the future of the French mercantile marine. For the last thirty years, France has been trying by artificial means to increase this service, and now there is a strong demand that within eighteen months after the war is ended, at least $32,000,000 be advanced by the Government to steamship companies to rebuild their fleets. Not less than $12,000,000 of this sum is to be used on ships already built, while the remainder is to be employed for new constructions. However beneficial the grant would be as an initial measure to encourage the merchant-marine, experts point out that $32,000,000 would go only a very little way towards the thorough rehabilitation of the French merchant-service, especially while nothing is done to remedy the onerous laws under which shipowners operate. In some ways these are comparable in severity to the demands placed on American owners by the laws of the United States. France, which has had good reasons in the past to be proud of its merchant-service, now seems quite willing to make any reasonable financial sacrifices to further its interests.

Germany.—The sixtieth birthday of the Imperial Chancellor was made memorable by the introduction of the Man-Power bill into the Reichstag. "Hands that are idle," he said, "assist the enemy." The bill provides that all able-bodied men between the ages of eighteen and sixty, not serving under the colors, are liable to labor-service in the country's interest. The Chancellor states that the measure has been discussed with the interested trades and in the Reichstag's Committee, is in harmony with the patriotic spirit shown by the whole nation and will make success doubly sure.

The Man-Power Bill

> God has helped us up to the present. He will help us further. The almost superhuman heroism of our troops, which cannot be expressed in words of thanks, and our clear conscience give us a right to such confidence, since we were the first and only ones who were ready and are now ready to end the war by a peace guaranteeing our existence and our future.

The bill was adopted at a later session by a vote of 235 to 19. Socialist members took advantage of the debate which arose at this session to condemn the Government's action in deporting Belgian workingmen. They declared it was detrimental to labor and a violation of international law. Dr. Helfferich, acting as Vice-Chancellor, expressed regret that such a discussion had arisen, "thereby promoting the business of our enemies." He then added in explanation: "The setting of the unemployed to work is thoroughly consistent with international law. They are not given work, which, according to international law, they should not perform. We are making use only of our undoubted rights."

Peace Desire No Sign of Weakness

The press is calling attention to the millions of men who have been sacrificed in the recent offensives, particularly by the Russians, without deciding anything "except that the German west front cannot be broken." The papers maintain that Germany can speak of peace without exciting suspicion of weakness on her part. The slight gains of the Allies are contrasted with the sweeping conquest of Rumania, but even this is not regarded as the most significant feature telling in favor of Germany. This, we are told, consists in the fact that Germany was able to put into the field two such overwhelming armies as those of Falkenhayn and Mackensen, and to assume the offensive against a fresh enemy along 800 miles of new front at a time when all the world believed her to be exhausted and when the Entente Powers were striking hardest on the Somme, in Russia, and in Macedonia. It proved that the German fronts are so independent of one another that they can operate regardless of developments elsewhere.

Ireland.—Le Journal de la Grotte de Lourdes, according to the Irish Catholic, contains an interesting and laudatory description of Maynooth College, given to a French journalist, by the Bishop of Digne, one of the distinguished French ecclesiastics, who recently visited Ireland. After praising the admirable site and the architectural beauties of the famous institution, the Bishop said: "We have nothing in France to be compared with it. It is first of all a national seminary, much more national than our St. Sulpice was." The French prelate expressed his admiration for the thorough way in which literature and science, and especially philosophy and theology are taught. He added: "The study of the ancient and modern Oriental languages, of exegesis, of the history of canon law, and of the sacred and profane sciences, is carried to a very high degree of proficiency." The Bishop was deeply impressed by the way in which the liturgy was taught and observed as well as by the solemn and thoroughly ecclesiastical nature of the plain chant he had heard in the college chapel. According to the Bishop of Digne, the Bishop of Orleans had been moved to tears at the sight of the piety of the seminarians and the dignity and impressiveness with which the services were performed.

Tribute to Maynooth

The report adds that the College possesses as its professors secular priests who have attained prominence and fame in the literary and educational world, and that these professors "have very keen intellects and minds ever vigilant for scientific progress." A fine tribute is paid to the knowledge and the administrative capacity of the President of the College, Mgr. Hogan, a nephew of the famous Sulpician the Abbé Hogan, who exercised such a lasting influence on the French and American clergy. In conclusion, the Bishop of Digne declared that Maynooth was the "heart and center of Catholic Ireland, and truly the intellectual capital of that fine Island."

Japan.—Nominally, Japan is at war with the German Empire but her financial prosperity was never greater. According to official reports received at Washington Japan's foreign trade is growing rapidly, her manufacturing establishments are increasing and her bank deposits have reached extraordinary sums. The eleven clearing-houses of the Empire announce for the first six months of 1916 clearances of $4,182,415,000, an increase of more than $1,500,000,000 over the corresponding period of 1915. Japan's gold holdings are expected to amount, before long, to about $348,950,000; the excess of her exports over her imports will probably reach $150,000,000, a big sum for that country. The field of foreign trade is being developed. China, India and the colonies once exploited by Germany are now Japan's markets. Another indication of the country's growing prosperity is the fact that the Japanese people recently provided the funds for a British loan of $50,000,000. The Mikado's subjects are evidently laying money by.

Unprecedented Prosperity

An Associated Press correspondent reports that Viscount Kentaro Kaneko, a member of the Emperor's Privy Council, has been urging the formation of an economic alliance between Japan and the United States, regarding China. Thus needless competition, he argues, would be avoided. "Japan might make temporary profits by dumping her commodities in China and driving away American goods from that market; but such an act would hardly improve the relations between Japan and America." He proposes that, instead, each country have its respective spheres of economic activity. Japan, for instance, might monopolize the small hardware trade of China, and leave to Americans the market for nails, iron pipes, etc. But other Japanese publicists are not so friendly in their suggestions. Shintaro Inagaki writes, for example: "Let America's ambitious policy on the Pacific be a warning to us peoples of an Oriental State. We, as well as the Chinese, should awake from our delusions, throw aside our petty quarrels and combine against the common enemy." It is clear that the longer the war continues the richer and more powerful Japan will grow, and her attitude toward China will be the crux of her relations with the United States.

An Economic Alliance

Rome.—Prime Minister Bissolati has gone out of his way to insult the Holy Father in a most outrageous fashion. In a speech delivered at Cremona, in which he eulogized Battisti, the Deputy of Trent, taken by the Austrians and hanged as a traitor, he remarked that there was a party that could not pardon him. That party is thus described in the Minister's own words:

The Bissolati Outbreak

> They were those who, in the name of the religion of Christ, curse war, not, however, the German and Austrian war that has devastated half Europe, bombarded defenseless cities, mutilated children, and sunk even neutral merchant ships, but the war of Italy, they curse, because Italy has laid claim to one of its own monuments which the Vatican wished to keep in perpetuity by the help of the long hand of Austria, as a symbol of its unchanging aspiration regarding Rome; they curse the war of Italy because Austria has ever blessed their fanaticism. Against these interpreters of the Christian religion, against the crooked politicians who use that religion in their interest, the blood of the Socialist Deputy of Trent cries out.

Bissolati's outbreak was caused directly by Cardinal Gasparri's "moderately expressed reserve," as Rome puts it, in regard to the action of Italy in taking possession of the residence of an ambassador to the Holy See, the Palazzo Venezia, headquarters of the Austrian Envoy to the Pope. Indirectly it was caused by the Roman question, which is thrust forward by politicians even at times when the Pope, for special reasons, desires that it should not agitate the public mind.

The attack of the Minister is quite tactless and unjust, for Italian Catholics, bishops, priests and laity have been as patriotic as the rest of the country. The Bishops have blessed and encouraged the troops, the priests have performed wonders of abnegation and devotion at the front and in the care of the sick, and thousands of brave and fervent Catholic soldiers have died in the trenches and on the field. The Italian Catholic press has boldly denounced the cowardly attack of the Minister.

Spain.—The budget for 1917 calls for the sum of $250,000,000. The Treasury income will probably add $20,000,000 more. The Moroccan estimates have been reduced about $5,000,000. The main objects for which appropriations were made are the reorganization of the army and the navy, the carrying on of various works of public utility, such as roads, railways and irrigation schemes, and the development and improvement of education.

The Budget

Important changes are made in the land taxes in favor of the tenants and landowners who cultivate their own land, and against owners who do not cultivate their holdings, such as absentees and owners of pasture land. The tax on pious bequests has been raised from 14 per cent to the enormous figure of 20 per cent, whereas legacy taxes generally can never, and this only in the case of the very highest fortunes, exceed 4 per cent. The annual tax on all mortmain property, the sugar tax, and the stamp duty have also been greatly increased. According to the usually well-informed correspondent of the Irish Catholic, the most fundamental provision of the estimates is a tax on the unearned increment on all immovable property. This tax will vary from 15 to 30 per cent of the increased value, according as this exceeds 10 per cent or is more than 200 per cent. Increase of value under 10 per cent is not to be taxed. Should any property not be legally registered, and if it does not pay the usual land tax, the entire value of the property will be taken as the increased value, and the tax will be 30 per cent. A super-tax is also proposed. Any tenant who increases the value of the land to 50 per cent can expropriate the owner by paying him a price estimated at 5 per cent on the total value of the land and an additional one per cent for the inconvenience and loss of good will. Tenants of property for 20 years or more or a direct descendant whose family have been tenants of the same property for at least 30 years and who undertake to pay a tax of at least 10 per cent more than is actually being paid, can on the same conditions expropriate the owner.

Drastic as these measures are, the clauses embodying them have been voted with little or no opposition. The only clause that raised strong objections was that referring to places of worship of all denominations, granting them all freedom from taxation, provided they were used solely for religious exercises. As this put the various sects on a level with the established religion of the State, it was opposed by all parties except the Liberals, Republicans and Reformists. This, says the Irish Catholic, may seem intolerant to those who do not understand the real status of the religious question in Spain, but it can be easily explained. For, with scarcely an exception, that paper adds, the sectarian schools and places of worship throughout the country are either maintained for political purposes or are intended for the perversion of the poorer and less-educated class of Spaniards. The sincerity moreover of those who are trying to win the converts to the sects at the price of apostasy, may be rightly called in question. The Spaniard does not need to be thus converted. General education, again says the Dublin paper, may not be at such a high level in Spain, but the religious knowledge of the masses is incomparably beyond that of the same class in any other country. The measure nevertheless was carried by the Government majority.

In his letter to Master-General Theissling of the Dominicans, the Pope pays a splendid tribute to the Order. He affirms that it was undoubtedly from its Founder that the Church received the Rosary; praises Dominican loyalty to the Papacy, and its scholastic labors. He grants during the centenary festivities a plenary indulgence on the usual conditions, to those who visit any Dominican public oratory or church, where a triduum or the festival-day only is celebrated, and allows the Mass of St. Dominic to be said on the centenary day itself and on the other two days of the triduum.

The Pope and the Dominicans

The Holes in Our Melting-Pot

AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

ONE of the last official Catholic directories says the Catholic population of the United States proper is 16,309,310; the New York "World Almanac" for 1916 makes it 13,862,913. The statement in the directories is from the diocesan reports, the other from the United States census of 1910. Both these numbers are too low.

The Bureau of Immigration in its report for 1915 finds that from 1820 to 1915, inclusively, 32,354,124 immigrants entered the United States; and it estimates that from 1776 to 1820 the immigration was 250,000 people, or 32,604,124 immigrants in all since the beginning of the Republic. The present population of the United States is reckoned to be about 103,000,000. These 103,000,000 are our immigrants plus their descendants; for our present purpose we may neglect the descendants of people who were here before the Revolution, a century and a half ago. The immigrants, then, have multiplied themselves over three times.

In the past ninety-six years there were 4,089,190 Irish immigrants, and of these at the least seventy-five per cent, or 3,066,903, were Catholics, judging from the religious grouping of the present population of Ireland. There were 4,061,885 immigrants from Austria-Hungary, all Catholics except nine per cent who were Jews—that is, 3,696,317 Catholics. Then too we got 711,760 Catholic Prussian Poles, and 4,025,345 Italian Catholics. Russia sent over 550,000 Polish and Lithuanian Catholics. France gave us 511,286 people, and of these 500,000 most probably were Catholic, at least as Catholic as the Italians. In the ninety-six years 5,489,306 Germans came in, but I have no statistics concerning their religion. One-third of the present population of Germany is Catholic, and one-third of the German immigrants is 1,829,768. Since 1899 we have had 117,735 Mexicans, 94,000 Spaniards, 117,358 Portuguese, 32,350 Cubans, a great number of French Canadians, and numerous Catholics from England, Irish in descent, Scotland, Belgium, Syria and elsewhere.

The Catholic immigrants we have had then, number at the most conservative estimate 15,410,765. Since the other immigrants multiplied threefold, the Catholic immigrants also increased in their descendants, in the same degree; but before 1870 practically the only Catholic immigrants were the Irish and Germans, and this fact precludes, of course, the possibility of tripling the number 15,410,765. Moreover very many immigrants return to Europe. In 1915, 384,174 aliens left the United States Many of these left because of the war, but from 1910 to 1915 inclusively, 3,143,828 aliens left the United States, nearly ten per cent of the whole immigration since 1820. The growth of the American population is too complicated a process to get a clear notion of it, but our 15,410,765 Catholic immigrants have certainly increased by American births more than 500,000. The estimates in the Catholic directories are as accurate as the publishers can make them, but they are notoriously inexact because the diocesan reports are not accurate. One diocese, for example, has sent in the same figures for sixteen years; other dioceses have sent in no reports at all. Shifting families are not reported, and most Americans are nomads naturally. Big parishes report "about 4,500," when 6,500 would be nearer the truth, but if 6,500 were reported there might be an episcopal karyokinetic carving.

The Catholic Church in America was primarily Irish and German, and it remains such still in its hierarchy and priesthood, but not in its laity. The Irish and Germans are decreasing in this country as far as direct immigration is concerned. In 1910 there were 312,000 fewer Germans, born in Germany, and 263,000 fewer Irish, born in Ireland, in the United States than there were in 1900. In 1860 there were 250,000 more Irish-born in the United States, than in 1910. The English-speaking group of nations in 1910 had 243,000 less representatives here than in 1890, and now thirty-seven per cent of our foreign-born are Slavs and Italians. The immigration lessened from Germany because of improved economic conditions there, and from Ireland because of a lack of population at home. There is a famine threatening Ireland just now, and after the war we may get many of the survivors, but if we got them all we would have an increase less than the population of New York City.

Again, the Irish who came here after the famine of 1847 and the Germans who came about the same time are dying out in their descendants instead of increasing normally, as I have shown elsewhere repeatedly. Groups of Irish families as large as fifty have made only twenty per cent of their normal increase here in two generations. The American climate is the cause of the inhibition in racial growth; it is fitted for the Mediterranean Basin and southeastern European nations, but it is destructive in time of the northern European races. The proof of that statement is too long for publication in this journal but it may be found in the Irish quarterly, Studies, for January, 1917. The Italian, Slovak, Slovene, Ruthenian, Croatian and Styrian Catholics will survive here after the Irish and Germans have disappeared, as the northern Vandals, Lombards, Alani, Goths, Normans, and other northern European migratory nations disappeared in southern Europe above the level of Virginia, and disappeared with astounding rapidity. What is done for these southern European Catholics now will have a great effect on the Church in America even a century hence.

Despite the optimism of some of our writers who like to hear the truth about the Presbyterians but hate to hear it about themselves, the Church is losing thousands of her people here through mixed marriages, proselyting soupers, the rapid degeneracy of the public conscience, avarice, aping the Gentiles, godless schools, lack of zeal for souls on both sides of the sanctuary rail, dearth of clergy for the new immigrants, and many other related causes. Take up any evening paper and you can read of the marriage of Gladys Murphy to M. Francis Burke, in the Second Baptist Church, by the Rev. Peter Doyle, and everyone in the group from parson to flower girl had grandmothers that took their beads to bed with them. In all our large cities there are actually colonies of mixed-marriage families. These truly refined floor-walkers, club-women, near-physicians, college instructors, and the like, find one another and group on certain streets because they have been frozen out as holy half-breeds by both Protestants and Catholics. They are the early Huguenot and Scotch-Irish, De Laneys, Du Gans, Phynyzys, Mc-Meins, Laricys, and Sullivants—ex-peasants who put the O in Ocean, coming over.

Should the family fortune be established by trade across foot-rails, by political contracts, note-shaving, or what not, the children are sent to Yale or Vassar, as a preliminary boost in social climbing. They do not learn catechism at Yale, nor do they get far up on the social tree-trunk as a rule; but even if the child does mount to the upper branches and the balmy air, the reward appears to be that he, raimented from London, can go to the horse show and watch a society lady, booted and spurred, in voluminous breeks fade over the water-jump like a scared cotton tail. Entrancing, doubtless, but what's the use? No man knows, the climber excepted.

Our people are pulled down into unbelief, too, by the rapid decadence of the American public conscience. Today indecent pictures are set up on the hoardings, and printed in the papers that enter our homes, unclean plays are presented in the theaters, brazen dames flop about in what are called esthetic dances, university professors preach ethical slush, without protest, yet a generation ago these crimes would open the doors of the penitentiary. The worst quality of all this paganism is that it has become a matter of course. Our women strut about the streets wrapped in nothing much but powder, rouge, and medieval taces. Even grandmothers waddle about. Corinthian columns reared on French heels, clad like an Irish sergeant in a Highland regiment, simpering, mincing, ogling, until the devil's face is parboiled with the tears of his laughter. I shall be assured in the "Agony Column" that at the least our Catholic ladies do not dress like the Queen of Sheba. Don't they? Well, they call themselves ladies. The other day I was passing a school just as a number of Catholic girls were coming out. There was a basement window near the gate which made an effectual mirror, and every blessed damosel that appeared took a powder puff from her reticule, or whatever you call their ammunition boxes, stuck her budding nose into it, and pattered off down the street looking like the white rabbit in a Christmas pantomime. Powder puffs are not criminal, but were these Catholic girls dressed modestly? That depends upon what part of Africa you come from. Someone calls all this late paganism the cockle of Protestantism. Both this paganism and Protestantism are the weeds of rheumatic Catholicism. If our forebears and ourselves were half-decent Catholics there would not be any weeds in the garden. Luther was the water-carrier at the end of the procession, not the drum major. Really practical Catholics are well-armed against both Protestant and pagan influences.

The Return to Medievalism

CECIL CHESTERTON

IT is always interesting to remember that one who may be regarded as the unofficial patron saint of children, St. Nicholas, known in modern parlance as Santa Claus, gained his title by a miracle of resurrection. Medea, the greatest type of the ancient and modern witch, undertook to make an old man into a young man by boiling him in a pot. But the old gentleman, like many old gentlemen who have attempted to renew their youth like the eagles, found that the experiment began and ended with getting into hot water. But St. Nicholas, according to the legend, found two children literally gone to pot, like modern society, and miraculously raised them unconsumed. He not only renewed their youth but also renewed their childhood. Either my brother or I once wrote an article on how the notion of restoration and resurrection mark the whole difference between good magic and bad. In the first the supernatural is a strong engine for restoring the natural. The only answer to the death of the body is the resurrection of the body. But in all the traditions of black magic there is the opposite idea, the idea of captivity, and not of deliverance. The children cured by St. Nicholas escape from the ogre's prison of a pot. But in the opposite and evil tales of enchantment there is always the clang of chains. The princess is imprisoned in a white hind as in an ivory turret. The prince is imprisoned in a green frog as in an emerald casket. But from the awful experiment of Eden to the last trumpet that makes dead men alive again, the light that lights up every Christian conception is the idea of liberty.

The most living of all liberties is the liberty to repent. These modern sages who say we cannot walk back by the road we have walked—these are now the plain and public enemies of human freedom. It is they who declare that a perfectly simple and natural human course is impossible. I will, for my present purpose, take as an example a remark that was made not so long since by a modern writer who said that when I talked of angels or devils I was only raising ghosts that had been laid forever. "Mr. Chesterton must really cheer up. I will tell him a secret which an angel, incidentally, whispered in my ear in Fleet Street the other day. The Middle Ages do not merely seem to be over, they are over."

Now that remark would be perfectly appropriate and apparently true if it had been uttered at the court of Queen Anne. I can hear a contemporary of the Queen telling me that all trace of the age of ignorance had been destroyed; that the Irishry, since the treaty of Limerick, are evidently lost through clinging to medieval superstitions; that the sacramental theory of knighthood was flung into the Thames with the Great Seal; that a religion under the control of reason will doubtless continue to satisfy many, but that some of my Lord Bolingbroke's arguments against all religion must convince any person of understanding, and, for his part, faith!—'tis impossible to be a monk or a Crusader now. Now I should have found it more difficult to have answered this critic in the time of Queen Anne. In so far as mere time can be made the symbol of human fashion and folly, it was true then that the medieval ethic, like the medieval epoch, was over. As things actually stand today, I have no difficulty in answering him by the brute facts of the case. There is practically nothing in the modern world that has not been, as compared to the age of Anne, a return or attempted return to the Middle Ages. I say the whole modern world, in so far as it is trying to do anything except sweat and enslave, has been a blind but obvious attempt to rebuild medievalism. That living societies can make such half-conscious attempts to recover something lost is plain from the facts of the most rationalist eighteenth century. He would be a bold man who should say that the French revolutionists were not, consciously or unconsciously, seeking to reestablish the sense of citizenship in the city-States of antiquity. And Danton was further off from Demosthenes than we are from Dante. But even at the time of the French Revolution there were the beginnings of a return to Christian as well as pagan origins. There was certainly something older than Addison in Robespierre's wild attempt to make the republic a sort of theocracy, to base everything on the dogma of deity. There was something older than Addison in Danton's plea that where there is no vision the people perish. Since that time all the revolutions, quite apart from religion, have been towards medievalism rather than away from it. The modern artistic critic prefers a picture by Blake to a picture by Flaxman; and Blake is by far the more medieval. The modern prefers the self-denial of Tolstoy to the self-denial of Smiles, and Tolstoy is the more medieval. In Queen Anne's court a civilized man might well regard any stray monk as he would a mad dog. But things have happened since then. The dog recovered from the bite; Queen Anne it was that died.

Now I shall take a test that anyone will feel to be fair. I shall rule out all cases that could be called cases of conscious return to the religion of that great Middle Age. I think that most people capable of following a close and cold piece of argument regard Mr. Belloc's book on the "Servile State" as a great contribution to economic history; but I rule it out. I think most people who like poetry would agree that the words and thoughts of Francis Thompson thrive more luxuriantly, if anything, than those of most modern poets; but I rule them out. Such men have manifest and avowed medieval sympathies. But I say that men of no medieval sympathies whatsoever are now leading us back to medievalism. To show that my argument is purely realistic, I will first take the particular instance with which my critic was concerned.

We were arguing about the late Mr. W. T. Stead, and he said with great truth that he was a man of real spirituality, but was a horrible bore about spiritism. But why was his spiritism a bore? It was a bore because it was not medieval. It was a bore because it was modern, because it was like all his other schemes for conducting the world through a cosmopolitan correspondence bureau. It was a bore because it was full of unity and universalism and optimism and peace, perfect peace. Because Stead could never be got to see that a man must meet the wrong specter at a seance as he must meet the wrong wife at a matrimonial agency; because he is not keeping tryst with somebody but with anybody. I am not sure that if a medieval exorcist, looking at Stead but talking to "Julia," said in the beautiful words of the Gospel, "Hold thy peace, and come out of him!" the scene would be wholly tedious. Anyhow, that is not my point: it is this. Go to the impartial man; go to the indifferent man; go to the nearest medical man acquainted with mental troubles, probably materialistic, certainly modern, almost certainly regarding medievalism as moonshine, you will not find that he admits the interview between the happy Stead and the glorified Gladstone. But you will find that he admits what he calls dual personality, which is pretty close to demoniac possession. For the little way they go, the cold, coarse, unconscious facts of science support demonology more than spiritism.

I took that case on the challenge: I turn to more cogent cases of the unconscious revival. Take the remarkable direction more and more taken by the demand of labor of late. I should say the British working man knew rather less about the Middle Ages than anybody in the world, except the British employer. But the solution that he is driving at is that of the Middle Ages. Syndicalism, whether you like it or not as a method of economic organization, is far more medieval than either Socialism or individualism. The movement lead by many of the younger men in London is not Catholic, but it is medieval. The labor daily paper, the Herald, is not exactly an illuminated Missal; but much of its expression is medieval in spirit. Mr. Ben Tillett, the labor leader, is not, I think, contemplating going into a monastery, but he is going into the Middle Ages and the age of monasteries. The man who asks for ownership by trade unions in 1916 is as plainly talking medievalism as a man who asked for a republic in 1790 was talking Latin.

My critic was mistaken. The voice he heard was not in Fleet Street but fell from the top of Ludgate Hill, where stands the statue of the Queen who is dead. And it is far more likely that we shall again see friars in Blackfriars or Crusaders in the Temple than that men shall endure the misery of our modernity forever.

Entomology as a Profession

J. R. de la Torre Bueno, F. E. S.

TIME was when the entomologist was regarded with derisive amusement by unfeeling strangers and was looked upon with pity even by his friends and family. Of course, in the face of this public and general attitude, the insect collector had to be a man of independent mind to persevere in a pursuit so misappreciated. The passing of years and the invaluable work of the economic entomologist have united to overcome this prejudice of the general public, and entomology, once the butt of the comic paragrapher, has become as important a reality in scientific agriculture as the study of soils and crops. It now ranks with geology, botany, and other natural sciences in the esteem of mankind, and has become a minister to its well-being and prosperity.

To the young man of scientific bent who loves the things that God has made, entomology presents a prospect of study combined with practical effort leading to beneficent results. While at present the material lure is by no means so great as in other commercialized branches of applied science, its intellectual aspect is to many a measurable compensation for the smaller pecuniary reward. Moreover, entomology leads to the formation of delightful intellectual friendships with men of wide culture and deep attainments.

Official entomology in the United States may be said to have received its greatest impetus in 1877, when the commission on the Rocky Mountain locust and its ravages in the prairie States presented its first report. While prior to that time entomologists had been in the service of the United States Government, the spectacular nature of the plague combated, and the successful measures recommended and put into effect, brought sharply to the attention of agriculturists and of the country at large the importance of a proper knowledge of insects and their habits.

The value of the farm crops of the Unted States is in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000 every year, and it has been shown that there is a loss of ten per cent, or $100,000,000 annually due to the preventable depredations of insects. On this foundation fact the United States Government most generously supports the entomological service. In the classic days of C. V. Riley and Townsend Glover, the staff of these renowned entomologists was limited to themselves and two or three assistants; the sums alloted for the service were negligible and in general included in lump appropriations. In the present, the apogee of the economic entomologist, Dr. L. O. Howard, Chief of the Bureau of Entomology of the United States Department of Agriculture, Professor Riley's disciple, colleague and successor, directs no less than 200 entomologists on the Government rolls, and appropriations to defray the expense of the unending series of researches into the ravages of various insects rose to nearly $800,000 in 1913.

Since the locust plague was overcome, the Government service has scored many notable triumphs, such as the conquest of the San José scale, the arrest of the potato beetle, the control of the apple-worm and the subjugation of many other less-known insects, such as the chinch bug, the icerya scale, the orange mealy-bug, the oyster-shell louse and others more inconspicuous still.

Practically every State in the Union maintains an entomological service and has some agricultural college teaching entomology. This affords scope to many men as State entomologists and to a number of others as professors and teachers of the science. The entomological service of New York, besides the State entomologist at Albany, maintains experiment stations at Geneva and Ithaca, the latter in connection with the State College of Agriculture. Many assistants are employed by these institutions in addition to the teaching staff at Cornell. Massachusetts maintains a State entomological department and also a gypsy-moth commission requiring the service of many experts. The colleges are Massachusetts Agricultural College, at Amherst, and the Bussey Institution near Boston, connected with Harvard University. Other important agricultural colleges with adequate courses in entomology are Ohio State University, Rutgers College, University of Illinois, University of California, which, together with others not named, have an enrolment of about 1,600 students in entomology. It must not be imagined, however, that a college makes an entomologist. It is only within the last ten years that extensive courses have been offered and the majority of the entomologists of today are strictly self-made scientists, men with a tremendous love for the study of created things. It is this spirit that makes the entomologist; without it, the work is no more than any other job.

The young entomologist nowadays, on graduating from college, frequently continues to study for a couple of years to qualify for a doctorate. Once he finishes his studies, he takes a minor position with some State institution or with the national Government, where he gets the experience in practical work which serves to reveal his mature bent. From that, he passes on to teaching, or rises in the Government service to occupy some of the more important technical positions.

Entomology is essentially a practical science; it cannot be learned from books or practised in a secluded laboratory. To attain the fullest grasp, a man must study in the field by observation of the living beings and their habits. All entomological courses, after giving an adequate foundation of general biology and elementary systematic entomology, require the student to do original work on practical problems as a fundamental part of the course. Self-taught entomologists, if they amount to anything, have always unconsciously pursued this plan. Graduates receive the B. S. degree and advanced students, or post-graduates, qualify for the Ph.D. The openings with greatest promise are in the extensive and growing Government service. State service and teaching are the other avenues open to success. The two different courses appeal to the student according to his bent.

Teaching is a well-defined profession whatever the subject-matter, and it will not be further considered. Economic entomology, however, is a broader and more diversified subject. Here the work is conducted either in the laboratory, the study or the field, frequently in all three. The entomologist has set before him problems of nature's propounding, on whose solution often depends the prosperity of entire communities. Such a problem, for example, is that of the control of the boll-weevil of cotton, which is causing great loss in Texas and other southwestern States, through its injury to the great staple product. In such studies, the entomologist has the freest scope for ingenuity, originality and enterprise. The adequate solution of attendant problems is a great satisfaction to the scientific investigator. Over and beyond these problems of agriculture are the far-reaching activities of insects as propagators and disseminators of disease. This branch of entomology is engaging the keenest minds in the science. The activities of insects as conveyers of disease are illustrated by the dreadful ravages of sleeping sickness in Africa and the desolation of the Roman Campagna by malaria, both insect-borne.

In this aspect, entomology becomes the handmaid of medicine, and medical entomology is a branch of the science rapidly attaining an importance, if possible, beyond that of the agricultural. Here also positions of investigators are presenting themselves, not alone as parts of well-organized health-departments but also in colleges and other institutions of learning where the connection of insects with disease is carefully taught and studied.

The remuneration of the entomologist is not always in keeping with the importance of his work to human well-being and happiness. In the Government service salaries may range from $900 to $4,000 annually, the last being commanded by only one man. States and colleges are less liberal, since salaries here vary from about $600 to $2,500 a year. Of course, there are outside sources of income for the more expert, derived from lectures, semi-technical articles, books and consultation work. But nevertheless, to those to whom success in life is not measured by the amount of money received, but rather by the satisfaction and pleasure in the work, I know of no pleasanter, more attractive profession. Even though fortune be not gained, a comfortable, untroubled livelihood is certain, coupled with the joys of independence.

Divorced Non-Catholics and the Church

J. HARDING FISHER, S. J.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The following questions have been the subject of some bitter controversies between myself and other Catholics. Will you kindly answer them in AMERICA? The questions are: (1) Suppose two unbaptized non-Catholics get married according to the law of the land, with or without religious services, and subsequently they are divorced in due legal form, can a Catholic, under any circumstances, marry either of them, both being alive? (2) Suppose a baptized Protestant and an unbaptized non-Catholic get married according to the law of the land, with or without religious services, and subsequently they are divorced in due legal form, can a Catholic, under any circumstances, marry either of them, both being alive?

Washington. R. F. DOWNING.

OUR correspondent insists on the fact that in both cases the persons concerned have been married according to the law of the land; but it is to be noted, as he is doubtless aware, that the solution of the difficulties does not turn on the observance or non-observance of legal requirements. The essential point to be investigated is not whether the marriage has been legal, but whether it has been valid. The law of the land is not always in conformity with the natural law; and hence it is possible for a marriage to be recognized by the State, and yet not be recognized by God. A legal marriage may not be valid, and a valid marriage may not be legal. A law-abiding citizen will endeavor to satisfy all legal requirements, but it should be remembered that legality and validity are not synonymous; the presence or absence of technical legal flaws does not necessarily vitiate or secure validity.

He also lays stress on the fact that the persons concerned have been divorced in due legal form; but the divorce-decree is neither here nor there in the discussion. Decisions in human law, which run counter to the natural law, have no power to free the individual conscience from Divinely riven bonds; privileges conferred by the State are absolutely valueless, if they are denied by God. Divorce-decrees, obtained in due legal form, merely free those in whose favor they have been given from civil liabilities and legal entanglements. They leave the bond of matrimony intact.

The answer to the first query therefore is not very subtle. One is free, antecedently to give his consent, to contract marriage or not, but once he has given that consent he is bound to abide by all the consequences thereof. Mutual consent to marriage sets up a contract which binds the persons who have made it, whether they be Christians, Mohammedans or pagans, to observe the prescriptions of the natural law. Now marriage is indissoluble, quite independently of any regulation of the Church. By its very nature, which is the same as saying by the will of God, it is permanent with a permanency that no merely human power can destroy. This truth is clearly expressed in the words of Christ: "What God has joined together, let no man put asunder." For it should be noted that in speaking thus Christ was not proclaiming something new that was to bind Christians alone; He was reiterating the natural law, and speaking for all mankind. It is the perpetuity of the union, with its consequent relations of husband and wife, of parents and child, and its enduring requirements of commutative justice, that makes marriage different from temporary and illicit unions.

Once therefore two unbaptized persons have taken each other by a valid contract of matrimony for husband and wife, they are absolutely debarred, so long as both of them are alive, divorce-decrees notwithstanding, from marriage with other unbaptized persons: under no circumstances can either of them marry a Jew, a Mohammedan, or any kind of pagan or infidel. Neither can they marry a baptized person, unless they themselves receive Baptism, and then only under the unusual circumstances that open the way to the application of the Pauline privilege, a privilege which certainly may be invoked by Catholics, and probably also by baptized non-Catholics. The first case, therefore, given by our correspondent, depends for its solution on the simple principle: Those who have been validly married cannot marry again during the life of their partner.

The principle on which the solution of the second query depends is equally obvious: those who are not married are free to marry. As in the former case the answer hinges on a question of fact: Were the persons married or not? But in the determination of this fact an element enters into the discussion of the second case that was not present in the first, namely, the jurisdiction of the Church. Over unbaptized persons the Church has no direct jurisdiction. Hence, when they marry among themselves they need not worry about ecclesiastical legislation. Baptized persons are in a different condition. Over them the Church has direct jurisdiction. If they would have their marriages valid, they must conform to the Church's discipline.

The Church does not indeed bind all baptized persons to the observance of her entire ecclesiastical legislation, although, strictly speaking, she could do so, since all who have received the Sacrament of Baptism are her subjects. This is of course denied by Protestants, but their denial is vain, for they bear on their persons the sign of their subjection to her authority in the character ineradically impressed on their souls by Christ at the moment of spiritual regeneration. This is a fact, and the mere refusal to acknowledge it does not do away with it. It is true that in things that concern the sanctification of souls, such as fasting, or abstaining from servile work on holy days of obligation, the Church is presumed, and rationally, not to wish to extend her strictly ecclesiastical laws to those who are in material heresy. But there are certain matters with regard to which the Church has explicitly declared her intention of including all baptized persons under her discipline. Her code of laws relating to diriment impediments to matrimony is such a matter.

They are universal laws bearing on all Christians, unless they have been excepted; for instance, as non-Catholics have been excepted by the Ne Temere Decree, from the necessity of having the parish priest or his delegate as an authoritative witness of their marriage with non-Catholics. These have not been excluded from, rather it is evident that they are included in, the operation of the law which declares that no baptized person can validly marry an unbaptized person without a dispensation. This exercise of authority is declared preposterous by those outside the Church, but it is undoubtedly the position of the Church. This invalidating law she has proclaimed and acted upon, with a rigor she has not seen fit to modify for more than eight centuries. Her legislation on the matter is the same today as it was hundreds of years before the so-called Reformation. In spite of the indignation of the sects and notwithstanding their repudiation of her authority, the Church still says to all Christians, what she said to them when all Christians acknowledged her jurisdiction: No baptized person can validly marry an unbaptized person without a dispensation. Nor does she admit that ignorance and good faith interpose any exception to the universality of the application of her law. All Christians fall under it.

In the first centuries of Christianity the Church understood, as she does today, that marriages between Christians and infidels were not invalid in virtue either of the Divine or the natural law, but that they were forbidden under pain of sin by the voice of nature and by the words of the New Testament. Experience soon taught her that such marriages exposed both parent and child to grave dangers to faith and morals, except in cases where due precautions had removed the peril. Accordingly she added her ecclesiastical prohibition to the prohibition of the natural law and the Divine law, and forbade them under pain of sin, though not of invalidity. Moreover she reserved to herself the judgment as to whether the danger had been rendered remote enough to permit of their celebration. A permission of some kind was doubtless given to St. Cecilia for her marriage with Valerianus, and to St. Monica for her marriage with Patricius; in the former instance with happy results, in the latter with consequences which threatened for a time to realize the mother's worst fears. It is, however, generally admitted that explicit and formal invalidating impediments, as we understand them today, did not exist so early. By the fourth century impediments had a recognized place in ecclesiastical discipline, but the legislation that was concerned with them was local and not universal, and in most cases was prohibitive rather than invalidating.

The twelfth century found the invalidating impediment called disparity of worship firmly established throughout the Church, not by canonical ordinance, but by general custom which had the force of common law. Since that time this impediment has operated as an effective bar to valid matrimony between baptized and unbaptized persons. It makes no difference whether the baptized person is a Catholic or a non-Catholic, an apostate, a heretic or a schismatic, whether he has lost the Faith or kept it. The essential point is, has he been baptized? If he has been validly baptized, even in infancy, he not only may not but cannot be joined in wedlock with an unbaptized person, unless the Church lifts her ban by a dispensation.

The Church does not legislate for those who have not been baptized; therefore, as has been said, if such persons contemplate marriage between themselves, they need not be concerned about ecclesiastical impediments, although they are bound by impediments that exist in virtue of the civil and natural laws. But when they propose to marry baptized persons, they are indirectly affected by ecclesiastical impediments. The bond of matrimony is one and indivisible. If it is vitiated on the side of the Christian, it is wholly vitiated. The consent to marriage, in which the essence of the matrimonial contract consists is a mutual consent; if it is null and void on one side, it is null and void on the other.

In the light of this doctrine the answer of the Church to the second query is clear. If no dispensation was obtained, the marriage between the baptized Protestant and the unbaptized non-Catholic would be invalid, although the children born to them, being the offspring of a putative marriage, would not be illegitimate. As a consequence those who attempted the marriage would be free, so far at least as any existing bond of matrimony were concerned, to enter wedlock with a Catholic or any other eligible person. True, other obstacles might stand in the way, arising conceivably from the supposed relation of husband and wife or connected with it; but if the people whom the second question concerns were excluded from wedlock, it would not be because they were already married.

Papers Concerning Oliver Plunkett

SHANE LESLIE

THE Anglo-Irish House of Plunkett has been distinguished by both the honors and fatalities which have befallen its members. It is a house which has given Ireland many peers, writers, agriculturalists and archbishops, both Protestant and Catholic. Of these the greatest was Oliver Plunkett, Archbishop of Armagh and martyr, now a candidate for canonization at Rome.

The principal papers in connection with the Blessed Oliver were collected by Cardinal Moran in the form of a memoir, which as historical literature has not been surpassed. The present article contains a few scraps of paper, mostly unpublished, which the writer was engaged in copying from the London record Office at the outbreak of the war and which may well be of service, when the cause is reconsidered at Rome. There has been doubt at times whether Plunkett was a martyr for political or religious reasons.

The times of Charles II were incredible. They have been touched upon in Mgr. Benson's novel, "Oddsfish." An extraordinary thing was that Plunkett was martyred for the Catholic Faith under an English king, who himself was Catholic at heart. Lingard tells us that when Lord Lieutenant Essex begged for Plunkett's pardon, knowing that the charge could not be true, Charles angrily replied: "Then, my Lord, be his blood on your own conscience. You might have saved him if you would. I cannot pardon him because I dare not." The times were those of the "Popish Plot," rife in treachery, false witness and massacre. License flourished at court, deceit, cynicism and panic abroad. It was of the year 1680, the year before Plunkett was executed, that Macauley wrote. "In that year our tongue was enriched with two words, mob and sham, remarkable memorials of a season of tumult and imposture."

The sources of the following documents are: The Ormonde MSS. (some published); the Ormonde Papers and the Shaftesbury Papers. Of Shaftesbury Macaulay wrote: "He was one to whose seared conscience, the death of an innocent man gave no more uneasiness than the death of a partridge." He adopted the Popish Plot and was made President of the Council. So successful was the Plot as a political weapon in England that Shaftesbury spread the alarm to Ireland. As Viceroy Ormonde replied he had no fears, "the Irish being in no condition to raise an insurrection." Carte, who wrote Ormonde's life, says: "This peace and quiet in Ireland was a great disappointment to Lord Shaftesbury and his party."

Ormonde was the head of the Butlers and was known among the Irish as Seumas Bawn (White James). He was a Jacobite and disposed to be friendly to the Catholics. However, Shaftesbury determined to show there was trouble in Ireland and he spread the alarm of a foreign invasion. Ireland was as usual accused of being the ally of England's enemy for the time being. Oliver Plunkett, whose whole energy was devoted to his spiritual office, was rumored to be plotting a French invasion. The grim truth was that it was the King himself who was secretly in league with King Louis, who had agreed under certain circumstances to send troops to England. Witnesses were needed, and one Murphy, who was under prosecution as an outlaw or Tory, turned King's evidence against Plunkett. Our first document in the Shaftesbury Papers is one from his agent Hetherington, dated March 23, 1679:

> That Fr Edmond Morphy did tell this informant at Dundalk about Oct. last he was sorry the King was so deceived by some of his officers for he had told severall Justices of the Peace of Primate Plunketts plottings and where they were to meet and shewed them a letter sent by father Rowland Malquin desireing him to apply himself to the next Justice to suppress Primate Plunketts meetings which was to no other intent but to ruin the King his three kingdoms and to bring in Popery as this letter expressed and as he had desired him and one father John Mackawan to watch on the roads and take a list of those who came to that meeting and that he himself was going to France to come to some designe there and then he resolved to come for England and discover all the cause there and some others to be sent for to proove the business And that the said father went into France and was poysoned. . . . That Plonket's letters from France are directed by the name of Capt Robert Cox—from Italy as George Fletcher merchant—That Morphy acquainted Sir Hans Hamilton with this Plott. That this informant lately in Dublin said to Morphy he would goe and acquaint my Lord of Ormond with it. Morphy replied you will then be in danger of your life. Plunket has so many friends about the Castle and town if you do anything there you will have your estate and Family destroyed. Your only way is to discover it in England and he and the rest would come with him which they resolved to do.

Here is the germ of the tragedy. The two priests whom Plunkett excommunicated for serious reasons became informers and eventually swore away his life. The evidence for his arrest appears in an unsigned paper saying:

> Coll. FitzPatrick delivered to the Pope's internuncio at Brussels a letter subscribed by four R. C. Bishops two of which were Plunkett Archbishop of Armagh and Tyrrel Bishop of Clogher recommending the said FitzPatrick for the only person fitt to be intrusted general Of an army for establishing the R. C. religion in Ireland under the French Sovereignty.

The story may be continued from the Ormonde Papers. Letter of Ormonde to Sir Hans Hamilton, October 28, 1679:

> It would be an extraordinary service to the King and of great advantage to me that Oliver Plunket the titular Primate and Tyrell the titular Bishop of Clogher might be apprehended; and therefore it is that I recommend it to your uttermost care and diligence, presuming that no man can be more like to effect it than yourself; and the better to enable you I give you liberty to engage me for any reasonable reward to any that shall discover them.

Letter of Mr. Secretary Coventry to Ormonde, December 23, 1679:

> We have nothing since or more of it than what I wrote you formerly of it; so that unless his papers discover some further grounds I doubt little will be got from him. But if your Grace think fitting to try him with any questions it is left to your discretion and may possibly have the effect of making him believe we know more than we do and beget some fear of continuing such kind of negotiations. And his very being in Ireland after the proclamation may sufficiently justify imprisonment and if need be a further prosecution.

Letter from Secretary Jenkins to Ormonde, June 5, 1680:

> A more than ordinary care ought to be taken of Morphey especially and his companions to ye end they may not be tampered with in favour of those that H Maj prosecutes, or be wrought upon to slip away before ye time comes to give in their evidence.

Here the sordid story may rest for the present. Next week further revelations will be made, that show how the saintly Archbishop was done to death.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters as a rule should be limited to six hundred words

Centralizing Mission Forces

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I was much interested in Father Hagspiel's article on collections for missions, and noted with particular satisfaction his suggestion to have a meeting of the heads of home and foreign missionary societies to discuss the matter in detail. I desire to endorse that suggestion and to say that, as far as the Church Extension Society is concerned, we would be very glad to cooperate with the other Catholic missionary agencies, and send representatives to such a meeting. I regret that innumerable duties prevent my discussing the matter more fully in AMERICA; but, after all, the best discussion could take place in such a meeting.

Chicago. FRANCIS C. KELLEY,
President, Church Extension Society.

College Dramatics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Has it ever occurred to you that your special contributors are over fond, perhaps, of that word "typical"? They have told us of the typical convent school wherein, they complain, the culinary arts are neglected. They have written about the "typical convent girl" who "paints and enamels." Poor Julianne! And, now, in your issue for November 11, Mr. Felix Hayden becomes vicious and tears his hair over the "typical" Catholic college play.

Is the boisterous farce described by Mr. Hayden typical of Catholic college dramatics? I think not. As a matter of fact, in the past ten months, almost every Catholic college in this part of the country has produced at least one of the plays written by that "man named Shakespeare." Does Mr. Hayden's "goodly number" include the Shakespearean dramas so splendidly produced by Fordham, by Georgetown, and by Seton Hall College? Or did Mr. Hayden attend "The Tempest," presented by the College of New Rochelle, or "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and "As You Like It," played at Trinity College, Washington? Last May, the students of the College of St. Elizabeth celebrated the great tercentenary with an original play, "Will Shakespeare," at the Hotel Plaza, New York. Was Mr. Hayden in the audience? Surely not. But then his article did not criticize, it ignored the dramatic work in Catholic colleges for women.

Madison, N. J. GERALDINE WALLACE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Hayden's recent budget of entertaining criticism has admitted him to the circle of AMERICA's contributors who specialize in finding fault with Catholic colleges. Poor Catholic colleges! They should have died of discouragement long ago! Mr. Hayden destroys without building up; he complains of the woful state of college dramatics, but leaves others to grope for a remedy. His dissatisfaction, however, has indirectly accomplished a great good. It has opened the public eye to the almost insuperable hindrances that lie in the path of those who would produce a Catholic college play.

My three years of active interest in dramatics at the College of St. Elizabeth, Convent Station, New Jersey, have given me ample opportunity to observe difficulties even more momentous than those cited by Mr. Hayden. First and foremost among our difficulties is the dearth of matter suitable for production in a Catholic college. From the first grows a second obstacle, namely, that little of what is available can be handled with advantage by the average college student. Take, for instance, the "incomparable" dramas of Shakespeare. Probably nothing is so hard to interpret. And what, pray, is more terrible than Shakespeare played in such a manner that "Twelfth Night" is converted into a tragedy and "Hamlet" into a farce? A third, more practical problem is concerned with costuming and the expense of scenery. We have stumbled against impediments so great and so disheartening that frequently, after picking apart and rejecting everything in the theatrical publishers' catalogues, we have been obliged to fall back on original compositions.

Something there must be to obviate these difficulties; perhaps that something is the Catholic Theater movement. Blushing at my own audacity, I would hazard a suggestion. If the Catholic Theater movement would form a committee on college dramatics; if the society would establish playwriting courses under the direction of a reputable and competent instructor, the difficulties of Catholic colleges in the matter of dramatics would, I feel certain, be lost to sight forever. Then, if college students should continue to insult the public with "rip-roaring farces" and "tearful tragedies," they would undoubtedly be deserving of every iota of censure that drips from the pens of AMERICA's special contributors.

Madison, N. J. MARY O'CONNOR.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Is the article on "College Dramatics" in your issue of November 11 but another instance of vox clamantis in deserto? Some who have read it seem to be of this opinion. "What's the use?" they say. "We simply have to conform in this matter, as in so many others, to the spirit of the times." Shakespeare, they believe, and the other dramatic heavy-weights whom Mr. Hayden speaks of may be all right in their line, but they do not appeal to the modern audience. They would not draw enough of a crowd to pay for the lighting of the theater, let alone the costuming or the salary of the make-up man. We are in much the same position as the professional managers. We have to give the public what it wants.

Is this true? If so, things have certainly reached a pretty bad state. But it may well be questioned whether it is true. First of all, even granting that we have to suit the play to the audience, there is excellent reason for believing that many of the friends and supporters of our Catholic colleges are far from being pleased with the kind of drama of which Mr. Hayden complains. He is by no means alone in his objections to such plays. Thoughtful people the country over are asking themselves and others how institutions which have been founded in the name of higher education can descend to such vulgarity and frivolity in their theatrical productions. But then, "We must give the public what it wants, we simply must conform to the spirit of the times." A splendid working principle indeed for educators, especially for educators who belong to the Apostolic Church! The world's taste has become vitiated, depraved. We, forsooth, must pander to its depravity.

Little wonder that the sermons preached by zealous pastors and missionaries against the evils of the present-day stage have so little effect, when the directors of Catholic institutions of learning manifest such apathy in regulating the drama within their own walls. Principiis obsta. How can we expect young men who are trained in colleges where the more serious elevating kind of entertainment is taboo, and the minstrel "show," with its coarse jokes and near-ribald songs, is in favor, how can we expect young men who are to take part in or view with enjoyment such productions, to appreciate the warnings of their pastors on the dangers of the theater?

It is consoling to note, as the writer in AMERICA has pointed out, that some of our colleges have been striving to go against this downward tendency. But have we not the right to demand that all of them do so? It would be well for some one to draw up a "white list" of plays suitable for schools and colleges, plays "whose primary purpose is to educate the boys who take part, and the college world generally, to appreciate good drama." Who will get this white list ready?

Los Gatos. J. O.

Cautions on the Luther Controversy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The approaching fourth centenary of Luther's revolt and the observance thereof by the Lutheran communities have naturally attracted the attention of Catholics, and this attention has begun to bear fruit in the form of lectures, pamphlets, and so on. This is, of course, highly commendable; but there is reason to fear that much of this labor is lost, for the reason that of those who engage in it some appear to forget the elementary principle of all discussion, viz., that argumentation can lead to no practical result, if it ignores the adversary's point of view. We must accept that point of view or demonstrate its falsity, but in either case we have to understand it.

To launch attacks on Luther's personal character may have an effect on those whose plain common-sense shows them that a man of his character and personal life cannot have been a Divinely chosen instrument of reform; in their case this line of argument may lead somewhere. But to expect that the more scholarly portion of the Lutheran body, its preachers, writers, lecturers, professors, are going to be affected by that method is to misread the situation. These men have gone through their Denifle and their Grisar, and they know just as well as we do the moral failings of Luther. Therefore, to make much, in controversy with them, of the Reformer's lapses is to waste time, because from their point of view the virtues and the vices of the man Luther have little if anything to do with the matter. To them Luther is no saint; he is not even a first-rate thinker or organizer. They regard him only as the pioneer in a great work; his was the first step toward accomplishing what they call freeing the Gospel from the accretions and corruptions of fifteen centuries of Romish superstition, and giving back the Bible to the people.

Like all pioneers, they will admit, he did his work imperfectly, but he is still entitled to lasting gratitude for having pointed out the way. Nay, even if he has been surpassed by some of his own followers, that ought not to diminish his glory, any more than our reverence for Copernicus is lessened by the consideration that many an astronomer since his day knew more about the heavens than he did. Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coute. Since this would seem to be about the attitude of the average Lutheran scholar of "broad" views, it may well be suggested that the sooner the controversy is removed from the field of personality, the sooner we may look for converts from the ranks of the more influential members of the Evangelical Church. Where they go wrong is not in their evaluation of Luther but in their evaluation of his movement. We regard it as an attack on God in His Church; they regard it as the first step in a return to the primitive purity of the Gospel.

The Catholic disputant therefore must take his stand on fundamental apologetics, and show: (1) that the Catholic Church was established by Christ to be the means of salvation for all men to the end of time; (2) that no amount of "abuse" or "corruption" in that Church can deprive her of her Divine character and mission; (3) that reform in doctrine is absurd; (4) that reform in morals must be carried on only under the authority of the Hierarchy in union with the See of Rome; and (5) that in no case is one justified in separating himself from "the Body of Christ, which is the Church."

Dunwoodie, N. Y. EDWIN RYAN.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Advent.

AS there is an astronomical and a civil year, so, too, is there a liturgical year. And this last, since it marks the succeeding changes in the supernatural life of the Christian and the varying moods of sympathy of Christ's mystical body with Christ Himself, takes its course with sublime indifference to the reckoning that determines the transit of mere secular affairs. Not from January, therefore, to December, survivals of paganism, do the sands of ecclesiastical time run out, but from Christmas to and through the glorious Pentecostal days. The center of the Church's system is Jesus Christ. The expectation of His coming, His birth and presentation, His fasting in the desert and death upon the Cross, His resurrection and His sending of the Paraclete mark the successive phases of her ecclesiastical year.

Another of her years is just completed. The Christmas cycle has begun again. The sacred liturgy gives eloquent testimony of this important fact. There are many signs for those who see. Violet vestments, the omission of the Te Deum from the ferial offices and of the Gloria from the ferial Masses, a marked restraint in the joyousness of liturgical music and in the elaborateness of altar decoration, strict prohibition of solemn ceremonies in the celebration of marriage, precepts of fasting, exhortations to mortification, Gospels that set forth the heroic ideal of penance and the classic preacher of it, St. John the Baptist, and terrifying reminders of the tremendous judgment that awaits each soul when the universe shall have gone to ruin: these are manifestations to all the Faithful that the Church has entered on a period of preparation for some great feast. That feast is Christmas, and the period of preparation is the season of Advent.

The four weeks that precede the Nativity are devoted to preparation for the solemn commemoration of the beginning of Christ's life on earth. The Church will have no repetition of the cold welcome, given to the Saviour when first He came unto His own and His own received Him not. "Prepare ye," she says, "the way of the Lord." There must be no foolish virgins on Christmas Day. All must be ready when the bridegroom cometh. "Now is the time," says St. Paul on the first Sunday of Advent, "to rise from sleep." With the last stroke of midnight that tells the passing of the old ecclesiastical year and the coming of the new, the Church begins the Advent Matins, and cries aloud, "Come let us adore the King, Our Lord, who is to come!" This is the characteristic note of Advent. It is a solemn invitation to lift up the gates of the heart by penance and prayer that the King of Glory may find them ready on Christmas Day, and enter in, and fill them with the peace that He gives to men of good-will.

The Food of the Future

WHOEVER has thoughtfully observed the serene and self-possessed air of the average herbivorous animal, and contrasted it with the nervous, emotional temperament of the flesh-eating beasts, has doubtless inferred that the former's placid disposition is chiefly due to the habit of dining on herbs and flowers. That this is true, men of learning asserted ages ago, but now comes a scientist who insists that human beings could acquire the admirable poise and calm of the domestic cow if we could only be brought to a practical realization of what rich nutriment lies stored up for us in the familiar blossoms of the field and garden. The race of tomorrow, however, we are told, will learn this glad secret and instead of devouring, as we do, vulgar vegetables and slain animals, our posterity will fare daintily on bright and fragrant blossoms and become in consequence a race of poets, artists, musicians and pacifists. Then wars will be no more, the world's childhood will return and life will be one long, sweet song.

The reflections suggested by this scientist's discovery are most bewildering in their beauty and variety. Already the esculent nasturtium and dandelion grace our tables, but picture the menus of tomorrow, when our country's entire flora can be laid under contribution to furnish forth a feast. Nowadays the flowers that deck the mahogany feed only the eye, but tomorrow they will be the most substantial part of every meal. Imagination almost reels at the thought of the culinary marvels a tasteful hostess, seconded by a clever chef, could wrest even from the common fields. Fancy then what a conservatory of rare exotics could offer the kitchen. A dish of costly orchids would perhaps be a delicious entrée and a pièce de résistance made up of prize chrysanthemums would be a familiar sight. Moreover, when flowers become food, the fastidious diner need no longer grumble, for viands to flatter the most delicate palate will abound. Owing, however, to the well-known fact that temperament is strongly affected by diet, it is perfectly obvious that there are orators who should not eat anemones, other men who should forbear to lunch on tiger-lilies, while many a fair lady would doubtless profit wonderfully by a regimen of lowly violets and modest pansies.

But it is as a solution of the present "high cost of living" and as a promoter of domestic harmony that the food-value of flowers will be best appreciated. If a bunch of buttercups, culled by the hurrying commuter on his way to the train, can furnish him with an appetizing and inexpensive breakfast, and if a mess of warm daisies is enough to gladden his heart when he comes to the supper-table, how joyful and prosperous his career will be, and how serene and cloudless his home life!

An Olive Branch?

IN the Constitutions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, published officially in 1908, we read, in the Twentieth Article of Religion, the following statement: "Wherefore the sacrifice of masses, in which it is commonly stated that the priest doth offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt, is a blasphemous fable and dangerous conceit." With surprise, therefore, one finds in the fraternal address delivered before the last convention held at Zanesville, several months ago, the prediction that the time is coming when Methodism and "Romanism" will federate and cooperate:

> Methodism and Romanism are then to be the final forms of practical Christianity. . . . All Christian activities and forces are to be grouped under the general forms of Methodism and Romanism and in the great coming times these two will federate and cooperate, and through their combined efforts all the kingdoms of this world will become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ.

That these words, spoken by Mr. James W. Lee, expressed the sense of the delegates, seems to be clear from the fact that they were afterwards published, apparently with the full consent of the convention. It is of course true that the statement emanated from the Methodist Protestant Church; but as this organization is in agreement with the Methodist Episcopal Church on points of doctrine though it differs from it on points of discipline, it is clear that the former no less than the latter repudiates the Sacrifice of the Mass "as a blasphemous fable and a dangerous conceit."

What then is the meaning of this quasi-official pronouncement? Is Methodism growing kindly to the Catholic Church? Current history by no means warrants the assumption. Or does it believe that the Church will eventually acknowledge that it has been in error in exacting faith in the propitiatory value of the Mass, in the Real Presence, and in the dogma that Christ is really, truly and substantially present in Holy Communion? Hardly. The Blessed Sacrament has been the center of the spiritual life of Catholicism too long for even the Methodists to suppose that Romanism will ever come to regard it as "a blasphemous fable and dangerous conceit." Or does Methodism intend to admit that the Church has been right all the time, and that the Mass is a real sacrifice, instituted by Christ to be offered as a clean oblation in every place among the Gentiles? This, too, seems scarcely possible.

We know that the Methodist Protestant Church made overtures to the Methodist Episcopal Church a few years ago, being willing, it would seem, to waive so vital a difference as whether the episcopal hierarchy is a part of the institution of Christ. Perhaps some similar olive branch is portended in Mr. Lee's prediction. The Methodist Episcopal Church has not yet seen its way to a reconciliation. The Catholic Church regards a reconciliation as simply out of the question. There is nothing dearer to its heart than the union of Christendom, but the condition is Christ's condition, reiterated by St. Paul. It desires "the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," but that unity must be founded in "one Faith." The Church cannot cooperate with Methodism, so long as the latter refuses to accept the most priceless part of Christ's Revelation. It is another instance of Non possumus.

A Crisis in the Food Problem

A HOUSEWIVES' boycott of eggs has been begun in Chicago. A similar movement is agitated in New York. Plans have been proposed for making it State-wide and even nation-wide in its effects. The first impetus appears to have been given to this campaign by the public indignation aroused against the Chicago egg-speculator, James Wetz, who is said to control 9,000,000 dozen eggs in cold storage, and to have already realized $1,000,000 on his venture.

Interesting side-lights are thrown upon the methods in vogue among food speculators by the findings of the Wicks Legislative Investigation Committee of New York. By its aid we can follow in detail the history of 9,930 dozen eggs now being sold and consumed in New York City. It began with their shipment from the West on June 8. Arrived at Jersey City they were consigned to cold storage, where they remained until the first case was delivered for consumption on November 17. During the intervening period the entire number of 119,160 eggs had been sold and resold ten different times, one wholesale firm rebuying and selling them twice after its first purchase. The storage dues and insurance had been paid until January 1, 1917, so that the sales to the various speculators, who bought and held the eggs for a rise in prices, were on paper only. The eggs themselves remained undisturbed, but the prices mounted steadily.

Here is a single instance of the practical problem confronting the country. Other foods are held in cold storage in a similar manner, for speculative purposes. It is claimed on the one side that a real service is rendered the public by thus tiding them over the times when eggs are scarce. On the other hand there is an uncomfortable feeling on the part of the consumer that cold storage companies have "cornered" food products and are manipulating prices entirely to their own advantage. In reality it is difficult to say where the root of the evil really is. It is altogether a more complicated problem than may at first sight appear. There is a probability that the intimately related questions already submitted for public consideration: of stimulating greater productivity on the farm, of imposing a governmental food embargo, and of preventing sequestration of food stuff for an unnecessarily long period in cold-storage plants will all be debated in the near future. Apparently no department of the Government has hitherto actively interested itself in this problem. The Department of Agriculture was not concerned with the price of food and the Department of Justice showed no inclination to open an investigation. The coming Congress will, however, be obliged to deal practically with this issue.

He Kept It Flying

THE American steamship Chemung, commanded by Captain John L. Duffy and carrying a crew of thirty-five, mostly Americans, was torpedoed a few days ago off the coast of Spain by an Austrian submarine. The Reuter dispatch which tells the news, adds that the captain and crew were saved, and that the Chemung went down with the Stars and Stripes floating at the masthead. The gallant captain, backed by his patriotic crew, though summoned to do so, refused to lower the flag.

As to the legality of the action of the commander of the Austrian U-boat, we have only one word to say. If, after all the facts are known, any complications arise, the Government at Washington should deal with the case with all fairness and fearlessness. But as to the gallant conduct of that good seaman, Captain Duffy, we are quite sure that we voice the sentiments of all who respect and love the Flag, when we say that he did the right thing, the only thing that an American sailor could do under the circumstances. If his ship was to meet the great peril of the seas and go down to the dim and vast silences of an ocean grave, he claimed for her the full honors of an ocean burial. He wanted to see the same Flag flying at her peak, with which she had sailed the seas. The spirits of Lawrence, of Decatur, of Truxton, of Perry and Farragut applauded the deed. The Austrian gunners whose torpedo sank the Chemung must have admired the pluck of Captain Duffy and his crew, who when everything else was gone stood by the Stars and Stripes and kept them flying. All brave hearts admire the man who does not know how to haul down his flag.

Captain Duffy—May his tribe increase!—belongs to the same sturdy brood which gave saucy Jack Barry to the American navy. His conduct proves that in devotion to the Flag and all that it means, the race from which he comes, is ready to make every sacrifice to protect its honor and safeguard its rights. In times of peace, they are not the ones to jeer at the ideals it represents or to trample it under foot. On the contrary they bless God that under its folds, they enjoy the inestimable privilege of civil and religious liberty. In time of war they are the first and the bravest to rally round it, and at Gettysburg, Shiloh, Vera Cruz and on the waves of the Pacific and the Gulf, the first to see their blood upon it. It was too much to ask a man with a fine name like John L. Duffy—clarum et venerabile nomen—to haul down the American Flag. That is a task which he and "Kelly, Burke and Shea" are not used to and which they thoroughly despise. But ask them to run it up as high as their hands can carry it over the smoke and din of battle, on land or sea, nothing could thrill or delight them more For they respect and love it with passionate devotion. The call of the Flag will ever find a responsive answer in their hearts.

If Milton Had a Typewriter!

THAT Milton could have composed his poems on the typewriter is a question of grave doubt to Mr. Thomas L. Masson who contributes to the December Bookman a paper on "The Mechanics of Composition." He maintains that a masterpiece like "Lycidas," resembles a mosaic that must be built up bit by bit, and that a typewriter is a sort of "mental hazard," for "you cannot quite overcome the thought that a sentence, once you have begun it, cannot be changed." Such a haunting fear would have made impossible the perfect beauty of the "Hymn on the Nativity," for as Macaulay well says of Milton's poetry:

> There would seem at first sight, to be no more in his words. than in other words. But they are words of enchantment. No sooner are they pronounced, than the past is present, the distant near. New forms of beauty start at once into existence and all the burial places of the memory give up their dead. Change the structure of the sentence: substitute one synonym for another and the whole effect is destroyed.

The Puritan poet's choice of the right word, we may be sure, was not haphazard. His well-worn quill must have scratched out many a phrase and altered many a line before his chefs-d'oeuvre were perfect. Perhaps a typewriter would have made the final copy of "Lycidas" conform more closely to our modern standards of orthography, but as for composing the poem on the typewriter—Perish the thought! Indeed the wide use of writing machines by the authors of today is no doubt a contributing cause of the melancholy dearth of Miltons, save "mute, inglorious" ones, in our times. That fatal facility in composing which skill with the typewriter fosters is an enemy to art. Even works of genius, before they are perfect, must be submitted to the file, and masterpieces have required the limae labor. The achievement of the highest literary excellence is so largely due to the gift of knowing what to omit that in the opinion of many discerning critics, the passing of the ink bottle and the steel pen marks a crisis in the history of letters. For the mere time required for dipping the pen in the ink made writers select their words deliberately and lead them to leave in the ink bottle many undigested, ill-considered thoughts which now rush pell-mell into print from the keyboard of the typewriter. If the physical labor of composing were greater, would not the quality of our modern authors' literary output be far higher than it is?

Literature

THE NOVELS OF HENRYK SIENKIEWICZ

"THE novel should strengthen life, not undermine it; ennoble, not defile it; bring good tidings, not evil." These words of the Polish writer whose death has saddened so many hearts, might well form the motto of his splendid romances. In spite of inevitable shortcomings, the creator of Zagloba, Pan Podbipienta and Kmita, the singer of the heroic defenders of the national shrine of Yasna Gora, has been true to his ideals. The historical romances of Sienkiewicz, "The Knights of the Cross," "On the Field of Glory," and especially the great trilogy, "With Fire and Sword," "The Deluge," "Pan Michael," teach a lesson of faith, of patriotism, of Christian sacrifice and self-control. They bring tidings of a rude but heroic past, when "knighthood was in flower" and every Pole considered himself a champion of the Cross.

Viewed as a whole, the masterpieces of the trilogy seem to tingle and throb with all the elemental passions of the human heart. In the titanic contests which they record, the clash of Polish blades mingles with the twanging of Tartar bows and the war-cries of the Cossack. They transport the reader from the solitudes of the steppes to the splendors of princely courts, the turmoil of the tabor and the camp. They form a panorama of vast contending forces, where starosta and volevode, banneret and bandit, Turk and Christian, Swede and Pole, hero and traitor move before us like the billows of the ocean lashed by a mighty storm. Laughter gives way to tears; the Falstaffian humor of Zagloba is followed by the death-prayer of Pan Longin, pierced by Tartar arrows as he recites the Litany of Our Lady. They picture patriotism and faith conquering passion and pride, and through penance and humiliation and prayer redeeming the hardened warrior from his meaner self and lifting him to the heights of heroism.

In brilliant and sustained narrative, in range of character and variety of incident, in grasp of historical situation, in pathos and power, in dramatic insight, in energy of diction and Homeric simplicity of phrase, in the wizard-like control with which he sways his reader to the ardors of battle or the tenderest and sublimest mood of forgiveness and mercy, Sienkiewicz has no superiors in the realm of historical fiction. In the bulk of his work, in detail of construction, in variety of general plot, Sir Walter may be his master. But he must yield the palm to his Polish rival where the deeper and nobler qualities of the story-teller are taken into account. You may search the Waverly novels through and through, you will find no Zagloba. You will have to go to Shakespeare for his prototype, and though Shakespeare undoubtedly furnished Sienkiewicz with the idea of the "splendidly mendacious" and bibulous hero, we are heretical enough to think that the author of the "Trilogy" has improved upon the original.

Zagloba is a wonderful creation. He is a liar and at the same time the soul of honor; a coarse mouth but a good heart; a coward almost by nature and on principle, but when friendship or the country demands it, a hero who can fight like a wounded bear; a contriver of wonderful and amazing stratagems, but if driven to the wall quailing neither before devil or Tartar, and facing the traitor Radziwill in his palace, with the anger of a roused lion and the flaming indignation of a Christian knight. Neither in Sir Walter can there be found in the long array of his splendid figures one to be compared with the giant Pan Longin Podbipienta, the maiden knight, mild of speech and sweet-tempered as a child, but who can hurl stones that bring towers to the ground and whose terrible sword deals destruction to all who come within its awful sweep. The death of this hero as he tries to break through a ring of 200,000 Tartars and Cossacks besieging Zbaraj, is one of the noblest scenes in all romance. He dies with the words, "Queen of Angels," still trembling on his lips.

And where in romance is there another like the hero of "The Deluge?" This tragic story might well be called the regeneration of a soul. The soul to be recreated is that of the headstrong, uncontrollable young Pan Andrei Kmita. He brooks no check to his wild will, submits to no master but his passions, recognizes no law-giver but the battle-ax and the sword. But he is generous, has the rude faith of his people, loves king and country and Our Lady of Yasna Gora with a passionate devotion. How through sorrow and his love for Olenka, through misunderstanding and suffering of body and soul, Kmita emerges out of the coarser strata of his lower self up into the nobler realms of self-sacrifice and self-conquest is told in a series of pictures which cannot be paralleled in the whole range of the wizards of romance.

Sienkiewicz strikes a spiritual note lacking in many novelists. All Poland surely must thrill with a sacred flame of religious and patriotic pride as her children read in "The Deluge" the story, incomparably beautiful and soul-inspiring, of the defense of Yasna Gora. It is not the soldier-monks of the saintly Kordetski, or Kmita and his brave companions who are defending it. It is Poland herself facing the Swedish legions, and by her side is the Virgin of Chenstohowa, that mighty patroness to whom, even in her darkest hour, Poland has never turned in vain. The chapters that tell of this Polish Iliad should be placed in the hands of every Catholic schoolboy. And side by side with Zagloba, and the lordly and terrible Prince Yarema Vishnyevetski, nobler Agamemnon of the band of heroes created by the imagination of this great artist; in company with the more restrained Pan Yan, and the gallant Kettling, and the bowman Mushalski, and Basia, heroine-wife of the incomparable swordsman Pan Michael Volodyovski, is that mirror of knighthood, little Pan Michael himself, small in stature, for Pan Longin can carry him in his belt, but irresistible in the field. Pan Michael, the tender-hearted, but the terrible, whose sword is like a raging flame or like the bite of a deadly serpent, the turn of whose wrist brings death as quick as lightning, the sworn foe of traitors, and who, with this last message to Basia: "This life is nothing!" dies under the walls of Kaminyets rather than surrender to the Turks, is a creation almost as original and as captivating as that of Zagloba himself.

In the realistic novel, "Without Dogma," Sienkiewicz showed rare powers of psychological analysis. Here he put the soul of his anemic hero under the microscope and studied every palpitation of that diseased organism, inevitably tending to decay because his hero is without faith, and his soul is atrophied and paralyzed for life's nobler activities. Opposed to this sorry hero, Leon Ploszowski, is Aniela the heroine, whose faith is contrasted with his unbelief. Strong as the book is, with a touch of the psychological insight of Bourget and Bazin, it does not show Sienkiewicz at his best. Neither in "Quo Vadis," the work by which he is perhaps best known to English readers, did our author reveal his full powers. Splendidly as the contrast is drawn between paganism and Christianity, marvelous as the picture appears of the preaching of St. Peter, original as the character of Petronius may be and gorgeous the tapestry, on which the figures of Chilo, Ursus and Vinicius stand out, dominated by the terrible and repulsive form of Nero, it is not his masterpiece. There is just a touch of antiquarian self-consciousness, a sense of labored effort as of one matching together sparkling bits of mosaic in a studio. "Children of the Soil," with the noble character of Marynia, and that fine boy's story, as good in its way as "Treasure Island," "Through the Desert," whose hero, Stasch, is a lineal descendant in courage and faith of Pan Yan and Pan Michael, show us the real Sienkiewicz, always at his best, when he sings of Poland and the things dear to its heart.

Sienkiewicz has his faults. He should have spared us the repulsive picture of the tortures of Kuklinovski and Pan Azya. They needlessly shock and harrow us. Horace was right: Quodcumque ostendis mihi sic, incredulus odi! Sienkiewicz himself severely condemns that school which instead of picturing the minarets bathed in light, and the architectural wonders of a great city, lingers over the slime in its streets. With him, vice is always vice and his books teach that it is its own punishment and that virtue alone makes men noble and happy. For that very reason, we have a right to demand of him greater reserve than he has shown in certain pages of "Quo Vadis" and "The Deluge." These are mistakes to be deplored.

Speaking at the exercises commemorating the five-hundredth anniversary of the University of Cracow, the late President Gilman said: "America thanks Poland for three great names: Copernicus, to whom all the world is indebted; Kosciusko, who spilled his blood for American independence, and Sienkiewicz, whose name is a household word in thousands of American homes, and who has introduced Poland to the American people." No man can claim a greater glory than to become the interpreter of the Faith, the history, the heroism, the ideals, the sorrows, the hopes and the aspirations of his race. For his beloved Poland, Henryk Sienkiewicz wrote, toiled and died. His fame is secure.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

REVIEWS

The Irish Rebellion of 1916 and Its Martyrs: Erin's Tragic Easter. By PADRAIC COLUM, MAURICE JOY, JAMES REIDY, SIDNEY GIFFORD, REV. T. GAVAN DUFFY, MARY M. COLUM, MARY J. RYAN and SEUMUS O'BRIEN. Edited by MAURICE JOY. New York: The Devin-Adair Company. $2.50.

Six Days of the Irish Republic. By L. G. REDMOND-HOWARD. Boston: John W. Luce & Co.

It is fortunate that for the inquest on the psychology of the latest manifestation of Irish discontent there has been an immediate and ample marshaling of facts and arguments. The symposium edited by Maurice Joy presents a history of the motives and incidents of the recent uprising, described by a group of writers who knew the leaders, and speak dispassionately about them and the events that led up to the tragic ending of their ambitious enterprise. There is no whine in the appeal they make, on behalf of their country, to the conscience and common-sense of humanity. The causes, economic as well as national, and the history of the rebellion are convincingly explained and recorded, interwoven with intimate and fascinating accounts of the personalities and ideals underlying this latest political alignment in Ireland. The editor specially has designed to make Irish affairs clear to the American mind. In both the method and the matter of his work and the historical prospective he offers the book is very satisfactory. Some fifty illustrations, which include portraits of the leaders, fac-similes of their proclamations and scenes of the fighting, add to the interest of this vivid historical presentment.

Mr. Redmond-Howard, who is a nephew of the leader of the Irish Parliamentary party, dedicates his little volume to "Wilfrid Meynell, one of the few honest Englishmen who are English enough to be ashamed of the story of English rule in Ireland." Its pages, which have passed the official censor, are mainly devoted to an eye-witness's story of the eventful Easter week in Dublin. He calls it the "most inexplicable occurrence in Irish history," but adds that "the rising has lifted the Home Rule controversy, at one stroke, from the region of the village pump into the very midst of the counsels of Europe" by challenging "England's claim to be the champion of small nationalities."

T. F. M.

The Painters of Florence. By JULIA CARTWRIGHT (Mrs. Ady). New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50.

Joseph Pennell's Pictures of the Wonder of Work. Reproductions of a Series of Drawings, Etchings, Lithographs, Made by Him about the World, 1881-1915. With Impressions and Notes by the Artist. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. $2.00.

"The Florentine school of painting," says Mrs. Cartwright in her preface, "is in many respects the finest and most interesting in the world." She admits that its masters may not be the equals of the Venetians in depth and splendor of color, but they surpass nearly all their rivals "in beauty of line and elevation of thought, in grandeur of conception and intellectual force." In her comparatively short but informing and suggestive book the author has proved the thesis. She has undoubtedly splendid material to work on. From Cimabue (1240-1302) to Michaelangelo (1475-1564), every artist's name is an argument in support of her cause. And what a splendid roster! What other commonwealth can boast of such masters as Giotto and Masolino, Fra Angelico, Masaccio and Orcagna, Leonardo da Vinci, Ghirlandajo and Lorenzo di Credi, Benozzo Gozzoli and Sandro Botticelli. And these are but some of the leaders of a vast host. To the study of these great craftsmen the author brings a thorough and intimate knowledge of the subject, enthusiasm and discriminating judgment.

Mr. Pennell's book calls us away from the frescoes of the Sistine Chapel and the Madonna of the early artists, from the strange but fascinating architecture of the Florentine painters, and plunges into the whirl of modern life. The author brings before us with rare power the industrial and commercial features of our every-day life, but with the artist's gift he makes us see beyond the mere material features. He shows us by line and perspective, by a subtle blending of light and shade the poetry of the sky-scraper, the grim strength of the yawning "jaws" of the draw-bridge at Chicago, or the daring of the uplifted buttresses of the Woolworth building. The artist accompanies every illustration with a brief comment which as a rule is suggestive and illuminating. With Mr. Pennell as a guide, readers may learn something of the poetry of common things. He teaches how to see a campanile in a factory chimney, a Venetian palace in a warehouse and the forge of Vulcan in the furnaces of South Bethlehem. But with all his art Mr. Pennell cannot make us forget that oil-wells, coal-breakers, stock-yards, huge and impressive as they may be, are not Reims, Chartres, Westminster or Notre Dame.

J. C. R.

The Long Road of Woman's Memory. By JANE ADDAMS. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.25.

The science of sociology has come to be associated in the minds of many with a prying and insatiable curiosity that finds the lives of the unfortunate poor an interesting field to be exploited. Undoubtedly and unfortunately too for the good that sociology can accomplish when inspired and directed by the principles and motives of Christian charity, this association has contemporary justification; and it is just such books as the present that tend to confirm the attitude of distrust widely adopted toward many so-called social workers. The results of the investigations made by these students must, of course, be communicated to an anxious world; and so it is that confidences which the Catholic Church, and indeed every self-respecting man or woman would regard as a sacred trust, are rehearsed at length. It matters little that names are suppressed. What does matter is that the stories should be blazoned abroad, and, incidentally, made matter for sale. Social helpers might learn a valuable lesson from the reticence and the delicacy of the members of the St. Vincent de Paul Society. The absurd cant about race memory of which the book, we are told by the publishers' notice, may be said to be a study, is superficial and inconsequential. The coloring that the language and the ideas of evolution have given to the author's mind is here quite in evidence. It is not surprising, then, that the arguments advanced should be shrouded in the customary vagueness that characterizes the theories of those who, in spite of the teachings of representative scientists, speak and write as if evolution had proved its claims to be an accredited system of philosophy. As usual in works of this kind, the element of the supernatural is not taken into account; nor is there any recognition of the influence that Christianity has exerted and still exerts in accentuating the dignity of woman. J. A. C.

Organized Labor in America. By GEORGE GORHAM GROAT, Ph.D. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.75.

To prove the need of a suitable answer to the labor question is to prove the obvious. The sole reliance of the wage-earner, as John Mitchel has written, is in his labor. All he asks is a just return, and to this he has a right, founded not in charity, but in justice. "There underlies a dictate of natural justice," teaches Leo XIII, "more imperious and ancient than any bargain between man and man, namely, that remuneration ought to be sufficient to support a frugal and well-behaved wage-earner. If through necessity, or fear of a worse evil, the workman accepts harder conditions, because an employer or contractor will afford him no better, he is made the victim of force and injustice." These are fundamental principles, but so frequently are they transgressed in modern life, that even in the minds of earnest students, a just wage is held to be whatever the laborer agrees to accept from the employer. How the just wage, with all that it implies, can be secured, is the whole point of the labor question. In the present state of society, some form of organized labor is imperative, but it is also plain that no union can accomplish every needed reform, and that in the hands of designing or unskilful men some organizations have hindered rather than helped the cause of the worker. In chronicling the history of labor organizations from the standpoint of a jurist, Dr. Groat is not so much concerned with philosophy, as with the story of what has actually happened; but his occasional discussions are exceedingly sane. "Agitation, and even strikes," he concludes, "are justifiable, both legally and morally. Disorder, violence, lawlessness in any form, has no justification, either in law or morals." This, he thinks, is the lesson the labor union must learn. It may be added that employers too can study this lesson with profit. For class-strife accomplishes nothing but ruin. A proper readjustment is possible only when all parties meet on the basis of justice and mutual good-will. "At the time being," wrote Pope Leo XIII, "the condition of the working classes is the pressing question of the hour; and nothing can be of higher interest to all classes of the State than that it should be rightly and reasonably adjusted." But for this a return to Christianity is necessary, "apart from which all the plans and devices of the wisest will prove of little avail." P. L. B.

Heaven Open to Souls. Love of God above All Things and Perfect Contrition Easy and Common in Souls Resolved to Avoid Mortal Sin. By REV. HENRY CHURCHILL SEMPLE, S. J. New York: Benziger Bros. $2.00.

There is a strong tendency today, outside the pale of the Catholic Church, to de-rationalize and undermine all religion; so a clear, worldly-wise and forceful exposition of the reasonable grounds for faith and piety is very imperative. In the attempt to supply this demand the Rev. Henry Churchill Semple, S.J., Moderator of the Theological Conferences of the Archdiocese of New York, has gone in this volume to the very heart of the matter. His purpose is to show that the love of God is easy, or, to adapt the words of the poet, that:

> "God above
> Is great to grant, as mighty to make,
> And creates the love to reward the love."

The contrary error that love is hard and rare has been widespread even among Catholics ever since the time when Luther and Calvin started to expound their shriveled and gruesome notions about God and human nature. The reader of the present work will find this error traced in its history from the time of the Reformation down to William James and the Modernists and its influence at each stage clearly indicated. In this respect the author's mastery of evidence is such as almost of itself to establish his point. The work as a whole is constructive too and is mainly taken up in detailing the traditional Catholic doctrine on the subject in question. The author's theological learning and wide reading of history and kindred sciences are brought to bear on his thesis, and his book is addressed to all who have souls to be cheered and saved. M. I. X. M.

Uncle Frank's Mary. By "CLEMENTIA," Sister of Mercy. With Frontispiece by Charles Chambers. Chicago: M. A. Donohue & Co. $1.35.

"Are Cardinals, in one's antecedent notions of them, little men?" asks Henry Harland. And are Sisters of Mercy, likewise in one's antecedent notions, writers of novels? Vaguely or gratefully, as the case may be, one thinks of them, as at home on battlefields and in hospitals, as active in schools and refuges, and as efficient wherever the application of oil and wine to weary souls and bruised bodies, is the indicated treatment. But they have not, in this country and century, taken any notable part on the field of fiction. All who know our Sisters, particularly our teaching Sisters, are aware of the amount of literary skill which, save for classroom purposes, they prefer to hide under a bushel. When literary activity followed by publication is in question, the Scriptural injunction of setting one's candlestick in the open, has few followers in the convents. Good reasons, no doubt, justify this course, even as they justify the occasional exception. After writing a number of plays for school-children, "'Clementia,' Sister of Mercy," of St. Patrick's Academy, Chicago, has turned her facile and graceful pen to the composition of a novel for girls. The happy result is a book which will captivate the young of all ages. Thoroughly Catholic in tone, but by no means "priggish," this novel has life, vigor and color, and moves swiftly through a field of interest to a satisfying conclusion.

P. L. B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The December 8 number of the Catholic Mind will be found of special value by English classes and literary clubs, besides being an effective prescription for Catholic admirers, if any there be, of George Bernard Shaw. For Daniel A. Lord, S.J., writes a brilliant paper on "Shaw's 'Apologetics,'" in which that Socialist's views of Christianity, its Founder and its dogmas are laid bare and refuted. The second article in the number is Joyce Kilmer's "Suppose Dickens Returned," a paper containing clever conjectures as to what "Boz" would say about some of today's social and economic vagaries, and paying an enthusiastic tribute to Dickens's genius.

"When a Man's a Man," Wright; "The World for Sale," Parker; "Mr. Britling Sees It Through," Wells; "The Rising Tide," Deland; "The Wonderful Year," Locke; and "Just David," Porter, were the six novels, according to the Bookman, in greatest demand in thirty-eight American cities during October. These books have all been noticed in AMERICA. Another novel that is likely to figure in a future list of "best sellers" is "A Strong Man's House" (Bobbs, Merrill, $1.35), Francis Neilson's strong, journalistic tract for pacifism. It is the story of the trials that beset Sir Alfred Norton-Birkett, the "organizer of the Haigh Shell and Bullet Co." with branches in the chief nations of Europe. His theory was that if all the first-class countries only bought enough of his ammunition they would all be so well prepared for war that none would "dare fire a shot." But Haigh projectiles wound or kill his sons; his violently pacifistic daughters, one of whom disgraces herself, turn against him; worse still, his wife becomes a Catholic, and the book's ending is unrelieved tragedy.

Edith Emerson Forbes has done the children of today a real service in compiling for them an anthology entitled "Favorites of a Nursery of Twenty Years Ago and Some Others of Later Date" (Houghton, Mifflin, $2.00). She has gone through a number of old New England books, now out of print, and selected more than 600 pages of rhymes and ballads, and has reproduced also the quaint old woodcuts that illustrated those little masterpieces. Particularly edifying are the rhymes in "The School of Good Manners," a book which gives children such sound counsels as these:

> Do not allow yourself to look
> In letters, papers or a book,
> Till you have leave. If one is reading
> Don't overlook him: 't'is ill-breeding.

"Aunt Sadie's Rhymes and Rhyme-Stories" (Dutton, $1.25) illustrated, is a varied collection of verses which she made for her easily pleased nephews and nieces. Clara Whitehill Hunt in an authoritative book, with good pictures in color by Maginel Wright Enright, tells all "About Harriet" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25) a four-year-old who has a week's adventures. The title of the "Children's Post Card Painting Book of Sacred Art" (Kenedy, $0.20) explains the pamphlet's purpose. Models are set for outline pictures of the Nativity, the Good Shepherd, Our Lady, etc., which the little ones can color.

In "The Sunday Missal for All the Sundays and the Principal Feasts of the Year" (Benziger, $1.00), Father F. X. Lasance has added another to his imposing list of excellent prayer-books. Besides giving in English the liturgy of the year's chief Masses, the book has in an appendix the prayers a Catholic needs, and there is an introduction that admirably explains the value of the Holy Sacrifice.——"Maxims of the Viscountess de Bonnault d'Houet, Foundress of the Faithful Companions of Jesus" (Longmans), is a little book containing a pious thought for every day of the year.——Lawrence Gilman's "Christmas Meditation" (Dutton, $0.25), considering its theme, is rather melancholy, but it is delicately done.——The nuns of St. Bride's Abbey, Milford Haven, South Wales, have added a number of new subjects to their list of artistic Christmas cards.

Americans who have recently heard Rabindranath Tagore discoursing, report that his talk is made up of "beautiful fragments," but few of his hearers could understand what it was all about. Most readers of "Fruit Gathering" (Macmillan, $1.25), the Indian pundit's latest book of "verse," will probably be of the same opinion. He writes for instance: "I am like the storm-driven clouds of summer that, having cast off its crown of gold, hangs as a sword the thunderbolt upon a chain of lightning." But the average dull Occidental will probably miss the application of the simile to the author. Taking advantage of the vogue Mr. Tagore's visit to the United States is giving his books, "The Hungry Stones and Other Stories" (Macmillan, $1.35), a volume of tales translated from the original Bengali, has also made its appearance. "Golden anklets" often tinkle through the book's pages, but what the character is of the vital "message to the West," which this author's writings are supposed to convey, is a dark mystery. Is it to worship Buddha and aspire to Nirvana, and to make "joy" instead of "duty" life's watchword?

One of the finest lyrics in "Songs of Wedlock" (David McKay, Philadelphia, $1.00), "Tom" Daly's latest volume of poetry is "The Sanctum":

> Lord, God of love, the wedded heart's
> Sure Comforter,
> O! make mine pure in all its parts,
> For Thee and Her!
> Pour, Lord, the flood-tide of Thy grace
> Through all its chambers, and efface
> Each secret thought's abiding place.
> I pray Thee make
> One shrine of it, which Thou and she > May jointly share, that it may be > Open to her, Lord, as to Thee,
> For her dear sake.
>
> Lord, God of love, who givest me
> Her heart of fire,
> Long keep it mine, but let it be
> Not mine entire.
> Though mine the honeyed tenderness,
> That wells therein to cheer and bless
> When joys elate or cares depress,
> I pray Thee make
> Thy secret shrine within its core.
> Let me before one close-sealed door
> Cry Non sum dignus o'er and o'er.
> For her dear sake.

"Trouvère de Notre Dame" contributes to the December Queen's Work the following sonnet on "The Blessed Virgin":

> Sole star of dawn when all the heavens are bare
> And earth is still, expectant of the morn!
> The rose with sinless sorrow as its thorn!
> When God beheld His image formed so fair
> Within thy bosom, He descended there.
> Virgin, through whom mankind has been reborn,
> The heaven that we lost with Eve forlorn
> We gain anew and Christ who is its heir!
>
> Upon the tree of life a wondrous flower,
> In union still with God who made His heaven
> In thee, His Mother, thou to us wert given,
> Omnipotent by prayer as God by power;
> For His consent awaits thy prayer, and places
> In hands that multiply them all His graces!

The poem is among those submitted to the Queen's Work "poetry contest," the rules of which require that the poems should be in praise of Our Lady and not more than twenty lines long, and that the author inclose a pen-name for publication, in case his effort is found good enough to appear in the sodality magazine. The writers of the two poems which a jury of literary critics consider the best, will receive respectively a gold and a silver medal of the Blessed Virgin.

John Galsworthy seems to have gathered into "A Sheaf" (Scribner, $1.50) all the odds and ends he has written for papers and periodicals during the past few years. Many of the articles are scarcely worth preserving, but books no doubt must be made. As the dreadful human carnage of the present war has become a dull commonplace, the author's passionate pleas for kindness to animals are, to say the least, ill-timed. But to Mr. Galsworthy all "rights" are sacred except God's. The latter half of the book is the better for it contains the author's reflections on the war which are written with remarkable distinction of style. But whenever "religion," "Christianity," and the "churches" are mentioned the cautious reader will remember the author's well-known principles.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Richard G. Badger, Boston:
The Conflict of Jesus. By George Shaw. $0.50.

The James H. Barry Co., San Francisco:
The Missions and Missionaries of California. By Fr. Zephyrin Engelhardt, O. F. M. Index to Vol. II-IV.

Benziger Brothers, New York:
The Mass and Vestments of the Catholic Church. By Right Rev. Monsignor John Walsh. $1.75; Catholic Soldiers' and Sailors' Companion, The Catholic Policemen's and Firemen's Companion. By Rev. Thomas S. McGrath. $0.50 each.

Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis:
Robert Louis Stevenson: How to Know Him. By Richard Ashley Rice. $1.25; France: Her People and Her Spirit. By Laurence Jerrold. With many illustrations. $3.00.

Mt. Carmel Guild, Buffalo:
Catholic Calendar 1917. $0.60.

The Century Co., New York:
War and Laughter. By James Oppenheim. $1.25.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y.:
The Woodcraft Manual for Girls. By Ernest Thompson Seton. $0.40.

The Encyclopedia Press, New York:
The Sulpicians in the United States. By Charles G. Herbermann, LL.D.

Henry Holt & Co., New York:
The King of Ireland's Son. By Padraic Colum. Illustrated. $2.00; Fellow Captains. By Sarah N. Cleghorn and Dorothy C. Fisher. $1.25; Mountain Interval. By Robert Frost. $1.25.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
The Divine Master's Portrait. By Rev. Joseph Degen. $0.50; A Brief Commentary on the Little Office of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary. By Rev. Charles Coppens, S.J. $0.50; The Divinity of Jesus Christ. By Rev. George R. Roche, S.J. $0.25.

Hinds, Hayden & Eldredge, New York:
The Religion of Beauty and the Impersonal Estate. By Ralcy Husted Bell. Second Edition. $1.38.

Alfred A. Knopf, New York:
Music and Bad Manners. By Carl Van Vechten. $1.50.

John Lane Co., New York:
The Sunlit Hours. By Emile Verhaeren. Translated by Charles R. Murphy. $1.00.

P. Lethielleux, Paris:
Christianisme et Modernisme en face du Problème Religieux. By M. Tamisier, S.J. 3 fr. 75.

Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Co., Boston:
The Young Folks' Book of Ideals. By William Byron Forbush. Illustrated. $2.00.

A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago:
Our Field and Forest Trees. By Maud Going. $1.50.

John Joseph McVey, Philadelphia:
Development of Personality. By Brother Chrysostom, F.S.C. Introduction by Thomas W. Churchill, LL.D. $1.25.

Thomas B. Mosher, Portland:
At the Sign of the Lion. By Hilaire Belloc. $1.00.

Princeton University Press, Princeton:
Romance. Two Lectures by Sir Walter Raleigh. $1.00.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
The War and Humanity. By James M. Beck, LL.D. $1.50; Eleven Poems of Ruben Dario. Translations by Thomas Walsh and Salomon de la Selva. Introduction by Pedro Henriquez Urena.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
Is Christianity Practicable? By William Adams Brown, Ph.D., D.D. $1.25; The Life of Francis Thompson. By Everard Meynell. $2.00.

John P. Smith Co., Rochester:
A Daughter of Mexico. A Historical Romance Founded on Documentary Evidence. By Dr. A. E. Breen.

Joseph F. Wagner, New York:
Conferences for Young Women. By Rev. Reynold Kuehnel. $1.50.

EDUCATION

Julianne Speaks for Herself

THE first emotion I experienced upon reading Doctor Coakley's unvarnished indictment of myself and my classmates, for our failure to live up to our valedictory promises, was bitter resentment. What right had he to take my name in vain? Some of the girls cried; some of them stormed; Sister Emerentiana wrote to all of us, urging us in heart-searching words to realize our responsibilities. But all of them looked to me, as their literary spokesman, to vindicate our own honor and that of our cherished alma mater, so rudely assailed by the horrid Doctor Coakley.

The Retreat

BEFORE we had time to formulate any plan of campaign, Father Blakely's article appeared, proving that all convent girls were not so bad as I! It laughed us into good humor, and we had our revenge. Then I resurrected that valedictory, promising such great things "for God, for humanity, for the Church and for self." As we read it aloud, sober second thought stole over us, and we seven girls, the graduates of 1915, agreed to make a week-end retreat at the Passionist Convent, and then really to do something to show the world, and Doctor Coakley, that we were in earnest. We took along his scathing denunciation, as a self-imposed penance, and reflected upon it every day. It was not a pleasant meditation, to be sure. But a still small voice whispered constantly to us, in the quiet of that peaceful cloister, that it was just what was needed to stir us convent girls to be "doers of the word and not mere hearers."

A Resolution

WE all made a resolution to put ourselves immediately under the direction of our Pastor, Father Brown, and have him direct us in what we should undertake. It was not without trepidation that we called on him, and we missed a luncheon at McCreery's, and a skating party at the Garden, to find him at home. We thought he would overwhelm us with a burden of unpleasant duties, and we were more than surprised when he insisted that we should not attempt too much; that we should not neglect any home-work; and that our leisure alone should be devoted to the work he was to give us.

Carmelita was assigned the work of teaching catechism on Sunday afternoons in a small mining town, about half an hour's ride in her machine. She went from door to door, gathering up the children; took a census of the village, and was thus instrumental in having a priest visit the district once a month, giving her own machine for this purpose. Thus singly and alone she began to galvanize into life, an entire community that within a few years would otherwise have been lost utterly to the Church.

Genevieve became a volunteer social worker for the Conference of Catholic Charities, the clearing-house for all the Catholic charitable activities of the diocese. She entered upon the work with enthusiasm, for her heart was touched, her sympathies expanded, and her vision enlarged, by coming into such close contact with the many poor and afflicted, who are found even in prosperous times and in wealthy communities.

What Julianne Did

FLORENCE was given charge of a settlement school for girls, largely the children of immigrants. Nimble with her fingers, she taught them to sew exceptionally well. Now she takes small parties of them several times a month to the fashionable stores, to show them examples of first-class needle work, and thus stimulate their ambition. To Beatrice, Father Brown assigned the instruction of the children in the local hospital for cripples. She brings them to Mass on Sundays in her own car, and teaches them on Saturday afternoons. Henrietta was assigned to an evening class of about thirty Polish and Slav girls in the parish. She taught them English and catechism. In this way she saved them from the influences, which, until Henrietta's time, had stolen the faith of every Catholic immigrant girl, who joined the Y. W. C. A. To Caroline he entrusted the task of organizing a parish circulating library and reading room, thus putting good Catholic literature within the reach of the entire parish. And finally to me, Julianne, whose name has been altogether too much in print of late, he gave the Catholic children in the school for the blind, where about twenty-five Catholic blind boys and girls were to be instructed in their catechism, brought to the Sacraments, and to Mass on Sundays. For I too have been blind.

Thus each one of us was started out in a practical way to "do something for God, for humanity, for the Church and for self." But in order that our class might still have the semblance of corporate unity, Father Brown suggested that we enter the Duquesne University for an evening course in social service. He wished our efforts to have the solid scientific background, which would come with familiarity with the best Catholic thought on social welfare.

"Do Likewise!"

WHAT Father Brown assigned was quite within our capacity. It was intensely interesting. It took very little of our free time. It gave us wholesome occupation in hours that otherwise would have been wasted; and in addition to its supernatural value, and its cultural opportunities, we had the satisfaction of knowing that at last our days were not altogether useless. Life now took on an added pleasure, unknown to us before, because now we were giving, not merely receiving, and what we were giving was largely ourselves. When we graduates of the class of 1915 look back over the amount of God's work we left undone since the night of my memorable valedictory, and the amount we have accomplished already, with a little wisely directed effort, it seems that after all, Doctor Coakley's invectives were not the result of dyspepsia, or of the penumbral shades of Pittsburgh, but were due to the fact that he sees things as they are.

JULIANNE R. DE VIVA.

SOCIOLOGY

The Rural Apostolate: A Suggestion

I DO not believe that any apology is needed for suggesting still another form of Catholic activity, in addition to those which already abound in the pages of AMERICA. The wider the choice, the more tastes can be united. Sometimes a little concrete instance will reveal a field open to many, who as yet have found no work that quite satisfies them, and will start a train of thought leading to broader and deeper activities.

The Example

A FEW days ago, I was driving along the road through the small village of Pines, in the heart of a rather backward agricultural district. The yard of the local public school was filled with conveyances, and the little building was thronged with the more intelligent people, old and young, of the whole neighborhood. The government lecturer, from the Department of Agriculture in Washington, an enterprising Protestant lady, and the County Demonstrator for Women's Work, an enthusiastic Catholic girl, were busy showing the women and girls how they could cook something besides fried eggs and "sinker" biscuits; grow something in their gardens to cook, and by raising and canning tomatoes, earn something in some other way than by "nursing and laundering" in State hospitals, or by "teaching" in the district schools. Nobody could observe the work without being in sympathy with it, especially as the activity of these ladies was directed towards building up some of the very foundations of the home; and upon the stability of our homes depends our nation itself. But rural home life is valueless, if faith and religion be absent. Be it ever so carefully planned, from an economic point of view, a non-religious home contains within itself the germs of decay.

The Wrong Way and the Right

THE activity of these ladies was, of course, restricted in its scope, and the results were dependent on the receptiveness of their particular hearers. Their object was simply economic improvement. Great as is the value of successful welfare work in country districts, city workers in the country will often miscalculate the practicability of these plans of betterment. A still greater error is committed, when such economic instruction is regarded as a substitute for moral or religious teaching. Protestants all over the country in their alarm at the "decay of rural churches," a very real decay in Protestant communities, are proposing as part of the regular work of their ministers, numberless schemes for the instruction of country people in domestic and farm economics, and for organizing their purely social life. This is offered as a substitute for the teaching of the Gospel, a substitute which plainly defeats its own purpose. The summer schools for ministers, held at many of our State agricultural colleges, and paid for by our meek Catholic taxpayers, will give you an insight, if you look over their prospects, into the aims and methods of the evangelists of rural economy. Yet their aims and methods are not altogether mistakes; they aim frequently at very real improvements, and their methods are well worthy of study.

As a matter of fact, such rural welfare work has been and is now taken up, often with astonishing success, by many of our priests, especially gifted for it, in localities suited for such experiments. Such is Mgr. Bandini, whose work with his colony of Italian immigrant farmers at Tontitown, Arkansas, has won a national renown. Father Finlay, S.J., is doing something of the kind in Ireland. Father Gallitzin, the prince-priest, is a notable example of a century ago, in Pennsylvania, and the labor of numerous missionaries in every clime is following similar lines. Nor can we forget the rural work of those noble Brothers, who while they train boys to an agricultural life, exert also a profound social influence on the surrounding rural community. Lincolndale, New York, Leonard Hall, in Maryland, and Rock Castle, Virginia, are classic examples.

Purpose of the Work

BUT great as has been the activity of Catholic priests, Brothers and laymen in the field of rural welfare work, which is so eagerly grasped at as a last support by some of our discouraged non-Catholic brethren, still no sensible Catholic has ever thought of ranking it with the proper office of the Church as such, or of regarding it as a substitute for the means of grace. Such work is simply the natural consequence of Christian charity. At the same time it establishes that wholesome life which is the usual prerequisite for the practice of Christian civilization itself. Civilization, to a large part, presupposes a certain degree of rural prosperity as essential, not only to the stability of rural homes as such, but, indeed, to the stability of the entire nation. A prudent Catholic therefore will avoid the error of substituting such work for religion, and will not consider it outside the sphere of those truly charitable activities, which pave the way ultimately for the imparting of far more precious gifts, those of religious light and moral strength.

The Application

IF these good ladies, then, at the "Pines" were cultivating so enthusiastically a merely economic work, why then, I asked myself, could not some of the young people adventure upon a [illegible] and more pressing [illegible]: [illegible] "[illegible]"? Such an apostolate might include much [illegible] work, but it would offer a great deal of spiritual and educational help besides. Could not, for instance, many of our [illegible] members [illegible] take up some rural lay apostolate in a [illegible] way, individually, or in some organized fashion?

For many of us, the opportunity of doing such work in the country has an attraction all its own. As I write, the woods are ringing at the opening of the November bird season. Yet if we in the country could but borrow for a time the brains and energy of some of these young Catholic sportsmen, who have motored down the long eighty miles that separate us from "civilization," I would guarantee that spiritual trophies to remember and value, long after the outing and the game had been forgotten, would be gained. But apart from incidental vacation experiences, there should be many in our cities who would be attracted by a rural lay apostolate, taken up seriously as a chosen form of charitable work. For many, a month or so spent annually in the open, would be a great benefit.

Such work does not detract from other activities, since it appeals to many who may not be suited for social or catechetical work in the large cities. Moreover, much can be accomplished in the country by a simple repetition of matter already prepared for a city clientele, such as instructions, plays, lectures and musical entertainments. There is hardly any talent, however humble, that cannot be used either toward religious instruction, or toward social union, or even economic betterment among our rural Catholics. Given a companionable nature, a readiness to help, and some kind of an opening, and there are few who could not find an attractive field of labor.

John La Farge, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Jesuit Students

THE number of students in attendance at the various Jesuit colleges and universities of the United States during the current year is 22,732. Of these, 16,438 are in the college departments and 6,294 are following university courses. The enrolment in the latter instance at the two Eastern universities is 1,938 exclusive of two courses which have recently been opened. In the Missouri province the total university registration has reached 3,865. New Orleans has 215 and California 276 university students. The highest number is found at Marquette University, Milwaukee, which counts 1,332 students in its university courses. In the college department proper by far the largest attendance is to be found in the Eastern province with a total of 2,995 collegians. The following are the numbers for the high school departments of the various provinces: Maryland-New York, 4,720; Missouri, 3,620; New Orleans, 509; California, 817. The total registration at Denver is 300. The students enrolled at the Canadian Jesuit colleges are not included in the above enumeration. They number in all 1,304.

Fashionable Educational Practice

MR. THOMAS J. McCORMACK seems to feel that something is still needed to complete the perfection of the American public school system. For in his recent address which is published in School and Home Education, he charges "fashionable educational practice" with "playing hand and glove with weak humanitarianism and plutocratic politics." He continues:

> The organized forces of society are marshaled to cater in our schools, with a sapping Puritanic timidity as to theory, and with diabolic thoroughness as to method, to the ideals of a new sensuous paganism. Carpe diem: Wash and be saved; eat and be aureoled. . . . And the magazines applaud and the women's bureaus applaud, and trust educators, ensconced everywhere, wouldng [illegible] for the incorporation of the new "ideas." And the softening of the public brain goes on apace, and the "leaders of thought" kowtow to the idols of the cave.

Mr. McCormack is a hopeless reactionist, for he is old-fashioned enough to believe that Latin is almost as important as folk-dancing, and insists that skill in the use of the tooth brush should not be considered the equivalent of a moderate proficiency in algebra.

The Eclipse of St. Paul

ONE of the effects, occasioned if not caused, by Mr. Sunday's visit to Boston, has been the establishment in the Boston University School of Theology of a course in evangelicism and church methods. The lecturer is to be Dr. Charles L. Goddell of St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church of New York. This clergyman, speaking of the popular preacher's discourses, finds it impossible to agree with Mr. Sunday's methods but at the same time he expresses unqualified approval of the results obtained. According to the statement attributed to him by the press, Dr. Goddell finds that Mr. Sunday's good points far outweigh the bad; and with this view most people of dispassionate judgment will find themselves in agreement. But it is with a good deal of a shock that one reads the further statement. "Then I considered his virtues, such as the fact that he has led more men and women into the Christian life than any other man in the world." That St. Francis Xavier should not have occurred to his mind is not unintelligible, for this son of St. Ignatius was after all only a Papist; but that the Rector of St. Paul's Church should have forgotten the Apostle of the Gentiles betrays a lack of historical perspective that passes comprehension. The blame perhaps rests with Mr. Sunday. He is constantly leading his admirers into extravagances. Dr. Goddell's climax of extravagance is of a piece with the rest.

Convention of Catholic Convent Alumnae

THE second biennial convention of the International Federation of Catholic Alumnae at Baltimore was attended by 3,000 representatives from thirty-five States of the Union and from two provinces of the Dominion of Canada. The delegates were united in the desire of giving testimony to the excellent work accomplished by the Catholic Sisterhoods in the fields of education and charity, and pledged themselves anew to uphold the ideals of true womanhood set before them in their convent schools. The members of the organization were urged to use their influence with parents and guardians to induce them to send the children under their charge to Catholic grammar schools, academies, colleges and universities. The duty of co-operating with pastors and bishops in their local undertakings, was insisted upon and ways and means of developing and encouraging literary talent in the young were suggested. Special approval was likewise given to the fight carried on against the flagrant immorality of many of our moving-picture theaters, and the convent alumnae were asked to interest themselves actively in this cause. The Governors of the Federation in a special meeting pledged themselves moreover to extend throughout their various States and provinces a knowledge of the great work undertaken in the foundation of the Sisters' College at Washington, established for the higher education of the Sisters of all communities. They resolved, furthermore, to interest themselves in seeking to procure for it means of support. The organization is determined to "make haste slowly" by laying a strong foundation on which to build up the Federation during the years to come into a grand and solid structure worthy of the cause it represents.

Mothers, Daughters, Books

RECENTLY the "Illinois Federation of Women's Clubs" was severely taken to task by a vigorous lady who scored mothers for motoring, playing bridge and dancing, while their daughters were reading cheap magazines or vile books obtained from the "secret" libraries of fashionable schools. According to press dispatches the speaker declared that "in every girl's club, or in almost every one, there is an underground library." Practically the same charge was made against the schools. "In my niece's school," declared the complainant, "they place the books in the lower part of the locker, in a place meant for rubbers, and as soon as one girl finishes a book she puts it in the locker next to hers." Those mothers who had been negligent in regard to the literature read by their children were asked to testify to that fact by raising their hands. Nearly every woman present indicted herself. This brought forth these remarks: "We should have freedom of the press, but we should not have freedom of obscenity and sensuality. Sex novels are causes of divorce. A girl is judged by her home, by her chums and by the books she reads. Those books will make or break her." This is all very interesting but quite useless, especially in the case of many Catholic mothers who take more care of their poodles than of their daughter's soul. The curse of new wealth is upon such women, and the consequent bewitchery of folly makes agents of evil appear the most desirable things on earth. But what of the daughters? That is a question for mothers to answer on the day of judgment.

A Notable Anniversary

ST. MARY'S SEMINARY, Baltimore, entered on its one hundred and twenty-sixth year of service in the last days of October. Founded by Bishop Carroll in October, 1791, it has continued an uninterrupted apostolic mission ever since. Some idea of its fruitfulness may be gathered from the fact that it has given more than 2,000 priests to the United States, over eighty bishops to the American Hierarchy, and claims for its most distinguished son, his Eminence, James Cardinal Gibbons. This stupendous work is due, under God, to the unremitting labors of the Fathers of the Society of St. Sulpice, who have devoted themselves with unflagging zeal for many generations to the obscure but grateful task of impressing on the aspirants to the priesthood committed to their charge their own lofty ideals of sacerdotal holiness. To the Sulpicians the Church in the United States owes a debt of gratitude it can never pay. Their share in sending workers into the fields white for the harvest is simply incalculable. It is gratifying to compare the judgment passed on their aptitude for the work of the seminaries by the first bishop of Baltimore, the Right Reverend John Carroll, with the testimony given to their efficiency by the present happily reigning prelate of the same diocese, Cardinal Gibbons. Bishop Carroll, writing in January, 1801, to M. James Andrew Emery, the Superior General of the Sulpicians says:

> I declare to you, as I have always said everywhere, that I have never seen or known anywhere men better able by their character, their talents, and their virtues to train ecclesiastics such as religion requires at present, than the gentlemen of your Society.

One hundred and fifteen years later, Cardinal Gibbons, looking back on their century and a quarter of labor, in his preface to Dr. Charles G. Herbermann's "The Sulpicians in the United States," quotes the foregoing tribute and adds:

> I feel then that I am voicing the sentiments of the thousands of priests in this country who have been trained by the Sulpicians, when I affirm that the coming of Father Nagot and his companions to found the first seminary in the United States was a signal blessing of God to our Church.

His Eminence might have added, without fear of contradiction, that the same sentiment is shared by those, who though they have not had the privilege of being trained by the Sulpicians, have had eyes to see the character of the men who have come under their influence, or have read Sulpician history.

A Divorce Record

THE high-water mark for the dissolution by civil decree of marital relations was reached in Cuyahoga County, Ohio, this year, according to the Cleveland Sunday Ledger. This conclusion was deduced from the figures, published recently by Marriage License Clerk Zizelman and County Clerk Haserodt:

> Zizelman issued 8,445 licenses during the year and Haserodt recorded 2,037 divorce suits, which are pending or which have been disposed of during that period. The previous year, 7,447 licenses were issued and 1,770 divorce suits recorded.

This means that the ratio of divorces to marriages in the county is as one to four. Commenting on the data furnished in these statistics, certain judges assigned various causes of the unhappy state of affairs. Judge Pearson declared that people contemplating matrimony do not exercise "the ordinary sense that a horse-buyer uses." Judge Stevens gave it as his opinion that one of the controlling causes was "the lack of realization of the seriousness of marriage, both before and after marriage." Judge Kennedy believes that the avowed purpose of defeating nature and the aversion to children, with which many persons enter wedlock, are at the root of the trouble. Judge Levine puts the blame on the machinery of the law, which instead of seeking to effect reconciliations by smoothing away petty disagreements, "is used to its limits in finding a way in which it can take advantage of them in a divorce action." The figures given by the lower officials and the comments made on them by the learned members of the judiciary are an appalling commentary on the breakdown of family ideals in the national life of the United States.

The High Cost of Living

THE agitation over the exorbitant prices demanded for ordinary foodstuffs has given rise to some picturesque logic embodied in picturesque words. For instance these statements of a United States Senator were recently wired from Washington:

> I think the Government can help lower food prices by legislative or other action, but I do know there are ways by which the consumer can cut down his expenses. For instance, every one who can should keep some hens, and any man who has twenty square feet of ground can keep them.
>
> People should eat more corn products. Mush is highly nutritious, and it isn't eaten enough. Rice is too generally overlooked in this country. I was surprised to hear the other day that five cents worth of rice will serve as a substitute for bread for an entire day in a family of six persons.

Undoubtedly twenty whole square feet crowded with hens would be a most interesting and entertaining sight, but how long would the thronging creatures support a family of six or eight? After all even industrious hens deserve consideration. Then too the Senator is apt to incur official wrath. Imagine suggesting only twenty square feet for a group of respectable chickens! New York will be horrified; it demands 800 cubic feet for each unfeathered biped and probably almost as much for the feathered creature. And why did it not occur to the Senator that if plebeians began to eat mush and rice the moneysharks would put prohibitive prices on them?

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVI. No. 10
WHOLE No. 401

DECEMBER 16, 1916

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

Home News.—President Wilson's message read before the last session of the sixty-fourth Congress contained three important recommendations. The first dealt with the enlargement and reorganization of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The second urged that the power to control and operate the railways be placed in the hands of the Executive when such action becomes necessary in time of war or in any other similar crisis. The third was aimed at the prevention of railway strikes and lockouts until due investigation into the alleged grievances can be made. This proposal, the President argued, was not equivalent to passing a law which forbade or prevented the individual workman to leave his work before receiving the approval of society.

Proposed Labor Legislation

> It is based upon the very different principle that the concerted action of powerful bodies of men shall not be permitted to stop the industrial processes of the nation, at any rate before the nation shall have had an opportunity to acquaint itself with the merits of the case as between employee and employer, time to form its opinion upon an impartial statement of the merits, and opportunity to consider all practicable means of conciliation or arbitration. I can see nothing in that proposition but the justifiable safeguarding by society of the necessary processes of its very life. There is nothing arbitrary or unjust in it unless it be arbitrarily and unjustly done. It can and should be done with a full and scrupulous regard for the interests and liberties of all concerned as well as for the permanent interests of society itself.

President Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, and Frank Morrison, Secretary of the same organization, immediately protested against the President's program and labor leaders are preparing to intimidate all Congressmen in whose district a large labor vote is cast. It is evident that a bitter fight will be waged. In anticipation of any law that would forbid a strike pending an investigation the last convention of the American Federation of Labor had unanimously adopted the following resolution:

> Involuntary and compulsory labor once enforced even for a single hour, will not halt at temporary enforcement, but will go on and become permanent. The human labor power which this law compels wage earners to give to their employers against their will is inseparable from the body and the personality of the wage earners. It is part of the men and women themselves. They cannot be forced to work for an employer against their wills without reducing them to the legal condition of slaves and transforming their minds and spirits into those of slaves. No more dangerous proposition has ever been proposed than this compulsory investigation measure.

Owing to the hostile declarations of the labor leaders Congressmen and Senators are apparently not eager to be instrumental in passing the new legislation. The Interstate Commerce Committee virtually shifted to the Senate the initiative in acting on the President's recommendation and a strong opposition developed within the Committee itself.

The Federal investigation into the high cost of living has begun in earnest. Indications are that the probe will be nation-wide and will include not only an inquiry into the causes of the soaring cost of food, but likewise into the coal problem. Grand Jury investigations of the reasons for the rising prices of food are apparently still under consideration. The following outline has been suggested as the probable program which will be followed by public officials, although only the first stage of the work has been reached by the Department of Justice:

Investigation of Food Prices

> (1) Determination of the actual causes of the rapid rise in foodstuffs and coal, whether it is due to natural economic laws, to the unwarranted action of individual dealers and producers in advancing prices, or whether there exist agreements among groups of dealers or producers to boost prices.
>
> (2) Vigorous prosecution of persons or firms, if any, who, by violation of existing laws, in making agreements to raise prices or otherwise, have contributed to the upward trend of prices.
>
> (3) Enactment of legislation to remedy the present situation and to prevent its recurrence.

An examination into the methods of various exchanges in New York, Chicago and other cities is said to be under consideration, and an investigation into the amount of foodstuffs held in cold storage and possibly of the volume of grain stored in elevators may be undertaken.

The War.—During the week the Germans reached the summit of Hill 304 in the Verdun region, the Austrians made ineffectual attacks on the Italians along the Carso, the Serbians had minor setbacks near Trnova and Gradesnitsa, the British made a little progress north of Sokul and south of Seres, and the Russians took several ridges south of Kirlibaba; but in none of these places has any important modification of the situation taken place. In Dobrudja combined Rumanian and Russian attacks proved fruitless.

Bulletin, Dec. 4, p.m.-Dec. 11, a.m.

The victorious armies of the Central Powers have continued to sweep through Rumania. The Rumanian army that was compelled to evacuate Orsova has been captured west of the Alt River. In the north, pressing hard on the Rumanians who had abandoned Curtea de Arges and Kimpolung, the Central Powers proceeded rapidly down the Dambovitsa Valley, captured Targovistea, seized the Kimpolung-Targovistea railroad, turned east, and took possession of Ploesci. At the same time the Rumanians found that Sinaia, northeast of Ploesci, had become untenable, and withdrew from it and the passes south of Kronstadt. Their retreat, however, began too late for they had already been cut off from the south. Not only were the passes taken but a large part of the Rumanian army fell into the hands of the Central Powers. About the same time Campina was captured.

Meanwhile the army of the Central Powers, which had crossed the middle Alt and occupied Pitesci and Golesci, followed the line of the Pitesci-Bucharest railroad, and entered Titu. South of Bucharest the Teuton forces that had reached the lower Arges, recaptured Comana and Gostinari, took Nogoesci and Gradistea, and later all the villages on the southern bank of the river, and with high explosives began to destroy the fortifications of Bucharest. They then crossed the river and took the city. The Rumanians made only a pretense at defending the capital, and the greater part of their forces succeeded in making good their escape. The King and the Cabinet had already withdrawn to Jassy, and the inhabitants had been removed to Braila, Galatz and various cities in Moldavia.

Belgium.—A gift of 10,000 lire, about $2,000, from the Holy Father, around which the children of America are urged to build a large fund for further relief of the children of Belgium, has been announced in an autograph letter from the Pope to Cardinal Gibbons, made public a few days ago. The Pope was moved to make this appeal to American children by a recent report from H. C. Hoover, Chairman for the Commission for Relief in Belgium.

The Pope and the Children

The following extracts are among the more striking passages in the letter of the Holy Father.

> Profound compassion of a father has again moved Our heart, when We read an important letter recently sent to Us by the distinguished chairman of the praiseworthy Commission for Relief in Belgium, describing in few words, yet showing proof of most terrible reality, the pitiable situation of numerous Belgian children who, during two sad years, have been suffering from the lack of that proper nourishment necessary to sustain the tender existence of budding childhood. In most moving terms the chairman has described how so many desolate families, after having given everything humanly possible to give, now find themselves with nothing left with which to appease the hunger of their little ones.
>
> He has made Us see, almost as if they were passing before these very eyes, dimmed with tears, the long file, continuously increasing, of Belgian infants waiting for their daily distribution of bread; unhappy little ones whose bodies, emaciated by lack of proper nutrition, bear out infrequently the impress of some deadly sickness brought about by their failure to receive the food which children of their age require.

After stating that Mr. Hoover had informed him of the inability of the Commission to provide any more extra food for the children, the Holy Father says:

> In this emergency the worthy chairman has turned his thought and his heart to the millions of children of your happy, noble America, who, in the abundance with which they are now surrounded, could they be given an exact idea of the pitiable and unfortunate condition of their little fellow-creatures in Belgium . . . would not hesitate a moment to cooperate heartily, in accordance with some prearranged plan, to come promptly to the relief of these needy Belgian babies.
>
> In view of this condition of affairs, We have considered the work indicated so humanitarian and so holy that, in prompt compliance with the appeal addressed to Us . . . We have decided to approve and recommend it, as We hereby do indorse it most heartily by these words to you, My Lord Cardinal, and through you, to the illustrious members of the American Episcopate, to the clergy and to every generous heart; but particularly to those children of America upon whom is based every hope of success for the plan devised by this beneficent institution.
>
> Neither do We doubt, in truth, that the happy children of America, without distinction of faith or of class, at this approach of another winter . . . will vie, in their innocent pride, with each other to be able to extend to their little brothers and sisters of the Belgian nation, even though across the immense ocean, the helping hand and the offerings of that charity which knows no distance.
>
> The words of our Divine Redeemer, "As long as you did it to one of these my least brethren, you did it to me," so appropriately brought to mind in these circumstances, are a sure pledge of heavenly pleasure and reward; while We feel likewise, how greatly, in this period of atrocious fratricidal carnage, even in the eyes of the world, are ennobled the people of more fortunate lands by the performance of true and loving deeds and by the pouring of a little balm upon the wounds of those less fortunate.

After expressing his confidence in the generous help all will give the work, the Holy Father announces the gift referred to above, and invokes God's blessings on all who shall "second and aid this noble and delicate undertaking."

France.—For some time past the Chamber of Deputies has been holding secret sessions, in which the public knew the gravest questions were being discussed, and the outcome of which they could only with difficulty surmise. On the night of December 7 the results were made known. The Chamber, by a vote of 344 to 160, passed a resolution expressing confidence in the Government for its conduct of the war. For several days dispatches from Paris had hinted that the outcome of the secret sessions would be a complete reorganization of the Government and the higher command, including the removal of General Joffre in favor of a younger man. Joffre's successor, as at first thought, and rumored, was to be General Petain. The latter is said to have declined unless a much larger measure of power were given him than the Government was willing to grant.

Vote of Confidence in the Government

On December 6 Pierre Renaudel, a leader of the Radicals, declared in the Socialist organ Humanité, that the Chamber would demand a Government closely approaching the Committee of Public Safety of the French Revolution. It was also predicted that a General Assembly would be held, the summoning of which would have meant a general election. These predictions were swept aside by the action of the Chamber. The very decisive vote of 344 to 160 means for the present at least the continuation of the Briand Cabinet and President Poincaré's Administration.

It is possible, the dispatches add, that Briand, to save his Cabinet, agreed upon a revision of the supreme command as a condition of his receiving a vote of confidence. In that event the opponents of Joffre, who are dissatisfied with the Fabian tactics pursued by the General-in-Chief, would be triumphant, and the appointment of General Nivelle, suggested by Petain, will follow. Nothing of such an appointment has been heard at this date.

Germany.—The representations made by the United States regarding the Belgian labor problem have been met in a friendly spirit by the German Government. A formal reply has not been sent at the present writing, but in an interview given to the Secretary of the American embassy the German Chancellor met the various objections that had been raised. To the criticism that the measure was being applied indiscriminately to the employed as well as to the unemployed, the Chancellor answered that this was contrary to the wish of the Government. Only the really unemployed would be taken, and wherever errors had occurred the victims would be returned to Belgium. An official explanation of this phase of the problem had previously been given to the effect that out of 1,200,000 persons engaged in Belgian industries 505,000 were wholly without work owing to the English embargo, and that in consequence 1,560,000 people were dependent upon public charity. More than 300,000,000 francs had already been spent in supporting them. The accusation that this state of affairs is due to the requisition of raw material by Germany was declared unjust. "These requisitions are made as a rule only where factories were unable to continue operations." Compulsory transfer of workmen was resorted to only where idle persons refused to accept work at reasonable wages. Tens of thousands voluntarily accepted work in Germany at profitable wages. But conditions in Belgium gradually became worse, the official document continues, and it not only became a right, but a social duty for the German Government to act.

The Belgian Labor Problem

Hence the ordinances must be enforced more vigorously in order to relieve the situation. Before compulsory transport, however, every idle person has the opportunity to accept profitable work voluntarily on contract, and compulsion is resorted to only where the laborer stubbornly refuses. Workmen coming to Germany are placed on the same footing as Germans and are earning higher wages than they ever received in Belgium. Steps have been taken to send part of their earnings to their families in Belgium. The laborers are also permitted to make regular visits to their homes, and families are allowed to accompany them to Germany, if that is desired. Provision also is made for religious services in their own language.

The point urged by the United States that employees of the Belgian Relief Commission should not be deported was instantly granted, since they were not regarded as unemployed. It was likewise promised that Belgian officials shall not be liable to arrest for refusing to deliver lists of unemployed. Complaints on this score, it was pointed out, were largely exaggerated. Only one Belgian mayor had been arrested for this reason, and he had already been set at liberty. The one request of the United States Government left ungranted was that unemployed heads of families be not deported. It was thought that unemployment on their part would aggravate the evils which the Government sought to remedy. It has been stated unofficially that the military aspect of the situation must likewise be taken into consideration. Under the supposition of the landing of a military force in Belgium the presence of a large assemblage of able-bodied adults, who had already shown a disposition to make trouble, would constitute a serious menace in the immediate rear of the German defense. "As is usual in war, military reasons prevail." The assurance is, however, given that the deported workmen will in no sense be forced to engage in labor that will react against their own country. Such in outline is the German explanation.

Great Britain.—According to the Court Circular, on December 5, "the Right Honorable Mr. Asquith had an audience with the King, and offered his resignation as Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury, which the King has been graciously pleased to accept." Mr. Asquith became Premier in 1908, in succession to Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. Shortly after the outbreak of the war, his Liberal Cabinet became the object of continued and incisive criticism, particularly with regard to the management of the naval forces of the Empire. So bitter was this campaign, that on May 26, 1915, the formation of a Coalition Cabinet was forced; Mr. Asquith, however, was retained as Premier. The Coalition never operated with desirable smoothness, and with the demand, voiced by Mr. Lloyd-George, for the organization of a smaller War Council, came the crisis. On December 6, the party leaders, Messrs. Asquith and Lloyd-George of the Liberals, Messrs. Bonar Law and Balfour of the Unionists, and Mr. Arthur Henderson of the Laborites, were summoned to confer with the King at Buckingham. After this conference, the King requested Mr. Law to form a new Cabinet; but Mr. Law "intimated," reports the Court Circular, "that he was unable to form an administration. Thereupon the King summoned Mr. Lloyd-George who at His Majesty's request undertook to endeavor to form an administration."

The New Ministry

Under the new Premier, the Cabinet will be small, and the Foreign Department will be reorganized. It is believed that Sir Edward Grey, Lord Robert Cecil and Lord Crewe will be dropped, but the new members of the Government had not been announced by December 12. It is thought that the War Council, from which the Cabinet will take its orders, will be composed of the Premier, Mr. Law, Lord Milner and Lord Curzon. "Whatever government arises," declares Lord Northcliffe, "it can not but be an immense improvement on that which has disappeared." H. W. Massingham, writing in the Nation, calls the venture "a leap in the dark." "I should venture an opinion," says G. K. Chesterton, in the New Statesman, "that Asquith and his colleagues would win easily indeed, in spite of the power of the press against them, if the people were called on for a decision." According to the Daily Chronicle, the new government will be "a one-man government," with the premier assuming "responsibilities as great as Lincoln's." "The old War Council was too easy-going, too tolerant, too anxious to conciliate. There will be nothing of this kind about the new chief. He will be forceful and decisive in all that he does."

Ireland.—Writing in Ireland for December 9, in a paper entitled "A Calm Survey of Present Conditions," Bishop O'Donnell, of Raphoe, makes a plea for national unity, affirms that in spite of the trials and storms of two years, the nation is still united on the main policy and aim, sees in the immediate concession of Home Rule a remedy for the evils under which Ireland is suffering, and states his conviction that it is surely time that England should put an end in Ireland to what he calls a system of "un-Irish" rule.

Bishop O'Donnell on the Situation

Among the many striking statements of the Irish prelate are the following. He believes that the country is still at Mr. Redmond's back. He says:

> In Ireland we have had a fair share of disruptive tendencies, and something more than a fair share of disruptive language. But the marvel is that, after the inevitable failure of two ill-starred short cuts in one year, rebellion and partition, so much genuine cohesion should remain. The country, on the whole, is still at Mr. Redmond's back, because in existing circumstances the Nationalist Party, supported by the National Organization, is the one power that can make headway for Ireland on the path of freedom. People say the Irish leaders made mistakes before the war and after. I suppose they did. Does anyone fancy it would be possible to bear a leading part in these troubled times and not make mistakes? If we wait for unerring leaders, we should wait until the water under the bridge runs dry. They are not to be had, and never were and never shall be. Statesmen and politicians have their faults and failings, like other men, and, more than most other men, are the victims of expediency.

While paying tribute to the Irish leaders, he believes in fair and independent criticism of their action when necessary. In speaking of the Ulster difficulty, he says that it is not often that a minority or a portion of a majority opposed to change have a prospect of exemption from a law they do not like. Continuing, he writes:

> In that respect the Unionists of Ulster, or some of them, have scored so far a remarkable record. They succeeded because Sir Edward Carson had something like an army at his back. Otherwise the idea of exemption would not have been entertained in Parliament. Our neighbors across the water admire right, but they pay a good deal of attention to might. The time, however, may not be far distant when those who, rather than touch Home Rule, went in for a separate scheme of government in Ireland, will look back upon the proposition to find no satisfaction in it except as an able move in the inevitable struggle that had to go on. If the question could be shorn of its antecedents the last thing wise Irishmen should desire would be to set up a most expensive system of government, devised to tie them to England and separate them from Ireland.

A Parliament for Ireland to settle her own affairs and an end to a system of un-Irish rule is the dream and the hope of the Bishop of Raphoe.

Rome.—At the secret consistory held on December 4, which was attended by twenty-eight Cardinals, the Holy Father announced the creation of the ten new cardinals whose names were published in AMERICA some time ago. The public consistory was held on December 7, in the Hall of Beatifications, in the presence of several thousand persons. It has been rumored that two more prelates, the Archbishops of Breslau and of Prague are to receive the red hat. In the allocution delivered by the Holy Father at the private consistory, he announced the completion of the revised code of canon law. The Pope said that credit for the new code was due to his predecessor Pius X., and paid a fine and well-deserved tribute to Cardinal Gasparri, Papal Secretary of State, who bore the brunt of the work. Cardinal Gasparri was appointed Camerlengo of the Church, in succession to the late Cardinal della Volpe.

The Consistories

Referring in his address to the present war the Holy Father said:

> It is well to recall, aside from the laws of God, that if even the law of man was obeyed at present, peace and prosperity would reign in Europe. If We neglect or disdain laws and authority, discord is the sure result. This is the highest social law. As a result of ignoring this law we see every principle of right violated in Europe. . . . I cannot but deplore again these crimes.

The Pope concluded his remarks with the prayer that, as the new code of canon law would mark a more tranquil epoch for the Church, so also the time might come when the spirit of law might again be respected in the world and bring harmony and prosperity to the nations.

The Philosophical Bigamist

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

HIS honor, the philosophical judge, closed the volume of the eminent psychologist reluctantly and laid it with his topcoat and his hat. He had just finished a most absorbing section on the human soul in which the writer in his graceful style had waged relentless war on the personal, individual, substantial soul. It was cleverly done; wit had shone, a little touch of satire had brightened the page, there was all the charm of literary allusion and indirect quotation; and, thought his Honor, it had left the poor old antiquated idea of a substantial human soul without a prop to lean on. All thought was ultimately reducible to nerve processes; and all nerve processes were identical with material activity. His Honor smiled a bit pityingly at the thought that there were actually some people in the world who believed in a human soul.

Then, with the smile still on his lips, he shook his shoulders until his coat collar rested comfortable, threw his cigar stump on top of the bailiff's "five-center" and the clerk's cigarette, and solemnly entered the courtroom. All who knew him well, recognized that the judge was proud of his philosophical habits of study; but he made his money by being judge.

The first case in the docket was listed as bigamy. The judge donned his largest tortoise-rimmed glasses and frowned down upon the prisoner at the bar. Bigamy was a crime on which the judge was particularly severe. A term of five years on the baseball team at Sing Sing was no infrequent sentence.

But the prisoner stood before him, a debonair smile on his sensuous lips and his head thrown back at an angle which permitted him to return his Honor's glare with compound interest. He was a large, sticky specimen of masculinity, overfed and overdrunk, the sort whose brows were always clammy and who had the unpleasant habit of licking his full lips. His bulky frame and bright raiment contrasted blatantly with the plaintiff's figure and garb, a thin, sunken-chested woman with faded roses on her hat and cheeks, and a dress which was reminiscent of former fashions and former owners. Even more in contrast were the tears in her eyes and the cold leer in his. Strange how a broken, beaten woman will fight for the possession of the brute who hates her.

The judge listened to her plaint with growing wrath. It was a wretched story told in English that reeked of gutters and the cheapest tenements and was interspersed with sobs and snifflings that made the judge writhe internally. The prisoner had married her seven years previously after meeting her at a dance-hall. He was the dissolute son of well-to-do parents, dismissed from college after his sophomore year and subsequently disowned by his father. She was a waitress in an uptown restaurant. For four years he had led her a life that had annihilated her frail physical attractiveness and left her without courage to do more than cringe under his domination. Then he had left her penniless. A month before, she had found him married to another woman, and she wanted him back. Even the flippant reporters were touched by her pitiful story, and they saw lightning in the judge's eye as he addressed the prisoner.

"Do you admit the truth of this woman's accusations?"

The prisoner's smile, if anything, grew more humid "I do, your Honor, but remember it all took place seven years ago."

The judge's glasses trembled with wrath. "Is that supposed to be an excuse for your neglect and abuse of this woman? Does that account for your leaving this woman for another? Is the fact that you married this woman seven years ago any extenuation for the crime of bigamy?"

The prisoner leaned forward confidentially and spoke in an oily voice: "Your Honor, I congratulate myself on being presented at your court. You too, I understand, are a philosopher."

The judge's mouth opened and closed with a fish-like movement, while every man in the court gasped like a tender youth thrown suddenly into cold water.

"Because," went on the prisoner, heedless of the court's surprise, "we shall understand each other so much better. I too read and admire your favorite author, who, by the way, taught my favorite college professor. I am a practical philosopher. So your Honor will understand me when I say that I left this woman because of a philosophical scruple."

The eyes of the judge seemed bursting from their natural setting, but when he tried to speak, astonishment held the words fast in his throat.

"Your Honor, we philosophers have tender consciences, and though this woman has told a truthful story, she was wrong in saying that she was the woman I married. And surely a man of your spotless honor will respect me for refusing to live with a woman I never married."

The woman who had been sniffling and wiping her eyes suddenly stopped in wonder and indignant protest. "Your Honor, I did marry him, I did, I did."

"One moment," said the judge, soothingly, and then he turned to the prisoner, and the dam which had obstructed his words broke. "In all the days I have spent on the municipal bench, I had yet to meet with your equal for impertinence. You admit this woman's story, and then deny that you ever married her. Do you take this courtroom for a nest of simpletons?"

"No, your Honor, but for the sanctuary of trained philosophers. To you, as a philosopher, I appeal. Let me explain. You and I, your Honor, are not so antiquated as to believe in the reality of a personal soul, I trust."

"Of course not," blustered his Honor; "but that has nothing to do with the case."

"A moment, your Honor; it has everything to do with it. Philosophy is the law of life, and I am a practical philosopher. I do not believe in a personal soul, for I recognize that all mental activity is ultimately reducible to nerve processes which in turn are material or bodily."

"If you mean," said his Honor, "that all thought is ultimately reducible to modifications of the nerves, especially those of the brain, we agree. That is necessary, if one denies the soul."

The prisoner smiled. The court sat at attention and the woman in the plaintiff's chair ceased sniffling at this exhibition of mental acumen on the part of "her man."

"I knew we were of one mind philosophically at least. Now it is a known fact, proved beyond shadow of doubt, that our bodies with their nerves and brain cells change completely in the course of seven years. Old nerves and cells are cast off and new ones formed from the food we consume, until there is nothing left of what was once our old body. Am I correct?"

The judge nodded. The fact was well known to him as it is to all scientists, Catholic as well as infidel.

"And we agreed in advance," went on the prisoner, "that I have no soul. Hence all my personality is made up of my body with its nerve modifications. Now let me state my point. Seven years ago, I married this woman. Time went on; gradually every nerve and fiber of her body and mine was cast off and replaced by new nerves and new fibers, until today our bodies are completely changed from the bodies we had when first we married. We agree, your Honor, that there is no substantial soul, only a body; and if this is the case, I am not the same person who married seven years ago; and this woman is not the woman I married just that number of years ago."

His Honor glared helplessly at his hands, then frowned at the prisoner, and then rapped viciously for order as a titter ran through the courtroom. At last he thundered at the prisoner:

"Your conclusion is perfectly absurd. If it were true, there would be no possibility of collecting debts; for the person who contracted them ceases to exist. Prison sentences would be ridiculous, for the man who committed the crime passes altogether out of existence. The whole paraphernalia of our courts and prisons would be a preposterous injustice."

"And so precisely, on philosophical grounds, I claim that it is. Without that absurdity called a soul, there is only the body left. The body changes entirely in the course of seven years, and the man who existed before that time has been succeeded by a new and distinct person. Your Honor, in justice to a philosophy which we both admire, cannot surely punish me for a wrong which I never committed."

His Honor swallowed rapidly three times, shook his shoulders, and then thrust forth his chin menacingly. "When philosophy interferes with the working of justice, philosophy has to go. When the philosopher comes in conflict with the judge, the philosopher must give way. If it is necessary to admit a substantial soul before I can convict you, I admit a soul. You will have ample time to meditate on the futility of philosophy at Sing Sing. In the interim I request the bailiff to throw into the furnace a book which he will find with my coat and hat. Call the next case."

The Question of "Merry" and "Happy"

GILBERT K. CHESTERTON

IN the dark house of infancy I can still darkly trace the outline of an aged member of my family, more than one of whose phrases have lingered in the later generations. In his creed and atmosphere he was what I should call Puritan; he was one of the last of the old Wesleyans and one of the first of the new total abstainers. But because he belonged to the old England rather than the new, there was a certain heartiness in his prejudices and preferences. One of the things against which, Puritan that he was, he had a hearty prejudice, was the salutation "Happy Christmas." In his youth, he said, it was always a "Merry Christmas;" and, with one foot in the grave, he considered it an impertinence to suggest that he was not still in his youth. If he had lived long enough he might have seen the noble ideal of merriment even lower than the comparatively vulgar ideal of happiness. The sects or heresies since his time do not make or buy or send Christmas cards at all. But how horrible they would be if they could be sent! The Theosophists, as their name implies, would wish us "A Wise Christmas." The pessimists, between arabesques of holly and mistletoe, would wish us "A Resigned Christmas." The supermen, an unlucky little Puritan sect, would wish us all a "Strong Christmas." But then the supermen are by their nature incapable of corporate action; and their tall, tempestuous card, full of Tritons and waterspouts, would never be printed at all.

On the whole I range myself on the side of my faintly remembered forbear. I am on the side of "merry" against "happy." At any rate I am very certain about one thing. Some persons, for some reasons, did call ancient England "Merry England." No person, for any reason, has ever dared to call modern England "Happy England." Moreover, the word "happy" may apply to an infinite number of levels or platforms above that of pure despair. The word "merry" cannot be used by any people except the people in a certain pacific temperature of high spirits. We may talk of people being negatively happy. Nobody could talk of people being negatively merry. Merriment is a positive victory and, like most positive victories, it is rare.

On this, as on most other subjects, the cynic is wrong; and the cynic is most wrong when he is really a wit. One cynic who was certainly a wit, said, "Be good and you will be happy, but you will not have a jolly time." This epigram has every intellectual merit except truth, for, curiously enough, it is the exact opposite of the truth. The psychological truth of the matter is something like this: "Be good and you will be unhappy; but you will always be capable of having a jolly time. Even if you have had a miserable year, you may still have a merry Christmas—merry, not happy." Satisfied and secure happiness does not come to him that has taken up his cross or taken up his common day's work. Satisfied and secure happiness comes to him who has taken up his neighbor's landmark; to him who has taken bribes, to him who has taken drugs, most of all, perhaps, to him who has taken his own life. Solid, stolid happiness is a morbid symptom. It means paralysis or death or a philosophy that is worse than death. In such cases the power to be happy may mean nothing more than the incapacity to be unhappy; indeed, it will generally be found that the impotence for tears goes along with the impotence for laughter.

But "Merry Christmas" is quite a different question. The power of expressing, not negative happiness, but positive hilarity, that is the thing which we all know when we see it or even when we hear it, half a mile down the road. It is this power of rising into the seventh heaven of mere temper the moment a strain is relaxed; of being cut loose like a captive balloon or springing skyward like a released rocket, that is really the reward of virtue. It is not the power of saying, "Let us feast; for tomorrow we die." It is the power of saying, "Let us fast; for tomorrow we feast."

This is the true meaning of that concentration on special days, on special seasons of rejoicing, which has always marked not only the highest but the most high-spirited societies. This is what has especially marked our own Christian European society. Our joy of life has always risen into peaks and towers and turrets, into superhuman exceptions, exceptions which really prove the rule. Our art has always been religious art, in the literal sense of being restricted and dedicated. Our poetry has always been occasional poetry, in the true sense of being written for an occasion. That is why "A Merry Christmas" was the right inscription and "A Happy Christmas" was the beginning of our decadence. The phrase "happy" in that connection was no more than any good man should wish another for any day of his life. To tell everyone to be happy might be to make oneself responsible for a Utopia, a light enterprise. But to tell everyone to be merry is to make oneself responsible for a Saturnalia, a sacred responsibility, only to be undertaken once a year.

Benighted South America

J. B. Culemans

CATHOLICISM in South America is in the direst straits. We have it on the unimpeachable, well-authenticated authority of Robert E. Speer, whose work on "South American Problems" has gone into its third edition. Traversing the land in all directions, he has visited more than sixty Catholic churches and cathedrals, six hospitals under the care of Sisters and four schools and seminaries, surely a representative number from which to give a thorough grasp and comprehension of conditions on a vast continent. He has talked moreover with Catholic priests, but he never names them. He has talked with laymen and nuns, lawyers and doctors and business men, foreign and native.

The laymen had a luncheon in Buenos Aires, and according to Mr. Speer delivered themselves in this sapient manner:

> The work of the Protestant church in South America is warranted because the Roman Catholic Church which we know here is not in any sense the Christian Church; because only the presence of the Protestant church can by its convicting influence make the Roman Catholic Church moral and upright; because the ideals which the Roman Church has held in South America are intolerable ideals and must be overthrown (p. 143).

And Professor Monteverde of the University of Uruguay in Montevideo "spoke right out in meeting" thus:

> The Roman Church here is in no respect the same as that Church in the United States; it forbids the Bible to the people; its moral influence is not good; it hates inquiry and intellectual progress; it would prefer clubs of infidels to Protestant churches.

But we must listen to the woful tale as it is unfolded by Robert E. Speer from personal study and observation. His wide reading and critical acumen may be gauged from the apodictic quotation which he takes from Cardinal Liguori, to the effect that "the most virtuous priests are constrained to fall once a month (p. 156). It is regrettable surely that no references of any kind are given as to this interesting and unknown author. If Mr. Speer is a little careless in this regard it is undoubtedly because of his penchant to stray off into frequent asides like the following: "It was a long time before the American natives ceased to be excluded from the full privileges of priestly orders by the Catholic Church, just as they are still kept out in Africa and Asia today" (p. 116). Yet there are several hundred Catholic Chinese and Japanese priests exercising the ministry in Asia today!

In the course of Mr. Speer's travels his inquiring eye dwells lovingly on the horrors of the Inquisition. He says the South American historians, none of whom are named, however, declare that hundreds of thousands of victims were sacrificed. The traveler is still told weird tales as he stands under the carved ceilings of the Senate Hall in Lima, or in the old Cathedral in Cartagena, with the iron gratings on its windows, said to have been the grills of dark ages when men were burned over fires to make them believe (p. 122). In Cartagena alone, it is said, 400,000 were condemned to death (p. 63). How thrilling a narrative one can make by giving the reins to his fancy!

Even though the document was really accessible to the gallant Mr. Speer, Catholics familiar with the Syllabus would hardly recognize it in these extracts which are supposed to give the cause of South American backwardness.

> The best condition of society is that in which the power of the laity is compelled to inflict the penalties of law upon the violators of the Catholic religion; the judgments of the Holy See, even when they do not speak of faith and morals, claim acquiescence and obedience under pain of sin and loss of the Catholic profession (p. 131).

This illuminating commentary follows:

> The Defensa Catolica, published in Mexico City, declared plainly in 1887: In the Lord's service and for love of Him, we must, if need be, offend men; we must if need be, wound and kill them. Such actions are virtuous and can be performed in the name of Catholic charity (p. 231).

Catholic clergymen and Catholic churches in South America are both too few and too many in his eyes. It is made a reproach to Ecuador that there is a Catholic church for every 150 inhabitants; that, of the population of the country, ten per cent are priests, monks and nuns. However, the Catholic Church is censured for doing little to cope with the problem of evangelizing the people of Buenos Aires: there are only forty Catholic and ten Protestant churches, as compared with ninety Catholic and 690 Protestant churches in Philadelphia, a city of the same size. Then again here is the wonderful enumeration of ecclesiastical edifices in Quito, Ecuador.

> There are six monasteries, seven convents, ten seminaries, seven parochial churches, fifteen conventual churches, a cathedral, a basilica and thirteen chapels, covering nearly one-fourth of the area of the city (p. 179).

A wasteful surplus of Catholic church accommodations for a city of 50,000 people. When priests are too obviously few to minister to the needs of large congregations, and the bishops bring in more from outside, this is done with a sinister intention, and "the Church has apparently rekindled its purpose to dominate the land" (p. 133).

The Church, according to Mr. Speer, must bear the responsibility for still worse conditions. For it is not true to say that the present moral conditions in South America exist in spite of the churches there (p. 146). The South American Church has never waged any such war against impurity as has been waged in lands where Protestant churches are found. It has, by its refusal to recognize the validity of civil marriage, and by its own extortionate marriage fees, directly fostered illegitimacy. Its priesthood is the product of the immoral conditions it was supposed to remedy, and has accommodated itself to the standards surrounding it. No single agency in South America is popularly accused of a greater share in the responsibility for these conditions than the confessional. The educational progress which has been made, has been in spite of the Church and against its opposition. It has had its schools, but they were church schools, teaching the principles of the Catholic program in South America, and they were for only a section of the community. To the extent that the priests do now provide better schools, it is because of the influence yielded by the Protestant spirit (p. 148). The Protestant churches are bearing the chief burden of the defense of supernatural religion against rationalism and fanaticism and indifference (p. 150). They are needed to meet a situation which the South American Church has not met and cannot meet, because it has helped to create it:

> For the South American religion is the one religion in the world which has no sacred book for the people. There are Roman Catholic translations of the Bible, both in Spanish and in Portuguese, but the Church has discouraged and forbidden their use. Again and again priests have burned the Bibles sold by colporteurs or missionaries, even when they were the Roman Catholic versions. It is safe to say that not one Roman Catholic out of a thousand would ever have seen a Bible but for the Protestant missionary movement. The priests themselves are ignorant of it. In only one church did we find a copy of it, though there were service books by the dozen. And in that church it had apparently been confiscated in the confessional (p. 151).

Even the priests themselves, in former years, had to ask for a dispensation if they wished to read and study the Bible for a time. "I have visited many priests who did not have a copy of the Bible, and the few that do exist are in Latin" (p. 152) which no priest in South America seemingly is acquainted with.

Whatever limitations may surround the idea of confession and indulgences in the mind of the Church, the people understand that by confession they are clear of all past sin, which the Church has now taken over, and that, if faithful to the Church, they may do what they like and be sure of salvation (p. 156). As if this were not enough, here is another damning indictment:

> The very Crucifixes of which South America is full, misrepresent the Gospel. They show a dead man, not a living Saviour! South America knows nothing of the Resurrection and of that which signifies life. We did not see in all the churches we visited a single picture, symbol or suggestion of the Resurrection or the Ascension (p. 169). Even the dead Christ is the subordinate figure: the central place is Mary's. And Mariolatry is the religion of the land because the Church has taught it as true Christianity (p. 170).

Concerning priests, the poor Catholics are taught that "as Christians with veneration and respect ought we to acknowledge them entrusted of God: these visible gods who represent to us the invisible, these gods on earth who at times make the God of heaven" (p. 172). It need no longer surprise us that Mr. Speer should finally cap the climax of folly in this fashion:

As we rode along one day in Brazil in a drizzling rain with bare heads and rubber ponchos, an old woman came running solicitously from her hovel, mistaking us for priests and crying: "O most powerful God, where is your hat (p. 179).

It was undoubtedly this distressing incident that filled Mr. Speer's soul with a burning desire to expose all the rottenness of the South American Church. Can there be any doubt at all that evangelical Christianity pure and undefiled, needs to be spread abroad in this unhappy land? Who is Robert E. Speer, the valiant protagonist of this new crusade? He is the representative of the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign [Protestant] Missions. This body is recruited from students of our American colleges and universities. What sort of scholarship holds sway in those schools that they can send forth men so intellectually narrow and so utterly deficient in critical sense?

The mere restatement of Mr. Speer's bald assertions is their own best refutation, and does withal provoke an indulgent smile of commiseration from any ordinarily instructed Catholic, who still remembers how this writer discovered a spurious Papal Bull to the Archbishop of Santiago, Chile. Ever since he has gone on discovering things that never were on land or sea. We should like to believe that Robert E. Speer is at least sincere. But if intellectual honesty can go together with such appalling ignorance of elementary matters of Catholic belief and practice, one almost despairs of our much-vaunted twentieth-century enlightenment. He wants us to pity benighted South America. We pity South America's benighted defamers.

The Origin of Human Life

Austin O'Malley, M.D.

THE discussion concerning the moment the human soul enters the body is older than Christianity. It was taken up by many of the early Greek and Latin Fathers of the Church, and it has been revived again and again down to the present day. Aristotle, St. Thomas Aquinas, and most of the medieval moralists, and even those of modern time up to a century ago, held that the soul of man is infused about the fortieth day, and that of woman near the eightieth day. The only reason for this notion was that Aristotle held it, but he didn't have one fact to prove his assertion. St. Gregory of Nyssa, who died about 385, held that the human soul is in the embryo from the very beginning, and he proved his proposition. St. Maximus, the Theologian, who was martyred in 662, did the same thing. Their arguments are in Migne's "Patrologia Graeca," volumes 44, 46, and 91. St. Anselm, who died in 1109, revived the Aristotelian notion. In 1620 Fienus, and in 1661, Zacchias, both physicians, attacked the Aristotelian opinion, and since 1745 the doctrine that human life as such begins at once in the embryo has been general among physicists. St. Alphonsus Liguori held the Aristotelian error, and he founded his argument on a badly translated text of the Septuagint, which differs essentially from the texts in the Greek and Hebrew Septuagints. The older writers did not know embryology, and they erroneously thought that the embryo lacks the organs requisite for the reception of the soul until the fortieth or eightieth day. There are a few well-known moralists today, Cardinal Mercier among them, who incline to the Aristotelian notion, but most of them frankly acknowledge they know nothing of the processes of embryological growth, and the others prove that they do not. The data in this question are very difficult and technical, and it is not altogether clear why these writers try to settle it without this technical knowledge.

Every human being begins existence, precisely as a human being, immediately upon the fusion of the single nuclei in the two parental germ-cells. The soul must have disposed matter for its operations, but it does not need a human organism complete in all its parts, as a necessary condition for its indwelling. If it did, a babe after birth would not be a human being; about the only distinctly human act a baby six months old can do is to smile, and that, because the nervous organs for the operations of the soul are not yet fully formed. There is, however, amply sufficient organized matter in the first cell of the embryo, which comes into existence after the nuclei of the germ cells fuse, to hold the soul as well as it is held by the body of a six-months-old infant.

The human body is made up of billions of microscopic living cells, all of which are derived by fission and differentiation from the nuclei of the two original parental germ cells, and these two nuclei together are so small they must be magnified hundreds of times by the microscope before they are visible at all. A typical animal cell is commonly spherical, but it may have a great variety of shapes. It has a cell body or protoplasm, called also cytoplasm, a nucleus and many other parts. The nucleus is the center of cellular activity. The specific qualities of organisms in origin and development are based upon nuclei, as far as the material element of the living cells is concerned. Vital stimuli pass through the nuclei into the surrounding protoplasm, and these stimuli control metabolism, or the process of using up in activity, and of renewing, the matter composing the body. The protoplasm assimilates material for construction and operation, but the vital principle energizes this assimilated stuff through the nucleus. A chief proof of this assertion is that a part of a cell deprived of the nucleus may resist corruption for a while, but it cannot repair itself; with the nucleus it can do both.

In the nucleus of a cell are several elements, the most important of which is chromatin, and from this chromatin are formed the chromosomes which carry onward all heredity from both parents. In man, as in other multicellular animals, after the germ nuclei fuse there is left a single cell with a single composite nucleus. The soul is then infused and human life begins. By a very complicated process this single cell and the nucleus divide into two united cells, which are the right and left halves of the human body at that stage, as has been proved absolutely. The two cells split into four, the four into eight, and so on. Then by some process unknown to us these new cells begin to differentiate: some become blood cells, some bone cells, others tissue, muscle, or nerve cells, and they fall into ordered positions. The process goes on until finally the child is ready for birth. All is one continual, identical process, from the first cell-division until birth; and as we roughly group ages into infancy, childhood, adolescence, and adult life, biologists add the one-cell, sixteen-cell, eighty-fourth-cell, third-week stages of intra-uterine life.

The basic vital operation of the human body at any age of man is metabolism, or the assimilation of material which will build up the body, sustain it, heat it, give it fuel which is used up in vital operations, and so on. The most lofty poetical flights of Dante or Shakespeare were uplifted, in an essential part, on bread and beefsteak. The process is exactly the same in the first embryonic cell as it is in the adult man. The cells that compose the body grow, divide, function, reproduce themselves, all through life sustained and constructed from food which at the very beginning lay in the yolk of the maternal ovum, and later was furnished by material brought to them by the blood stream. After the child has been born, the stomach and intestines take in the food, prepare it somewhat, pass it on through various organs, until finally it is carried by the blood to the bodily cells. The cells are the real consumers; the other organs are the farmers, the middlemen, and the like.

The very first embryonic cell has contractility, protoplasmic motion, it can absorb perfectly all food-stuffs necessary for it from the yolk of the ovum, and get the necessary water by osmosis, and it does this as well as the brain cells of Shakespeare did when he was writing "Hamlet." This embryological cell has (1) immanent motion, action; (2) a set of correlated organs; (3) an unstable chemical composition different from all inorganic bodies; (4) a peculiar figure in keeping with the human species; (5) an origin from a living progenitor; (6) a developing nature; (7) a power of reproduction. In other words, it is alive. If it is alive it has a soul. If it has a soul that soul is human in the full sense of the term, a rational soul, because in that primordial cell there are all the requisite conditions for the indwelling of a rational soul, and there is no need of the interposition of any other kind of soul. If there is no need for any other kind of soul it is certain no other kind of soul is there, because God never does useless work. To use other vital principles, vegetative, or sensitive, when the human soul could be present, is a multiplication of entities without any necessity therefor, a condition repugnant to the universal method of nature.

The vital principle of a man is at the end, when it normally issues, the same as it was in the beginning. If it is at perfection a substantial form, and it is, man's soul always was a substantial form. A substantial form might absolutely replace another inferior substantial form, but in the case of man there is never need of such replacement. The soul of man is at once rational, sensitive, and vegetative; in the infant the rational faculty is not exercised, but from this there is no reason to argue its absence. That faculty is not exercised by anyone when he is asleep, or when he is six months old, but it exists nevertheless. Earlier in fetal life the soul begins to exercise its sensitive faculty, earlier still, its vegetative faculty, but the whole soul is there. The soul can never do anything except as a whole, because it is simple.

At present surgeons can take a piece of bone, or a square inch of skin, from one man, graft it on another man, and the graft will grow, be informed by the recipient's soul. They can leave the graft in cold storage for weeks, then emplant it, and get the same results. When the graft has been separated from its original host, it is no longer kept alive by that host's soul. Then it must be either dead, or informed by some kind of low-grade dependent life. Certain writers have maintained it cannot be dead, because all life is from life, Omne vivum e vivo is Harvey's dictum, and if it is dead it can never be reinformed by another vital principle, short of a miracle like the raising of Lazarus. It has, then, they say, a life of its own, "educed from the potency of matter," or from some other source, and specialists dispute as to the nature of this dependent life. Furthermore, they say, if such dependent life exists in these grafts, there is no reason why it should not exist also in the embryo for some time before the human soul is infused.

Granted the existence of this dependent life, there is no reason why it should be found in the primitive embryonic cell, because there is no need whatever for its presence, and as we said, nature never does needless acts. I am now inclined to deny, however, that there is any life in these grafts while they are separate from the first and second host. The saying, "Every living thing is from another living thing," is a distinguishable proposition. In the human embryo, in the primordial cell, life is from life instantly, after the corruption, or death, of the life in the germ nuclei which are replaced by the newly-created substantial form of the new man. There is always an instant of time in which death, or corruption of the primitive form, intervenes between the corruption of one and the generation of the other. All human life is from life through death, Omne vivum e vivo per mortem—just as we go into eternal life through death, but more absolutely.

Now suppose a plaque of skin is cut from a dead child and put into cold storage, so that post-mortem disintegration is arrested. The child is dead, its substantial form has departed. If the child is dead, its skin is dead, as dead as Marley, and all this talk about "low forms of dependent life" is tommyrot. If left to itself, that skin disintegrates and is destroyed simply because it is as dead as last autumn's leaves; but when the disintegration is prevented artificially by cold, nothing happens. This graft in cold storage has still the physical aptitudes of human skin, the potentiality of human skin; and in proper circumstances, with vitalized fluids and the rest to preserve it, it is fit to take up again the offices of human skin. We graft this piece of dead skin on a living man, and the live body-juices of the man seep into it, feed its cells; they finally start to proliferate, to live with the life of the new host. There is no need whatever for the "low grade dependent life" as an intermediate between the life of the original host and that of the new host.

After death the disintegration of the tissues of the body is brought about by microbic and autolytic enzymes. The micro-organisms which always swarm in the intestinal tract of everyone diffuse through the body, and their ferments dissolve the tissues. Autolytic ferments, which are held in a harmless state in the living blood-stream by the secretions of the ductless glands, also begin to act, and they contribute to the disintegration of the tissues. Certain tissues are more resistant than others. They hold together, however, not by life, but by density of structure and other chemico-physical properties. Hair, however, will grow on some corpses by drawing nutrition from the disintegrating tissues. If it grows it is alive with a new vegetative life, or form, which it acquires after the body form has departed. It is the only part of the body that shows this vegetative life. The skin graft, and bone graft, are dead by every test we know; if they have "dependent" life there is no sign of it, but every symptom of its contrary.

The earliest embryo, then, is a human being, a body with a human soul, and the destruction of this one-celled embryo is as much murder as the destruction of a President of the United States, although the murder of a President, for accidental reasons, would be the graver crime.

Papers Concerning Oliver Plunkett

SHANE LESLIE

THIS week's testimony about the martyred Primate of Ireland is of a piece with that presented in the last issue of AMERICA. The story runs as follows:

Letter from Gwyn to Ormonde, July 24, 1680:

> The last Council day was read a letter from Murphy to Hetherington in which he complained that Oliver Plunkets trial was to be at Dundalk which would be a great discouragement to himself and several others who would be evidence against him, which occasioned the letter from the Board to your Grace and Council recommending the having the said Oliver Plunket tried at the Ks Bench at Dublin only.

Letter from Ormonde to Sunderland, October 17, 1680:

> In obedience to the directions from the Lords of Council I have sent over Oliver Plunket in the custody of George Wakefield the messenger with orders to attend your lordship with him to be disposed of as His Majesty and the Lords of the Council shall direct.

Letter from Lanesboro to Ormonde, October 25, 1680: "The Titular Primate went off last night with the Dogger."

Letter from Gwyn to Ormonde, October 26, 1680:

> Their Lordships ordered that there should be a power given to Mr Hetherington, Murphy and Mr Fitzgerald to bring over what witnesses they think necessary to lay open the Plot of the Papists in Ireland and that orders should be sent for the speedy sending over Oliver Plunket under a safe custody and with great care.

Letter from Longford to Ormonde, October 30, 1680: "Mr Plunkett with his six attendants came to town last night."

Letter from Ormonde to Coventry, April 10, 1680:

> You may remember that I gave you notice of the apprehension of the Primate who has ever since lain in the Castle for no other reason (known to him or to any other but myself here) than his presuming to stay here in contempt of the proclamation. I have foreborne hitherto to have him examined upon the particular he is charged with in expectation of some further light into the matter, which is of such a nature that he will certainly deny his having any part in it, and then we shall want anything wherewith to convince him or draw any acknowledgment from him that may lead towards a discovery of the truth. I put you now again in mind of this affair because that another titular Bishop is taken whose name is Creagh and is styled Bishop of Cork.

Letter from Whitehall to Ormonde, May 14, 1680:

> I am commanded to acquaint your Grace that Moyer, Morfey, Callaghan and Finan who were lately brought hither out of Ireland are now by his Majesties Order to be sent thither back againe, not in custody but under ye conduct of Atterbury the messenger bearer hereof, in order to give Evidence against Oliver Plunkett.

Letter from Francis Gwyn to Ormonde, May 15, 1680:

> The four priests Murphy Moyer Calaghan and Henan brought in their informations in writing the last Council day to which they were sworn—Mr Secretary Jenkins was ordered to signify to your Grace that Oliver Plunkett should speedily be brought to his trial and a new indictment brought against Lord Brittas and that particular care should be taken that no Papist should be on any of their juries.

Letter from Ormonde to his son Ossory, May 16, 1680:

> The titular Primate accused by them is not no more above them in gifts of nature than he ought by his place to be and

I doubt hardly so much, his life I confess is much more churchmanlike.

Letter from Ossory to Ormonde, May 18, 1680:

Yesterday the titular Primates servant and a friar that lately went from Prague into Ireland were examined but the further looking into this matter is deferred until tomorrow. These two persons deny anything which can shew the truth of Murphy or Moyers depositions that crew being sent back unto you. (May 21, 1680): This morning the Committee examined the friar and the servant of the titular Plunket; I suppose they will when the Council meets be sent back into Ireland; we are not at all edified by anything they say. (May 25, 1680): I beleeve tomorrow Councell will order their return if the yocht has got to Liverpoole, as I may conclude by the orders you gave.

Letter from Longford to Ormonde, November 6, 1680:

Plunkett has deceived all men living for he told his tale with modesty and confidence enough and without any manner of hesitation or consternation. In fine he told his story with such plaines and simplicity that he left an impression with the Lords to his advantage.

Letter from Ormonde to Arran, December 21, 1680:

I believe one Owen Murphy sent to provide witnesses against Oliver Plunket will be found faulty but there are yet no complaints of him.

Letter from Arran to Ormonde, April 16, 1681:

I hear all the witnesses except Oates and Dugdale are out of pension so that you are like to have them in Ireland as soon as they have hanged the titular Primate, for without doubt the jury will find him guilty there being so many witnesses point blank against him and their testimonies will be looked upon as valid.

Letter from Arran to Ormonde, April 30, 1681:

Whether it be intended he should be tried here or in Ireland I cannot yet learn; but if here he is not like even to see Ireland again for there are a great many witnesses against him, and they will be believed by the juries here.

Letter from Ormonde to Arran, June 20, 1681:

I wish for the honour of the justice of England that the evidence against Plunkett had been as convincing as that against the other was; for we must expect that Papists at home and abroad will take his trial to pieces and make malicious remarks upon every part of it and some circumstances are liable to disadvantagious observations.

A paper signed by Ormonde, Mich. Armach. (the Primate), Drogheda, Longford. Granard, Lanesborough, Blesinton, June 10, 1681:

A petition in the name of Doctor Oliver Plunket now a prisoner in England being exhibitted at this Board concerning granting him passes for his Witnesses to be produced at his Tryall there, and alsoe for Coppies of Indictments and Examinations alleadged to be matteriall to be there made use of by him, we did upon consideration therof immediately grant order for passes for his Witnesses but did not think fitt to give order for the Coppyes he desired, but left him to make his application for those to the proper officers, a Coppy of which said petition and of an order thereupon we send you heere inclosed to be made use of there as occasion shall offer.

Letter from Arran to Ormonde, July 2, 1681:

I shall not need to send you Plunketts speech for it is verbatim in the news books and also sold by itself in print. He died as all people say with great resolution and Fitzharis very pitifully.

Letter from John Ellis to Ormonde, July 2, 1681:

Plunkett and Fitzharis suffered yesterday the former as a man prepared and the latter as a man surprised.

Paper containing the last confession of Henry O'Neill when about to be executed at Mullingar for robbery, March 18, 1682:

In Bosoms Inn in London he was desired by McClane who said he would take the sin of it on himself to swear the Plot against Primate Plunkett, but never gave any evidence against the Primate and hopes he is innocent of the blood of that man although it was his misfortune to be in the company of those that accused him.

No comment is needed on this correspondence which is singularly complete, considering the two centuries which have elapsed. It tells the whole story, the arrest without evidence, the procury of the lowest kind of informers, the means by which a jury was found to accept such information, and finally the piteous death of the Primate without the papers by which he could have proved himself innocent. Lastly we have the dying confession of Henry O'Neill, which Ormonde seems to have kept not without a suspicion that his own fingers were tinged with innocent blood. There can be no doubt that Plunkett was a martyr for the Faith and not for any political reasons. May the day soon arrive when we may claim his prayers at the altars of the Church!

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

The Excellent Gift of Charity

To the Editor of AMERICA:

No friend of AMERICA, I am sure, would call in question the general principles laid down by Mr. Cortland Van Winkle in his recent letter. How far H. W. may have transgressed I am not prepared to discuss. I should like, however, to make some remarks on the larger question of the attitude, recurrent he calls it, to which Mr. Van Winkle has given the name of uncharitableness. At the risk of aiming in the dark, I would suggest that what he is complaining of is not uncharitableness, but a vigorous, straightforward defense of truth and a fearless attack on religious error and political sham. To some such an attitude seems too strong and too assertive for a Catholic periodical to assume. There are indeed those who would substitute courtesy for courage, compromise for character, caution for candor; who would win the favor of enemies by assurances of friendship, who believe that the truth of Christ may be whispered in drawing-rooms, but should not be shouted from the housetops. But surely there is in this matter another view which merits attention.

It is the Catholic spirit not to be afraid of asserting Christ's doctrine, not to be yielding and complaisant when the Kingdom of God is in the balance, not to allow each man to be his own final judge and infallible teacher of religious truth. Protestantism, with the logical carrying out of the principle of private judgment, adopts a different spirit. The Catholic cannot do so. For the Catholic there can be no question of compromise or yielding where Revelation is concerned: he cannot shrink from protest and condemnation when occasion requires it; for to him religion is not a theory or a subject of interesting and tolerant discussion; it is a fact, fashioned and revealed by God.

To keep this piercing truth blazoned before his own mind, and before the world, is an admirable, though at times a terrible, exercise of zeal. Religious error, he believes, is the greatest enemy of mankind; against this error he lifts his bludgeon, whenever it raises its head, believing that it is truth alone that will make us free. The great Hildebrand knew God's Word to be truth, and truth a sword, and so he set in a memorable phrase the characteristic spirit of Christian apologetics: Cursed be he who sheathes the sword for fear of blood. If error in any land is to be brought repentant to Canossa, it must be by the spirit of Hildebrand, by a fighting spirit that sets the cause of truth high above the domination of kings and the sway of gold. All the astounding forward movements of the Church have been organized and led on by lions. The subtlety of serpents is ineffective. The roaring lion, with tense muscles set for a spring is the fitting symbol of the undaunted energy of true Catholic zeal.

Baltimore, Md. KEVIN MORE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is distressing to think that the lack of charity in your contributors, of which evidence appears from time to time in your columns, should have compelled Mr. Cortland Van Winkle to protest; and as one of the supposed offenders I beg to apologize as far as I am guilty. How far I am blameworthy I do not know. Mr. Van Winkle has evidently studied the matter. If he will be good enough to draw up a scheme of well-ordered charity, beginning with man's relation to God, to Divine Revelation, the Catholic Church, the depositary of that Revelation, and coming down at length to persons outside the fold who undertake to handle what is not theirs, I and others will be able to fix the exact measure of our guilt. I am profoundly grateful for his reference to that rare book, "Vanity Fair," which I knew perhaps before he was born. But, notwithstanding, I stick to my assertion that Thackeray never wrote a description of the battle of Waterloo.

Los Gatos. H. W.

Unionism in the United States

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The editorial in AMERICA for November 18 on the authentic deification of crime by a great labor-body was splendid and very much to the point. But it seems to me that an excellent opportunity for laying down the law to Catholic union men was lost. You say, "Catholic workingmen have an heroic battle to sustain to save the labor movement from anarchistic and socialistic propaganda." To my mind this is equivalent to saying, "If you are good, you will not be bad." What is wanted is a lash and a spur in the shape of a definite statement, something like the following:

> Your officials are not chosen for moral qualities. Your union countenances crime, for it shields wrongdoers. Strikes breed violence, injure innocent persons, and lead to the destruction of property, not belonging to the union. It is always known who do these things. You Catholic men are bound in conscience to denounce these things. Tell your unions that you must and will do so. Tell your unions that if they do not expel these men you will resign in a body, that your Church will not countenance union crime while it denounces crime in the individual.

Then, too, you made no reference to the dynamiting at the 116th Street subway station. Who has come forward to repudiate that act? It is an outrage to endanger the lives of those whose only crime is to ride on the subway. If the Brotherhoods mean half of what they say, January will inaugurate worse disorders than the Debs-Altgeld riots, with no Cleveland to stamp them out. Unionism, as run in the United States, is anti-American and a menace.

New York. E. C. BARRY.

Justice to Huerta

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In an address, which was given wide publicity by the public press, Mr. Wilson, speaking of the dead President of Mexico, referred to him some time ago as the "unspeakable Huerta." This masterpiece in the art of expression, because it had emanated from the President of the United States, out of a spirit of loyalty to his high office, was allowed to pass unchallenged. But the repetition in a political speech of the same stigma by one of the Cabinet officers frees even the sensitive from all obligation of silence. The official and recorded diplomatic exchanges, which passed between our Government and General Huerta, prove the latter to have been quite the equal, in the art of expression, of the scholar who represents the United States. But I should like to call attention to an unrecorded passage in the secret dealings of this country with Mexico which redounds no less to the credit of the man to whom, in the late campaign, the political protégé of "3-cent" Tom Johnson also referred disparagingly as the "unspeakable Huerta."

In the pourparlers which ensued early in the Democratic Administration between Mexico and our Government, General Huerta was given to understand that objections to him personally might be waived, if he would give proof that Catholicism would have no power under his Government. He pointed out in reply that the Catholic clergyman in Mexico could not display any outward sign of his calling, while the Protestant clergyman was freely permitted to do so. He was a Catholic himself, but he had no friends and only a few acquaintances among the Catholic clergy. With none of these did he ever speak of politics, and rarely did he himself visit a church. The Church was then, and would be thereafter, practically without a vestige of political power or influence.

Asking what pledge would be required of him to satisfy our Government of his sincerity, he was told that an official affiliation with a secret society hostile to Catholicism would be a sufficient guaranty of his fidelity. On this occasion he again proved himself to be anything but the "mute" which he was afterward called by the disbeliever in the good qualities of even the hero of Valley Forge. Though a bad Catholic himself, and even then without the pale of his Church, General Huerta would not deny the religion in which he was born and in which perhaps by the grace of God he might at last die. This he would not deny, even to oblige the United States.

New York. JOHN P. DAVIN, M.D.

Keltic Demands Recognition

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A rather interesting case of a request for points for proficiency in Keltic, possibly the first of the kind, happened recently. A young person desirous of taking up a professional career was in need of ten points for a qualifying certificate. According to the scale established by the Board of Regents, New York, a second year, or a successful examination in German, French, Spanish, Italian, Latin, Greek or Hebrew entitles the applicant to just ten points. It so happened that the applicant in question had done a two years' course in Keltic, and inquiry was made as to its credit value. An answer, sent by an assistant in Albany, dated August 24, 1916, declared: "The Department does not give any credit toward a qualifying certificate for admission to professional study for proficiency in Keltic." A second letter, addressed personally to the Director of the Examinations Division, was sent, in which it was pointed out that it is very arbitrary to make a concession to easy modern languages and grant absolutely nothing for two years spent in the acquisition of the very difficult Keltic, and a request was made for the reason thereof. The assistant replied that an answer would be sent as soon as the director returned from his vacation.

On September 20 another letter was received from the assistant declaring that credit for Keltic was not given "owing to the fact that the Regents' rules do not provide for any examination in that subject." A third letter was sent, this time addressed to the President of the University and Commissioner of Education, Dr. John H. Finley, in which the obvious injustice of the rule was pointed out and it was urged that in the present case, a first-class testimonial rendered an examination unnecessary. A letter from the Director of Examinations, dated October 17 insisted that the question "must be determined by the Regents' rules as they now stand." He added: "There is no class in this language in any of the secondary schools in this State." It might well be said in reply: (1) There is a class of Keltic in a university of the State; Columbia has just established a chair of modern Irish: (2) Keltic has long been made much of in the universities of Europe: (3) There is no class of Hebrew in the secondary schools of the State; yet Hebrew is recognized. This evidently gives a young Jew a great advantage. In his ritual, his newspapers, and his dialect is included a considerable amount of Hebrew, rendering it easy for him to get the necessary credits.

After all this correspondence, the applicant presented testimonials of lower studies of a two years' course in Keltic, and was granted a qualifying certificate. As to the why and the wherefore of this decision I am mystified.

New York. HENRY A. JUDGE, S. J.

Premature Business Courses

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There is today a great demand for high-grade stenographers. The Government in Washington, for instance, is holding extra examinations in order to secure 200 male stenographers, and the typewriter companies say that they cannot supply the demand for educated stenographers. Toward the end of October one of the oldest and best business colleges advertised that it had for several weeks been seeking to fill thirteen positions, paying from $58.00 to $75.00 per month, but had been unable to furnish stenographers of the required intelligence. And yet hundreds of half-educated stenographers are without positions or are working for $6.00 per week. One of the reasons is that business colleges are permitted to persuade children to leave the elementary schools and take up commercial courses before they are able to make an intelligent use of such a course. Superficial preparation does not take the place of solid, substantial education.

Parents should beware of the "short-term," "cut-rate" college. Cut rate means cut service. Every spring pupils in the District of Columbia and the suburbs receive a business-college circular offering: "Tuition free. Pay us for September and we will give you July and August free, three months in day school for $12.00." Country children are lured to the city before they know how to care for themselves properly, parents are persuaded to let a daughter "improve her time" by attending this summer school; by September she is interested in the college course and is easily coaxed to remain and complete it. She learns to write and read shorthand rapidly. In the following spring she is placed in a cheap position, and, because she lacks foundation in common school branches, she is unable to accept promotion to a higher salary and is, consequently, dismissed. She finds another cheap position, later loses that for the same reason as before. Too late, she realizes that she should have finished high school before taking up shorthand, but the business-college owner has her money and she is handicapped for life. A young mind cannot see so far ahead; but if parents, school teachers and Sunday school teachers would persistently urge pupils to remain in school until they have completed the course, stenographers would be able to secure creditable salaries. Business men could help remedy the situation by specifying that they wish high-school graduates or the equivalent. Why should we not have a law enacted forbidding business colleges to solicit pupils in country districts where a commercial course is taught in the elementary or high school, and also requiring city pupils to get a permit signed by the principal or the superintendent of schools before leaving the elementary school to enter a business college? This would give the principal an opportunity to point out to the pupil his mistake.

Sometimes in large families a parent is persuaded to borrow $125.00 or more to send a daughter to a business college so that she may earn money to help out at home. Because of her limited education it takes her a year to complete the course; the second year she spends part of the time in cheap offices and part of the time seeking a job. She has probably earned enough to pay back the borrowed money, but her carfare and living expenses have been more than it would have cost had she remained two years in high school. What did she or the family gain? She has no more money and no more education than she had two years ago, she cannot rise to a better-paying position because she lacks foundation, and the small salary she does earn is not enough to defray the expenses of educating the younger members of the family. Had she finished high school before taking the commercial course, she would be capable of earning enough in one year to help her sisters prepare for lucrative, dignified positions.

Who gets the profit when a pupil is persuaded to take her shorthand course before completing high school? Not the city, not the pupil, not her family, not the business world; no one but the owner of the college. If a pupil can get all that is required for her future in ten months in a business college, why do we maintain high schools?

Washington, D. C. E. A. GILLISS.

"What Becomes of Them All?"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Hilaire Belloc expresses his wonder at the disappearance of so many of the products of antiquity and suggests questions on the subject, to some of which there is a fairly easy answer. He tells us there are only five manuscripts of the letter of St. Patrick to Coroticus, a work of the fifth century. He suggests there must have been hundreds and hundreds of copies of this epistle, and wonders what happened to them all. He might have taken instances of still more famous writings which were circulated on a large scale, and of which only two or three early manuscripts remain. But is the problem of their disappearance so puzzling? We know that for hundreds of years it was a common practice to rub out the writing on parchment or vellum with a piece of pumice-stone and use the sheet again for another manuscript. There was a wholesale destruction of libraries in the sack of cities during the barbarian invasions, and a still more wide-spread and deliberate destruction at the time of the Reformation. Is it any wonder that many books have been lost and others are known only through a very few early copies?

As to the disappearance of buildings and other structures there is surely a fairly easy explanation. All over the world, the buildings of one period used to be the quarries for the buildings of a later date. Till fairly recent times, there was but scant reverence for the remains of antiquity. In England, for instance, at the Reformation, there was a wholesale destruction of monastic buildings. Thus the great Benedictine monastery of Lewes was leveled to the ground; the monastery of Syon, with its great church which had thirteen altars, supplied building material for the present residence of the Dukes of Northumberland; at Southampton, one sees carved stonework built into some of the old warehouses; these carved stones came from Netley Abbey, which was used as a quarry for 200 years, so that all the buildings near the road have disappeared. Mr. Belloc asks what became of the old wooden bridge on the Thames, at Staines, and asks, "Where are the piles of that bridge?" The ends of them are probably still in the river-bed. Lower down, about Kew and Brentford, dredges still bring up the piles of the old barricade of the ford, dating from British times. The marble columns of Charlemagne's church at Aachen were taken from Roman palaces.

In the Middle Ages and the days of the Renaissance, Roman builders took their material from the Coliseum and the Baths of Diocletian. In North Africa and Egypt stone buildings still remain in a more or less ruinous state, because this process of using them as quarries was not so continuously carried out. But the houses of the people have disappeared, probably because they were built of wood which decays, and mere sun-dried bricks which easily disintegrate. As for objects of metal, arms and armor have been continually worked up into newer patterns, as the fashion in these things changed; just as only a few years ago, when the British army adopted a repeating rifle, hundreds of thousands of Martini rifles were broken up and used as new material in the arms factories. In the case of altar plate, we have to take account of two different factors: first, plunder and destruction of sacred vessels in the barbarian invasions, during the Reformation period, and during the stormy days that followed the French Revolution, besides minor instances of the same kind of plunder and destruction; and second, the reworking up of the gold, silver and precious stones into newer patterns.

"If the Pyramids stand," asks Mr. Belloc, "why have we not a vestige of the Temple?" But these are not parallel cases. The Pyramids are solid masses of stone, and of stone in gigantic blocks difficult to move. The builders of Cairo could get their stone much more easily by quarrying close by in the Mokattam Hills, instead of quarrying in the Pyramids, miles away on the other side of the Nile. But they took from them what could be easily removed, cleared away most of the facing stones and built a lot of them into the citadel of Cairo. But the Temple cannot have been such a solid structure. It had almost certainly a wooden roof. It was burned in the siege of Titus and the site was cleared more than once for the erection of later structures. Mr. Belloc, writing of London, says he cannot see any reason why St. Paul's should not stand for 10,000 years. It probably has a much shorter lease of life. The foundation is not very solid, and cracks in the building have frequently to be dealt with. The weight of the masonry and supports of the dome makes this problem of preservation a serious one, and the dome itself is a mere shell, supported on a wooden cone-shaped framework, which is certainly liable to decay, and has in recent times been strengthened with iron, itself subject to slow destruction by atmospheric influences. The most permanent buildings in London are recently erected edifices like the new General Post Office, which is one solid block of ferro-concrete.

Isleworth, England. A. H. A.

The Age of the Pillotherium

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In an editorial in your magazine for November 18 you have credited the American museum authorities with giving out some very absurd figures with regard to the age of a fossil skeleton found last summer. Permit me to assure you that we had nothing to do with these figures. They are the invention, presumably intended humorously, of the reporter.

New York. W. D. MATTHEW.

[AMERICA, in the editorial to which Mr. Matthew refers, did not intend to imply that the authorities of the museum had fixed the age of the pillotherium. Its purpose was to do two things: give credit to the vertebrate department for the discovery of a valuable scientific "find," and to protest against the age, by whomsoever fixed, assigned in current reports to the fossil skeleton. It is a pleasure to record the fact that the museum expressly repudiates responsibility for the absurdity.—Ed. AMERICA.]

A Plea for Correctness

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Over twenty years ago the American Ecclesiastical Review published a decree of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences insisting on the correct termination of the prayer which begins in the original Latin "En ego, O bone . . ." and is usually called the "Prayer before the Crucifix." The correct form is "quod iam in ore ponebat tuo David própheta de Te, O bone Jesu . . ." To retain indulgences attached to the recitation of prayers, the translations must agree substantially with the originals. Practically the only books in which the prescribed correction has been made are the Breviaries. In some recent prayer-books a slight alteration has been made, so that the words now read "that which David, the prophet, said of Thee," but the incorrect reading, "that which David spoke in prophecy," is still found in most manuals. The only perfect rendering that I have met occurs in one place in Father Lasance's "My Prayer-Book," and is as follows: "that which David, the prophet, put in Thy mouth of Thee, my Good Jesus." The Spanish "Raccolta" translates the Latin the same way; "que puso en tus labios de Ti." Why do not those who compile Catholic prayer-books exclude the imperfect version altogether, instead of putting it on an equal footing with the correct one? The former rendering does not preclude the meaning that some one other than David prophesied this, whereas only the latter rendering clearly states that Our Lord Himself spoke thus through the prophet.

Most prayer-books, even such recent ones as Mother Loyola's, have the additional mistake: "Add five Paters and five Aves," whereas five Paters and five Aves, if said after Communion for the Holy Father's intentions, suffice of themselves alone to gain a plenary indulgence. The "Raccolta" says, "Pray a while for the Holy Father's intentions." Thus one Pater and one Ave, added to the "Prayer before the Crucifix," are sufficient. The "Manual of Prayers" has an incorrect form of the Litany of the Blessed Virgin, for it omits the invocation, "Mother of Good Counsel."

Again, most catechisms ignore the important decree, in force since Easter, 1908, which requires the authorized priest or bishop to be present at the marriage of a Catholic under pain of invalidity. This law should be instilled into the minds of children, if they are reasonably to be expected to observe it when they are grown up, especially when a bigoted lover objects to a priest assisting at his nuptials. The Messenger of the Sacred Heart and the Intermountain Catholic stated lately that meditation on each Station is required in the Way of the Cross. Such a practice is commendable, but it is not necessary for gaining the indulgences. All that is required is meditation on the Passion in general. Lastly, why should even our smallest prayer-books not contain approved and indulgenced prayers rather than those that are suitable for private devotion, such as the litanies of the Child Jesus and of the Blessed Sacrament?

Pocatello, Idaho. C. VAN DER DONCKT.

"Is There a Santa Claus?"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Apropos of the letter and an editorial which recently appeared in AMERICA, I should like to say that even if it were desirable to do away with Santa Claus, the task would be impossible. What we should do is to impress on the children in season and out of season that the Christ-Kindlein is the essence of Christmas, and that the joy, feasting and presents are the accompaniments of that day, because it is Christ's birthday. In lieu of Santa Claus we should insist on St. Nicholas.

St. James, Minn. J. D. DURWARD.

Systematic Collections for the Missions

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Two years have passed during which we have seen our missions seriously threatened with ruin, and as yet no step has been taken to organize a nation-wide system for receiving alms or collecting funds for the relief of present distress and the rehabilitation at an early date of discontinued work. I know many Catholics who sent their contributions to non-Catholic agencies, because they did not know of any Catholic committee that was easily accessible. Is it too late to remedy this state of things?

Baraboo, Wis. J. T. D.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

"Make Straight the Way of the Lord"

THE way of the Lord leads direct to God, there are no angles in it, no safe by-paths near it, it has no counterpart, it is unique, a hard way, at time a cheerless way, extending from the cradle to the grave, and a little beyond, to God: make it straight. But before beginning the task, it were well for each man to be sure that the way he knows best leads to God. For life has many ways and all, except one, lead to gods or goddesses, but not to God. And the ways to gods or goddesses are so broad and smooth and lightsome that men fairly dance along them, joyous to the end, but not hereafter.

This caution is all the more necessary in these days of unfaith, when a new goddess puts forth claims for Divine homage, and men are mad in fast quest of her, seeking her temple, longing for her presence, as the Greeks of old longed for the unknown God, in whose honor, worshiping, "without knowing," they had erected an altar in the streets of Athens. Pleasure, her votaries call this new idol that engages every aspiration of their lives, every energy of their souls.

There is no need to straighten her way, it lies fair before man; not a single obstacle obstructs those who tread it. Day by day they stretch forth for the crown that they are seeking, but never acquire, even in the end. Each night their hands and hearts are empty, but not their ears, for their goddess whispers: "Tomorrow is your day." The morrow comes and goes and they are crownless yet, and to the end, forever. Pleasure plays them false, she is only a goddess after all and her purpose is to obscure the Christ, to prevent men from making straight the way of the Lord. Perhaps she is but the olden Aphrodite under a new name, a fair creature born of ocean foam, that flits before the human eye, like a phantom in the dim twilight, ever whispering to her disciples the delusive word, tomorrow.

> A period nowhere to be found
> In all the hoary register of Time,
> Save, perchance, in the Fool's Calendar.

Pleasure holds the human heart till it is old and withered and then she casts the unhallowed thing away, and night is on; and man whimpers for his God like an infant for the light, "with no language save a cry." "Whatever my eyes desired I refused them not, and I withheld not my heart from tasting every pleasure. Vanity of vanities, and all is vanity."

"Make straight the way of the Lord," for this is Advent given, so that at Christmastide man may walk with the Christ direct to God.

Michael Mockus and the Mammal

THE whale, as most of us learned at an impressionable age, is a mammal. This being the case, when the prophet Jonas consented to be cast into the sea, and the sailormen of the ship very amiably expressed their willingness to cast him in, and, furthermore, when the whale, which is a mammal, opportunely, or, as we have been taught to believe, providentially, came along and swallowed him up, neither the prophet nor the sailormen nor the whale, individually or collectively, knew what trouble they were bringing upon the Commonwealth of Connecticut.

The fault, such as it is, lies not with the prophet nor with the sailormen nor even with the whale. The fault lies with the Rev. Michael Mockus, an Unitarian minister of Waterbury, who refused to believe, among other things, that Adam ate the apple, or that the whale swallowed Jonas. Orthodoxy is very strong in those parts, and the minister is being prosecuted under an old blasphemy law that was promulgated some 274 years ago in Connecticut, which decrees penalties for any one "who calls into question any portion of Holy Writ."

This is not so very bad either, because the reputation of the prophet Jonas does not hang entirely on the belief of an Unitarian minister. The real hardship is that Jonas has to appear in court to prove that he was swallowed by the whale, or, failing that, the whale must be subpoenaed to give evidence that he swallowed the prophet; failing the appearance of both of these important witnesses, the jury will have to decide, on purely circumstantial evidence, unsupported by the testimony of eye-witnesses, whether the whale swallowed Jonas or whether he did not. So it appears, from the finding of the jury, the case will be decided for or against the Rev. Michael Mockus.

The case being sub judice it is, of course, out of the question for us to direct any advice to the witnesses. There is nothing, however, to prevent the prophet Jonas, when he is called on the witness stand at Waterbury, Conn., stating quite clearly to the jury that his name is Jonas, that he is a Papist, and that he was swallowed up by "a great fish," species unknown. The Douay Version and quite a respectable number of the Fathers will bear him out.

As for the prophet Jonah, who is the main cause of the Unitarian minister's trouble, it should be an easy matter to convince the jury that he is a Protestant, and that he appeared in print only some 350 or more years ago, when the anatomy of whales began to be taken more seriously.

And if the prophet Jonah is called upon to give evidence, he will, we suppose, relate to the jury the incident that appeared in the Neue Lutheranische Kirchenzeitung in 1895 about the whale-hunter, James Bartley, who in February, 1891, was swallowed by a whale, and when the whale was killed next day, was taken alive from its stomach. He lay, so the incident relates, in a swoon in the belly of the whale, and when he was brought out alive, the sailors had much difficulty in restoring him to consciousness. But perhaps the District Attorney will see to it that neither Jonas or Jonah, nor the whale appear before the jury at Waterbury, Conn., and for want of first-hand testimony the Rev. Michael Mockus may go free.

Birth-Control from the Pulpit

A PERSON accustomed to New York is not easily surprised. License in speech has long had its fling, unmolested, and the public has become inured to novelty, unconventionalism and radical views of every description. Even the things that St. Paul says should not be so much as mentioned among us have won for themselves an assured and prominent place in the press. Birth-control, as a topic for discussion, is now taken as a matter of course. Not long ago a judge went out of his way to put on it, in an official pronouncement, the weight of his authoritative approval. Despite this the great city was hardly prepared to hear a Congregationalist minister advocate it in the pulpit; yet it was with a strong plea for this abominable practice that a clergyman inaugurated his Advent course.

If he had read his Bible at all, he would have learned that the book of Genesis forbids what he advocated. There was an easy way, however, of extricating himself from his difficulty, and he promptly availed himself of it. Religion, he declared, was only sanctified common-sense. His people must have wondered, why, if he believed his own words, he was preaching in the church of the Holy Trinity, for mere common-sense would not take him far in expounding the mystery of the Triune God. Perhaps they were dazzled for the moment by the epithet, "sanctified" with which he characterized his particular common-sense. Nevertheless, they must have marveled by what stretch of common-sense, even sanctified, he could urge on them a practice in which instruction is forbidden in practically all the digests of law in force in the various States of the Union. Surely both he and they were aware that the embodiment of hard, concrete common-sense is to be found in the laws of the land. It is simply unintelligible how he could have thrown a veil of sanctity over an act which has been held and is held to be an abomination in the sight of God and men, by all peoples, civilized and barbarous, who have elemental notions of right and wrong. Yet this apparently is what he succeeded in doing. He could not have done so, had he taken his stand on the ground of common decency.

It is bad enough for a clergyman, professing to be a Christian, to have practically repudiated Revelation; it is an outrage to his congregation for a pastor to put his approval on a practice of such a character that to instruct others in it is a criminal offense; it is desecration of a high office, for one whose profession is to fight sin, to use his pulpit to advocate sin. Such things simply could not happen in a Catholic church; or if, by any chance, they did happen once, they would not happen a second time. A priest who said such things would undoubtedly be silenced, and no doubt suspended. But then a minister is generally a law unto himself, and not even God counts for much, when popularity or notoriety is sought.

A Splendid Monument

BENEDICT XV. has at last carried to a successful termination the monumental work which Pius X. had begun. The codification of canon law has been completed. That great mass of ordinances and decrees which guide the Church in her world-wide activities, in her dealings with individuals and society, has been revised, tabulated and brought into accord with the best scholarship both of the present day and of the past. It was a momentous task to undertake. For the laws which are thus finally reedited, are as numerous as the needs of humanity and as perplexing, at times, in their application as the bewildering thread of the conflicting motives and passions which make up the warp and woof of life.

Not a single point of Catholic dogma or morality has been changed. No such purpose directed or could direct the accomplishment of the duty imposed upon the scholars who directly supervised the reediting of these constitutions. And though the task set was simply stupendous, yet the gentle Pius X. was not afraid to face it, and Benedict XV. has had the courage and good fortune to bring it to a happy conclusion. They can exclaim, both he who laid the broad foundations and he who placed the crown: Exegi monumentum aere perennius. Theirs is no empty boast: they have in truth erected a lasting monument to the wisdom, prudence and practical insight of the Church into the needs of those committed to her care.

A perfect society, the Church has all the rights and can exercise all the powers and the prerogatives which such a society has in order to secure her well-being and that of its members. She has powers to legislate, to judge, to enforce the observation of her laws, to punish or pardon the offender. In the work which has just been completed are the laws which bishop, priest and laity must obey; the statutes and the constitutions which will regulate the ordered proceedings of Councils and synods; the precedents and forms according to which ecclesiastical tribunals will pronounce their verdicts; sacred and hallowed regulations, which safeguard the proper administration of Sacraments and so on through a long and complicated list.

Considered even from a purely human standpoint, these great tomes of canon law are a marvel of methodized reason, of practical wisdom, of patient toil and beneficent legislation. We hear in them an echo of the majesty of the old Roman law, while the voice of many a medieval scholar speaks through them. Moreover, to a Catholic these constitutions are sacred, for through them the Church regulates his conduct, in the name of Christ; and her genuine offspring accepts her decisions in all their entirety with full trust in her Divine commission.

The Superior Schoolma'am

A NICE young woman was recently appointed a teacher in a public elementary school of Brooklyn and, to her amazement and horror, her fine sensibilities thereby received a shock. So with that charming naïveté that distinguishes the Anglo-Saxon mind in whatever part of the world it happens to find itself, she confided her troubles to the public press, and wrote a letter to the Brooklyn Eagle in which she said:

> I have been appointed to a school in a very low kind of neighborhood. The children are filthy. They all possess horrible dispositions and it seems impossible to have unity and class spirit. What is a young girl going to do to elevate these children when they are only under her influence five hours a day and then they are surrounded by an undesirable environment at home? Is it fair to send a girl who comes from a refined home to such a place? . . . There are plenty of girls on the eligible list who come from just such homes and such neighborhoods that this school is in. Why not send those girls to schools like that where they can teach their own kind?

Now, whatever justification there may be for the first part of this letter there is none for the last part, and the number of letters that many teachers have written condemning the writer as a snob, shows that the attitude of this particular teacher is far from being general. Indeed, it has shown that a large number of our public school teachers have a firm idea of the nature of their calling. But this young teacher made a mistake. It is not in the melting pot of Brooklyn that she should have sought to teach school, but in that far-off old diocese of Reims, where there was many a

> Nice little boy, with a nice cake of soap
> Worthy of washing the hands of the Pope.

There, at least, the children were credited with being both nice and clean, and in Brooklyn, where the cost of living goes up and the cost of labor goes down, they are said to be neither.

The laborer is worthy of his hire, and the labor of a school teacher is one that is of equal dignity with that of the doctor. But even so, refined homes need not of necessity stand in the way. There used to be a very exquisite young man in one of the refined homes of Assisi, who took into his head the extraordinary idea of leaving that home, and devoting the whole of his time to teaching and washing such unsavory persons as lepers; and, as events showed, the lepers did not degrade him, but he ennobled them.

Even today in our own country, there are quite a number of nice young women, and of nice young men, too, who are content to leave refined homes to teach not only dirty and far from nice American children, but even dirty Mexicans and dirtier savages.

So although there may be a certain amount of sympathy for a teacher whose lot is cast among a generation to whom soft speaking is a sign of degeneracy and the shower bath is as the Mark of the Beast, to whom, in the name of the Countess Montessori, are we to look for a lead towards instilling better ideas, if not to the teacher who comes from a refined home? The Utopia in which the nice, refined teacher and the nice, refined children, get nicer and more refined day by day, and the roughnecks get rougher, is one that, thank goodness, will never flourish under the aegis of the New York Board of Education.

The Drug Evil

THE discovery of the amazing growth of the drug habit in New York city, and the threatening danger that it may become a national evil, is alarming but not surprising. It is believed that at present there are 200,000 hopeless drug addicts in the metropolis alone. Among them are judges, physicians, lawyers, ministers and even mere boys. "I remember," affirmed Dr. Bishop, the gentleman in charge of the narcotic wards on Blackwell's Island, "when victims sent to us were men, some of them aged, but now they are chiefly young men and boys."

These revelations indicate a serious and shocking moral bankruptcy far too prevalent to be viewed lightly. But is this condition at all surprising? For many years past self-restraint has been held in small esteem both at home and in the school. Our children have been trained to the easier way by precept and example, and the only reliable stays against temptation, the Divine sanctions so frequently and emphatically urged by Christ, have been recklessly replaced by a fatuous code of "social ethics" neither better nor worse than the passions which gave it birth. As a consequence our boys and girls shrink from struggle and pain, and pursue pleasure with an abandon that recks nothing of ways and means and give no thought to consequences. The music of the fiddler must tremble in their ears incessantly; they are unhappy else, and insist on a quest for new experiences, regardless of propriety, if not of the very decencies of life. Even the leaping fire of passion has no terror for them, and what careless moth ever flitted in and out a flame and did not leave its charred remains below, symbol of a ruined soul?

Sad to say this scorn of abnegation is a national trait that betrays itself in most diverse ways. A vast many of the statutes that roll out of our capitols in huge bundles are witness to the fact that legislators sense the evil and have come to the vain conclusion that men can be dragooned into virtue, coerced like oxen, driven like sheep, the while their hearts are untouched by the breath of God. This perhaps is the most discouraging feature of the problem. For if the leaders in Israel are blind to the true inwardness of the evil, what can be expected of men of smaller vision, who, though ready to throw their sweaty night-caps high in air, will not follow on? Nothing except contempt for prohibition and for injunctions against traffic in drugs and women and so forth. It is the heart of the citizen that enforces law, not the club of the officer nor the sentence of the judge. And until parents and teachers and statesmen recognize this simple fact and promote moral training through religion, the liquor problem, the drug problem and all other problems that turn around sin will remain completely unsolved.

Literature

THE MODERN NOVEL OF SOCIAL PROBLEMS

LITERATURE has so often been called a criticism of life that the observation is now trite. Yet its truth remains almost unquestioned. Every author has his point of view conditioned to a greater or less extent by his surroundings, by the predominant thought of the time, by "the spirit of the age," if you will, by what the psychologist would call his educational environment. So it happens that the novels of the late eighteenth century were concerned chiefly with the individual morality which philosphers were then discussing, that the books of a later period dealt with political problems, that the stories of the mid-nineteenth century reflected the ideals of the new rising middle class. Dickens and Thackeray were not only for all time, but for their own. And now that the world is worrying about sociological affairs and industrial reform, we have the novel of social problems. We have thus seen a gradual change in type from merely pictorial representation of facts to a study of character, from the story of how one man conquers his difficulties because of certain assumed qualities to an analysis of that same man, in the novels of Mr. Hardy, for instance, as a psychological reaction to the social phenomena about him.

The historical novel has gone by the board, and writers give us instead of romance reality, instead of the individual the conditions, instead of the character a synthesis of movements and social ideas. "Cardigan" has given place to "The Danger Mark," "Spanish Gold" to "Gossamer," "The Pride of Jennico" to "The Haunted Heart." "Dri and I," "To Have and to Hold," "Beverly of Graustark," and "The Cardinal's Snuff Box" have departed. In their places stand "The Patrician," "The Inside of the Cup," "The New Machiavelli," "The Harbor," and "Mr. Britling Sees It Through."

Political and social theories have, of course, been used as backgrounds before. We must not forget "The Gadfly," "Marzio's Crucifix," "Barnaby Rudge," or "The Eternal City." But the emphasis has shifted, and the times are no longer mere scenery. The problem novel is no more concerned with "the eternal triangle." It faces and sometimes tries to solve important questions of the present day. But we must never forget that fiction-writing is an art, although it is sometimes also manual labor. Its history as an art deserves an investigation—and that is why I have briefly indicated these "tendencies"—and the purpose of the artist deserves our careful scrutiny. We should never accept too hastily anything from a fiction writer, but should always criticize, and see what he is doing, what he set out to do.

It is not only in such performances as "The Woman Thou Gavest Me" that "the Church is the soul of the world. It stands for purity." Even a vague figure of a priest in "Father Bernard's Parish" has much influence on the lives of his people; acting always for the best interests and discerning the best wishes of his parishioners, he stands for a moral law: he is the Church. This is a type which many novelists have neglected altogether amid the confusion and formlessness of modern thought as depicted in modern novels. This type represents the wealth of learning and scholastic tradition handed down from of old, the true sympathy extended to spiritual children by a Father whose very creed is based on the idea of the forgiveness of sins, and represents, finally, the keen insight and general mental penetration of men "whose creed required that they should be cloistered and separated from the world." In 1789 the world was shaken to its foundations by a mere French Revolution, but Hébert's statue of the Goddess of Reason erected on the altar of Notre Dame drove men into themselves and so to discord and disunion. It was only later that the world began to sicken of political chaos and found union again. And so now in the midst of social instead of political chaos, we must find our strong ideas in that Church which answers Pilate, "I am the Truth!" and which has for its motto Semper Eadem.

Three recent novels, from the pens of Catholic authors, deal with these great ideas of modern life in such a way that Catholics can read them without falling into misconceptions. These books are, like the works of H. G. Wells, John Galsworthy, Winston Churchill, and Ernest Poole, indicative of a great deal of mental worry over prevalent social, economic, and industrial conditions. In them Catholicism and various phases of modern thought and action are brought into close conflict. The first, Paul Bourget's book, "The Night Cometh," tells how the great war, which has caused a remarkable spiritual awakening among people who were previously inclined to "dance down to posterity amid a blaze of Bengal lights," how this war brings these keen questions of life and death, social responsibility, materialism, and divinity into the mind of a group of persons in a Paris hospital. The scene is far removed from the tumult, and the shouting of the battle front, far from the drums and tramplings of actual conflict; and the book stands as a touchstone of the spirit. It is a simple picture of how the materialist and the ardent Catholic each react to the conditions of stress and strain. A great physician in the novel, who calls the Bible "the most astonishing publishing success the world has ever seen," who deems religion "only a psychic thing of psychological origins," is told by his wife, "That view of the world is too hard." And a gallant young soldier, who represents the new France, says: "The Truth cannot reside in ideas that fail to sustain us when we suffer and die."

The second of these novels, "The Shepherd of the North," by Richard Aumerle Maher, shows a Catholic bishop among people who are unfriendly to his faith. There is in it individualism, industrial revolt as well as spiritual revolt. But "sooner or later we have to learn that there is something bigger than we are," something that comes intimately into our very lives, whether we will or no. And at the ending of this exciting tale the people in it, after many refusals, accept the tried precepts of morality and the conduct of life. These words from another author almost summarize the final state of mind of the young man here: "There is something going on, and I want to know what it is. Something or other has taken me in hand: I'm blessed if I know what. All these things don't happen on top of one another just by fluke."

The third novel, "The Ivy Hedge," by Maurice Francis Egan, is an interesting symposium of purely industrial conditions, contrasting the Catholic viewpoint and the "gospel of revolt," a symposium in which Socialists and priests, rich men and poor women of strength and masculine weaklings, rampant reformers and real humanitarians are mingled and evaluated. It teaches even the reader who runs that society is really acting quite well along certain well-defined rules. We find that individualism is insufficient, and that as Mr. Chesterton has said, "dogma is not the absence of thought, but the end of thought." It has all been tried out before and found good. And, once found good, it should not be discarded. "It is war to the knife between the Catholic Church and the Socialists." Catholicismus contra mundum, if you will.

Perhaps the most idealistic of all literature is poetry; but poetry, as George Meredith has said, is like talking on tip-toe, so exalted is its spiritual tone. In the more robust type of the novel we get more solid conceptions more firmly brought home. The poem is the ecstatic interpretation; the novel is the practical. In these novels we have found thorough application to actual behavior of the doctrines which govern us, of the havoc of the thing we cherish, of the faith by which we live. Nothing could be more valuable than such books as an educative force to inform us concerning the true feelings and actions of people who hold to certain doctrines. Where an argumentative presentation of a position may appear merely a clever assortment of words ingeniously arranged, the pictorial presentation causes a striking recognition of truth. In the fleeting snapshots of popular story we may see false doctrines and true, not contrasted as philosophical questions, but worked out respectively into successful and unsuccessful practice, according as they are true or false.

FRANCIS PAUL.

REVIEWS

Three Plays: The Fiddler's House; The Land; Thomas Muskerry. By PADRAIC COLUM. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $1.25.

Wild Earth and Other Poems. By PADRAIC COLUM. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $1.25.

The King of Ireland's Son. By PADRAIC COLUM. Illustrated by WILLY POGANY. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $2.00.

In these three volumes, Mr. Colum finds ample scope for his versatile pen. Both in prose and verse he is an exponent of that new force in present-day literature, "the Irish mode." He has the gifts and talent of seanischie and filé on the Irish side, and the copia verborum on the English. The volume of "plays," however, is a disappointing performance. In a prefatory note the author gives the history of the writing of these dramas, and what we may call their philosophy. He was connected with the Irish National Theater, being one of the group that formed the Society. He had intended to make other plays, "about the merchant, the landowner, the political and the intellectual leader and so write a chapter in an Irish Human Comedy." But, before the production of the third play in this volume, Mr. Colum ceased to be associated with the Society, so his plan was not carried out.

The reason for giving this summary of his own note is to prelude the blame and censure that will be given to this book. Had the author written the complete group of his plays, he would doubtless have given us a more representative chapter of the "Human Comedy" which he anticipated. As it stands, the book is, in its material, oppressive, and, on its artistic side, monotonous. Were the character of the Irish people entirely as it is represented in these plays, they would long since have joined the ranks of socialistic atheists. A bit of land and a fist of gold do not constitute the lure of Irish endeavor; and the loss of temporal prosperity does not, as a rule, make their lives sordid and mean. They have a bread which the world knows not. But there are touches of literary merit along the pages, and, here and there, bits of humor and pathos.

In the volume of poems, Mr. Colum displays his unique artistry. The nuances, or, as the Irish would have it, "the things half said," suggest genius. Intimate love of nature, spells of romance, "the peering of things across the half-door," throbs of passion born of great domestic emotions, these and other characteristics of the Irish Bards gleam from these pages. But it is "The King of Ireland's Son," which, to the reviewer, at least, stands highest for the author's praise. He has built a romance out of an entrancing world wherein humans and enchanted beings of the animal and supra-sensible worlds are the dramatis personæ. What refreshing magicry invests the players; with what enchantment do they run through this romance till the author gathers their hands together at the end, after leading them through the most intricate labyrinths of adventure. Fairy-lore of Ireland's rich treasure-house, flashes of poetry and of humor and of moral precepts, for Irish legends educated in chivalry, sparkling processes of the seanischie's craft proclaim for the author a unique success in this field of romantic fiction. He must have been an attentive listener at the old fireside stories, and a reader of those older legends that have passed from the lips of story-tellers. Even in the narration of the marvelous interplay of fairies and men he confirms what Jeremiah Curtin said about Irish folklore: that it is the richest and the most definitely expressed of any in the world. Mr. Pogany's pictures, especially those in color, are excellent. Let us add a wish that this charming book be a holiday gift to tens of thousands, young and old, who are anxious for a fresh, happy romance.

M. E.

Undercurrents in American Politics. By ARTHUR TWINING HADLEY, Ph.D., LL.D. New York: The Yale University Press. $1.35.

Form and Functions of American Government. By THOMAS HARRISON REED, A.B., LL.B. Yonkers-on-Hudson, New York: World Book Co. $1.50.

In the preface Dr. Hadley remarks that his book, which contains the substance of lectures given at Oxford and at the University of Virginia, might well be entitled, "Extra-Constitutional Government in the United States." The point is well taken. As viewed by the framers and the ratifying States, the American Constitution contemplates a scheme of government which intrusts the dominating power to the political majority, and works, through a carefully devised system of checks and balances, to the full protection of the rights of the minority. It is true that the "checks and balances" have not operated with unvarying precision; had they done so, they would have predicated a perfection beyond the possibility of human fallibility.

A government constituted by men, designed to guide, within limits, the conduct and fortunes of men, is not a lifeless machine. It partakes of the qualities of the living organism, is subject to the shortcomings of its constituent factors, and is influenced by conditions extrinsic to itself. Because of these facts, "extra-constitutional" government has established itself in political life. Yet "extra-constitutional" and "contra-constitutional" are not synonymous terms. Dr. Hadley is no Cassandra. He believes that the fundamental theories of 1787 find a fair realization in the life of the nation today. The mode of their expression alone, and not their substance, has been subjected to change.

Professor Reed writes clearly and interestingly, and his account of the early days of American government is excellent. The bibliographies appended to each chapter are good, and students will find the "Suggestions" helpful. But the author's philosophy of the newer forms of governmental activity is somewhat uncertain, and the chapter, "Crime and its Prevention," contains an excellent assortment of non sequiturs. It is somewhat surprising to note that Lombroso's "Crime" is styled, "the classic work on the subject," and that the callow high-school student is referred to such records of subjectivism as Lowrie's "My Life in Prison" for "the best idea of life in modern prisons."

P. L. B.

France, the People and Her Spirit. By LAURENCE JERROLD. With Many Illustrations. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.00.

More Wanderings in London. By E. V. LUCAS. With Sixteen Drawings in Color by H. M. LIVENS and Seventeen Other Illustrations. New York: George H. Doran Co. $2.00.

These finely illustrated volumes will attract the Christmas book-buyer and their contents will hold the reader's interest. During his long residence in France, Mr. Jerrold has used a discerning eye, and though he is a warm admirer of the Gallic race, and leaves none of their virtues unrecorded, is not blind to their faults, and gives on the whole a just appraisal of the people and the spirit of France. The author finds in the entire country a remarkable unity of language and manners, and pays high tributes to the common-sense, piety and conservatism of French women. The chapter on the practical working of France's centralized government is full of information and his pages on the Church, considering that they are written by a non-Catholic, show considerable penetration. "Was Rome right or wrong?" in making no compromise when the separation law came up, asks Mr. Jerrold. "Rome is generally right," he concludes. "The State was hostile, the Church could not capture the State; better then, to cut all connections with the State." He testifies that the influence of the Church increased amazingly after the separation. Congregations were more numerous and edifying than ever before: men took to going to Mass regularly with their women folk; students openly, sometimes ostentatiously professed in large bodies, complete obedience to the Church; piety in school as well as in drawing-room was creditable." But the author does not seem to see the injustice and cruelty in the government seizing church property and banishing innocent religious.

Tourists who visit London with Mr. Lucas as a guide are in competent hands. He knows the city thoroughly, connects apt anecdotes with historic sites, and is particularly at home in the old London churches. Those who for prudential reasons have decided not to visit England this year can take instead pleasant fireside walks through London streets with this book in hand, and learn among other things just why the Cockney is so called, how tall the renowned Irish giant, Charles Byrne, was, and where Jeremy Bentham may still be visited.

W. D.

Creative Involution. By CORA LENORE WILLIAMS, M.S. With an Introduction by Edwin Markham. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. $1.50.

Bergson startled us by his "Creative Evolution." Miss Williams took her cue from his title, and the result was "Creative Involution." The philosophy of Bergson is founded on lines of force shooting out; his Deity is the "continuity of shooting out." Miss Williams' philosophy is founded on lines of force shooting in; her Deity is continuity of shooting in. She is "Sometime Instructor of Mathematics in the University of California"; and rides her hobby in "fourth dimensional space." Dizzied by hobby-riding, she sees the solution to the problem of creation. That solution is the fourth dimensional in-shoots of hyperspace that press in upon our superconsciousness with a "vital urge," the élan vital of Bergson. There is as much sense to these in-shoots of her vital urge as there is to the out-shoots of the élan vital. What is worth the Catholic's attention is the fact that the author of this book is Sometime Instructor of Mathematics in the University of California. She has left her mathematical last, to peg away at the "vital urge," just as Dr. Gayley, Professor of English of the same university, leaves his innocent chair to sit in the chair of theology with Badé's disreputable book in hand. What a pity and a shame, if the precious Catholic faith of California youths is harmed by the influence of such instructors.

W. F. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Buyers of Christmas books should keep in mind the new cheaper edition of Everard Meynell's "Life of Francis Thompson" (Scribner, $2.00). A lengthy review of this highly interesting biography appeared in our issue of December 20, 1913. They should not forget either about the reprint of Rt. Rev. Monsignor John Walsh's excellent volume on "The Mass and Vestments of the Catholic Church: Liturgical, Doctrinal, Historical and Archeological" (Benziger, $1.75), a standard work which first appeared seven years ago. And they should not overlook "At the Sign of the Lion and Other Essays from the Books of Hilaire Belloc" (Thomas B. Mosher, Portland, Me., $1.00), which will make a dainty present for the "particular person." But, if purchasers are seeking a sumptuous book for a boy, they should get Stevenson's "The Black Arrow" (Scribner, $2.25) with its fourteen finely conceived and executed pictures in color by N. C. Wyeth.

In "Her Father's Share" (Benziger, $1.25), Edith M. Power has written an attractive and interesting tale of real life. The heroine, Molly Moore, leaving the hills of Ireland, goes to visit her grandmother, the Duchess Donna Guilhermina, who resides in Portugal. On the journey thither Molly meets with a cousin bearing the same name as hers, and on this circumstance the plot turns, its clever development holding the reader's attention to the end of the book. The author describes Portuguese life and customs very entertainingly.——"Gifts from the Desert" (Abingdon Press, $0.50) is the title of Fred B. Fisher's readable little Christmas story about the symbolism of the Magi's gifts. There are three colored pictures by Harold Speakman.

Michael Artzibashef's "War" and Beulah Marie Dix's "Moloch" are issued in the series of "The Borzoi Plays" (Knopf, $1.00 each). The former is a study of Russian middle-class society as affected by the war, and is written in a style severely simple and restrained. But the unworthy marital intrigue that is carried on throughout leaves a decidedly bad taste. The latter play is at once cleaner and more powerful. The country involved is designedly left vague, and the whole action is skilfully handled to show that material ruin and world degeneration are the natural results of a ruthless war. The play as a whole, though, is very depressing, unrelieved as it is by any gleam of faith or hope, or reliance on God's Providence.——Writing in his usual vein, Justin Huntly McCarthy has added another to his list of romances, in his new book, "In Spacious Times" (Lane, $1.35). It is a story of Queen Elizabeth's days and that grim repulsive lady is painted in no uncertain colors. The sailor hero is as strong and brave, and carries off his lady as cavalierly as you please. It may fairly be doubted, however, if so capricious a maid proved a fitting consort to so straightforward a gentleman.

The December Catholic Convert contains interesting accounts of their own conversions by Jesse Albert Locke, Elizabeth S. F. Kite, Mabel L. Judd and Marion Pharo Hilliard. In describing the influence that the example and personality of Miss Charlotte Dana, a distinguished Boston convert, had over him, Mr. Locke gives her own account of how she found the Church. Miss Dana said:

When I was a young woman I attended St. Paul's Church, at that time the fashionable Episcopal church in Boston. The rector was Dr. Stone, a very eloquent preacher. He was always fulminating against the Catholic Church, and one day he capped the climax for me by arguing thus: The Catholic Church is so strong today, and it has triumphed over so much in the course of its history, not only external opposition but, more still, corruption from within, that it simply cannot be of human origin. It must, therefore, be the work of the devil. I followed him up to that point but I drew quite a different conclusion. That very indestructibility, that living force which the powers of the world cannot kill, seemed to me the fulfilment of Our Lord's prophecy to be with her always and that the gates of hell should not prevail against her. I wanted to know more about her but I had no Catholic friends. However, I first got a Missal out of Harvard College Library and read that attentively. I got such other books as I could and finally the gift of faith came to me, and I told my father that I wanted to become a Catholic.

The Catholic Convert records the diverting rumor that Anatole France has been received into the Church!

Mr. Montrose J. Moses, "an armchair diplomat," has contributed to the "holiday book number" of the New York Evening Post a good paper on "Choosing Literature for Boys and Girls," in the course of which he lays down the following rules for the guidance of purchasers:

(1) Be careful of over-colorful bindings, which atrophy the eyes; beneath the covers may lurk a feverish tone. (2) Do not desert the well-tried stories for any patent "just as good" with which the market is flooded. (3) Determine your child's taste and select his literary food accordingly. (4) The disease known as "series" is liable to last many years, if the microbe once takes root. It undermines the taste, and deadens the sense of style. (5) Better spend a little more money in acquiring the services of writers of authority than pay less for quacks, whose chief practice is to perpetuate the "series." (6) While there are very few cases of immorality in the literary market for children, there are very often signs of rash ethics which should be guarded against. (7) Slothful imagination should be rectified by a good supply of fairy tales. (8) Do not be fooled by bread-pill doses of the classics. They are harmful, being so much adulterated food. (9) Nervous children should not be pampered by the infusion of overmuch kindness in literature. There is too much salve in children's literature already. (10) If the child swallows the contents of a bad book, call in immediately the services of a good book. (11) Book emigrants waiting in the nursery harbor will be excused from the educational test, but they must be possessors of a due amount of imaginative inheritance. (12) Do not allow undesirable books to crowd the nursery shelf.

Mr. Moses believes that the conscientious observance of the foregoing rules will protect our children from "literary infantile paralysis."

If readers of AMERICA, who are at a loss what books to buy as presents for their friends and relatives, will only run over the pages of our Literature department in the issues of the past year, they will find an abundance of suitable titles. Here is a selection from the more notable books that have been mentioned or reviewed in AMERICA:

Biography: Taylor's "Cicero" (McClurg, $3.50), Bellasis' "Coram Cardinali" (Longman's, $1.25), Howell's "Years of My Youth" (Harper, $2.00), "Letters of Richard Watson Gilder" (Houghton, $3.50), Smith's "O Henry" (Doubleday, $2.50), Beveridge's "Life of John Marshall" (Houghton, $8.00), Sothern's "The Melancholy Tale of 'Me'" (Scribner, $3.50), Kirkfleet's "History of St. Norbert" (Herder, $1.80), Richards and Elliott's "Julia Ward Howe" (Houghton, $4.00), Cuthbert's Romanticism of St. Francis" (Longman's, $2.00), Antony's "St. Catherine of Sienna" (Herder, $1.80), Fletcher's "Dante" (Holt, $0.50), Bowers' "The Irish Orators" (Bobbs-Merrill, $1.50), Durand's "Life of Pere Joyard" (Burns and Oates, 7s.), Martindale's "Life of Mgr. Robert Hugh Benson" (Longman's, $5.00).

History: Thureau-Dangin's "English Catholic Revival in the Nineteenth Century" (Dutton, $11.00), Van der Essen's "Short History of Belgium" (University of Chicago, $1.00), O'Shaughnessy's "A Diplomat's Wife in Mexico" (Harper, $2.00), "The Irish Rebellion of 1916" (Devin-Adair, $2.50), Gardiner's "Poland" (Burns and Oates), Stryienski's "The Eighteenth Century," Madelin's "The French Revolution," Battifol's "The Century of the Renaissance" (Putnam, $2.50 each), Wedewer's "A Short History of the Catholic Church" (Herder, $1.00), Gaell's "Priests in the Firing Line" (Longman's, $1.20), Stebbing's "The Story of the Catholic Church" (Herder, $1.00).

Poetry and Literature: Maynard's "Laughs and Whifts of Song" (Erskine MacDonald, $0.25), Quiller-Couch's "On the Art of Writing" (Putnam, $1.50), Repplier's "Counter-Currents" (Houghton, $1.25), Leacock's "Essays and Literary Studies" (Lane, $1.25), Lionel Johnson's "Poetical Works" (Macmillan, $2.25), Claudel's "Tidings Brought to Mary" (Yale Press, $1.50), Boyd's "Ireland's Literary Renaissance" (Lane, $2.50), MacDonough's "Literature in Ireland" (Stokes, $2.75), O'Donnell's "The Dead Musician" (Gomme, $1.00), Seager's "A Medieval Anthology" (Longman's, $1.00), Grahame's "The Cambridge Book of Poetry for Children" (Putnam, $1.50).

Philosophy, Education, etc.: Ryan's "Distributive Justice" (Macmillan, $1.50), Searle's "The Truth About Christian Science" (Paulist Press, $1.25), Pallen's "The Education of Boys" (America Press, $0.60), O'Hara's "Introduction to Economics" (Macmillan, $1.00), Windle's "A Century of Scientific Thought" (Burns and Oates, 4s.), Fabre's "Life of the Caterpillar" (Dodd, $1.50), Kuhn's "Roma" (Benziger, $10.00), Gerould's "Hawaii, Scenes and Impressions" (Scribner, $1.50), O'Neill's "Clerical Colloquies" (Notre Dame, $1.00), Rysbroeck's "Adornment of the Spiritual Marriage" (Dutton, $1.75), St. Bernard's "Book on the Love of God" (Dutton, $1.25).

Fiction: Clarke's "Only Anne" (Benziger, $1.35), Wood's "Penitent of Brent" (Longman's, $1.35), Tarkington's "Penrod and Sam" (Doubleday, $1.35), and "Seventeen" (Harper, $1.35), Kingley's "The Tutor's Story" (Dodd, $1.35), King's "The Pleasant Ways of St. Médard" (Holt, $1.40), Wemyss' "Jaunty in Charge" (Dutton, $1.35), Bourget's "The Night Cometh" (Putnam, $1.35), Conrad's "Within the Tides" (Doubleday, $1.35), Maher's "The Shepherd of the North" (Macmillan, $1.35), and Moore's "The Wiser Folly" (Putnam, $1.35).

As for children's books, they are so numerous, rich and varied that a selection is hard to make. Purchasers are advised, however, to cling to old favorites like "Mother Goose," Grimm's "Fairy Tales," "King Arthur's Knights," "Alice in Wonderland," "Arabian Nights," etc., but to mingle with them anthologies of verse and lives of the saints. Older boys and girls should be started reading the standard nineteenth-century authors.

What is in many ways the most notable contribution to the December Catholic World is Charles Phillips's beautiful poem, "The Crimson Snow," a dialogue between the Divine Child and His Mother, at "Bethlehem, 1916." The poem is too long to quote in full, but the following stanzas will indicate its quality:

"Close to your heart, O take Me, Mother!
Close to your bosom hold!
There are cries in the night that shake Me, Mother,
And the wind of the world is cold!"

Sweet, O be quiet; safe in my keeping
Nothing shall hurt or harm!
('Tis only the throb of my wild heart weeping—
The pulse of my loving arm.)

"And look, O Mother, My Mother, look!—
There is blood on the Christmas snow,
And blood on the sea, of brother and brother,
And blood where the rivers flow!

"And O, the grief on the wind and storm,
And O, the cries of pain!
And whiter than snow, the stark white form
Of brother by brother slain!

"Mother, My Mother, lift Me high
Ere the sun in the dawn hath swooned.
And show Me to my brother's eye
Ere he die of his gaping wound!

"Higher—and high, O Mother, hold!
And cry to the world of men,
Till Shepherd and King and Seer, as of old,
Come back to My crib again!"

Full of good poetry too is Blanche M. Kelly's paper on "A Merry Christmas." She quotes, for example, the following quaint carol of "Jolly Wat" the "good herd boy":

Jesu, my pipe, I give to Thee,
Robe, tarbox, scrip I offer free,
Home to my fellows now I flee,
The sheep, methinks, have need of me.
Ut Hoy.
What shall I sing?

Now farewell, Wat, my herdsman true.
What, Lady, so my name ye knew?
Lull ye my Lord to sleep anew,
And Joseph, now good day to you.
Ut Hoy.
What shall I sing?

Now dance and sing full well I may,
For at Christ's birth was I today,
Home to my mates I'll take my way,
Christ bring us all to bliss I pray.
Ut Hoy!
In his pipe he made so much joy,
What shall I sing but Hoy?

BOOKS RECEIVED.

The Abingdon Press, New York:
Gifts from the Desert. By Fred B. Fisher. With Decorations and Illustrations by Harold Speakman. $0.50.

American Catholic Historical Society, Philadelphia:
Index of the American Catholic Historical Researches. Covering all Its Issues, Volumes I-XXIX. July, 1884-July, 1912.

D. Appleton & Co., New York:
A Spiritual Pilgrimage. By R. J. Campbell, M.A. $2.00.

Thomas Y. Crowell Co., New York:
A Fire in the Snow. By Charles E. Jefferson. $0.50.

Cupples & Leon Co., New York:
Nobody's Boy. By Hector Malot. Illustrated in Color by John B. Gruelle. Translated by Florence Crewe-Jones. $1.25.

The Devin-Adair Co., New York:
Melodious Vocal Exercises. By L. Camilieri. $1.50.

Duffield & Co., New York:
The Cross of Heart's Desire. By Gertrude Pahlow. $1.30.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
Of Water and the Spirit. By Margaret Prescott Montague. $0.50.

Essex Press, Newark:
Patriotic Essays. (Second Edition.) By Elroy Headley.

Harvard University Press, Cambridge:
The Spiritual Interpretation of History. By Shailer Mathews, D.D., LL.D. $1.50.

The Macmillan Company, New York:
Mechanisms of Character Formation. By William A. White, M.D. $1.50.

Moffat, Yard & Co., New York:
Shakespeare on the Stage. Third Series. Complete in Itself. By William Winter. Illustrated. $3.00.

John Murphy Co., Baltimore:
The Fall of Man. By Rev. M. V. McDonough. $0.50.

Princeton University Press, Princeton:
The Prosecution of Jesus. Its Date, History and Legality. By Richard Wellington Husband. $1.50.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
The Growth of a Legend. By Fernand van Langenhove. $1.25; Eleven Poems of Ruben Dario. Translations by Thomas Walsh and Salomon de la Selva. $0.75; La Pecadora. By Angel Guimera. A Play in Three Acts. $0.75.

Matthew F. Sheehan Co., Boston:
Stranger Than Fiction. By the Rev. John J. Bent. $1.10 Postpaid.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
The Cycle's Rim. By Olive Tilford Dargan. $1.00.

EDUCATION

Reading and Your Child.

A GOOD many who are still vigorously doing their round of daily tasks recall that when they were boys or girls the reading of young people was watched over somewhat jealously. There were good books a-plenty for them, more indeed than could be read profitably during the years devoted to schooling: novels, romances, juveniles, books of travel and poetry, besides works of a more serious kind. But promiscuous reading for young folk was frowned upon, because experience had convinced parents and teachers that the mind, like the body, if it is to grow normally, must be nourished and developed not by allowing it to feed upon whatever comes to hand, but rather by giving it in sufficient abundance what it is best able to digest and assimilate.

A Lesson from Nature

YOU see, those "old-fashioned" parents and teachers took a lesson from nature. They believed firmly in the Horatian dictum that if you drive out nature even with a pitchfork, she will come back, sooner or later, on the gallop, and if she finds her house in disorder and hard to reenter, there will be no end of trouble. Nature denatured is always a pitiful sight. It is pitiful to see young shoulders prematurely bent under heavy burdens, the normal growth of the body stunted by hard labor and unhealthful surroundings. It is pitiful to see nature striving to reassert herself and restore health, when the poor frame has been wrecked beyond repair. But far more pitiful is it to see tender and unformed minds bent, twisted, weakened and depraved by knowledge that is abortive, because acquired before the youth is old enough to have a sane understanding of what he is learning, or any real appreciation of its value.

Seasonable Knowledge

THE facts learned may be good in themselves. It may be necessary for the child to know them sometime or other. Ignorance and innocence are not wedded mates. But everything in its season. The solid food required by the healthy youngster who can look out for himself will not do for his baby brother. It is simply a matter of following nature, and when bodily health is concerned, everyone recognizes the wisdom of letting nature lead. In education, too, the principle is followed to an extent. How the teacher in the kindergarten would deride the "reformer" in his efforts to replace letter-blocks, pictures and clay-modeling by demonstrations on the blackboard which interest the little ones not at all because they are not old enough to catch the purport of figures and diagrams! Why weary the little heads to no purpose, and foster a prejudice against schooling by forcing them to listen to what their minds cannot grasp?

Our Inconsistency

THE wonder is that, having begun well, our guardians of the young forget their wisdom so soon, and allow children of eight or ten years to pore over books, papers and magazines which treat of matters as unsuited to their age as the multiplication table is to the baby class. Granted that the knowledge is good in itself, granted that ignorance is an inefficient warden of innocence, it does not follow that the knowledge is good for the child now. Knowledge of the multiplication table is good, but only when the mind is mature enough to take it in. Imprudent forcing perplexes the mind of the child, cools whatever eagerness he may have for books, and sets him against learning. Besides, what he acquires under such conditions is a mere smattering, a few facts inaccurately memorized. They have no interest for him because he does not understand them. His pleasure is to forget them. He takes them like a bitter medicine he is compelled to swallow, after spilling as much as he can over his jacket, and begging for sugar to take away the taste.

Unseasonable Learning

UNFORTUNATELY, the case is different with the unseasonable knowledge a child gleans from his reading. Here is something that arouses interest and excites imagination. Evil is catching far more readily than good. The information is novel and therefore pleasing. He has found it himself, it is therefore attractive. It is after the fashion of forbidden fruit, and therefore alluring. Next comes the matter of secrecy. So long as a child is frank with his parents, much harm is prevented. But once he is stirred into ferreting out that which he feels is unlawful, he almost always becomes secretive, and a prurient curiosity will urge him to put questions to those who are least fitted to inform him properly.

This view of our subject need not be regarded further. Little thought is required, and not much experience, to convince one that stories and accounts of divorces, intrigues and kindred topics are morally unhealthful for all children, and that nature herself as she gradually and normally brings about physical development, also prepares the mind, in her own way, for a right understanding of questions of sex. On the other hand, it is clear that the mind of the growing child should be drawn to consider only the nobler and purer aspects of life. Man is not a thing wholly evil, nor are his works, nor is life. The majority of men and women as we meet them, display many evidences of the good that is in them. To allow the child to gain the belief that evil is the rule, is something worse than a blunder in pedagogics. It is the first step in "scandalizing the little ones."

The Art of Prevention

PREMATURE information of this kind cannot fail to work harm. The child-mind is incapable of understanding its bearing on life, and somehow grows into the fancy that all such matters are evil in themselves. An unwholesome pleasure is had by thinking of them, yet instinctively children will speak of them only in whispers and apart. What is thus acquired never comes to the dignity of knowledge in the child's mind. Knowledge, after all, is more than an aggregate of facts. Knowledge worthy of the name imports not only facts, but an evaluation of the facts themselves, and of their bearing on one another. All else is mere information at best. Or in the mind of the child, it will oftenest take the form of a shoddy makeshift like vague impressionism, haphazard suggestion, a loose jumble of realities and half-realities, jostling in the mind like rusty odds and ends in the bag of a junk gatherer. Whether one regard the case from an intellectual or moral viewpoint, a jumble of the kind does no good in the young mind. Unfortunately, this "jumble" seems an inevitable result of many a modern system.

Parents who allow their children to read at random and without supervision, are winking while the little ones during a very impressionable time of their life are filling their memories and soiling their imaginations with facts and statements, some true, some false, some wofully exaggerated and unreal, but all beyond the comprehension of the readers, facts that belong to the world of older people, and often not facts, which, if they could be transmuted into material objects, a decent person would consider unsanitary and foul.

Most of us, probably, can look back to our early years, and place a word, a phrase, a snatch of conversation, not half understood at the time, but which, none the less, has left an unsavory memory we would give much to be rid of. Or it may have been a book not intended for minds as imperfectly formed as ours were. Now we wish we had never opened the book till we were old enough to distinguish grain from chaff.

A kind of sepsis, hidden and unsuspected, has undone the moral strength of many a robust young mind. Why not apply the very sensible principle of antisepsis to your child's reading? Half the ills of life come from our being so little skilled in the art of prevention.

F. J. McNiff, S. J.

SOCIOLOGY

Lay Mission Workers

"YOUR Mother Needs YOU!" With due apologies to the originators of the British war posters, we may well repeat these words for the benefit of our Catholic laity: "Your Mother Needs YOU!"

Do many of us know that there are thousands of children, mostly of foreign parentage, living at our very doors, who are in need of that religion which is their very birthright? Is it not a shame that so few American Catholics are aware of the many foreigners who lose their faith after coming to this country? This fact is not merely to be deplored, but the laity should realize that it depends upon them, as well as upon the priests and good Sisters, to keep the light of faith alive in foreign-born Catholics and their children.

And what is our Catholic laity doing to frustrate the organized proselytism practised by our non-Catholic brethren, a work carried on almost entirely by the laity of the Protestant denominations? If they will only realize the great efforts that are being made, and the large sums of money that are spent by almost all of the non-Catholic denominations in proselyting alone, my appeal will not be in vain.

There is probably no better means of serving our holy Mother, the Church, in this great work than through the "Missionary Confraternity of Christian Doctrine," which may be called a lay religious congregation, and which, in my opinion, should exist in every diocese in the country, as it now exists in the diocese of Pittsburgh, where great good has been accomplished by it.

Missionary Confraternity of Christian Doctrine

THIS confraternity, to which the writer belongs, has a membership of about 125 young men and women, thoroughly familiar with the catechism and the teaching of our Holy Faith. The principal work consists in visiting mining towns and the surrounding country districts, where there is neither a resident priest nor a Catholic church, there to organize Catholic Sunday schools for the children of foreign parentage. We now have under our instructions about 7,000 children, including some in city parishes where pastors have requested our assistance, especially in teaching Italian and colored children. The children are taught the essentials of the Faith and are prepared for Holy Communion and for Confirmation. After that Bible lessons are taught them. The results are very encouraging, and it is certainly most desirable that such an organization should be found in all large cities where there are so many foreign-born people who, either through carelessness after their arrival in this country or for some other reason, never attend Mass.

Catholic Children in Protestant Sunday Schools

NUMEROUS times have the members of this confraternity been told by the indifferent parents of the children that they "were sending the children to the Protestant Sunday school, because it was too far to go to the Catholic church, and they wouldn't learn anything that would harm them at the Protestant school, and besides, they often received holy cards, candy, fruit and nice things." Under such circumstances is it not necessary that we should have an association ready to organize Sunday schools wherever possible? In this diocese we teach catechism in barns, in the halls of different fraternal orders, such as the Moose hall, Elks' hall, in "nickelodeons" and other similar places.

Some of our teachers have gone into different towns where there was neither Catholic church nor Sunday school and found that the majority of the pupils in non-Catholic Sunday schools were children of Catholic foreigners. As many as thirty or forty Catholic children have been diverted from such schools in one afternoon. One of our teachers, for instance, went to a certain mining town about fifteen miles from Pittsburgh and opened a Sunday school. Within two weeks there was an attendance of sixty children and as a result the non-Catholic school, which previous to the opening of our mission had an average attendance of about eighty or ninety, was reduced to thirty children, and from four teachers to one. Many pages might be filled with actual experiences similar to this, all of which the writer knows to be positively true.

Heroic Lay Catechists

SOME of the towns and districts in which we teach are rather far distant from Pittsburgh, but by making sacrifices our teachers are able to reach their destinations Sunday after Sunday, some by trolley cars, railways, automobiles, wagons or carriages, and some on foot. This we have been doing, winter and summer, for almost nine years, in fair weather and bad weather, all for the love of God and "His little ones." Surely from such labor the children, and in many cases big boys and girls and even youths twenty-five years old, are receiving that food for the soul, which in after years will have its salutary effect upon their lives. Many times the writer has taken the hands of boys or girls, eighteen years of age and older, and has traced upon their forehead and shoulders the sacred Sign of the Cross. Their parents had fallen away from the Church and the children were raised in utter ignorance of religion.

Catholic Catechists and the Proselyters

OUR teachers go to their respective missions in the city on Saturday afternoons and evenings, visit the people, remind them of Mass and Sunday school in the morning, cheer the sick, inquire if there are any children who need Baptism, help the poor, if possible, and perform other similar acts of Christian charity. Then on Sunday morning the same teachers go to these districts and gather the children together and take them to Mass. Now the non-Catholic laity who are active in proselyting the foreign element do very similar work, and on Saturday and Sunday especially they gather the children and take them to their different churches. Very frequently our teachers have been at the front door of homes trying to persuade mothers to send the children to the Catholic church, while the non-Catholic teachers were at the back doors trying to induce the father of the family to send the children to their Sunday school. This is all very true, and just as it happens in Pittsburgh, so does it happen in other cities. We have even seen some of these proselyters with rosaries, prayer-books, medals and holy cards. By displaying these they often make the parents of the children, who in a great many instances can neither speak nor understand English, believe that they are Catholics and that their church is the Catholic Church. We have asked them why they bother our children so and their reply is: "To educate them in the Christian religion and to teach them Americanism." Are we Catholics not Christians? Are we Catholics not true American citizens all during our life? Why not wake up, then, Catholics, and do the work of the Apostles? "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God."

The Appeal Direct

NOW here is the application I have to make. The proselytism that is carried on in Pittsburgh is carried on in your cities. Are you doing anything to stop it, to counteract it? If not, why not? Can you not organize a Missionary Confraternity of Christian Doctrine in your city and find young men and women who will sacrifice a few hours a week to teach children in the outlying districts their prayers, prepare them for Holy Communion, Confirmation, etc.? Can no young men and women be found zealous enough to gather children together on Sunday morning and take them to Mass? In a great many cases children, if they do not receive instruction from us, will grow up utterly ignorant of the Church, of which their parents had been faithful members in their native land. The work can be done. There will be opposition and hardships in the beginning, but after a few years of labor, your work will be recognized, just as ours was, and the priests will come to your aid.

In the diocese of Pittsburgh, there are today seven new parishes with resident priests and one chapel, all of which have been erected within the last seven years, mainly through the efforts of the teachers of the Missionary Confraternity of Christian Doctrine.

Missionary School of Catechists

ONE of the priests of the Pittsburgh Apostolate has been appointed spiritual director of the Confraternity by the Bishop, and a lecture is given by him every second and fourth Monday of the month on the catechism and on the various subjects which should be taught to children. This is called the "Missionary School of Catechists." After a person has attended these lectures for two years he or she receives a diploma from the Bishop at the yearly meeting of the Confraternity, to which the public is invited to hear the reports for the year and other matters of interest.

This work is done with the consent and cooperation of the pastors of the different places. Go thou and do likewise, for the safety of the country and the glory of God.

Louis F. Cook.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Soul of a Child for the Christ Child

WHAT will be the most acceptable gift for those we hold most dear? What will be our gift for the Christ Child? There are presents in abundance that will be acceptable to Him, but none more delightful than the soul of a little one for whom He came into the world. The customary donation for "the purchase of a heathen child" is five dollars. Its Baptism is thus made possible and it receives the name chosen by its benefactor. Such for many years has been the practice of the Holy Childhood. Gifts are particularly acceptable at this time when the funds of this association for the salvation of pagan children have been reduced to about one-third the amount received in the year before the war. Those who would perform a larger mission-charity can rescue several children or, for twenty-five dollars, support a catechist in India for an entire year. The needs of India are exceedingly great and the work cannot possibly be accomplished without the service of trained catechists. Lesser gifts are no less gladly welcomed, for even pennies are golden in the eyes of the missionaries and their helpers. Where other channels for mission donations are unknown America will gladly dispose of them according to the donor's intention.

Death of a Distinguished Jesuit

THE Rev. Theobald Butler, the patriarch of the Southern Province of the Society of Jesus, died a few days ago at St. Stanislaus' College, Macon, Ga. He was in his eighty-seventh year and the oldest Jesuit in the South. Born in Tipperary, a cousin of the gallant General Sir William Butler, and with all the virile qualities of his family imbedded in his nature, when scarcely more than a boy, he entered the Society of Jesus in France. By a romantic series of events, he was led sixty-eight years ago to the Jesuit mission of New Orleans, in which, with the exception of the years spent in study in France and Rome, he passed his life. As teacher, priest, rector and pastor, as superior of the New Orleans mission, as the pioneer of the Jesuit Fathers in Texas, Father Butler was a living monument and witness of the growth of the Society of Jesus in the South. Thousands in New Orleans, Galveston, Augusta and Macon, Ga., where he was perhaps best known, will mourn his loss. As a man, as a priest, as a religious, as a father and a friend, this true son of St. Ignatius can never be forgotten by those who have had the happiness of knowing and loving him. His leading characteristics were childlike faith, a wonderful spiritual outlook on life, men and events, strength, tenderness, sincerity; and a knightly frankness and straightforwardness of manner and speech. In his death the Province of New Orleans has lost a sturdy pioneer, the Church and the Society of Jesus a devoted and obedient son.

Music, Charity and the War

THE New York Times Magazine records an interview with the famous Austrian artist and violinist Fritz Kreisler. Although he wore the uniform of an Austrian officer until struck by a Russian bullet, he did not hesitate to say:

> As an Austrian and a soldier I owe every drop of my blood, every dollar that I can earn, to my country; but as an artist I am above all politics and owe my best to the world. If the time ever comes that I am unwilling to play the beautiful music of France or Russia, or any other country, I hope to forget our own Austrian hymn. I would be ashamed of Austria if she resented my playing the music of the world. But Austria never will. In Austria and Germany today they are giving the plays of Shakespeare, they are playing the music of Russia and France. In Vienna it is still no crime to use the French language. The band of the Prussian Guard has kept the march from "Carmen" throughout the war. People tell me that I am all right, personally, but that Austrians as a nation cannot be accepted. I will have none of that. I am an Austrian. We are all alike. Why hate us? Why hate any people because of disagreement and disapproval of the political government of that people? I am not only an Austrian, but more than that; I am a human being and have no right to hate anybody, because we are all brothers and should be able to think of individual men as such, no matter what we may be doing to one another as members of political groups. I have not cut off a single friendship because of the war and I have friends who are of every belligerent country.

These are noble words. To them must be added the comment of his wife, which unfortunately is only too true to fact: "I am afraid that too much of the bitterness of this war is here in non-belligerent America. On the field does the nurse or the surgeon ask: 'What is the nationality of this wounded man?' Not at all. But does America stop to ask that?" Even the playing of Austrian music by her husband has been criticised in America as propaganda, while she herself has, without discrimination, mothered Russian, Serbian and Austrian children left to her care by the dying men, friends or foes, whom she nursed in the field hospital at the time her husband was fighting in the trenches.

Is Freemasonry a Political Society?

THE question of prohibiting the Irish police from joining any political or secret societies except the Freemasons was recently dwelt upon by Mr. Dillon in a speech before the House of Commons while the Irish Police Bill was under discussion. There had been no little discontent among the men owing to their conviction that promotion did not depend upon merit and efficiency. In this connection the political influence of Freemasonry was alluded to, also the fact that both the Constabulary and the Dublin Metropolitan police are prohibited by an extraordinary oath from belonging to any secret society or any political association except Freemasonry. The following is the oath imposed upon the Constabulary since 1836:

> I, A. B., do swear that I will well and truly serve our Sovereign . . . and that I do not now belong to, and that I will not, while I shall hold the said office, join, subscribe, or belong to any political society whatsoever, or to any secret society whatsoever, unless to the Society of Freemasons.

The infliction of this oath upon a Catholic nation the speaker described as "an act of high-handed oppression," "a cruel and very outrageous insult to the Catholic people of Ireland," but the point he wished to make was that Freemasonry was officially recognized as a "political" society. The same wording occurs in the oath taken by the Metropolitan Police:

> And that I do not now belong to, and that while I shall hold the said office, I will not join or belong to any political society whatsoever, or any secret society whatsoever, unless the Society of Freemasons.

To the objection that "political society" was used disjunctively with "secret society" Mr. Dillon answered: "The words of the oath convey the meaning which even the framers of the oath recognize." As an illustration of the political influence of Freemasonry he pointed to the fact that up to quite recent times every man engaged with the administration of the law in Ireland was a Freemason. Was this an accident? Mr. Dillon moved an amendment which would have the effect of including Freemasonry among the prohibited political or secret societies. What directly led to this motion was the proposal to punish certain members of the police for joining the Ancient Order of Hibernians, a society neither secret nor political; while their officers were entitled to belong to the Freemasons, a society both secret in its nature and political in its activity not only in Ireland but in many other countries besides.

Cardinal Gibbons on Woman Suffrage

A STRONG warning against the agitation for woman suffrage has been issued by Cardinal Gibbons. The entrance of woman into active political life, he firmly holds, "is calculated to rob her of her grace of character and give her nothing in return but musculine boldness and effrontery." He sees in this agitation an alluring but specious pretense for drawing woman away from her most exalted duties of motherhood to the detriment of the nation and the race:

> I regard "woman's rights" women and the leaders of the new school of female progress as the worst enemies of the female sex. I wish I could impress on American women the dangers that would attach to such innovations.
>
> The most precious, undeveloped asset of any nation is its children. An all-wise God, through the law of nature has committed this precious treasure in a special manner to the mother. Women cannot vote intelligently unless they give time to an intelligent study of political questions, and all such time taken from the household will be injurious to the future generation without giving to the present generation any appreciable benefit in the purifying of the ballot.
>
> When I deprecate female suffrage I am pleading for the dignity of woman, I am contending for her honor, I am striving to perpetuate those peerless prerogatives inherent in her sex, those charms and graces which exalt womankind and make her the ornament and coveted companion of man. Woman is queen indeed, but her empire is the domestic kingdom. The greatest political triumphs she could achieve in public life fade into insignificance compared with the serene glory which radiates from the domestic shrine and which she illumines and warms by her conjugal and motherly virtues.

So far as he has observed, the Cardinal continues, woman suffrage has not affected the result of the elections except to increase the volume of the vote. "Thus it seems that our political life has not been benefited or purified by the entrance of woman into the political arena, though the domestic life of those engaged in political work must have been neglected."

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVI. No. 11
WHOLE No. 402

DECEMBER 23, 1916

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—During the week the Germans made a vigorous but ineffectual attack on the French at Lassigny, west of Noyon. In the Verdun district the French gained an important victory. Advancing on a front of six and a quarter miles, they succeeded in regaining fourteen square miles and in recapturing Vaucherville, Louvemont, Côte du Poivre, the Haudromont Farm, the Caurettes, the Chaffour and Haussoule Woods and the town of Bezonvaux. In Rumania the Central Powers have had uninterrupted success. Advancing from Ploesci they have captured Mizil and Buzeu, and crossed the Buzeu River east of Buzeu. Further south they have pressed on from Bucharest, crossed the Jalomitsa River, captured Urziceni, made their way across the Calmatuiul Lowland and reached the Buzeu River. At the same time the new army that recently crossed the Danube has moved north from the river and taken Fetesci, and crossed the Bucharest-Fetesci railroad. In Dobrudja the Rumanians and Russians have abandoned the Cogaleo-Hirsova line and are retiring.

Bulletin, Dec. 11, p.m.-Dec. 18, a.m.

On Tuesday, December 12, the German Imperial Government transmitted a note to the official representatives of Spain, Switzerland, and the United States, and asked that it be brought to the notice of the Governments that compose the Entente. The same step was taken by the other Central Powers, Austria, Bulgaria and Turkey. The Vatican was also communicated with on the same subject, and the other neutral Powers. The note, which was identical in all cases, was read by the Chancellor in the Reichstag and published throughout the world. Its purpose was to propose that the nations at war should enter on peace negotiations at once. After referring to the dire effects of the war, and declaring that the aim of the Central Powers is not "to shatter or annihilate their adversaries," the note makes the following definite proposition:

> In spite of our consciousness of our military and economic strength and our readiness to continue the war, which has been forced upon us, until the bitter end, if necessary; at the same time prompted by the desire to avoid further bloodshed and make an end to the atrocities of war, the four allied Powers propose to enter forthwith into peace negotiations.

Then follows an expression of belief that the terms to be submitted for discussion, would afford "an appropriate basis for the establishment of a lasting peace." The original purpose of self-defense, it is asserted, has not changed, in spite of Teutonic victories. These latter, which are characterized as "gigantic advantages," the note continues, justify the Central Powers in being confident of still further successes. They are desirous however of averting the spiritual and temporal ruin that threatens Europe. The note closes with a disclaimer of responsibility for the further continuance of the war:

> If in spite of this offer of peace and reconciliation the struggle should go on, the four allied Powers are resolved to continue to a victorious end, but they disclaim responsibility for this before humanity and history.

The neutral Powers that were asked to act as intermediaries, namely, Spain, Switzerland, and the United States, forwarded the note to the Governments concerned, but abstained from adding comment of any kind. In Germany, the Chancellor's proposal was received with enthusiasm; but elsewhere the note of the Central Powers has been given a cold and distrustful reception in the editorial comment of the press of the Entente and neutral nations. At first the papers were filled with strictures on Germany's methods and motives, but as the week wore on these were replaced by a more temperate attitude, especially in England, where calm suspension of judgment and even of discussion are advocated, until the terms Germany has to propose are disclosed.

Russia has made known her official attitude in unmistakable language. The Duma has unanimously passed a resolution which repudiates German efforts to shift responsibility for the war and declares that "a lasting peace will be possible only after a decisive victory over the enemy." Russia scouts the the idea of peace negotiations:

> The Duma, having heard the statement by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, unanimously favors a categorical refusal by the allied Governments to enter, under present conditions, into any peace negotiations whatever.

Baron Sonnino, the Italian Foreign Minister, after reading the note in the Italian Chamber of Deputies, made the following comment: "There it is; there is nothing in it." Premier Briand attacked the note in the most bitter language and declared that France would abide by the Convention. At the same time the French Chamber of Deputies introduced a resolution which to all intents and purposes gives the new War Council power to pursue the war with renewed vigor. In England the illness of Lloyd George has delayed official statement, but the demand made by Mr. Bonar Law in the House of Commons on the day following the publication of the German notes, is taken as very significant. He asked the equipment of 1,000,000 more men, and a vote of credit for $2,000,000,000 for carrying on the war until February. He also quoted with approval the ex-Premier's statement that England was determined to exact "adequate reparation for the past and adequate security for the future." A quasi-official interpretation of Mr. Bonar Law's statement was made by Mr. Arthur Henderson, his colleague in England's new War Council. Mr. Henderson said that guarantees for the future would "not be enough without reparation for all that Belgium, France, Serbia and Poland have suffered."

Austria.—The Austrian Cabinet has resigned and the formation of a new Ministry has been intrusted to Alexander Spitzmüller, a former minister of commerce and later a director of the Kredit Anstalt. The retiring ministry had been in office little over a month. On October 27 Dr. von Körber had succeeded the assassinated Count Stürgkh, as Premier, and on November 1 it was announced that he had formed another Ministry. No allusion to any crisis has been made. The spirit of hopefulness which animates the new Emperor is evident from the following dispatch to his army and navy:

Austrian Cabinet and Emperor

With God's gracious assistance and your loyal allies' endurance, we have created a situation in which our final victory is no longer doubtful. In an endeavor to give back to our peoples, who in serious times have held out heroically, the blessings of peace, I and my illustrious allies have attempted to bring about an honorable peace. I pray that the Almighty may bestow His blessings on this step, but I am convinced you will continue to fight with the same heroism until peace is concluded or the enemy is entirely beaten.

The great advantages, military and economic, which have accrued to Germany from the Rumanian victories have naturally reflected upon Austria-Hungary, giving the people new determination.

Belgium.—Cardinal Mercier's protest against the deportation of Belgians to Germany, has been recently received in this country in its entirety. So far brief extracts only from the document had appeared in press. The protest is dated from Malines, November 7. The Cardinal affirms that thousands of Belgians have been deported to Germany, there to perform forced labor, and that as early as October 19, he protested to the Governor-General but nothing was done; that at the time of his protestation, the unemployed only were affected but that "today every able-bodied man is carried off." He then names the districts in which the deportations have taken place. He quotes the following specimen of the German announcement concerning the proceedings:

Cardinal Mercier's Protest

By order of the Kreischef every male person over seventeen years old shall present himself, Place Saint Paul, in Nivelles, on November 8, 1916, at 8 o'clock (Belgian time), 9 o'clock (Central time), bringing with him his identification card and eventually his card from the Meldeamt.

Only small hand baggage is permitted. Those not presenting themselves will be forcibly deported into Germany, and will besides be liable to a heavy fine and to long imprisonment.

Ecclesiastics, physicians, lawyers and teachers are exempt from this order. The mayors will be held responsible for the proper execution of this order, which must be brought immediately to the knowledge of the inhabitants.

After referring to three decrees culminating in the deportation of Belgians the prelate writes:

Now it is no longer a question of forcible working in Belgium, but in Germany, and for the benefit of the Germans. To give an appearance of plausibility to these violent measures, the occupying power insisted in the German press, both in Germany and Belgium, on these two pretexts: the unemployed constitute a danger to public order and a burden on official benevolence. To this we replied in a letter addressed to the Governor-General and to the head of the Political Department on October 16, as follows:

You are well aware that public order is in no wise threatened and that all influences, moral and civil, would support you spontaneously were it in danger. The unemployed are not a burden on official benevolence; it is not from your funds that they receive assistance.

To the Governor's objections that finances had to be protected and that prolonged unemployment would cause loss of technical skill, the Cardinal answers:

True, there were other ways in which our finances might have been protected. We might have been spared those war levies which have now reached the sum of 1,000,000,000 francs, and are still mounting up at the rate of forty millions a month; we might have been spared those requisitions in kind, which amount to several thousands of millions, and are exhausting us.

There are other ways of providing for the maintenance of professional skill among our workpeople, such as leaving to Belgian industry its machinery and accessories, its raw materials, and its manufactured goods, which have passed from Belgium into Germany. And it is neither to the quarries nor to the lime kilns to which the Germans themselves declare they will send our unemployed that our specialists will go to complete their professional education.

The naked truth is that every deported workman is another soldier for the German army. He will take the place of a German workman, who will be made into a soldier. Thus the situation which we denounce to the civilized world may be reduced to these terms: 400,000 workmen have been thrown out of work by no fault of their own, and largely on account of the régime of the occupation. Sons, husbands, and fathers of families, they bear their unhappy lot without murmuring, respectful of public order; national solidarity provides their most pressing wants; by dint of unselfish thrift and self-denial they escape extreme destitution, and they await with dignity and in a mutual affection which our national sorrows have intensified, the end of our common ordeal.

Groups of soldiers introduced themselves forcibly in the homes of these people, tearing the young people out of the arms of their parents, the husband from his wife, the father from his children; at the point of the bayonet they block the entrances to the homes, preventing wives and mothers from rushing out to say a last farewell to them; they align the captives in groups of forty or fifty and push them forcibly into freight cars; the locomotive is under pressure, and as soon as a trainload is ready, an officer gives the signal and they depart. Thus another thousand Belgians reduced to slavery, without previous trial, condemned to the penalty which comes next in cruelty to the death penalty, deportation. They don't know how long their exile is going to last, neither do they know where they are going. All they know is that their work will benefit the enemy. Several of them have been brought to sign—by coercion or by threats—an engagement which they dare to call "voluntary." While they certainly take the unemployed, they also take a large number—in the proportion of one quarter for the Arrondissement of Mons—of men who were never out of work and belonging to diversified professions, butchers, bakers, tailors, brewery workers, electricians, farmers; they even take the youngest men, college and university students, or young men from other high schools.

The Cardinal complains also that men who have never been out of work, have been taken away and this in spite of the assurance to the contrary given by such high authorities of the German Empire as Baron von Huene, Military Governor of Antwerp, and Baron von der Golz, when Governor General at Brussels. Baron von Bissing, however, says the Archbishop, interpreted differently the guarantees given by his two predecessors, that "young men need have no fear of being carried off to Germany, either for enrolment in the army or for forcible employment," for the Baron maintained that the employment of the Belgian unemployed in Germany differs essentially from the captivity of men fit for military service.

Upon this interpretation, the Cardinal remarks:

As if the word of an honest man was terminable at the end of a year or two! As if the declaration confirmed in 1914 did not explicitly exclude both military operations and forced labor! As if, in fine, every Belgian workman who takes the place of a German workman did not enable the latter to fill a gap in the German army!

To this he adds the appeal:

We, the shepherds of these sheep who are torn from us by brutal force, full of anguish at the thought of the moral and religious isolation in which they are about to languish, impotent witnesses of the grief and terror in the numerous homes shattered or threatened, appeal to all souls, believers or unbelievers, in allied countries, in neutral countries, and even in enemy countries, who have a respect for human dignity. When Cardinal Lavigerie embarked on his anti-slavery campaign, Pope Leo XIII., as he blessed his mission, remarked: "Opinion is more than ever the queen of the world. It is on this you must work. You will only conquer by means of opinion."

May Divine Providence deign to inspire all who have any authority, all who are masters of speech and pen, to rally around our humble Belgian flag for the abolition of European slavery.

He concludes with the prayer that "human conscience may triumph over all sophisms and remain steadfastly faithful to the great motto of St. Ambrose: 'Honor above everything;' Nihil praeferendum honestati!".

France.—General Robert Georges Nivelle, commander of the French forces at Verdun, has been appointed Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the North and North-East. The new commander who succeeded General Petain as the defender of Verdun, is the son of a French father and an English mother. He was born in the Department of Corrèze at Tulle, and is sixty years old. At the outbreak of the war, he was still a colonel, and was about to be retired from the service. He distinguished himself at the battle of the Marne and soon was picked out by Joffre for his ability. He is said to be a strict disciplinarian but at the same time a magnetic leader.

New Cabinet and War Chief

On December 12, the day on which these changes were made, a new Cabinet was announced. It is as follows: Premier and Foreign Minister, Aristide Briand; Minister of Finance, Alexandre Ribot; Minister of War, General Hubert Lyautey; Minister of Marine, Rear Admiral Lacaze; Minister of National Manufactures, including munitions and transport, Albert Thomas. These five are the members of the War Council. The other members of the Cabinet are: Minister of Public Instruction, Paul Painlevé; Minister of the Interior, Louis J. Malvy; Minister of Commerce and Agriculture, Etienne Clementel; Minister of National Subsistence and Labor, M. Herriot; Minister for the Colonies, Gaston Doumergue; Minister of Justice and Public Works, René Viviani. Three Under-Secretaries will also be members of the Cabinet under M. Thomas, namely M. Loucheur, for Munitions; Albert Claveille, for Transportation, and Justin Godart, for Sanitary Service. General Lyautey, the new Minister of War, has been Governor of Morocco for the last five years.

At the very outset the new Cabinet had difficulties to face. There is in a certain section of the Deputies a desire "to condense" Parliament. Deputy Georges Bonnefous wants the creation of a Parliamentary Committee of National Defense, which is to last during the continuation of the war. It would be composed of thirty delegates selected by the Deputies and forty elected by the Senate. The committee would meet weekly to consider information relative to the military, diplomatic and economic conduct of the war as communicated by the Government. The Socialist leader, Renandel, urges a joint session of the two Houses of Parliament.

On the evening, however, of December 13, the Chamber of Deputies by a vote of 314 to 165, adopted a resolution of confidence in the new Government. At the session in which the resolution was passed, the Premier refused to answer questions put to the Government with regard to the lack of coordination by the Allies in Greece, giving as his reason that it was impossible to do so while negotiations were going on. On the same day, President Poincaré signed a decree naming "General Joffre, Commander-in-Chief of the French armies, technical counsel of the Government regarding the direction of the war." Another executive decree makes both General Nivelle and General Sarrail, the Commander of the Entente forces in Macedonia, directly responsible to the War Office and independent of the Commander-in-Chief. Premier Briand has certain policies which he is anxious to carry through with the aid of his still strong majority. These are the prohibition of the use of whiskies, brandies and liqueurs and the concentration of the control of France's war policy in the hands of a few.

Great Britain.—The new Cabinet was officially inducted on December 12. The War Cabinet is composed of the Premier, David Lloyd George; Earl Curzon, President of the Council; Arthur Henderson and Lord Milner, Ministers without Portfolio, and Bonar Law, Chancellor of the Exchequer. The other members of the Ministry are Sir Robert Finlay, Lord Chancellor; Sir George Cave, Home Secretary; Arthur Balfour, Secretary for Foreign Affairs; Walter Long, Colonial Secretary of State; the Earl of Derby, War Secretary; Austen Chamberlain, Secretary for India; Baron Rhondaa, President of Local Government Board; Sir Albert Stanley, President of Board of Trade; John Hodge, Minister of Labor; Sir Edward Carson, First Lord of the Admiralty; Christopher Addison, Minister of Munitions; Lord Robert Cecil, Minister of Blockade; Baron Devonport, Food Controller; Sir Joseph Maclay, Shipping Controller; Baron Wimborne, Lord Lieutenant for Ireland; Sir Ignatius O'Brien, Lord Chancellor for Ireland; Henry E. Duke, Chief Secretary for Ireland. The new Ministry announces a vigorous policy. All available recruits will be enlisted, and the remainder of the civil population is to be mobilized for work connected with the war. A ban will be placed on luxuries, and it is possible that "meatless days" will be ordered.

The New Ministry

Mexico.—Conditions in Mexico still remain extremely bad. Hunger and disease are playing havoc with the people, and the revolutions are as numerous as ever. Villa's success in taking Chihuahua has made him a popular hero once again. As a consequence his army has increased in number, many Carranzistas having gone over to his side. The great bandit is cutting a wide swath through northern Mexico. General Pershing has not succeeded in taking him, "dead or alive." Meantime throngs of wretched peons, mostly women and children, continue to flock into the United States. So far, this year, 17,198 northern Mexicans have crossed the border: of these 8,466 were women and 5,459 were children under fourteen years of age. In four years over 50,000 homeless people have passed through El Paso and other border towns. The subjoined table gives the total number of these refugees for each of the past four years with the number of women and children listed in separate columns.

Present Problems

Year.	Total.	Women.	Children.
1913	10,954	4,595	3,048
1914	13,089	6,505	4,409
1915	10,993	5,311	3,134
1916	17,198	8,466	5,459

The figures for 1916 are not complete: according to the present rate of immigration 22,500 shall have arrived by the end of the year. In 1916 only 559 Mexicans went home: of these 158 were women and 52 children: in 1915, 573 returned to Mexico: of these 127 were women and 41 were children. Some idea of the hardships suffered in Mexico may be had from this letter written in Mexico City on November 18, and received in New York on December 8:

> The looting of the markets by the starving people has been going on since yesterday. As a matter of fact we are glad of it, because it gives us hope that once hunger is appeased, the fury of the rush will subside, and moreover we shall no longer, for a time at least, be haunted by pinched faces and wild-threatening eyes. Our problems are enough to drive us mad. Our days are spent searching for food which is most difficult to get, and only at inconceivable prices. Imagine fifty pesos for one egg! Servants are sent to the shops at two o'clock in the morning, one to the baker's, one to the dairyman's, another to the charcoal seller's. At ten or eleven o'clock the shops are opened, and just as things are beginning to go nicely "Senor General" arrives dressed in a Carranzistas uniform and confiscates everything, to the indignation of prospective buyers.

To add to the misery, Carranza has antagonized a large number of the workmen. At first he showed them every favor, and made use of them in his work of destruction. This accomplished, he issued a decree from which the following article is taken:

> The death penalty shall be applied not only only to disturbers of the peace mentioned in the law of January 25, 1862, but also to those who incite workmen to strike in factories and concerns devoted to public service, or who engage in propaganda to that end; to those who preside at meetings where such strikes are proposed, discussed or approved; to those who defend or uphold the same; to those who approve or subscribe thereto; to those who attend said meetings, or do not withdraw from the same as soon as they learn their purpose; and to those who strive to render the strike effective after it has been declared.

Quite naturally the workmen are clamoring against this death warrant. Meantime the "First Chief" has convened his henchmen at Queretaro, with a new constitution in view. These men represent nobody but themselves and nothing save animal passions which they will probably write into the constitution. As usual, an article was presented forbidding ministers of any sect to teach in any school. This precipitated a violent debate: the clergy were violently attacked by General Mujica, but Palavicini threw oil on the troubled waters, asserting amongst other things that Protestant ministers received pay from Mexico for teaching Mexican Catholics and also drew a wage from Protestant missionary societies, for the same work. In the end it was decided that no clergymen whatever may teach in the schools. It would be interesting to know whether, in the eyes of the bandits, seminaries for the training of priests are schools.

The Lesson of Bethlehem

JOHN WILTBYE

WHEN our Blessed Saviour appeared amongst the children of men, He came into a world that had been waiting and sighing for Him. Trial and tribulation had been the lot of His chosen people for centuries. They had known the fire and sword of merciless conquerors. They had seen the Holy City in the hands of a victorious enemy that adored not the true God. The yoke of foreigners had been laid upon their shoulders, and far from the hills of their native land, they had experienced the hard lot of the captive under an alien sky. But God had not left them without the solace of hope. Raising up saints and seers, He had placed them as watchmen on the walls and towers of Israel, to guard His people throughout the long night, until the rising of the true Day Star on high. Through the darkness of captivity, through the cloud and the mist of a present filled with sorrow, they were to look into a future, filled with cheer because of the promised Messias, the Saviour of His people.

Thus was their message the counsel of hopeful waiting for the Lord. "I will stand upon my watch," announced the prophet, "I will fix my feet upon the tower, and I will watch to see what will be said to me. For as yet the vision is afar off, and it shall appear at the end and will not lie; if it make any delay, wait for it, for it shall surely come, and it shall not be slack." And the message of the prophet went home, not only to the people of Israel, but, as history bears witness, to many of the peoples of the old era, who sat in the darkness and bitterness of sin's slavery. For as God, the Father of all, had left none made in His image, without some testimony of Himself, so too, it would seem, He allowed the hallowed words of the prophets to be borne to the outer nations, that they might not be crushed utterly under the burden of their misery. The natural course of human events gave outward sign of the deep pit of iniquity into which mankind, groping without God, had stumbled. Pestilence devastated whole communities, wars had laid waste the fairest and richest provinces, and once proud nations had fallen low. Slavery, which is, essentially, the refusal to acknowledge the equality of all as children of God, flourished in the world's most civilized centers. Woman had long since sunk to a degradation in which her most unwomanly traits were accounted her chiefest charm and value. With this degradation, home, even among the most refined communities, came to be little more than a name. The wisest men of the ancient pagan world realized, in some sense, that all flesh had worked iniquity, and in the realization that human means of cleansing were ineffective, dimly conceived, and hoped for, the coming of the needed help from on high. And so He came, the Expected of nations, in the fullness of time. Not what might have been counseled by human wisdom, were the circumstances of His entry. He who made His dwelling-place with men to save the world, did not invoke the pomp and pageant of majesty, but chose to be born in the least of cities, in a stable, among the poor, a little Child in subjection.

What the birth of the Blessed Babe of Bethlehem, Jesus Christ, the Incarnate God, has meant to the whole world, is written in the hearts of men, and made manifest by the re-creation of the world He came to save. He restored man to the sonship of God, making him an heir of Heaven. He preached a religion of the heart, of dependence upon Almighty God, in faith, in hope, and in charity. He taught us all without distinction, to call God our Father, thereby impressing the great lesson, that before God there is no distinction of Jew or Gentile, of pauper or prince, of rich or poor, but that all are brethren, since all are children of the one Father in Heaven. In these lessons, unknown to the practice of the wisest paganism, has the history of the world since His coming been written. Without Jesus Christ, that history is without meaning.

The Christian world kneels in adoration at the crib of the Infant Saviour. At the crib, as it seems to me, is found the lesson that has a special significance to us who are citizens of this great country. It is the lesson of subjection, not the subjection that weighed so heavily before His coming, but the subjection made sweet and noble by the example of Christ. Wrapped in the swaddling clothes that bind Omnipotence, the Child of Bethlehem teaches us subjection to all lawful authority. He teaches it by His whole life. He came among us a Child. with all the subjection implied in childhood. In subjection to the will of His Father, He took upon Himself the burden of our mortal frame. He went down to Nazareth, in subjection to Mary, His Immaculate Mother, and Joseph, His own creatures, yet placed over Him in a position of authority. He taught by word and example, in the course of His public life, subjection to all officials of the State, who had power given them from on high. To heal broken bodies, to win souls for God, He subjected Himself to toil and weariness as in His journeys, His blessed feet pressed the rough highways of Judea. His inspiring life brings before us in precept and in deed, the three-fold subjection of the Christian: first, subjection to God and His law; next, subjection to all who are our rightful temporal rulers, and finally, the loving subjection of ourselves to our brethren, in giving them the willing, Christlike service of charity.

By the providence of God, we are citizens of a republic, dedicated to true liberty. By that same good providence, we have never doubted that liberty, in its most precious form, cannot long endure unless it is based on the threefold subjection preached with divine eloquence from the Crib at Bethlehem. More blessed than other nations, we have learned that liberty is not license, but the freedom to do those things that are good. We know that rights connote duties, and that the most firm bond of society is that charity which does not merely safeguard the rights of our neighbor, but induces us unselfishly to hold his interests as sacred as our own. May God, the loving Father of all, grant that this our knowledge and our persuasion, may never fall away in this land of liberty, where on Christmas Day millions of Americans fall down in adoration before their God and Saviour, a little Child in subjection, in the Crib at Bethlehem.

Feminism in the Anglican Church

A. Hilliard Atteridge

WHEN early in the summer the Anglican bishops issued the program of a national "mission" to begin in the winter, the cooperation of all classes was invited, and incidentally it was stated that a special part in the work would be given to women. Then came the suggestion that under certain restrictions, women should be allowed to deliver addresses in churches. Dr. Ingram, the Bishop of London, a very zealous man, but liable to act somewhat impulsively, welcomed the suggestion, and announced that women would be invited to speak in the churches during the mission, provided they did not speak from the pulpit or from the chancel. There were immediate protests from leading men amongst his clergy and laity. The suggestion obtained very little support, and the Bishop modified it into a new invitation to duly qualified women to address meetings of women and girls, not necessarily held in churches.

The idea of women preachers was however taken up energetically by a number of ladies, some of whom had been associated with the extreme suffragist movement before the war. Already, during the earlier agitation, some of the advanced advocates of votes for women had predicted that the time would come when women would be given the full share in the ministry of the Anglican Church. At various times women had been allowed to preach in Dissenting chapels; thus for instance, in the early years of the nineteenth century, there were still women preachers among the Wesleyans. Everyone will remember Dinah Morris of "Adam Bede," a character partly suggested by an aunt of the novelist, who was a Wesleyan evangelist, but as Dinah Morris explains in the novel, the practice of licensing women to preach was even then disappearing. In recent times the only Dissenting body that has made large use of women as preachers has been the Salvation Army, and some of the advocates of a like practice in the Church of England point to the services rendered by these Salvationists as an argument in favor of the new departure. It should be noted that there are two groups among these feminist advocates in the Anglican Church. The greater number wish only to see women licensed to preach, much in the same way as laymen are now licensed as preachers by the Anglican bishops. Others go further and want to see women ordained to the ministry and recognized as qualified to perform all its duties.

This latter claim has been put forward very frankly and fully in two articles in the Nineteenth Century, which have given rise to a good deal of discussion. The writer of the articles, Miss Picton Turbervill, has drawn forth from clergymen and laymen, not only hostile replies, but also some fairly sympathetic commentaries. In her second article she quotes the letter of a clergyman, who after reading it wrote to her: "It is a revelation to me, indeed I consider it unanswerable." It is true that she dwells chiefly upon the office of the clergy as preachers, but she does not confine her claim to this. Her argument is that "the grace of God can work freely and fully through all men and women filled with the Spirit; in the teaching of Christ there is nothing contrary to the inclusion of women in the ministry, but His attitude to women shows that they, equally with men, can be His channels of grace." Again, quoting from Canon Streeter, who had given her theory some support in an article in a church periodical she says: "God is neither male nor female, and as long as preachers are chosen from one sex only, an incomplete apprehension of the Divine is likely to be brought home to the ordinary worshiper." She concludes that the time has come for the reconsideration of the whole question.

Both in Miss Turbervill's articles and in many of the criticisms they have called forth, there is a curious evidence of the complete lack of any idea of authoritative teaching in the Church. Miss Turbervill herself boldly cuts herself adrift from all tradition and seems to believe that a new discovery as to Christ's purpose and teaching can be made after nineteen hundred years, during which the whole drift of Christendom has been in the opposite direction. An eminent London clergyman, after noting that her theory is supposed to be based on the teaching of Christ, asks the question: "Who is to decide as to what is or is not the teaching of Christ? Miss Turbervill might think one thing to be the teaching of Christ, I might emphatically deny that it is so. Her opinion is as good as mine, my opinion is as good as hers. Who is to decide between us?" The writer seems to have given up absolutely the idea of a teaching church. Probably he would deny this, but the question "Who is to decide?" is altogether unmeaning, if the Founder of the Church made no provision for the preservation of His teaching from age to age. But as a matter of fact, outside the Catholic Church, the idea of authoritative teaching is practically non-existent. As we see in this discussion, even the most fundamental questions can be reopened, and the attempt to settle them is made either by a personal interpretation of some text of Scripture, or sometimes by an appeal to the teaching of the Church in the first centuries, as if there had been some temporary provision for authoritative teaching, which lapsed long ago, despite the clear promise that Christ would be with His Church forever.

When one comes to the arguments that Miss Turbervill and her friends put forward, one is struck by their singular irrelevancy. She makes much of the argument that one cannot predicate sex of the Divinity, but seems to leave quite out of account the fact that God became man. She argues that because the priesthood was first conferred upon apostles who were men, it does not follow that it could not be extended to women, just as the fact that these first apostles were Jews did not prevent the priesthood later being given to Gentiles. And here she and her friends leave out of account the primary fact that first the Prophets and then the Messias himself declared that in the new kingdom there would be no difference between Jew and Gentile. But the radical weakness of the whole argument lies in the fact that it suggests a new interpretation of the teaching of Christ on a matter of primary importance and that it takes no account of the fact that for nineteen Christian centuries no such interpretation of that teaching has been known. Some of the supporters of this new claim show a remarkable ignorance of the history of the past, and even of the present practices of the Catholic Church. One Anglican clergyman indeed, put forward as an argument the strange statement that the Catholic Church already recognized the priestly office in women by allowing abbesses and superiors of convents to hear the confessions of their subjects and give them absolution. A very small acquaintance with Catholic history would have shown him that there never has been such a practice and the Holy See has on more than one occasion sternly suppressed the attempts of aspiring abbesses not indeed to discharge any priestly function, but to deliver public discourses which might be classed as sermons. Probably the reverend gentleman was misled by confounding with sacramental confession the public confession of faults against the rule made in the Chapter in religious houses, which has nothing whatever to do with either sacramental confession or the priestly office.

Happily this new delusion has not many supporters in the Anglican Church. It is entirely a movement of a few extremists inspired by the extreme suffragist idea that whatever men can do should also be done by women. In the Catholic Church womanhood has its highest model in the blessed Mother of God, and from the first there has been a place for women who wish to devote themselves actively to the work of the Church. Since the days of the Oxford Movement the Catholic ideal has been accepted by many Anglicans with the result that more than one Anglican sisterhood has been founded, usually to carry on some charitable or educational work. But this quiet activity does not satisfy the extreme advocates of the suffragist cause. Hence the agitation of which Miss Turbervill has made herself the prophetess.

The Winter Stars

B. J. Reilly

IN the eighteenth Psalm, the Psalmist tells us: "The heavens show forth the glory of God and the firmament declareth the work of His hands." At no time is this more true than in the winter months, when so many big stars shine gloriously "in the infinite meadows of heaven."

Those of us who live in cities are apt to forget this. It is only when we get away from town that the stars with their wonderful brilliancy attract our attention. Then again in the cities there is so much light scattered about that the stars do not stand out so prominently as they do in the country.

The amateur astronomer has much to contend with in a metropolis. Tall mercantile buildings and huge apartment houses are apt to shut off from view a great part of the heavens. The city has, however, one advantage for a person who does not possess a good glass. For the small sum of ten cents he can view the heavens through a three-inch telescope at several of the plazas. He can see

> That orbed maiden with white fire laden,
> Whom mortals call the moon.

A splendid view of the rings of Saturn is also to be had, of the moons of Jupiter too, and of beautiful double stars with their glorious tints. Nor is the lecture from the custodian of the telescope to be despised. If it does not increase knowledge, it does at least afford amusement. And some one has said that there is so much gravity in astronomy that a little levity is not out of place.

But to return to our subject. These beautiful winter evenings, when the skies are wont to be so clear, the stars shine with a greater luster. Watch them as they mount the heavens! First we behold the Pleiades, those mysterious stars around which so many fanciful stories have been woven. There are seven of them, though most people with the naked eye can see only six. The dim one is called the "lost Pleiad." Next comes Aldebaran in the constellation Taurus. It forms the eye of the Bull, and is reddish in color, as becomes the eye of an angry bull that is about to charge on that valiant Nimrod, Orion, just coming up in the sky. The V-shaped cluster of stars that accompanies Aldebaran you will recognize as the Hyades. When these are visible, somewhat to the north, the beautiful star Capella has flashed into view. Orion is the brightest constellation in the heavens and the glory of the winter skies. First comes the star Bellatrix, followed by Alpha Orionis or Betelgeuse, orange in color and shining in the topmost corner of the constellation. In the opposite corner is a beautiful blue star called Rigel. Both Betelgeuse and Rigel are stars of the first magnitude. The belt of the warrior is composed of three stars of the second magnitude. Next come Castor and Pollux, the twins—Pollux, the brighter of the two. In the constellation, Canis Minor, is seen Procyon, a star of the first magnitude and below it the constellation Canis Major with Sirius, the Dog-Star, which is the brightest of the fixed stars. Andromeda and the great Square of Pegasus are included in the Autumn stars, but, of course, are still visible. So is Algol in Perseus, that wonderful variable star, which the London Punch once called an astronomical reprobate and christened "Algo-hol."

How wonderful are the heavens these winter evenings! Great planets, constellations and nebula rushing through illimitable space that defies calculation by the small mind of man; suns, like Sirius and Canopus, that are immeasurably greater than the center of our own planetary system; stars that are so distant that their light, traveling at the rate of one hundred and eighty-six thousand miles a second, takes hundreds of years to reach our little earth! Well, may the psalmist exclaim: "The heavens show forth the glory of God." The stars bring to our mind the infinitude of God. If their size and their distances are so great that our minds cannot grasp them or realize them, how incomprehensible must be Almighty God, who sent all these wonderful objects on their limitless journey! As we view the heavens on these winter nights, how silly appears the attitude of atheists and agnostics! And what pleasant hours can be spent in watching the heavenly courses!

> What joy to build the viewless stair,
> That finds Arcturus or Altair,
> To fling a far and filmy span
> To Algol or Aldebaran!"

As we point the telescope to the heavens, a new planet may not swim into our ken, nor is it likely that we shall add to the world's knowledge of astronomy, but we shall certainly grow to love the stars, and as each season returns we shall look for them, as for "old familiar faces" which we have been expecting to see.

Christmas in Gaelic Lore

SHANE LESLIE

CHRISTMAS is such a familiar word that we forget, and Irishmen most of all, that Ireland had her own name for the Feast of the Nativity, as indeed she had for almost every event in the "Holy Year." Nodlaig is the Irish for Christmas and Nodlaig mait agat is the Irish way of wishing a Merry Christmas. It is only of recent years that the Irish terms have crept onto the Christmas cards. Between Nodlaig and the French Noël there seems to be affinity, one of the numerous links between Celtic Ireland and Celtic France.

Brittany, by the way, though the only part of France which speaks a Celtic dialect, is not nearer Gaelic Ireland than many parts of Gallo-Roman France. Brittany was colonized by the British, not by the Gaelic Celts, fleeing from the Saxon. A great many modern French words, descended from French Celtic, have modern Irish parallels. For instance, the Irish word for Dublin means "the town of the ford of the hurdle" (cliath) which suggests the French word for hedge (claie). The French word broder recalls the Irish for a needle (brot) and bile, the Irish for old tree, is like the French bille (tree-trunk). But best of all we have the same word for Christmas. Would that the whole world had the same word and the same service for Christmas! Universal peace and understanding are far more likely to issue from a Roman Congregation of Rites than from a Hague Convention. But these reflections form a digression quite unwarranted.

How is the modern Irish Christmas kept? What makes the Gaelic Nodlaig? Well, to tell the truth, Christmas is not the supreme festa of jollification among the Celts that it is with Teutonic peoples. To the Celts, as to the Latins, Easter and even the Assumption are more popular feasts. But the Teutonic peoples have concentrated their powers of religious revelry on Chrismas. The English sacraments are three, the Bible, Sunday and Christmas. These follow the Flag. Anglo-Saxons without the vaguest idea of the meaning of Communion regard the eating of plum-pudding as a sacred duty. Teutonic peoples have preserved more of the old pagan customs than of the Christian interpretation. The red holly is the bush of Thor and the mistletoe is the sacred symbol of the Druids.

The Irish Christmas is not the English Christmas, except so far as the country has been Anglicized. I have always thought it typical that the Saxon child hangs up a stocking with the expectation of some material present arriving in the night, while the Gaelic child lights a candle which is left burning all night in the window for any travel-worn mother and child that may be out on the roads; for the Holy Mother herself may be passing through the country. At one time the door of each Irish house was always left open a little, on the eve of Christmas, for the same reason. But these customs are passing away or are being forgotten in the rather vulgar joviality popularized by the press. Another custom was that all fish caught on Christmas day was reserved for the widows and orphans of the parish under the name of "Peter's alms." The Feast of Stephen following Christmas, known as "Boxing Day" in England, used to be celebrated in Ireland by the "wren-boys" who hunted the unhappy wren from morn to night on the supposition that it was the bird of the Druids.

Christmas was not the season for the Gaelic peasants to decorate their cottages. The eve of St. Brigid's day is still a universal time for twisting and putting up the curious triangular crosses, called "St. Brigid's crosses," of straw or rushes, over the beds, windows and doors of houses. As is well known, St. Brigid and Our Lady are often confused in Gaelic legend. That Christ was born in the Aran Isles and that Brigid was His foster-mother was a rumor in the medieval age. Even in late medieval times we find a delightful story of an Irish monk in Germany, who insisted that St. Brendan was Christ's brother, and that Brigid was His mother. He was rather summarily treated for his naïveté. But most Irish children will tell you today that St. Brigid was beside the Crib at Bethlehem and that "Brigid of the Candles" carried the light before the Virgin going to her Purification. Is not St. Brigid's feast the day before the Purification in the Calendar today?

There is no doubt Brigid was the name of an old Irish goddess who presided over youth and poetic wisdom, and many of her attributes passed naturally enough to the Saint. Pagan terms passed into the charmed circle of Christianity. For instance, the hazel-tree, and not the apple, was the Celtic tree of knowledge, and the Gaelic litany took up the allusion in calling the Blessed Virgin "Jesse's Tree of Knowledge in the beauteous hazel-wood."

Likewise the salmon was regarded by the old Irish as the symbol of fairy or supernatural wisdom. So not meaningless in the ears of the Gael was a fifteenth century allusion to the Blessed Virgin as "the Salmon of Knowledge." Our Lady and St. Brigid coincided, until, in the famous phrase, St. Brigid is described as "the Virgin Mary of the Gael." At any rate this accounts for the presence of Brigid at the Crib in all Gaelic thought.

Indeed there is evidence to show that, in legend, she was with Our Lord from the Crib to the Cross. The dandelion was said to be one of the healing herbs laid on the Body of Our Lord by His Mother and in Gaelic the dandelion is "Brigid's flower." It begins to bloom on her feast just as her bird, the linnet, begins to sing. In Ireland, as the story goes, all the birds begin to nest on St. Brigid's day.

It was this instinctive feeling of Brigid's relation to birth and youth that led Gaelic tradition to place her beside the holiest nest of straw and leaves, that was ever gathered together, the Manger of Bethlehem. The Irish Christmas is not Christmas without Brigid.

"Bestiae et Universa Pecora"

H. C. Watts

SANTA CLAUS had gone out to lunch. It was rather late in the afternoon, and this may not be an exactly accurate statement, because he may quite possibly have gone out to consult his card-index file of good and bad children. But that doesn't matter much: what does matter is that Santa Claus had gone out.

The red-carpeted dais was empty, the crimson rails that kept the crowd in order were deserted, and the little Christmas tree with its bright ornaments, and shiny, magically uneatable fruit, stood unadmired and forlorn. At the further end of the dais the canopied throne, all decked out with gold and silver, stood empty under the brilliant electric light, and not even a crease appeared on the scarlet cushions where this august old gentleman is accustomed to sit and tell uncommunicable secrets. Santa Claus had gone out—to lunch, or to look up the records of good children and bad.

But his housekeeper had not been idle. She is a native New Yorker, her name is Wanagimsterma, and she may be found anywhere between the Battery and the Bronx Zoo. And the housekeeper with the mixed-up name had provided entertainment for Santa Claus's guests.

She had provided, among her other attendants, a great company of gnomes. Now by some process of the eugenics of fairyland these gnomes had all gone to face, and nothing else. So there they were like great illuminated cheeses, or so many Men in the Moon; with no body, arms, or legs; only a great expanse of face, a face that wobbled clock-wise, first to the right and then to the left; and at every turn each closed one gigantic eye and winked prodigiously, as if to warn: "Don't you believe everything these grown-ups tell you!"

That wink and that warning were necessary in a way, because many pet theories of the grown-ups were to receive a shock before the day was out. How could they, for instance, look wise and whisper to each other "Oh, just fairy tales, my dear!" when in full sight of everybody there were all the old nursery friends passing and repassing before their very eyes. Mother Goose grinned from ear to ear, and managed to keep her balance very nicely at the same time on the back of an enormous goose; Jack was gazing with all his eyes at the Giant's castle that was perched on the top of a hill. As for the Old Woman, she defied eugenics and hygiene, and proudly housed her large family in a large shoe, and Humpty Dumpty, elegantly attired in yellow breeches, dangled his legs over a blue wall and looked a trifle scornfully at Hey Diddle-diddle and all that crowd. And Peter the Pumpkin Eater felt free to make jokes at the Three Men in a Tub, who were behaving quite respectably because the Enchanted Princess was riding immediately behind them in a glass coach.

But just then there came a sound like the wind blowing over a field of ripe wheat at harvest, or like the noise made by the branches of trees when they whisper together and nod their heads, and little feet began to patter like the hailstones on the roof, and little voices cried out shrilly "Oh, mamma, here he comes!" And so Santa Claus came back.

His little friends pressed all around him, and the grown-ups could see only a bright scarlet coat of very ample proportions, and above that a red cap with a white tassel. And between the ample coat and the bright red cap was a red cheery face, crowned with long white hair, and ornamented with beautiful white whiskers that grew where the Lord meant them to grow and never came out of a property box.

So Santa Claus went up to his throne, and all his little friends went after him. A lean and frigid virgin, with the skin of an unhappy dead fox around her neck, who happened to be in the crowd, tried to spoil the treat by whispering in a boarding-house voice to a friend: "Oh, that's the old man from Third Avenue; he gets two dollars a day for doing that. So silly, don't you think so?" But the friends of Santa Claus didn't hear her, or if they did, they didn't believe her. They crowded up to the dais, smilingly and reverently; and Santa Claus smiled back, and took each little hand in his, said a few words of welcome or admonition, and then handed out some small gift. By which token no one will dare disbelieve in Santa Claus.

It is too early for the famous reindeer to have put in an appearance; but there is every suggestion that Santa Claus has turned upside down all our accepted theories about the animals. It looks very much as though he had formulated his plans on the idea that the lion shall lie down with the lamb. For the Christmas lions are so very small and so very timid looking, and the lambs are so large and all swelled up with pride and abundance of wool. There is, somewhere in New York, a great and impressive-looking toy polar bear, that rolls its head ferociously and emits wicked roars. But it is easy to see that this bear is a fraud; it looks around fiercely and growls enough to frighten you out of your skin only when the man pulls a cord. And when the man stops pulling the cord the bear just looks foolish and shuts up, and nobody is afraid of him any more.

It is just the same with all the lions and tigers, with the crocodiles and the snakes, and the other wild beasts. Christmas seems to make them very insignificant and they lose all their fierceness: the lions look cross-eyed and very mild, while the tigers are for the most part bow-legged, and seem only too anxious to get into any sort of home. Even the camels and elephants become all shades of blue and pink so that they cannot be taken seriously.

But consider how different is the case with all those domestic animals that we are wont to think about in connection with the shepherds of Bethlehem. How round and curly and silky are the sheep; how dignified and noble are the dogs, the white dogs with black eyes and the black dogs with white eyes, even the bull-dogs and dachshunds, and how well they compare with the cages full of teddy bears and monkeys that look up appealingly to be bought—and the goats! They swell with pride as they look contemptuously down on the diminutive lions. There is one lordly goat on Fifth Avenue that sniffs defiance all day at the traffic policemen and at every passing automobile. And the ox and the ass are tied up with pink ribbons at Christmas-time because of the great honor and dignity that fell to them long ago beside the Crib. This is the way Santa Claus deals with the beasts and cattle, just as if he knew in exactly what degree he should put down the mighty from their seat, and lift up those of low degree.

Yet Santa Claus, for all his solicitude on behalf of the beasts and cattle, is no pacifist. It cannot be noted anywhere that he has laid in a smaller stock of shining drums than usual. And in the matter of leaden soldiers he is really prodigal. At one place he has a complete United States army camp, with forts and earthworks, with soldiers standing up keeping guard, and soldiers lying down firing at the enemy, and in the background the Red Cross wagon. Or he has machine guns surmounted with the United States flag and machine guns with the British flag, and probably other flags, with whole regiments of cavalry and infantry and brigades of artillery; cuirasses and German uniforms in abundance, for Santa Claus has no preference.

If the grown-ups should object to war as destructive, there is plenty in the way of constructive forms of amusement. One of the most effective and enjoyable of Santa Claus's gifts this year is a toy railway, run by electricity that is picked up from the third rail. In and out of tunnels, over bridges and past signals, the tiny engine with its carriages goes, never stopping so long as the current is turned on. A small motor in the engine works the train, and a little electric bulb glows on the front for a headlight. Then there are wonderful and airy structures of building blocks, of Meccano steel, or of wood; mechanical contrivances that lift weights, working models of engines, and last, but not least, the wireless pup, that leaps from his kennel at the sound of a whistle.

It would have been a kindly attention to say a word about the dolls! But who shall be so unchivalrous as to number these gentle creatures with bestiae et universa pecora, volucres coeli et pisces maris, or even with the worms and feathered fowls? Let them remain cloistered and secluded, wonderful and mysterious, as in those great dolls' houses into which little girls peeped with awe and then called softly and reverently "Oh, mamma!" The Christmas toyland is, after all, but a microcosm of life; but, alas, too many of us fail to see the romance and beauty of Santa Claus, or whoever else the beneficent being may be. All we see is the old man of Third Avenue, and all we hear is the voice of that lean and unlovely virgin, whose name is Envy, Hatred and Malice and All Uncharitableness, telling us that he does it only for what he can get out of it. But all the time the little people crowd up, and they, looking into the eyes of Santa Claus, know the truth.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

To Unknown Benefactors

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A thousand thanks for publishing my letter in your paper. My appeal has been answered beyond all hopes. To all those whose name and address I have been able to decipher I have written a personal letter of thanks. But I am distressed because a number of the packages arrived in more or less bad condition, and I have not been able to make out either the name or address. Will you permit me to make use of AMERICA to thank my unknown benefactors, and to assure them of my prayers.

Bangar, La Union. M. VANOVERBERGH.

The Editor of the "Dublin Review"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a recent issue of AMERICA Mr. Shane Leslie pleasantly controverted the rumor that he was to be the new editor of the Dublin Review. The latest issue of that quarterly (October, 1916) has a review of Mr. Leslie's book, "The End of a Chapter," by a contributor who signs an omega to his opinion, and ends it in the following fashion:

> It has been a nervous business thus to review one's destined Editor. Still, this was the last time we could say what we liked about him; and in our sheer enjoyment of this book, we never forgot to congratulate the Dublin on a future chief who is in such vital contact with his world at so many points.

Is this an official intimation that Mr. Leslie's modest estimate of his own abilities does not coincide with that entertained by the proprietors of the Dublin Review?

New York. T. F. M.

Another Julianne

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Upon my life is a blight, on my young soul a dark stain, in my heart a secret too heavy to carry alone! I can keep silent no longer, all ashamed I come with my awful confession: I too, am a Julianne. Like your Julianne of last week, and her companion,

I have followed closely my namesake. Unlike your Julianne I neither cried nor stormed I—pardon the audacity, I laughed! I laughed until Daddy and the boys came rushing to the scene startled and curious that AMERICA could really wax humorous.

This is neither an apology nor an excuse for being. I am what I am, and I like it. One thing only I want to ask, and in all humility I put my question: Why pick on Julianne when her brother Percye is about? After all Julianne is safe in the hands of her teachers, and her confessor. They know how false is the outside appearance, how weary, at times how frightened, is the inner Julianne of her world and its demands, her dressmaker who rules supreme, and her mother and her ceaseless search for a husband. But I am frightened about Percye! Julianne can go to parties and dance six nights a week, and still go to Communion six mornings; she does it. Percye can't, or won't. Moreover he drinks the punch bowl dry. I admit Julianne can not go one step without her small powder box and, say it gently, her rouge. What of that? An awkward Julianne was Dr. Coakley's small friend. I wish her proficiency in her art and good taste. May she not go too far, that is all. Men demand that women sing and be glad at all times, in all humors, sick or well; and we play our part. But being Julianne I love the bright nights and the glorious lights and the young men. Also I love everything wearable, even Paris finery! I am "rushing," father and mother are "pushing;" it is quite understood betwixt us that I am a good investment; get married I must. But may I be saved from Percye!

Percye graduated from a Catholic college. He is in business now with his "governor," who supplies him well with coin and a couple of cars. The governor however fails to govern, and son Percye can be seen most any day at any time on Chestnut street holding up Wanamaker's jewelry counter or posing outside Huyler's. Percye's days are all the same. He rises far later than Julianne. He affects a foreign air that goes well enough with his pretty first name but fails to blend with the "Mc" that follows after. "Some little dresser" is Percye with his pink-edged handkerchiefs, scented soap, china-silk socks, monogrammed cigarettes, and spindle cane. Dancing along he comes perfumed, and manicured and shampooed.

I shall end with an incident true in every word. Last winter a Catholic affair was given at one of the large hotels and we Juliannes were well represented. Stooping to pick up her kerchief one Julianne, a frivolous, silly, powdered Julianne, dropped from the bosom of her dress an ugly brass crucifix. She was confused almost to tears. At the close of the evening in the secrecy of the cloak room in an effort to ease her humiliation, six Juliannes drew out and bravely exhibited six such ugly worn crucifixes that they too cherished and carried about them. Going home that night one of those same Juliannes called her own car and went off alone, and one other entrusted herself to a kind friend and escort, because two young men were not fit to go home with anyone. Oh! Julianne is wicked, she is, but how about Percye?

Philadelphia. JULIANNE LE BLUFF.

The Romeward Movement in Holland

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There is in Holland at present a movement towards Catholicism among the Protestants, which owes its origin principally to the intelligent activity of the Canisius Society, an organization similar to the Catholic Truth Society in English-speaking countries. The Canisius Society is composed of eminent Catholic priests and laymen, and enjoys the special patronage of the Dutch Episcopate and of his Eminence Cardinal Van Rossum. It has honorary members, who support it financially, and active members. The latter write pamphlets that are distributed among Catholics and Protestants, publish apologetical articles in Catholic dailies and weeklies, refute erroneous statements in Protestant and secular papers and periodicals, conduct courses in apologetics in somewhat the same manner as the inquiry classes and missions to non-Catholics in the United States. A general information bureau has been established in connection with this Society, and advertisements are placed in non-Catholic papers, inviting readers to ask information from the secretary of the Canisius Society concerning the teaching of the Church on matters of dogma, morals, history, sociology, and the like.

Many erroneous ideas about the Church have been dissipated, and a considerable number of converts has been made by the uninterrupted activity of this splendid organization. A well-known author, Ida Dorper, who has given us an interesting account of her conversion in a little brochure entitled "Katholiek of Protestant," writes that the pamphlets sent to her upon request by the Canisius Society were the human factor leading her from the Babylon of Confusion to the Holy City of Peace.

The articles and publications of the Dutch Truth Society have given to many outsiders a better knowledge and a higher appreciation of Catholicism. They have also made many Protestants more tolerant towards the Church, as was clearly manifested recently on the occasion of the conversion from Calvinism to Catholicism of the Rev. Mr. Vethake, pastor of the Dutch Reformed Church at Koedijk. When this minister declared to his congregation that serious and conscientious study had led him to abandon Protestantism and embrace Catholicism, and that consequently he wished to tender his resignation as their minister, the elders of the parish permitted him to give a lecture in the church explaining to them the reasons which moved him to take this important step.

The profound appreciation of Catholic doctrine which has repeatedly followed from a better knowledge of the Church has shown itself of late in the utterances of several Protestant preachers. Many of these men are advocating the reintroduction of Catholic dogmas into Protestant theology. Some of the most remarkable statements of certain ministers of the "Reformed Religion" were quoted by the Rev. Mr. A. R. Rutgers in an extremely interesting article written for the Protestant monthly Omhoog.

The Rev. J. L. Snethlage, for instance, feels sorry that "Protestantism does not possess an equivalent of the Roman doctrine of purgatory," and adds that "the Catholic teaching on purification after death, spiritually conceived, is psychologically infinitely more reasonable than the absurd and ridiculous representations of the hereafter current among Protestants." The writer of that article further quotes from a sermon of the Rev. B. de Ligt, in which the veneration of the Saints is strongly defended and recommended. Another minister, the Rev. G. H. Van Senden, well known in Protestant circles for his Catholic tendencies, apparently considers it his life task to spread among his fellow-Protestants a better knowledge of Catholic Christianity. He is especially zealous in promoting the principles of Christian asceticism and the retreat movement among the Dutch Calvinists. So, too, on Low Sunday, 1916, the Rev. Mr. Gerritsen preached a sermon on the doctrine of sacramental absolution, which Protestants, he said, have wrongly rejected. Another minister defended the hierarchical authority of Catholicism as forming a necessary link between Christ and the world.

The author of the article in Omhoog states that the question is not so much one of church membership as of a more profoundly religious and spiritual life. The great fundamentals of religion, he says, such as mysticism, consciousness of sin, detachment from earthly things, true catholicity, authority in matters of faith, are all found in the Roman Church. He also shares the opinion of the Rev. Dr. Van Senden that only "Protestant narrow-mindedness can fail to see that Roman Catholicism satisfies the deepest desires and strongest religious needs of the human soul." He concludes with the words of the Rev. H. W. Ph. E. Van den Berg Van Eysinga that "a spiritual and religious revival among the people will necessarily result in more conversions to Rome."

West Depere, Wis. G. RYBROOK, Ord. Praem.

Curing Leprosy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I do not know what the secular press has said about the cure for leprosy discovered by an humble citizen of Havana; but I thought some little notice of it might properly find space in the columns of AMERICA.

Angel García Abrantes, a native of the Canary Islands, now a Cuban citizen, entered voluntarily, as a patient, the leper hospital at Havana, August 24, 1904; and the hospital physician declared his disease was leprosy. Angel knew he had the dread disease and was certain that he was curing himself. He entered the hospital only to avail himself of the greater facilities offered there. Soon finding these lacking, he applied to the Director of Health on September 26, 1904, for permission to leave the hospital, giving sufficient guaranty that he would remain in isolation. Permission was granted.

Today, Angel García Abrantes is free from leprosy, so declared by competent, and not too partial, physicians. More, he is quartered in the leper hospital where he has some forty or fifty patients under his care, all of whom show daily signs of improvement. I visited the hospital myself a few days ago, and can vouch for the healthful appearance of scarred men and women and children, whose gnarled hands and almost effaced noses show how near they had been to the grave, but whose unaffected cheerfulness revealed a hope that had solid foundations.

May the lepers of far away Culion and Molokai soon share the good fortune of their fellow sufferers of Havana. Perhaps as a matter of professional prudence, the doctors, some, at least, appear to give scant credit to Abrantes. So far, however, nature seems more generous. Angel G. Abrantes is a layman, ignorant, and a practical Catholic.

Havana, Cuba. M. O. S.

Can Catholics be Single Taxers?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the Note and Comment Department of AMERICA for November 4, somebody essays to answer the question, "Can Catholics be Single Taxers?" and assumes to excommunicate those of us that favor this plan of raising public revenue. I refuse to be excommunicated.

The theory of Henry George is not that private property in used land is an enormous wrong. On the contrary it would make such land tenure more secure. At the present time nobody can own absolutely a single square foot of land. It is now subject to tax, to the law of eminent domain, to regulations against nuisances and to numberless other restrictions on ownership. The Henry George theory is not, as the writer in AMERICA assumes, that only the civil authority may really be the lawful possessor of the soil. To guard against such danger Henry George proposed "leaving to landowners a percentage of rent, which would probably be much less than the cost and loss involved in attempting to rent lands through State agency." Your writer confounds single tax with land nationalization—two distinct things. Henry George not only conceded a margin of rent to the landlord, but as a matter of fact, as stated by Thomas G. Shearman, also prominent as an advocate of the site tax, "not all the power of all governments could collect in taxation all of ground rent."

Nor is the single-tax theory in opposition to the teachings of Pope Leo's Encyclical Rerum Novarum, wherein he states: "If a man exerts both his mental faculties and his physical strength in procuring the fruits of nature, by so doing he makes his own that portion of the earth which he cultivates and on which he leaves as it were, the impress of his personality." Pope Leo XIII does not defend the monopolization of land nor does he maintain the doctrine that we should encourage men to make poor use of land. No man can use land without employing labor, causing a demand for the products of other labor, and benefiting the community. Land monopoly can be destroyed without abolishing the private ownership of land, by placing as high a tax on the site value of unimproved land as we now impose on improved or partly improved land equally well situated. Such a plan would prevent the unjust discrimination that now exists against all landowners who use land. A man can own rent-bearing land without using it, but his right of ownership is not superior to that of the landowner that uses land. Consequently the owner of vacant land or the man who only half uses it, should not be favored at the expense of his more industrious neighbor. The landowner who does not make use of his opportunities should not have his right of ownership safeguarded by the State, while the landowner who uses land is compelled to surrender a greater part of his property to the State. Both landowners should share equally the burdens of taxation. There is nothing in this principle that interferes with the private ownership of land, as that term is generally understood. Nor would the appropriation of rent by means of taxation interfere, as present tax methods do, with the private ownership of clothing, food, merchandise, personal property, houses, wealth and the other products of labor that are communalized under the present Federal, State and municipal tax laws.

In his book, "Our Land and Land Policy," Henry George affirms that private property in land is a condition of civilization and that it is necessary to the proper use of land. His paragraphs attacking private property in land do not employ the term as it is ordinarily understood. It is not what he said about private property in land, but what he meant by the term "private property in land" that we have now to consider. We are concerned with Mr. George's practical proposal and not with his rhetoric. In his "Progress and Poverty" he tells how land speculation may be wiped out, and at the same time how land nationalization may be avoided.

Denver. JOHN B. MCGAURAN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. McGauran's communication reminds me of the beginning of a debate on the question of single tax carried on in the Catholic Bulletin. The first letters of the single taxers were fiery, full of conviction, replete with broad denials and sweeping assertions. Nearly every communication was a medley of the most various subjects which the writers believed had some bearing on single tax. The more the correspondence progressed, the more wary and cautious grew the writers. But towards the end new fighters appeared, who had not followed the progress of the debate. Their letters again expressed the same confusion, indignation and indiscriminate ardor as the very first that had appeared. Mr. McGauran's letter belongs to this class. It is impossible to answer all his statements in the present communication. He will find all of them mentioned, in some form, in the pamphlet "Single Tax and its Cleveland Champions" which he can procure from John Wey & Son, 5500 Lorain Ave., Cleveland, Ohio. For the benefit of the readers of AMERICA, however, I shall take up some of his errors.

It would seem that he has never heard of the Open Letter which Henry George wrote, in 1891, as an answer to Pope Leo's Encyclical on the condition of the working classes, Rerum Novarum. After stating in the introduction that he had read the Pope's Encyclical, he continues: "Since its most strikingly pronounced condemnations are directed against a theory, that we, who hold it, know to be deserving of your support, I ask permission to lay before your Holiness the grounds of our belief, and to set forth some considerations that you have unfortunately overlooked." How can anyone, after reading these words, maintain that the theory of Henry George is not in opposition to the teachings of Pope Leo's Encyclical Rerum Novarum?

It is a fallacy to state, as Mr. McGauran does, that "the theory of Henry George is not that private property in used land is an enormous wrong." Henry George merely maintains that there is nothing in his system which would force a man out of the actual holding of land so long as he is deriving so much positive profit out of its use that he can pay the single tax. But he is never the owner in the same sense in which he may be the owner of a gun or an auto or a railroad car or the twenty dollars he has just received in his pay envelop. The land, says Henry George, is created by God and "the right of private possession in things created by God is very different from the right of private ownership in things produced by labor." (Open Letter.) According to him there is no private ownership in land. By the term "private property in land," Mr. McGauran can mean only the actual holding of land, which of course Henry George cannot prohibit, because without it the land could not be used at all. This is just the bone of contention between Henry George and his opponents. According to the latter, private property in land is exactly of the same kind as private ownership in things produced by labor. "If he [the workingman] lives sparingly, saves money, and for greater security, invests his savings in land, the land, in such case, is only his wages under another form; and consequently a workingman's little estate thus purchased should be as completely at his full disposal as are the wages he receives for his labor." (Leo XIII in the Encyclical, Rerum Novarum.)

The fallacy is hidden by stating that Henry George is not opposed to private property in used land. Pope Leo XIII, contends, and we with him, that man may have a full right of property in unused land. The lot bought by the workingman with his savings is his, just as much as his money was his; and this, not only after he has built a house on it, but as soon as the purchase has been made, though it may remain unused for years. A careful study of Henry George's book, "Our Land and Land Policy," will convince Mr. McGauran that by property in land his master understands nothing except the actual holding of it while in use; but this is not true property as understood by Holy Scripture and the doctrine of Christianity and the Catholic Church.

Mr. McGauran thinks that "a landowner who does not make use of his opportunities should not have his right of ownership safeguarded by the State." What does he say to the following: A millionaire who does not make use of his millions should not have his right of ownership safeguarded by the State? Money, according to Henry George, can be truly owned, whether it is used for industrial enterprises or not. Why not the land? If one kind of property has a claim to State protection, why not the other? What's sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Clothes, houses, food, merchandise etc., it is implied in the letter, are "communalized" because we now pay, directly or indirectly, Federal, State and municipal taxes on them. He thereby unwittingly grants that there is the same kind of ownership in things made by labor as in things created by God. Although we pay taxes on products of labor, the latter remain our own, and it makes no difference whether we actually use them or not. In the same way land, whether used or not, is property in the proper sense of the word; and by those who have rightfully acquired it, is held by the same kind of ownership as clothes and money. Concerning the master-argument of the single taxers, the evils of land speculation, let him read the above mentioned pamphlet. The index will direct him to the respective passages.

Cleveland. FRANCIS S. BETTEN, S.J.

A Protest

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It may be interesting to your readers to read the protest that I have just sent to the writer of a story in the Christmas number of the Metropolitan:

DECEMBER 5, 1916.

MR. A. E. W. MASON,

The Metropolitan Magazine.

DEAR SIR:

In your story, "The Silver Ship," published in the current issue of the Metropolitan, you speak most strangely about the Catholic Church. If you have an aversion for that venerable institution one would think that you could hold it in abeyance when writing a bit of fiction. You write that "Joan . . . had turned . . . toward the enemy, because the enemy meant a religion of color and incense and security and deep emotional appeal."

It seems to me, Mr. Mason, that your depreciation of the Catholic religion in this story is wholly irrelevant and impertinent. If ever you become a Catholic, you will discover that you have adopted a religion which, while it makes provision for the sensible nature of man, has for its basic essentials, right reason and good living, a submission to the Creator's teachings and commands and prohibitions, and an unhampered freedom from everything else. I hope your strictures on the Church are due to inattention and not of malignant intent.

Troy, N. Y. VINCENT G. O'BRIEN.

We Catholics should smite, and smite hard, the irresponsible writers who are forever, without rhyme or reason, taking their fling at the Church. If the writers themselves are incorrigible, the editors of the magazines may be induced to use their blue pencil freely and strike out passages that have no purpose or use except to insult a portion of their readers.

Troy, N. Y. VINCENT G. O'BRIEN.

Christian Christmas Cards

To the Editor of AMERICA:

May I suggest that you urge your multitude of readers to demand of their stationers, of department stores and other dealers, this Christmastide, Christmas cards which picture or otherwise specifically advance the "Message of Bethlehem"? This will have the dual effect of securing for loyal Catholics the limited supply of such cards that may be available and of convincing the dealers, and through the dealers, the publishers, of the fact that in eliminating the idea of Christ in the publication of Christmas cards, they have disregarded the tastes and wishes of a potential element among retail purchasers of such literature. Demonstrations of this character often are far-reaching in their effect.

St. Louis. LOUIS H. C. PLUMMER.

The Holes in Our Melting Pot

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In an article, "The Holes in Our Melting Pot," in AMERICA for December 9, I said I had no statistics on the religion of our German immigrants. We have had, since 1820, 5,489,306 German immigrants, and Mr. F. P. Kenkel of St. Louis, the Director of the Central Bureau of the German Roman Catholic Central-Verein, informs me, "We here at the Bureau figure that there are 3,000,000 German Catholics in this country in round numbers." I wish we had twice as many German Catholics. There are no better people in the world. If we take the estimates of the careful writers in the "Catholic Encyclopedia," and give a little common sense study to the statistics we are certain of, we shall find that there are over 21,000,000 Catholics in the United States; there would be many more, if large numbers had not, unfortunately, leaked out of the "Melting Pot" into the fire.

Philadelphia. AUSTIN O'MALLEY.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Christmas Day

IN the year from the creation of the world, when in the beginning God created heaven and earth, five thousand, one hundred and ninety-nine; from the flood, two thousand, nine hundred and fifty-seven; from the birth of Abraham, two thousand and fifteen; from Moses and the coming of the Israelites out of Egypt, one thousand, five hundred and ten; from the anointing of King David, one thousand and thirty-two; in the sixty-fifth week, according to the prophecy of Daniel; in the one hundred and ninety-fourth Olympiad; in the year seven hundred and fifty-two, from the founding of the city of Rome; in the forty-second year of the empire of Octavian Augustus, when the whole world was at peace, in the sixth age of the world, Jesus Christ, eternal God, and Son of the eternal Father, desirous to sanctify the world by His most merciful coming, having been conceived of the Holy Ghost, and nine months having elapsed since His conception, is born in Bethlehem of Juda, having become man of the Virgin Mary. The Nativity of our Lord Jesus Christ, according to the flesh.

Thus, in solemn chant rising with each note to a plane of higher joyousness, is the Church announcing to the world the consummation of the hopes of the Old Testament. Thus does she enshrine in language of unparalleled simplicity the fears of our first parents, the protection of the chosen people, the founding of the Royal Line, the sighs of the Prophets, the unspoken and unhoped for destinies of Greece and Rome, the mysterious hypostatic union of the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity with the human nature that He deigned to take from the fairest of the daughters of God, the virgin birth of God made man, Jesus Christ, the Ancient of days, the first-born of all creation, the Image of the invisible God, the Brilliancy of the Eternal Light, the unspotted Mirror of God's majesty, the Lion of the tribe of Juda, the Root of David, the Head of all principality and power, the Father of the world to come, the Prince of the kings of the earth, God from God, Light from Light, true God from true God, begotten not made, consubstantial with the Father by whom all things are made, God, alone, unapproachable, incomprehensible, unsearchable, Jesus Christ, the sum and total of Christmas Day.

A Christmas Message

CHRISTMAS is preeminently the feast of children, of the Christ Child first of all, and of all God's children, young and old. In Germany the whole spirit of the season is bound up with thoughts of the Christ-Kindlein. In England the yuletide ceremonies open with an invitation issued to children and sung by children, to come to the children's King, and when the veil is removed from the manger it is to children that the Infant Saviour is first disclosed. In Rome, the heart of Catholicism, the keynote of the Christmas celebration is struck on the Capitoline Hill in the shrine of Our Lady in Ara Coeli, when, after the Bambino, the holy image dear to every Roman heart, has been carried in gorgeous procession and deposited in the Crib, a child steps forward and breaks into a rhapsody of welcome to the Child of the ages. In our own land there is never a church so poor but has its bed of straw, and never a Catholic so proud but kneels in simplicity to do honor to the Babe of Bethlehem, and becomes childlike once more in the presence of Infinite Power putting off His majesty and becoming in all things save sin, like unto us.

In this spirit AMERICA extends to all its friends Christmas greetings, good wishes and the hope that they may be given to share abundantly in this childlike spirit of the birthday of Jesus Christ; that they may be children again with all childhood's joyousness and kindliness and trustfulness; that they may find the burden of years slipping away as they bow before the manger, their hearts growing young with the enthusiastic, reckless love of their early years, love too generous to count the cost, replacing the cold sophistications of age; that the smile of the Christ Child may smooth the wrinkles of care from their brows, put laughter into their hearts, and light up the darkness of the world and make it appear a good place after all, in spite of its sin and sorrow and selfishness. What the first-born is to the youthful father and mother, AMERICA hopes that the Christ Child will be to all its readers, a consecration of their holiest affections, an inspiration to high resolve, and a full and overflowing redemption of their hearts. Christ, with His arms outstretched in pleading, unmindful of neglect, and anxious to take even sinners to His heart, makes one glad on Christmas Day to be alive, for it is a glorious thing to be alive in a world in which there is the mystery, ever renewed, of the infinite love of the Incarnate God.

A Man and an Occasion

THE man is a gentleman from the Pacific coast, the occasion was a lecture delivered in the metropolis, in aid of a parochial school situated at Turner, in the State of New York. There was nothing very unusual about the occasion, there is something quite extraordinary about the man; he talks like a Catholic. He believes in Catholic doctrine and is not afraid to preach it, even from the stage of Carnegie Hall, in the city of New York where there are so many Catholics prominent and uncompromising on high feasts, elusive and meek-toned in the day of tribulation.

The gentleman from California has caught the spirit of the Church: somehow or other, probably through the agency of a mother who lived in the vision of God, he has been brought to realize with St. Augustine that Catholicism is also life, life lived and to be lived not only in the pew at High Mass, but also in the forum, in the market-place and even on the stage of Carnegie Hall, in the city of New York. He was as a breeze from the sea, that man of the West, refreshing and toning. He spoke of the Christ-child, mark it, from the stage of Carnegie Hall, in the city of New York; he laid down in emphatic tones the Church's doctrine on the sanctity of woman's virtue and motherhood, he exalted her teachings on uprightness: strangest of all, he paid tribute to the zeal and learning of the American clergy and spoke affectionately of the Church, as a tender, infallible mother to whom Catholics should look for help and guidance. All this from the stage of Carnegie Hall, in the city of New York, and the hall still stands, but the man from the West, alas! has gone.

And wonderful to say that man from the West is intellectual; why, he has even attained prominence, great prominence in his profession, the law; it is even whispered that he is "well-to-do," and moves in select circles, but he talks like a Catholic.

The strength of the Lion of Juda to Joseph Scott of Los Angeles, and the peace of Christ: and to others too, for this is Christmastide.

Peace and the Vatican

MORE and more has the world come to behold in the Pope, the Vicar of the Prince of Peace. This fact has again been strikingly brought home to us in the recent note addressed to the Vatican by one of the great contending Powers in the world war. Acting in sympathy with her allies, Germany has recognized in the Holy Father the supreme defender of the cause of peace. To him, as to the highest court of appeal, was sent the note of peace transmitted to the opposing Governments through the kindly office of the three neutral Powers, the United States, Spain and Switzerland. This is nothing less than a public and official recognition of the true function of the Pope to safeguard as best he may the peace of the world. His love, like that of Christ, embraces all mankind. It knows no bounds of country, and no distinction of language or of race. He is the Father of all Christendom. Even those into whose lives the Christmas star has never shone are dear to him, and his affection goes out to them with that yearning tenderness which filled the Christ Child's heart on the first Christmas morning.

His wish is to behold all men united in a brotherhood of love, practising the arts of peace, and worshiping the one God and Father of all, and Him whom the prophets foretold, the Prince of Peace. Germany in her appeal has officially recognized this fact. Describing the frightful devastation caused by the war, the destruction of the treasures of civilization, the death or maiming of millions of brave soldiers, the grief which has settled on almost every household, and the baneful effects which have extended even to the neutral lands, she appeals to the Holy Father as the one most deeply interested in restoring the lost peace to the world. In words without adulation she pays to Him this true and noble tribute:

> Since the first day of the pontifical reign His Holiness the Pope has unswervingly demonstrated, in the most generous fashion, his solicitude for the innumerable victims of the war. He has alleviated the sufferings and ameliorated the fate of thousands of men injured by this catastrophe. Inspired by the exalted ideals of his ministry, His Holiness has seized every opportunity in the interest of humanity to end the sanguinary slaughter.

Time and again has the call for peace sounded from the Vatican. Time and again has he demanded of the nations and their rulers to cease from the fratricidal conflict. Fearlessly has he exposed the sophisms of those who held that lasting peace can be achieved only by crushing their opponents. Granting that after further years of carnage, when all Europe has been furrowed by the plow of war and soaked with the blood of her best and bravest sons, such a tragic culmination could finally be reached by one party or the other in this gigantic struggle, would the result be a lasting peace? Never! the Holy Father has assured us. The fires of hatred and revenge, he declares, would glow only the more fiercely underneath the ashes of defeat, until the time when they could break forth with a renewed violence. May the nations heed his warning. He is speaking in the interest of no side or country; he is speaking in the name of the Prince of Peace.

A Martyred Priest

ARNULFO AREVALO, few knew him and fewer still cared for him! After all he was but a Mexican priest, one of many driven by the tempest of bandits' passions to our shores. One cold day he rang the bell of a house where busy men dwell and entered timidly, ill clad, sick and tired, an exile from a land he loved. He stayed on for a long time, gentle and prayerful, thankful to embarrassment for the least service. As the year wore away Arnulfo Arevalo grew restless with a strange restlessness. His eyes were dim at times, but he was silent then, and no man intruded on his grief.

The Spirit of God was upon him; he had been "anointed to preach the Gospel to the poor," he had been "sent to heal the contrite of heart, to preach deliverance to the captive and sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord, the day of reward," and now, in the very beginning of his priesthood, while the holy chrism was still fresh on his anointed hands, he was idle in a wilderness of men, in a strange city. Children who hungered for the Bread of Life and thirsted for the water of eternal joy were dying on far-away plains and in distant mountain-passes. He must be with them. Then too would not his mother need his protection and ministration in Mexico's sad hour of rapine and disease? Thus the Spirit of God spoke through this young, sad-eyed priest, and when objection was raised that to go to Mexico was to die, a smile flitted across his face, as he said: "Maybe one man must die for the people." And he went, and he died for the people.

His letters told of misery, too great for words: hunger, sickness and despair:

> I have just returned worn out from a day's journey among the sick and dying. Typhus is raging, the people are dropping off by the score. I found six doomed persons in one poor shack and helped them as best I could. Famine stalks abroad, and I am so sad. How heavy the hand of God is upon us!

But Arnulfo Arevalo is sad no longer. He is dead, another victim in Mexico's tragedy. His lifeless eyes look up to heaven, on a far-off plain, but his soul is with God. For eternity the light of God's face will be on his brow and the music of golden harps will be in his heart; Arnulfo Arevalo gave his life for a friend.

And how his fate typifies Mexico's travail, the good dying by the score from hunger, disease, violence, the depraved living in high riot under the eyes of a powerful neighbor, while sleek, well-fed Americans view with indifference or contempt the fate of a martyred nation! But then some day America may produce an Arnulfo Arevalo, and God will be pleased.

"That Now Discredited Word 'Literary'"

THE eloquent "plea for the older ways," which Mr William Watson makes in his recent book, "Pencraft," is a merciless criticism of modern literary tendencies. Literature, he maintains, is a noble art and should be so considered by its votaries. He has little patience with the promoters of the newer forms of literature and warns his readers against those books by "advanced" authors, "which are praised for being little short of brutally 'alive.'" To correct the errors in taste which admiration for such works evidences, Mr. Watson addresses these earnest words to all scholars:

> What, then, is the rock of principle on which we should take our stand? It is this: the recognition of an intellectual duty and obligation on our part to see to it that our very revolutions, in their nature and purpose, are essentially movements toward order, not toward anarchy; toward that happiest freedom which rather welcomes control as a support than resents it as an interference. It is because I discern in much recent literature an opposite drift, away from that true enfranchisement, that I have attempted the perhaps hopeless and almost certainly thankless task of doing something, however little, in the counteracting of such a tendency.

He observes in this country "widespread literary impressionability," "coupled with a good deal of crude and indiscriminating judgment." That, no doubt, is due to the commercialism of the age, our worship of "efficiency" and the abandonment, in the curriculums of so many non-Catholic colleges, of those time-tried courses which are so valuable for developing in students keen literary discernment. In substantial agreement with Mr. Watson's appraisal of modern literary tendencies is a good paper contributed to the New York Times by Mrs. Florence Earle Coates. She finds writers of today producing a vast deal of "verse," but precious little poetry. She would advise many of them to give up trying to be poets, "poetry is so difficult," and write honest prose instead. Regarding the character of the themes they choose for their lucubrations, she well observes:

> The trouble with much modern poetry, with much poetry that is widely read, highly praised, and extensively advertised, is that it is absolutely godless. I find that few of the poets who have been conspicuous during the last few years have any ideal, anything large or final to say. Some of the modern poets deliberately choose distasteful subjects, subjects that are mean and morbid and base. They show a perverse affection for ugliness and ill-health. Now, poetry that endures is not produced by writers who have this attitude toward life.

Unfortunately, however, the various kinds of free-verse writers still contrive to persuade the average magazine editor to print in the form of poetry their prosy output, and the things they choose to describe are all too often the very ones that cannot be, as Mrs. Coates correctly maintains, the theme of true poetry whose high mission has been time out of mind to fill the soul with love and admiration for what is great and beautiful. Those who attract attention by writing, however cleverly, about ugliness and disease are not authentic poets, the publishers of "fifth editions" to the contrary notwithstanding. True poets, by "still nursing the unconquerable hope, still clutching the inviolable shade," give their readers nobler loves and nobler cares, "lifting them above mean desires, and helping them to believe with Socrates, that they who have the fewest wants are nearest to the gods."

All this to be sure will sound strange to those Americans who insist that since literature is life, it must deal with "subjects that are mean and sordid and base." Such folk, only too often vicious themselves, are not as disingenuous as they appear to be. Were they more honest, they would proclaim boldly that, in their estimation, letters are a legitimate avenue for the dissemination of corruption. This admission would have the merit of honesty, even though it revealed a sordid heart.

Literature

BULWER LYTTON, VICTORIAN ROMANTIC

IN studying Victorian origins, one's eyes are constantly turned to the salon of Lady Blessington. From that circle came forth so many of the figures that were to make the difference between 1837 and 1887, and all who had been steeped in its atmosphere carried into the affairs of the larger world a trail of its influence. They were men distinguished and yet in some strange way déclassés. They had glory, but not secure reputation. Bulwer Lytton was one of the most characteristic of the types that emerged from the Blessington salon. The Bulwers were an old English family, yet he was so swarthy that men might well take him for a foreigner, almost for an Oriental. He had been brought up in the most extraordinary fashion, and everything that had happened to him had combined to give him a twist. His father and his mother had quarreled all through his childhood. When he fell in love he quarreled with his mother about his sweetheart. When he married, he quarreled with his wife, partly about his mother. Most people, however, who read a fair account of this latter quarrel will feel their sympathy to be mainly with the wife.

But Lytton was unquestionably a man of genius; one feels that in his worst novels and in his most affected private letter. What kind of genius he was is a much more difficult matter to determine. The close friendship which developed between him and Disraeli inevitably suggests a comparison between the two men, and, indeed, they had not a little in common. The one is remembered primarily as a politician; the other, more faintly, as a novelist. Yet there seems at first no particular reason why an accident should not have resulted in their changing parts. Disraeli's novels, if not better novels, are at least more permanently valuable contributions to literature than most of Lytton's; and there are speeches of Lytton's, those on the Crimean War in particular, which seem, to me at least, fully equal to the best of Disraeli's. Deadly as was much of Disraeli's irony and powerful as was his best invective, it was not in him to say anything as good as: "Destroy your Government and save your army."

Had Disraeli been disappointed in his political ambitions he would probably have devoted himself to literature; his novels, written for the popular market, would have had more romantic fustian and less cynical observation, would have been more admired by his contemporaries and more easily forgotten by posterity, just as Lytton's have been. And it may easily seem to many that had Lytton been able to snatch the chance that Disraeli snatched, he might have been the leader of a great political party.

But there was not in Lytton that Jewish power of concentration on a single object that underlay all Disraeli's fripperies and affectations. It was his temperament as well as his pose to be an Admirable Crichton, to touch everything and to touch nothing that he did not adorn. He was the most representative of all the Victorians. He was not a great novelist, but he created one brilliant fictitious character. That character was Bulwer Lytton, and Bulwer Lytton is best understood as the Victorian era dramatizing itself romantically.

The Victorian era was, until near its very end, a time of exuberant hopes and inexhaustible interests. It was interested in art and in literature in a romantic fashion. It was interested in science in an even more romantic fashion. It was interested in politics in a fashion half-serious, half-sporting. It was keenly interested in religion without having much of a religion to be interested in. The ideal man of the Victorian age must be an omnivorous student, a not unsympathetic skeptic, and yet a man of the world, acquainted with affairs. Lytton fitted this ideal.

Lytton's novels, indiscriminately praised in his own time, have now—with the possible exception of "The Caxtons"—fallen into a somewhat indiscriminate neglect. Yet he produced at least one really great tale, "A Strange Story," and all that he wrote in the way of comedy, especially of extravagant comedy, like much of "Pelham," is good. His plays are dead: even the "Lady of Lyons" and "Money," which lasted the longest, have ceased to attract modern audiences. The world has even more completely forgotten his poetry, and this is perhaps the most undeserved part of the fate which has overtaken him.

Lytton was not a great poet. Much of what he wrote in verse, in the "Lady of Lyons" and, in fact, nearly all his poetic dramas, is sham romantic stuff. On the other hand, it is fair to him to say that no one since the eighteenth century has been able to catch so well the note of that school of epigrammatic satire which Dryden and Pope established. There are passages in "St. Stephen's" and "The New Timon" which recall the best eighteenth-century work in the compactness of their phrasing and the vividness of the impression they produce; and one would hardly be afraid to put along side of some of the superb portraits of "Absalom and Achitophel" the description of Lord Derby in the latter poem:

> The brilliant chief, irregularly great,
> Frank, haughty, rash—the Rupert of Debate!
> Nor gout nor toil his freshness can destroy,
> And time still leaves all Eton in the boy.

Unfortunately, however, Lytton let fly one of his shafts at a poet immeasurably superior to himself, a poet who seldom used the weapons of satire, but who, when he did use them, showed himself a master. In "The New Timon" there was an allusion to "School-Miss Alfred" and to "Tennysonian Rhyme." School-Miss Alfred showed herself no person to be insulted with impunity. Tennyson's reply has always seemed to me a very fine piece of work. I do not know of any passage in poetical satire, not even Pope's verses on Sporus, where mere contempt is more powerfully suggested than in that stanza on the comparison between the Old and the New Timon.

> So died the Old; here comes the New;
> Regard him—a familiar face;
> I thought we knew him! what, it's you—
> The padded man that wears the stays!

Lytton died in 1873. He lived long enough to make Dickens spoil the end of "Great Expectations," and to see his friend Disraeli establish household suffrage. The Victorian age was already waning. The free parliament of the fifties, in which he had distinguished himself, was no more. Gladstone and Disraeli confronted each other, and the mechanical party system was already in being. The Victorian era was passing; and this brilliant type of it passed first, "as he was ever wont."

CECIL CHESTERTON.

REVIEWS

The Sulpicians in the United States. By CHARLES G. HERBERMANN, LL.D. New York: The Encyclopedia Press. $2.25.

Not the least of the many debts under which the lamented Dr. Herbermann has placed his fellow Catholics in the United States is this history of the Baltimore Community of the "Gentlemen of St. Sulpice." It was the last work of his busy life, and one which, having once begun, in spite of the loss of sight that afflicted Dr. Herbermann's closing years, he says himself, he "soon found a labor of love." When his great affliction is recalled the success of his accomplishment can be all the more appreciated. It is the first comprehensive record published of the aims of the Sulpicians, the nature of their methods in the cause of clerical education, and of the character of the men who have carried on their work from the coming of Father Nagot to Baltimore, in July, 1791. In detailing the development of St. Mary's Seminary and College and of St. Charles' College, Dr. Herbermann has made use of his data to illustrate as well the steady growth of the Church throughout the United States, and to indicate how racial accessions contributed to its material and social progress. There are sketches of the pioneers that the Company of St. Sulpice gave to the ranks of the Hierarchy: Dubois, Flaget, David, Dubourg, Maréchal, Eccleston, Bruté, Chabrat, Clanche, the builders of the strong foundations on which the great structure now securely rests.

> On the mission-field, says Cardinal Gibbons in a brief preface to the volume, they have everywhere left in the districts in which they worked as priests or bishops, a reputation for personal holiness, great labors and public spirit. Their missionary record is especially noteworthy for men trained in the cloistered life of the seminary, and laboring in a strange land. Again it would be difficult to overrate the extent of their help in securing for our needy missions in times past a large supply both of French priests and of French money. This service is, as has been remarked, not unlike that which the French nation rendered ours at the period of the Revolution.

In the recent celebration at Baltimore, of the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the first Sulpician seminary in the United States, Dr. Herbermann's History was crowned with honor and was made one of the features of a notable event in which prelates and priests from all over the country participated. The tribute was well merited and the only regret is that the author did not live to witness it.

T. F. M.

Lights and Shadows. Some Scenes and Sketches from the Mission Field. Compiled by Rev. Joseph Speiler, P. S. M. Translated by C. Lawrence, O. M. Cap. Techny, Ill.: Mission Press of the Society of the Divine Word. $0.75.

These sketches make a very timely appearance, coming as they do at a moment when thinking Catholics of America are beginning to realize that their money and perhaps their lives must help support the missions that the war in Europe has crippled so terribly. After a clear summary of the chief religions found among the heathen, the author gives a vivid picture of the moral and social evils of paganism. The very simplicity of this narrative and the absence of all artificial coloring but heighten the depressing effect. Add to this the story of the difficulties, dangers and sacrifices that mark the efforts of the heroes of God who are trying to bring these souls to Christ, and the picture is dark indeed. But these shadows lose their gloom in the light that comes from the third part of this book. Here we have the story of the faith and zeal of the neophytes, told mostly by the lips of the missionaries themselves. Thus by a method of contrasts our sympathy is enlisted for the missions. The book should find a large audience among Catholics who have at heart the spread of the Kingdom of Christ.

E. D. S.

Our Hispanic Southwest. By Ernest Peixotto. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

Is it good taste or bad that prefers "Hispanic" to "Spanish"? We leave it to the reader, remarking that, while Hispanus was good enough for Cicero, later Romans, generally supposed to have degenerated somewhat, had to invent Hispanicus. The book before us is the work of an artist who travels to find subjects for his pencil. The pictures, therefore, are its chief part, and they are good. The reading part is rather rambling. Both are more pleasant for those who have the preparation of experience. Those who have seen the places depicted and know their history, will find this book the occasion of many pleasant reminiscences: those who lack this experience may be led to seek it. Of course, one notices in this, as in all such books by persons not Catholic, that superior habit of gentle toleration, which some of us accept humbly and gratefully, and praise as the sign of a kindly spirit, but which others, perceiving the incongruity of such patronage coming to the Church of the Living God from all sorts and conditions of his creatures, resent very justly. Our author is good-humoredly patient with pictures of saints and such like things; while, when an Indian girl falls a couple of hundred feet over a precipice, at the foot of a missionary mounting to the cliff city at the peril of his life, who picks her up unhurt, he prefers to attribute the escape to the probable softness of the probable sand upon which she probably fell, rather than recognize with the Indians, who saw the fact and were thoroughly informed regarding the probable sand and its probable softness, and the natural result of such a fall, the miracle which led them to lay aside all hostility and to receive the missionary as the messenger of Heaven. But the children of this world are always wiser in their generation than the children of light.

H. W.

Problems of Religion. By Durant Drake. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $2.00.

Professor Drake is an agnostic, and yet not an agnostic. He finds fault with every argument for the existence of a personal God, the while he holds premiseless conclusions anent the origin and evolution of religion to be scientifically acceptable; he rejects the Gospel testimony in favor of Christ's miracles, and uses Gospel testimony to prove that the Wonder-Worker of Galilee was a faith-healer; he doubts whether the "Primacy" text belongs to the genuine sayings of the Master, albeit he has no doubt that it does not mean what it does mean; he finds no reason for asserting the Saviour's Divinity, but is perfectly satisfied that Jesus thought the end of the world near; he is sure that the Resurrection is unproved, and equally sure that St. Paul's visum est can refer only to visions. It is to be regretted that books of the "Problems of Religion" type constitute the popular religious literature of the day; it is still more to be regretted that the authorities of Wesleyan University permitted Professor Drake, who, by the way, is a Ph.D. of Columbia and an A.M. of Harvard, to inoculate the students whom Christian parents have committed to the care of these professors, with the poison of Christless Christianity, and, perhaps, to define faith as an assent to possibilities on account of the advantages thereof, or to ascribe the birth of religion to primitive superstition and error.

J. T. L.

My Garden. By Louise Beebe Wilder. Garden City: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.50.

Whoso loves a garden will love this book even as he might love the faithful portrait and appreciative biography of a dear friend. For every well-kept garden is, as the initiated enthusiastically claim, "a companion that never falls, a friend that never fails, an unending source of refreshment, comfort and entertainment." No corner of an ideal flower-garden is left undescribed in these pages. The wall or the hedge or the lattice-work that incloses it and gives it a distinct boundary, and its greatest charm of privacy and seclusion, where we may open the garden-gate and close it behind us and feel the rare enjoyment of a paradise apart; the borders and the beds and the soil of them and the tasteful mingling of colors; what flowers we are to choose and nourish to set amid the draperies of May, or the magic luxuriance of June, or the hot fervor of July, or the sunset glories of autumn: here we may learn of them all, we who care to keep our own gardens, receiving from them more radiant life, more sunshine, more growth than we give thereto. Nor does the author's enthusiasm and fervor force her to be the less practical, for lists and statistics and illustrations and sensible work-a-day counsel only penetrate the further with the reader because of the warmth and eloquence that surround them. This book has peculiar value for the keeper of a garden, inspiring him with enthusiasm or imparting direction; and yet for all who love life at all, the volume mingles in the way that ever fascinateth, the thing of profit with the glow of charm.

J. P. M.

The History of the Fabian Society. By EDWARD R. PEASE. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.75.

Socialism in America. By JOHN MACY. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.00.

Fabianism has in general been regarded as a dilettante form of Socialism. It has never been taken very seriously by American Socialists, but has furnished them with an abundance of literature which they have found serviceable in making a wider appeal for their doctrines. Its fundamental tenets are purely socialistic, demanding the transfer of land and industrial property from individual to class ownership. In the latter instance it specifies such property as can conveniently be managed socially. Expropriated individuals are to receive "such relief" as may seem fit to the community. This in brief is the basic doctrine of the Fabian Society. Though an exclusive association and confined to what its leaders would consider an intellectual aristocracy, it welcomed from its beginning every form of radicalism, and only gradually evolved a definite program. It consisted of young men who were superciliously wiser than their fathers. "Our parents," says the author, "who read neither Spencer nor Huxley, lived in an intellectual world which bore no relation to our own. We also felt instinctively that we could accept nothing on trust from those who still believed that the early chapters of Genesis accurately described the origin of the universe." This explains the spirit of the book and of the society whose leading and formative spirit was Shaw. Though the latter has at present retired somewhat into the background, the association might fittingly enough have been termed the Shavian Society. Its main sources of inspiration have been Socialism, atheistic Darwinianism, and the agrarian Socialism of Henry George. One of its guiding stars at the first was Mrs. Annie Besant, "then notorious as an advocate of atheism and Malthusianism." The slightest trivialities concerning the Society are considered by the author worthy of historic immortality.

The second volume belongs to the series of "The American Books." It is somewhat difficult to analyze the psychological process by which it comes to be included in "a library of good citizenship," such as this series professes to be. The author is at the same time a Socialist and an I. W. W. and his book is dedicated to the anarchistic syndicalist Arturo Giovannitti. He believes that the issue between the Catholic Church and Socialism "had better be sharpened and not blurred with timid explanations." The fallacy is repeated that the Church has begun the attack, as if the principles of Socialism had not themselves been a defiance of Christianity. The author candidly admits that Socialism and anarchism "sprang from the same stock and have in their veins some common blood," and shows that no attempt has ever been made to carry out the staged resolution of expelling from the Socialist party those advocating "crime, sabotage, or other methods of violence." He adds convincingly: "Some of us have been advocating these things under certain conditions as publicly as we knew how and are still awaiting expulsion from the party." His ideal, which is here put before American youth in "a library of good citizenship," is that of the I. W. W. Its spirit he believes must animate the labor movement "if it is to have a revolutionary function," and he holds that it admirably possesses "all that is essential in Socialism." J. H.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In "The Valley of Vision" (New York: The Encyclopedia Press, $0.75), Miss Blanche Mary Kelly has gathered together about thirty short poems from her pen, which have already appeared in various publications. The poems are something more than mere pleasant versifying. They are the embodiment of genuine poetic thought, clothed in poetic yet simple diction. They show delicacy and refinement of feeling and at times give evidence of strong, if suppressed emotion. The little volume is unpretentious in scope and theme. That very quality will help to win it a warm welcome. When the author shall have steadied her hand to all the arts and devices of her difficult craft, it is to be hoped that she will not be afraid to sound a bolder message than she has given us in these delicate lays. Her poems promise well for a still richer harvest of song in the future.

The December Month offers its readers a series of interesting and timely articles, all marked by sound scholarship, clearness and force of presentation. Continuing a subject already treated in two preceding articles, and whose purpose is to help the reader to derive more profit as well as enjoyment from the works of the foremost Catholic novelists, Father Herbert Lucas writes "'Of God's Plot' in Catholic Fiction." With regard to "plot significance," plot-interest, he says that the Catholic writer holds a position of distinct advantage as compared with the non-Catholic novelist. "God's Plot" for the salvation and sanctification of souls, he writes, involves interrelations far more intricate than those which arise out of the more narrowly limited aims of short-sighted humanity. In "Concerning Prayer," Father Sidney Smith analyses certain theories of prayer and kindred subjects put forth by prominent Anglican clergymen such as the Rev. Harold Johnson, the Rev. C. H. S. Matthews and Dr. Rufus Jones, and shows how far they deflect from fundamental Christian beliefs. John Ayscough, in "French and English" tells how the "Ancient" met the French artilleryman and of the good he did to his soul. M. B. Willison writes of "Domestic Service," Father Thurston of "The German Press Propaganda," and Mary Samuel Daniel draws interesting sketches of "Some Peddington People." The "Miscellanea" and the "Reviews" present their usual thoughtful budget, and M. G. Chadwick contributes a fine poem: "The Hand of the Lord."

Priests and laymen who are desirous of having at hand an accurate exposition of Catholic doctrine will be pleased to know that a translation of the second volume of Rev. L. Labauche's lectures on dogmatic theology is now in the market, under the title, "God and Man" (P. J. Kenedy & Sons, $1.50). In four well-classified divisions the author treats of the state of original innocence, original sin, grace, man and his future state. Though simple, the book is scholarly and abounds in valuable references which will please those who wish to pursue further studies along the lines indicated. The publishers announce that the first volume of the lectures is already in press.

Catholics would get nothing to hope for were they to read such books as "Living for the Future" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.00), by Dr. J. R. Slater, Professor of English, in the University of Rochester. The author purposes to give us his impressions of heaven. "Impressions," is used advisedly, for the whole book is a patchwork of impressions. No attempt is made to prove anything, not even the fact of life after death. Immortality is a fact that we are supposed to know by intuition, belief in the hereafter "is not matter of proof." This attitude is the Ritschlian tendency that has permeated into the very core of most Protestant theology of today. Religion is not a thing of the reason; it is of the emotions. And so we need not prove the truth of any dogma of our religion. Does it appeal to us?

Is it of value to us? Yes? Then that is enough. In such wise the professor of English postulates the fact of immortality. And what is its nature? What will the soul do after death? Dr. Slater is sure, by intuition, that the soul in heaven will not be idle. That is a comfort. Then what will it do? He now waives Scripture and metaphysics. He views immortality "from a new angle,"—yes, an angle so obtuse that from its point of vision, we can see only blank space. For we get not an idea, when he tells us that immortality will be a "permanent resistance to the forces of spiritual mortality."

With paper so high, it is a pity the free-verse writers are not more considerate. Amy Lowell's latest volume, "Men, Women and Ghosts," (Macmillan, $1.25) is 363 pages long, yet if the rhymeless, three-worded lines that fill much of the book were only printed like the prose they really are, the bulk of the volume would be greatly reduced. These uplifting "verses" from a "poem" entitled "Thompson's Lunch Room":

> The electric clock jerks every half-minute:
> "Coming!—Past!"
> "Three beef-steaks and a chicken-pie"
> Bawled through a slide while the clock jerks heavily.
> A man carries a china mug of coffee to a distant chair would be tolerable descriptive prose, if so printed, but though written like poetry they deceive no one of discernment. There are well-rhymed selections in the volume, however, and the author often shows she is a clever word-painter. But in the name of every-day honesty, why not print prose as prose?

Roy L. French's "Home Care of Consumptives" ($1.00), Mae Lowell Croy's "1,000 Ways Around the House" ($1.50) and "The Myrtle Reed Cook Book" ($1.50) are three useful volumes from the press of G. P. Putnam's Sons. The author of the first book has gathered together only useful and at the same time necessary information on the subject of consumption, and has put it forth in the simplest form. One brief chapter is devoted to the purely scientific discussion of the disease, its nature, care and prevention, while the other chapters deal with the practical and even minute details of the consumptive's daily life: rest, exercise, cleanliness and eternal hope. The second book is an excellent collection of hints and suggestions on ways of making housekeeping easier. They range from advice about choosing and furnishing the home to counsel on bringing up children and on entertaining guests. The list of labor-saving devices in the book will alarm impecunious husbands. The 500 or more pages of recipes in the third volume named above ought to enable housewives to give an alluring variety to the domestic menu. In addition, there is a bright chapter on "The Philosophy of Breakfast," directions for setting the table properly and a "Kitchen Rubaiyat" which stops just in time.

"The Taming of Calinga" (Dutton, $1.35), Mr. C. L. Carsen's first novel, is the story of a glorified Filipino head-hunter. The hero leaves his mountain tribe armed with his war-bolo and the clay image of an ancestral god, and is captured by the Presidente's party which is journeying to Manila. After stinging cuts of the lash fail to tame the wild, defiant soul, the Ilocano Padre's calm, quiet message of the "white Image of a Man that hung from Crossed Sticks" proves the best method of civilizing the savage. Calinga shows himself a patient, obedient student, and after some thrilling experiences, involving a comely maiden, he awakens to a new spirit of enterprise and returns to his tribe a Catholic. It is a strong and well-told story.——Admirers of Irvin Cobb, and they are many, will confess to some disappointment in "Fibble, D.D.!" (Doran, $1.20) and "Local Color" (Doran, $1.35), but each volume contains welcome examples of Cobbian humor, human, clean, and always kindly.——"The Whirlpool" (Dutton, $1.50), by Victoria Morton, is a novel which sets out to prove that "the present system of criminal punishment is barbarous and primitive," and that "to open all the prisons in the world would go far towards establishing a better order of things." The proof submitted by the author can scarcely be termed apodictic.

Mr. J. F. Fuller, F.S.A., M.R.I.A., etc., is a Conservative-Nationalist-Protestant architect who in a well-illustrated volume called "Omniana: the Autobiography of an Irish Octogenarian" (Dutton, $3.00), frees his mind of a vast deal of unimportant reflections and reminiscences on that wide range of subjects of which the renowned Walrus, Alice's friend, was so consummate a master. When a boy in Kerry Mr. Fuller knew intimately the Father Welsh who was the original of Alfred Perceval Graves's "Father O'Flynn." The author is fond of expressing his low opinion of all kinds of theology, he finds much entertainment in the conversation of tourists from "Ammurrica," fills 287 pages of excellent paper with uninteresting anecdotes and recollections, and ends by proudly displaying his family tree, with its wonderful "seize quartiers."

In "A Fire in the Snow" (New York, Thomas Y. Crowell, $0.50), Charles Jefferson, D.D., compares the spirit of Christmas to a fire kindled by schoolboys in the snow. What is Christmas, he asks, but a fire burning amidst the ice and the frosts of December? The author is keenly alive to the festive spirit of Christmas and sees in it the feast of friendship and of the home. But he realizes that it is something more sacred still. He recognizes that it was the Son of God who kindled the fire of Christmas long ago, the fire of love. He then draws a picture of the cold world in which we live, and sees it benumbed by a deadly chill, while in Europe "a continent has slipped back into the age of ice." The little book is written in the right spirit, and carries with it a cheering message. The central idea around which it revolves will recall to many the beautiful poem of the martyred Jesuit, Robert Southwell, "The Burning Babe."

Lovers of the Christ-Child will be pleased to read once again this beautiful carol of Gilbert K. Chesterton:

> The Christ-Child lay on Mary's lap,
> His hair was like a light.
> (O weary, weary was the world,
> But here is all aright.)
>
> The Christ-Child lay on Mary's breast,
> His hair was like a star.
> (O stern and cunning are the kings,
> But here the true hearts are.)
>
> The Christ-Child lay on Mary's heart,
> His hair was like a fire.
> (O weary, weary is the world,
> But here the world's desire.)
>
> The Christ-Child stood at Mary's knee,
> His hair was like a crown.
> And all the flowers looked up at Him,
> And all the stars looked down.

"Woman's Suffrage by Constitutional Amendment" (Yale University Press, $1.35) is a series of lectures given at Yale, by H. St. George Tucker. The book's real subject is local self-government, assured by "the rightful demarcation of the powers of the Federal and State Governments under the Constitution." Dr. Tucker presents a strong argument against undue centralization at Washington, a movement which bids fair to culminate in governmental dictatorship over private institutions of education and relief.

EDUCATION

Christ in the School

ON the cornerstone of many a parochial school is sculptured the phrase, Christo Redemptori, for Christ our Saviour. Rightly is Christ chosen as the cornerstone of every undertaking, and in the Latin brevity two words suffice to enshrine the whole purpose of the Catholic school. As was foretold by the Master, we Catholics, poor for the most part in the goods of this world, and held of little account by the great ones of the earth, often find ourselves strangely at variance with the ebb and flow of life about us. To those who can look beneath the surface of current history, never perhaps, in the ages of Christianity, was the variance more sharply marked.

The Message of Christ

CATHOLICS believe fully and firmly that some nineteen centuries ago, the eternal God, to save mankind from sin, came down from heaven, and appeared amongst us as the Babe of Bethlehem, born of the Virgin Mary. We read in the Sacred Scriptures, which without ignorant and supercilious cavil we accept as God's own word, that during His years amongst us, He taught us what we must do and believe, if we would cooperate with Him in the salvation of our souls. He did not content Himself, as the Gospels reveal, with teaching His followers to avoid evil and do good. That much the pagans, enlightened by the natural law, had done. Nor did He stop when He had given them certain special means, instituted by Himself, to help them to keep the law of God. Often during the course of His work, He insisted upon the acceptance by all of a body of truths, which, He said, they must believe. Furthermore, He sent a group of men to preach what He had taught them to believe and to do; and He authorized them, although He was goodness and gentleness itself, to say in His Name, that all who refused to believe, would be damned forever.

To these men, after He had imparted His own power of binding and loosing sin, He gave the commission to teach the whole world, sending them "as the Father hath sent Me," and He promised that He would abide with them, Himself teaching them all things. He did not fix the term of His presence at the sixth or at the sixteenth century, but promised that His Spirit would be with them until the consummation of the world. We Catholics hold that Jesus Christ was the Truth of God. He has not deceived us. His promise has been fulfilled.

The Place of Christ

IT follows from all this, that to us Catholics, Jesus Christ is not a faint memory, but a very real and living Person. He is not far from anyone of us. He is in heaven at the right hand of His Father, and there His Sacred Heart still beats in love for us, as of old in the days of His pilgrimage. But He is also in the Church, His Mystical Body; He dwells with us, according to His promise, really and truly, the Emmanuel of our altars; and He is present to us in the promptings of His grace. In Him, we live, move, and are. He is not the Unknown God, whose altar the quick eye of St. Paul noted in the streets of Athens, nor have we any intention of ever allowing that title to be applied to Him. We see no reason whatever, why the principles and the memory of Jesus Christ should be divorced from art or from literature, from science or from our amusements, or, in short, from any pursuit in which man may lawfully engage. Life without Him seems an exile as dark as the pit of Orcus, and as hopeless.

The Claims of Christ

SPEAKING as moralists, we consider education without God the pet invention of Julian the Apostate, and the chief delight of the Prince of Darkness. As scientists, we fail to rate as the triumph of educational skill, a system which tries to read history, let us say, while simply ignoring the claims of Jesus Christ. "It does not matter," the moralists-without-religion tell us, "whether or not Jesus Christ is God. We can still admire the nobility of His character." To do this, requires, it would seem, certain brain-convolutions not common among Catholics. And there is a world of guile in that "still." If Jesus Christ is God, it is blasphemy to say, particularly to impressionable children, that it makes no difference whether or not we accept His claims. If He is not God, He is either a fanatic, or the truth is not in Him. The spiritual value to the child, of a person of this type, is not apparent. We may pity fanatics, but we do not admire them; and it does not seem safe to ask the child to pattern his life after the model shown by one whose chief claim to men's remembrance is a skilful mendacity that for centuries has led astray the major part of the civilized world.

Preaching Christ

ACCEPTING without reserve the claims of Jesus Christ, we gladly apply them in every department of life. We realize with a great sense of gratitude that ours is a precious heritage, to be transmitted undiminished to our children. Therefore is Jesus Christ the very soul of all our work in education. His Cross is on our school buildings, His Name is written upon their cornerstones; but our chief and dearest care is to engrave it on the heart of every Catholic child. We are not ashamed of the Gospel. In the Catholic school, the Incarnation is made a reality. Christ is pictured as the living God, the eternal lover of every human soul, and it is along the road of tender, intimate, personal love of Jesus Christ, that the soul of the child is led to God. Remembering, therefore, the words of Christ who welcomed the little ones, when, in mistaken zeal, the Apostles would have stayed them, we would put Christ into the heart of the innocent child at the earliest possible moment. Hence we deem it necessary to dedicate our schools, as well as our homes, to Christ.

We do not fear the old cry that our schools stifle in the children that proper love of their fellows and of their country, indispensable to good citizenship. It has never been raised by any man who has read history with an unbiased eye. He knows that our schools prepare first for the Kingdom of God, as the Saviour bade, and that this preparation is the firmest guarantee of upright and loyal citizenship. The others we disregard. But we are determined that the school in which Jesus Christ is ignored, or from which He is excluded, is not the school to which we can intrust our children. Therefore in our poverty, and how bitter it has often been God alone knows, we have erected the most splendid monument ever reared by any people to testify their belief in God, and their unswerving devotion to His Son—the American parochial school.

The School of Consecration

IT was a beautiful thought of the venerable prelate of St. Paul who bade us, "stand some morning near the parochial school, and feast your eyes on the little ones who are being educated for Christ." By the blessing of God, the little ones are being brought to Christ in daily increasing numbers. God who searches the hearts of men, is infinitely loving, and may find some mercy for those unnatural parents who without reason, deprive their children of the inestimable benefit of a Catholic education. To man, there seems no possible palliation. "Jesus, to Thee, I consecrate my whole self; my body, my soul, my heart, and all that I have, for time and eternity" is the prayer that the children were offering, as I passed the parochial school some mornings ago. That is a school in which Christ reigns. That alone is the school for the child which God Himself has put into your keeping.

P. L. B.

SOCIOLOGY

Christ in the Lowly

IF we saw Jesus Christ, the workman of Galilee, in the harassed man who is trying to support a family of five on eight dollars a week, we might be moved to cry out against the oppression of the wage-earner. But that is not our vision. Therefore is it, that in this age of advanced civilization, and in this land of unequaled opportunity, a considerable majority of the laboring classes are endeavoring to live on less than a living-wage. If in the grimy face of the breaker-boy, or in the pallid features of the bobbin-girl, we could recognize some faint trace of the beauty of the adorable Child at Nazareth, the unspeakable iniquity that coins money from the blood of boys and girls would long ago have been swept out of existence. There is legalized murder and tolerated rapine on the earth today, as the bells again ring in the birth of Christ. Even on this blessed day, the souls and bodies of men and women are sold for a price in the marts of the world, and in desolate homes, children weep for hunger on Christ's birthday, because so many of us have forgotten what it is to be in truth, a follower of Jesus Christ.

The Brotherhood of Man

BY His merciful coming, Christ forged an unbreakable bond, uniting all men as brethren. He is truly of our race and nation; He has taken to Himself our frame, our flesh, our nature; He has become like to us in all things, save only sin. Made the first-born of many brethren in the Incarnation, He elevated the natural kinship of all in Adam, to a relation that is sacred. As brothers, we are equal; as brothers, we ought, in St. Paul's words, to prevent one another in charity; and because Jesus Christ is our true brother, we are all in an equal sense, according to the intention of Christ, children of God and heirs of Heaven. Apart then, from the truth that every human being has been made to the image of God, the most ignorant, crude and abject worker on the streets or in the shops attains through the Incarnation, a special dignity and consequent claim upon our consideration. He is one of Christ's brethren. By nature, he has all the rights of a man; through the Incarnation, he may ask something more than a free and full acknowledgment of these rights. The spirit of the Gospel would have us see in him, Christ Himself. "As long as you did it to one of my least brethren, you did it to me."

Dissolving the Bonds

IN the Gospels and in the traditions of the Church, nothing is clearer than our Lord's teaching of this brotherhood from which no man is excluded. This fact, no one who calls himself a follower of Christ will deny; but the greater part of the world's misery arises from the refusal of men, particularly of those in commercial and financial strongholds, to put it into consistent practice. Worse, as the world draws away from Christ, it seeks to supplant His teaching, by theories in which He has no part. The attempt to find a remedy by this course is vain; as well might the mathematician seek to solve his problem by persistently refusing to include the dominant factor.

No man ever spoke with the power, or taught with the insight and justice that is found in Jesus Christ. Unless the principles of life which He taught and practised are accepted without gloss or diminution as an indispensable groundwork, the most carefully elaborated plans of social reform can do no more than throw a temporary veil over present evils. The Greeks had their philosophers, their workers of unequaled skill in form, color, and language, and their civilization culminated in moral and physical rottenness. Rome, following in her magnificence, at last saw the barbarians without her gates, and within the walls, a nerveless, effeminate race, in which the corruption of the flesh had worked its way. With the lessons of history plainly before us, it should hardly seem necessary to draw the unmistakable conclusion, that when God is left out of man's reckoning, the tendency of individuals and of nations is definitely retrogressive. The refinements of literature and art, and the sterner lessons of a pagan philosophy which exhorts but cannot strengthen, have never turned the eyes of any nation away from the muck and towards the stars.

The Way to Salvation

YET there are many among us today who teach that the precepts of Christ may safely be replaced by the conclusions of man, that spiritual interests, if indeed they exist, must be held subservient to physical comfort and material progress, and that after nineteen centuries, a Christianity which they do not understand and have never practised, must be discarded for the prevailing philosophy of the day. The uprightness of their intentions need not be questioned; but it is clear that the proper term of their work is moral and physical ruin. In the solution of the problems of life and of social reform, merely human wisdom is foredoomed to utter failure. We need the wisdom of God, revealed to us in Christ Jesus, and help from on high to act according to that wisdom. There neither is, nor can be, any effective shield against the evils that today afflict society, except in the full acknowledgment of the claims of God over His creatures. There can be no adequate protection of the workers, who constitute the bulk of civilized society, or of their families, unless the spirit of Jesus Christ rules the hearts of men and directs the councils of nations.

Wisely, therefore, has Leo XIII written, "if society is to be healed, in no other way can it be healed, save by a return to Christian life and Christian institutions." For society as for the individual, there is no way to salvation, except through the acceptance of Christ and His doctrine. Applied to society, that doctrine teaches the dignity of man as an image of God, and the equality of all as brethren of Christ and heirs of Heaven. It teaches that this world is not man's abiding home, but that all have a destiny which will be fulfilled only in eternity, and forbids men, therefore, to place a higher value upon the things of this world than upon the things of God.

The Duty of Alms-Giving

THE consideration of two further truths, directly connected with the brotherhood of men, seems especially opportune in these days, when the birth of the Saviour is celebrated. The first is the strict obligation incumbent upon the wealthy to apply themselves to alms-giving, and the second is the singularly exalted place held by the poor, in the affection of Jesus Christ.

Private ownership is beyond all doubt, a natural right which no man or government may abolish. Nevertheless, as is clear from our Lord's words, wealth is a possession to be regarded with fear and trembling. It may be said that then only does the rich man follow the constant tradition of the Church, when he regards himself simply as the steward of the poor. "He has received them," teaches Leo XIII, when treating of temporal goods, whether external, or gifts of soul, "to use them to perfect his own nature, and at the same time that he may employ them, as the steward of God's providence." In these striking words, the Pontiff only repeats the doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas. "Man should not consider his outward possessions as his own," says the Angelic Doctor, "but as common to all, so as to share them without hesitation when others are in need. Wherefore the Apostle saith: 'Command the rich of this world . . . to offer with no stint, to apportion largely.'"

It is true that this obligation is founded, except in extreme cases, not on justice but on charity, and that justice must always be satisfied before the claims of charity may be allowed. Therefore, the man who refuses his workers a living-wage, gains no crown in heaven, and should be suffered to assume none on earth, by endowing a hospital. For he is, in plain words, a thief, and according to Holy Scriptures, a brother to the murderer. He has sinned the sin that cries to Heaven for vengeance, and He who is the lord of vengeance will assuredly repay it. There is no charity as long as justice has been left unfulfilled. No blessing flows from money, stained with the blood of murdered men and wet with the tears of starving children, brethren of Jesus Christ, who Himself ate the scanty bread of a workingman in the sweat of His brow.

Christ and the Poor

HOW Jesus Christ loved the poor is clear from every page of the Gospel. He was born in poverty. He chose the poor as His closest associates. He owed His very tomb to the charity of a friend. Not by the glorious radiance of Angels, but by sufferings willingly borne, was the path to Bethlehem brightened for Joseph and Mary. There was no place for them in the inns or cheery homes of Bethlehem, for they were poor. Homeless, out into the night they go, to find a birthplace for Christ the Eternal King, in an abandoned stable. He was God, but He was born like an outcast. He came of a race of Kings, and Mary, the spotless Maid, was His Mother; but they who first visited Him were poor and ignorant men, who saw a little Child in a manger and adored Him as their God. Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven. So has it ever been; so shall it be to the end. His lips have spoken it, who for our sake was born in indigence, and from the Cross looked down to see the foreign soldiers gambling for His poor garment. Blessed are they who, like Christ, spend their lives in teaching the world the needed lesson of an abiding love for the poor. Blessed are they who have understanding concerning the needy and indigent, they who like our persecuted Sisters and Brothers, have given up all things to serve Christ in the sick, the afflicted, the aged, and the orphan. And for us, especially in these days when the calls for Catholic charitable work are so pressing, is written the counsel of the aged Tobias: "If thou hast much, give abundantly; if thou hast little, take care even so to bestow willingly a little." The children in particular, exposed as they are to the dangers of insidious proselyting countenanced in high places, ought to be the first objects of our care. "Whosoever shall give to drink to one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, in the name of a disciple, amen, I say to you, he shall not lose his reward." For "as long as you did it to one of my least brethren, you did it to Me."

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A Christmas Saint

THERE is perhaps no more beautiful illustration of how the charity of Christ overflows at Christmas time in the hearts that love Him than a little quotation from the words of St. Francis in the Franciscan Herald. This saint of the Crib, as we may call him, and of the Infant Saviour, was not satisfied with wishing to relieve the spiritual and temporal needs of his fellowmen, but desired to extend his bounty even to the birds of the air and the beasts of the field. His measure of happiness and love was great enough to deluge all creation. Thus, we are told, he was often heard to say:

> If I can have speech of the Emperor, to entreat and persuade him, I will ask that for the love of God and me he will make a special law . . . that all the magistrates of cities and lords of fortresses and villages shall be bound every year on Christmas day to compel men to throw out corn and other grain on the roads outside the cities and fortresses, that our sisters, the larks, and other birds, too, may have somewhat to eat on so great a festival; and that for the reverence of the Son of God, whom on that night the most Blessed Virgin laid in a manger between the ox and the ass, every one who has an ox and an ass shall be bound that night to provide them abundantly with good fodder; and likewise that on that day all the poor shall be satisfied by the rich with good food.

St. Francis deserves to be numbered in a particular way among those saints of the Holy Childhood whose simple love has ever possessed a special power in winning the hearts of men to love Christ.

Christ Child Society

THE Christ Child Society of Chicago has just published its "Ninth Year Book." The number of boys and girls clothed or partially clothed by it, during the last fiscal year, was 2,513. In addition to this, poor mothers of 147 infants were supplied with complete layettes containing, besides clothing, every sanitary requisite. Nearly 16,000 articles of clothing and pairs of shoes were supplied to children from one to fourteen years of age. By making its purchases from manufacturers, jobbers and wholesale dealers at the close of the wholesale season, buying broken and odd lots, and samples of clothing, the Society is able to secure articles at less than half the ordinary retail prices. This illustrates the great advantage of giving our charity, largely at least, through our Catholic organizations which wisely investigate each case of need and seek, as in the present case, to double the value of every penny. Whatever charity is not personally bestowed should at all events be given through no other channel than that of our own Catholic associations. It is most proper; it is most economic; it brings with it the special blessing of our Faith.

Charles J. Jaegle, Knight of St. Gregory

MR. CHARLES J. JAEGLE, publisher of the Pittsburgh Observer, has just been created a Knight of the Order of St. Gregory the Great, by Pope Benedict XV. This honor is well-merited on account of the new Knight's labors, devotedness and efficiency in the cause of Catholic journalism; but it must likewise be considered a special recognition of the services rendered the Church by the Catholic Press Association, of which Mr. Jaegle has been one of the most active members and promoters. He has held in it the office of treasurer since its organization six years ago. Simple in manner, straightforward in defense of truth and zealous in the advocacy of every worthy Catholic cause, Mr. Jaegle richly deserves this token of appreciation bestowed on him by the Sovereign Pontiff. A previous testimony to his service as a lay apostle was the certificate of affiliation to the Capuchin Order granted him by the Minister General in 1893, an honor rarely granted to laymen. Mr. Jaegle was born in Germany, 1854, and came to America at the age of fourteen. After following various occupations in Pittsburgh, Pa., he was intrusted in 1880, with the management of a German Catholic publication. In 1898 he founded the English Catholic weekly and official organ of the Pittsburgh Diocese, the Pittsburgh Observer, which he has conducted successfully to the present day. The ceremony of conferring the insignia of knighthood will take place in St. Augustine's church, of which he has been a member since 1870.

Our Duty in the Philippines

OUT of fourteen young missionary priests of the Society of the Divine Word who were sent to labor in the Philippines, five have succumbed to privation and overwork in the course of the last six years. For the support of the entire number of priests, Sisters and teachers engaged in this work under the direction of the same society, 100 persons in all, American Catholics have given $1,000 during the past half year. This amount, with a very few additional Mass stipends, has been almost the only means of subsistence for this heroic band. Yet they have never ceased to labor for the redemption of the poor natives who had drifted away from the Faith and for the conversion of the pagan tribes. Our own nation expelled the laborers from God's vineyard, and for a time the Philippine population were left without spiritual guides, except for the altogether insufficient number we were able to supply. The Catholics of Germany generously came to our aid, provided our own colony with zealous laborers, and even supported them for us until the war broke out. It would be an eternal disgrace if we permitted these heroic men and women to remain without adequate means to carry on their noble and necessary work. Catholic laborers in the Philippines are altogether too few to do more than a portion of the great work which had been under way before our own nation recklessly destroyed the flourishing labor of the Spanish priests in these Islands. Aglipayanism, Freemasonry and Protestantism are struggling to divide among themselves the vast population which the Church of Christ had fostered and taught in her motherly love. The schools are fast making these natives indifferent, as experience is daily proving. American Catholics have therefore a sacred duty to interest themselves in this work which is so peculiarly their own.

Advising the Brewers

MR. GUSTAVE PABST, formerly president of the Brewers' Association, has recently reminded his confreres that the liquor traffic is now on trial for its life. If it is to be acquitted, its supporters must so regulate the business, "that the evils incident to it shall gradually diminish and intemperance be reduced to a negligible social factor." But in what spirit will the trade accept Mr. Pabst's suggestion, which really contains one of the readiest and best solutions of the difficulty?

> An energetic and active demand should be made on local authorities to exercise greater discrimination in granting licenses, and in the prompt and efficient prosecution for repeated or wanton violation of law, as distinguished from an honest mistake.

Just why a saloon-keeper should be exempt from prosecution, until his violation of the law becomes "repeated" or "wanton," is a problem to tax the ingenuity of our leading jurists. The escutcheon of the liquor trade in this country is not so spotless as to call for any special indulgence to the law-breaker. However, Mr. Pabst has delivered himself of some excellent advice, and it is to be hoped that the liquor dealers will act in accordance. If they can be induced to unite for a sorely needed "clean-up week," the powers that in some communities now make the saloon the active ally of violence and of the lowest forms of vice, will soon find their natural harborage in some hospitable penitentiary.

French Boys and Moving Pictures

THE Journal des Débats quotes from the records of two French courts an interesting judicial decision that fixes on the moving-pictures the responsibility for much of the prevalent crime committed by youths. A pitched battle had taken place in the streets of Châlons-sur-Saone between two hostile groups of young men. The offenders were arrested and condemned. The details of the trial brought to light evidence that led the court to decide that demoralizing scenes presented in moving-picture theaters had fired the imaginations of the culprits with false ideas of heroism, with the consequence that they had hurried from the place of amusement and enacted in real earnest deeds no less horrible than they had seen enacted on the screen. In its judgment, the court condemned the cinema on two counts, first, because it was teaching vice in all its forms by representing tale after tale of immorality; and secondly, because it was brutalizing the public by depicting, with absolute disregard for art, the most horrible crimes. In fact the cinema was becoming a real and efficient school of evil. The case was appealed to the higher court at Dijon, but the decision of the lower tribunal was upheld. Commenting on the case, La Réponse, for November insists on the justice of these censures, points out that they deserve serious attention from those who are responsible for the character of the amusements presented to the public, and pleads for a stricter censorship over moving-picture films. The same views have long been held by moralists and sociologists in this country. If more of our judges would follow the example of their French brethren, and put on record the convictions that lamentable facts have forced on them, our legislators and high executives might be induced to lend a less ready ear to the film interests, and pass laws, or at least withhold their veto from laws that aim by efficient censorship at controlling the deleterious influences of this rapidly growing menace to youthful morals.

Some Sage Advice on Company-Keeping

AMONG the "book-rack pamphlets," published at Pittsburgh, is one entitled "A Letter of Great Importance to Every Young Man and Maiden." It deals with the question of company-keeping and seeks to guard the young against hasty marriages that lead to long regrets. After pointing out the dangers of marriages contracted with those outside the Fold, it lays stress upon one important point: the necessity, on the part of those who wish to enter upon a union for life, of acquiring a more intimate knowledge of each other's true characters and habits than an expected visit can afford, when all due preparations have been made. Speaking to the young man the writer says in his familiar style:

> No, no! dear boy, you'll need more than the Sunday night's good looks, painted features, dyed hair, rich perfume and low-cut flimsy dresses to keep you happy. True love will hardly thrive on these, nor will you be fed by her skill in making fancy doilies, hand-painted empty vases, taffy and candy fudge. Not for stenographic feats and rag-time tunes only should her dainty hands be trained, dreading other work lest they lose their idle beauty.
>
> You want a girl who possesses above all other accomplishments, which she may have fallen heir to, the following few simple qualifications. She should above all be modest, industrious, appreciative, pure, obedient to her parents, and a zealous Catholic girl. These properties are the cornerstone of a future happy home. Without them there is very little chance of expecting to have in the future a clean, cosy, home-like dwelling. Beware lest your abode become a hovel of disorder and a den of malcontent.
>
> Many young men are too optimistic when choosing their future wife, not realizing that now-a-days many girls are three-fourths artificial, displaying only strained and borrowed manners when company-keeping. Beware ere it is too late! Better try to get a glimpse of her as she really is, as you will have her for life. Remember that once you take her it is "for better, for worse . . . until death do us part."

The girl too is given her sound advice. Her preferences are to be for "an honest, pure-minded, self-respecting and industrious young man." She is told not to trust him too soon, for he likewise may prove to be disguised, hiding from her what it is most vital for her to know. "Surprise him at times and test him now; pure gold is not injured by being tried. After marriage it is far too late." Above all she is asked to harbor no illusions concerning the possible correction of a drunkard. He will plunge her into misery and ruin, together with her unfortunate little ones. These are sage counsels.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVI. No. 12
WHOLE No. 403

DECEMBER 30, 1916

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—The Germans have made vigorous but fruitless efforts to retake the positions recently lost at Verdun; they have also been on the offensive in the Somme district, but without success. In Moldavia the Russians have checked the progress of the armies of the Central Powers, but in Dobrudja have fallen back to a line about ten miles south of the Danube. On the other fields of battle matters have been at a standstill.

Bulletin, Dec. 19-p.m.-Dec. 23, p.m.

Great Britain's attitude towards Germany's proposals for peace negotiations were voiced by Mr. Lloyd George in a speech delivered on December 19 before the House of Commons. The Premier stated that France and Russia had already made reply, and that Great Britain would give clear and definite support to the statement made by them. The Allies, he said, had separately and independently arrived at precisely the same conclusions. He protested that he had no desire to prolong the war "wantonly or without sufficient cause"; but at the same time he insisted that to abandon the struggle "without achieving the high purposes" with which it had been undertaken, would be "the costliest act of poltroonery ever perpetrated by any statesman." As for the proposed conference, he declared that to accept Germany's invitation, without any knowledge of what proposals that Government intended to make, would be "to put our heads into a noose with the rope-end in the hands of Germany." The only terms on which peace could be obtained and maintained in Europe were: "complete restitution, full reparation and effectual guaranties"; but of these he found no hint in the German Chancellor's speech; in fact, "the very substance and style of the speech constitute a denial of the only terms on which peace is possible." The most significant part of the Premier's statement is contained in the following sentences:

> We will wait until we hear what terms and guaranties the German Government offer other than those, better than those, surer than those which she so lightly broke. And meanwhile we shall put our trust in our unbroken army, rather than in broken faith. For the moment I do not think it would be advisable for me to add anything upon this particular invitation. A formal reply will be delivered by the Allies in the course of the next few days.

As matters stand at present, therefore, the Allies do not absolutely reject the possibility of peace negotiations, but they have made no step to facilitate them.

The day before the British Premier made his speech, which is generally accepted as the authoritative statement of the common attitude of the Allies, the President of the United States sent to the Governments of the nations at war a communication in which he suggested that they exchange views on possible peace terms and guaranties. This step, he said, had long been in contemplation and had no connection with the overtures recently made by the Central Powers. After stating that the United States is vitally and directly interested in the measures to be taken for securing the future peace of the world and for safeguarding weaker nations against the peril of wrong and violence, he calls attention to the extremely difficult situation of the neutral nations and the possibility of irreparable wrong being done to the civilization of the world, and declares that he "feels altogether justified in suggesting an immediate opportunity for a comparison of views as to the terms which must precede the ultimate arrangements for the peace of the world."

> The life of the entire world has been profoundly affected. Every part of the great family of mankind has felt the burden and terror of this unprecedented contest of arms. No nation in the civilized world can be said in truth to stand outside its influence or to be safe against its disturbing effects, and yet the concrete objects for which it is being waged have never been definitely stated.
>
> The leaders of the several belligerents have, as has been said, stated those objects in general terms. But, stated in general terms, they seem the same on both sides. Never yet have the authoritative spokesmen of either side avowed the precise objects which would if attained satisfy them and their people that the war had been fought out. The world has been left to conjecture what definitive results, what actual exchange of guaranties, what political or territorial changes or readjustments, what stage of military success, even, would bring the war to an end.

An interchange of views, the President thinks, might show that the terms of the belligerents are not altogether irreconcilable and might make a concert of nations immediately possible. He declares, however, that he is not proposing peace or even offering mediation, but merely suggesting that soundings be taken.

The effect of the President's communication has been to give an enormous impetus to the discussion throughout the world of the possibilities of peace, but it has had no other immediate practical result. Except in Italy, where the Parliament rejected by a vote of 293 to 47 a resolution that the President be asked to act as mediator for the inauguration of peace negotiations, official opinion in the countries at war has been silent. But unofficial opinion has been freely expressed. In Austria and Germany the great mass of editorial comment has been distinctly favorable. On the side of the Allies, however, the note has been received with coldness or hostility. Canada regards it as an "unwarranted interference." France is amazed at the proposal, but is courteous and friendly; it is alone, however, in scouting the idea of peace negotiations while France's enemies are on French soil. English journalists and statemen believe that an adequate answer has already been given the President by the official spokesmen of the Allies and especially in the recent speeches of the King and Lloyd George.

Austria-Hungary.—After the failure of Alexander Spitzmüller to construct a new Austrian Cabinet, the task was deputed to Count Clam-Martinic, former Minister of Agriculture. The following is the list of Ministers submitted by him to Emperor Charles: Premier and Minister of Agriculture, Count Clam-Martinic; Minister of the Interior, von Handel; Minister of Commerce, Dr. Urban; Minister of Labor, von Trnka; Minister of Education, Baron von Hussarek; Minister of National Defense, F. von Georgi; Minister of Finance, Alexander Spitzmüller; Minister of Justice, von Schenk; Minister of Railways, Dr. Z. von Forster; Minister without Portfolio, Dr. Baernreither; Governor-General of Galicia, Michael Bobrzynski. The question of the official title of the Emperor has been decided. He is to be called: "Emperor Charles I of Austria and King Charles IV of Hungary and Bohemia." His immediate predecessor of the same name on the throne of Hungary was King Charles III of Durazzo, King of Naples and a descendant of the House of Anjou. He was called to the Hungarian throne by the opponents of the widow of Louis I and was crowned December 31, 1385. On the following February 6 he was fatally wounded and died March 5 in the prison of Visegrad.

New Ministry, Title of Emperor

France.—On December 19, a determined assault was made upon the newly-formed Briand Cabinet. It had been prepared by the Army Commission under the leadership of Georges Clémenceau, the "Cabinet wrecker," and Charles Humbert, who has often been compared with Lord Northcliffe. The opening attack was made in the Senate by M. Bérenger, of Gaudeloupe, who severely criticized the military, diplomatic and economic program of the Government. Premier Briand, however, cleverly parried the attack, and by a reference to the recent successes of General Nivelle's troops at Verdun brought forth a storm of applause. Specifying his charges, the Senator from Gaudeloupe said that the Ministry had brought about only a change of personnel. This was shown in the way in which the war was being directed, for they had not as yet succeeded in driving the enemy beyond the frontier. He then charged that there had been a lack of organization of war material and imputed the recent results in Athens to the short-sighted diplomacy of the Government. Directly addressing Premier Briand, M. Bérenger said: "Do not think that your past war record gives us confidence for the future."

The Berenger Debate

M. Briand, in replying, deprecated reproaches against the Government at this period "because the men in power must be able to work with the necessary freedom of mind, have uninterrupted confidence at home and for their actions abroad, and our allies must not be able to think that our Government is under suspicion." In concluding he said that he was ready to make way for any one who was judged more fit for the Premiership than he.

Commenting on these incidents, the Temps remarks that there exists a growing tension between the Government and Parliament, which is jealously watching any attempt to infringe on constitutional rights, although at the same time urging the Government to act fearlessly. Whatever may be the result of the Parliamentary situation and the party divisions now developing, men of all shades of political belief have deeply resented the unpatriotic attack of Clémenceau on General Nivelle and General Lyautey, the new Minister of War, for all Frenchmen feel that to attack the army or its chiefs now is little less than treason.

General de Castelnau, General Joffre's chief of staff, having reached the age limit is retained on the active list by a special decree signed by President Poincaré, which is preliminary to his appointment to the command of an army group. General Nivelle has chosen as his chief of staff, Brigadier-General Ferdinand Auguste Pont. The Military Medal, the highest distinction a general officer can receive, has been awarded to General Foch. The medal is a simple decoration which was created for soldiers in the ranks and non-commissioned officers. The only commissioned officers who can receive it are generals already possessing the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor.

Germany.—Potato bread has been abolished in Germany. The large quantities of wheat taken in the Rumanian campaign have more than supplied for the serious potato shortage. Over 3,000,000 tons of breadstuffs were captured, besides numberless herds of cattle and flocks of sheep. Boats and rafts, filled with provisions, crowded the Danube at the time of the invasion, but were unable to escape, owing to the rapid progress of the German armies. The food possibilities had never been lost sight of in the strategic planning of the campaign, and it is reported that a complete economic organization for exploiting the surplus food resources of Rumania was in readiness behind Falkenhayn's front line, "down to Landsturm garrison professors, purchasing agents, grain and cattle experts, traffic managers and other experts." Not only Austria-Hungary, but Bulgaria and Turkey are also sharing in these supplies. Other needs of the Central Powers are provided for by the oil wells. The rapid advance of the conquering forces made the destruction of machinery impossible, save in a few places. As a consequence a majority of the hundreds of towers in the Prahova Valley and near Campina are already in operation, and it is thought that in a short time German engineers will have repaired the damaged electric power stations at Campina and Sinaia. The transportation is to begin on a large scale within a short time. The sending of grain to Berlin and Vienna took place almost immediately. It is said that a great flotilla of barges and towing steamers had been assembled and was only waiting for Mackensen to open up the lower Danube. This explains the Chancellor's statement in the Reichstag that the hunger phantom had left Germany and was now hovering over England.

Food and Oil Supplies

Great Britain.—In his speech of December 19, after stating the spirit in which the country would consider all overtures for peace, the Premier expressed his desire

The Premier's Speech

"to say a word or two about the Government itself." He had no intention of raising any political issue which "might excite irritation or controversy. There is no time for that." But he realized that "the character and composition of the Government" might rightly be considered "unusual."

There are three characteristics in the present Administration, in which it may be said that it has departed, perhaps, from precedent. First of all these is the concentration of the executive authority in a very few hands. The second is the choosing of men of administrative and business capacity rather than men of parliamentary experience, where we were unable to obtain both for the headship of Government departments. The third is the franker and fuller recognition of the partnership of labor in the government of this country.

The Premier would not say that this concentration "is best adapted for Parliamentary navigation, but I am convinced that it is the best for war. In war you want quick decisions above everything. . . . You cannot run a war with a Sanhedrin."

Among other points discussed by the Premier were the labor question and the appointment of a "Food Controller." A system of recruiting would be devised which while making use of every force, "will insure that no man is taken into the army who is capable of rendering more useful service in industry." As to "the food problem," the main facts were "that the available harvests of the world have failed. . . . The problem is one of distribution and protection . . . that there shall be no man, woman or child who suffers from hunger because some one has been getting too much." On December 22, Parliament was prorogued until February 7.

Ireland.—According to the Dublin Weekly Freeman it is understood that Lord Chief Justice Cherry has formally resigned the office of Lord Chief Justice and that the vacancy is to be filled by the appointment of Mr. Campbell, Attorney-General. At the last session over which he presided, the Judge took informal leave of the officials at the rising of the Court. It was well known that the health of the Chief Justice has been very unsatisfactory for some time, and though he made heroic efforts to carry out his duties, he was at length compelled to give way.

Changes in the Bench and Bar

Lord Chief Justice Cherry was called to the Bar in 1881 and became Queen's Counsel in 1896. In the General Election of 1900, he contested the Kirkdale Division of Liverpool as a Liberal, but without success. Six years later, however, he scored a notable triumph in capturing the Exchange Division of the same city. On the formation of the Campbell-Bannerman Ministry in December, 1905, he was appointed Attorney-General for Ireland, which position he filled with conspicuous success until his appointment as Lord Chief Justice on the resignation of Lord O'Brien in 1909. The Freeman adds that the eminent jurist will be sorely missed at the Four Courts. According to the same Dublin journal the Solicitor-General for Ireland, Mr. James O'Connor, K. C., will be appointed Attorney-General, and the gossip of the Four Courts is to the effect that the Solicitor-Generalship, which, it is said, is to be a Unionist office in the present circumstances, lies between Mr. Denis Henry, K. C., and Mr. James Chambers, K. C.

On December 21, the Government decided to release the Irishmen who were interned after the Easter rising. Henry E. Duke, Chief Secretary for Ireland, in announcing the intention of the Government in the House of Commons, said:

Release of Prisoners

The time has come when the advantages of releasing these men far outweigh the risk, and I have so advised the Government. Steps, therefore, were taken to-day to proceed, with the least possible delay, to return the interned prisoners to their homes.

According to the statement of the Secretary for Home Affairs in the House of Commons, last October, there were 576 Irishmen interned in connection with the late Sinn Fein rising.

At a time when there is so much agitation, especially in America, for justice to Ireland, it is well to bear in mind that the Irish are laboring under difficulties which later on may necessitate relief in money and food. Mr. J. W. Byrne writing in the January Century says:

Ireland's Wrongs

In Ireland, as in Great Britain, not merely is there the imposition of direct imperial taxation, but there is the more crushing indirect taxation due to enormous increases in the prices of the necessaries of life and commodities of all kinds. The Irish worker has to pay 100 per cent more for his beer, and for his tea than he paid immediately before the war. For his tobacco he pays from 75 to 100 per cent more, and for his sugar about 200 per cent more. . . . Whereas the British tradesman or laborer is financially better off than he was before the war, owing to a more than proportionate increase in wages, the poor Irishman has to meet the extra cost of living without any increase in his earning capacity. In Great Britain untold millions are being spent for industrial and munition work; in Ireland hardly a penny. In these circumstances the Irishman is faced with three alternatives: He may stay at home with his family and enjoy, in common with his wife and children, the privilege of slowly starving to death. He may join the army, and so secure for his family the tempting allowances promised by the military authorities. He may go to Great Britain to sell his labor at the high rates prevailing there; but in this case he will be held to have taken up his residence in Great Britain, and will be promptly conscripted.

A report still persists that the potato crop, especially on the west coast, is far below normal. These are serious conditions.

Rome.—The efforts of the Holy Father to relieve the sufferings of unhappy Poland have to some extent at least been crowned with success. Unable to stop the horrors of war, he has endeavored to rouse the sympathy of others in behalf of the victims. The Polish Relief Fund, initiated by him, has met with gratifying results. Some time ago the Osservatore Romano gave a list of the generous sums collected by the Committee, and published the following letter to the Cardinal Secretary of State from the President of the Executive Committee and Treasurer-General:

The Pope and Poland

My Lord Cardinal: We lay at the feet of the Holy Father, through the kind interposition of your Eminence, our sincerest feelings of unshakable filial attachment, and we beg your Eminence to convey the following list to his Holiness. It is an account of the sums realized in the gathering of offerings for Poland so generously initiated by the Holy Father himself. If additional offerings are sent on afterwards we shall not fail to give account of them to your Eminence.

Considering that the whole world is suffering from a war which is the desolation of humanity, we have good reason to congratulate ourselves on the result obtained, a result which contributes materially to the end of our committee. All this we owe to the benevolence of the Holy Father, who did not neglect to make his voice heard in commendation of the cause of our country. We beg your Eminence to make known to his Holiness the deep debt of gratitude we feel placed under by his great benefits towards us.

With respect and veneration, I have the honor to be, your Eminence's most obedient and devoted servant,

ANTONY OSUCHOWSKI.

In the list of subscriptions, four countries lead all others, Germany, including the Polish provinces, the United States, Austria, likewise including the Polish provinces, and Ireland.

Spain.—The recent sessions of the Cortes have been sensational and stormy. The discussion of the budget brought in by Señor Alba almost precipitated a crisis. It was marked by the intervention in the debate of such prominent men as Maura, Cambo, and La Cierva. In addition to the inherent interest of the question before the Chamber, there was the feeling that the international situation was particularly delicate, that there were several elements of weakness in the composition of the present Government which gave evidence of little ability to deal with the momentous problems involved in the dealings of the country with foreign powers. The attacks made upon the Ministry some time ago by La Cierva have considerably weakened the influence of the Cabinet. There also prevailed the general conviction that the Government has been remiss in not dealing earlier and more vigorously with the problem of the scarceness and costliness of the necessaries of life.

Stormy Debates in the Cortes

The climax, however, came in the attack made on the Government by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, Señor Urzaiz. Ever since he was driven from office Señor Urzaiz has reminded the Government of his pique and ill will. He now accused it of having deliberately betrayed its duty and of having done so for the sake of furthering the private interests of its members. When asked to specify his charges, Señor Urzaiz claimed the opportunity to discuss the question of certain royal decrees regarding the exportation of copper, which were the cause of his expulsion from the Government. The authorities agreed to discuss the matter in another session. A hurried Cabinet Council was then held, and it became known that the Speaker had offered his resignation. This, however, was not accepted. In a subsequent session of the Cortès Señor Urzaiz explained that he had tried as Minister to insist on the observation of the laws, forbidding the exportation of certain products, including copper, and that the royal orders which had been signed by the King had not been published in the "Gazette," owing to the intervention of the Government. By doing this the Government had violated the law. He went out of his way to say, that many who formerly protested against the Divine right of Kings, now believe in their omniscience and infallibility. The whole House, with the exception of the Republicans, who loudly cheered the words, protested against the speaker. After a sharp reprimand to Señor Urzaiz from the Prime Minister, Count Romanones, for introducing the King's name into the debate, and various statements from the Ministers who had been attacked, the matter ended without any apparent result, as far as legislation, remedial measures, or a sifting of the facts, are concerned. But one result is evident. The debate seems to have weakened the prestige both of the Parliament and the Ministry among the people who recently became so restive under the rapid and continual rise of ordinary and most necessary foodstuffs that a great strike was inaugurated in the hope of forcing relief measures from the already harassed Cortes.

Whisperings About Eternal Childhood

VINCENT MCNABB, O. P.

I LIKE writing about Christmas after the feast is over more than I do before. Besides, all of us who had money and child friends or child kindred were busy making gifts for children before Christmas. I think that we would give to children with greater generosity or grace if we realized that we are but paying for our schooling. The appeal of Christmas is a lesson with full liturgical accompaniment, in our essential duty of childhood; for childhood is not a swift season of life that passes away, but is an attitude of mind or soul that should abide. All the year long our masters, the children, are teaching their heavenly, peripatetic philosophy as they romp in the nursery, or rescue fire victims up and down the stairs, or fly kites high into the clouds, or play football, or leap with a bound at nightfall from the deepest energy to the deepest sleep. But at Christmas their daily lesson gives place, as the old medieval writers say, to a solemnis lectio, a solemn ritual lesson, with all the romantic accompaniments of cattle and a cave!

Once I heard deep words of wisdom from a school inspector, in a speech he made when retiring in old age from his life's work. As a father might speak to his sons, he warned us younger men not to look on childhood, with its morning color and sweetness, as a mere rehearsal for years that may never come, or may come with less sweetness and color.

In childhood as a span of years there is something beautiful that should endure, and something almost more beautiful that must pass. Keats sang his "Ode to a Nightingale" when racked with pain on a bed of death. We warrant that it was a song he had once heard in childhood, and never again. Only its echoes murmured in his song. Its music, its life, its loveliness had fled with childhood into the irrevocable past. If for no other reason, then, childhood, with its eager eye and ear, should be allowed those sinless joys which it can never taste again, or never on this side of the grave.

But the better part of childhood is not a frail beauty that swiftly falls from its brow. Like the ideas of truth, goodness, beauty that Plato held to be the heart of all our thinking, the heart of childhood should be eternal. Once a child always a child. A man who had seen many golden visions, and had spoken them in many golden words, has left on record that when he was a child he spoke as a child, he understood as a child, he thought as a child. Then when he became a man he put away the things of a child. But he never put away the heart of a child. Cor Pauli, cor pueri. The heart of Paul was the heart of a child.

But a greater than Paul was once a child, and, therefore, a child forever. Christmas is the feast not of a child, but of The Child. The very essence of Christianity is that Jesus Christ is the eternal Child. We have gone far into wisdom when we have recognized that the Babe of Bethlehem is God's attempt to express some of His Divine attributes through childhood. But perhaps we have touched the crest of perfect wisdom when we see in the Babe of Bethlehem God's attempt to express His essential and eternal childhood.

For this reason philosophers who are still floundering in the mire of the Kantian or Hegelian Absolute, should always keep Christmastide by going hand in hand with some children to a church where there is a Crib. There, if they have the seeing eye, and the hearing ear—the Lord hath made them both!—they will see and hear more than may be learned of a hundred universities or encyclopedias. Their pale dream of a finite absolute God, essentially limited by the thought of His mind and the work of His hand, will give place to an infinite God who has strained His attributes of power, wisdom, mercy, to their utmost by limiting Himself to the helplessness of a little child.

Our enduring childhood is not as His. From the beginning this eternal Son had reached the crest of perfect childhood. A poet who wrote authentic words on childhood made at least one mistake when he humbly directed his friends to "look for him in the nurseries of Heaven"; for there are no nurseries apart for heaven's children, where all are children and the whole City is a nursery. "Of such is the Kingdom."

Our childhood, then, once lost must be again recovered; if recovered, it must be made to grow. Childhood has been called the time of vision. But Augustine of Hippo has taught us that the blessed have a morning and an evening vision. Assuredly as one draws deeper into the evening shadows of old age new visions visit the soul. Of these the most welcome is that which assures the soul of its power of being again a child, and even of growing in childhood until death. But a poet on her deathbed sang:

Make me grow young again,
Grow young enough to die,
That in a joy unseared of pain
I may my Lover, loved, attain
With that fresh sigh
Eternity
Gives to the young to breathe about the heart
Until their trust and youth-time shall depart.

Let me come to Thee young
When Thou dost challenge "Come!"
With all my marveling dreams unsung;
Let me rush to Thee when I pass
Keen as a child across the grass

The Golden Wedding Ring

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

THREE scenes are intimately related in the mind of the Church. Far back in the golden dawn of human history the first is laid, when from the side of the sleeping Adam, from a member close to the beating of his heart, woman was formed. And God brought her to him, bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh, that they might be inseparably united. Wherefore was man to leave father and mother and cleave to his wife, and they were to be "two in one flesh."

The second scene, of which the first was the symbol and type, has for its background the darkened sky around the mound of Calvary, where the world's great tragedy was enacted. There, from the opened side of the Second Adam, cast in the sleep of death, the Church was created, Christ's mystic Spouse, holy and without blemish, to be forever His glorious Bride. In that union between the Divine Bridegroom and His Spouse the world was to possess for all times the model of the perfect bond between man and woman.

The third scene, like the first, is a symbol of this union of Christ with the Church. Yet it is no mere symbol, but an efficacious sign of the life of grace. Its background is the lighted altar, with the white-vested priest, prepared to offer up in an unbloody manner the same tremendous Sacrifice that took place on Calvary. In the foreground, at the altar steps, are the Christian bridegroom and his bride. Not a mere civil convention, not a purely legal contract, not a tie to be lightly formed and as lightly broken, but a lasting and inviolable bond is the union effected there. It is a solemn pact witnessed not merely by men, but by God and His Holy Angels, and recorded for all eternity in the registry of heaven, with sacred obligations to posterity and to the Church.

From the opening of His public ministry Our Divine Lord manifested his deep concern for the sanctity of the marriage bond. "The beginning of miracles" took place at a nuptial feast in Cana of Galilee. Here, too, the Mother of Christ appeared in her great rôle as intercessor with her Son. "Even from that day forth," wrote Pope Leo XIII, "it seemed as if the beginning of a new holiness had been conferred on human marriage." Christ it was who thereafter saved woman from the degradation of polygamy and from the heartless rejection on the part of man by restoring to its primal purity the marriage bond and sweeping away forever the bill of divorce. So through Him did woman achieve her true emancipation.

But the greatest gift that Christ bestowed on her in married life was to raise marriage itself to the dignity of a Sacrament of the New Law. That He has done so in reality we know beyond doubt. Such is the tradition of the Universal Church, such is the doctrine of the Councils and the evidence of the earliest liturgies of the East and West which even call it in express terms a "Sacrament of the living." Such is the testimony of St. Augustine when he ranks Christian marriage with the Sacraments of Baptism and Holy Orders. (De Bono Coniugii). Such is the teaching clearly "intimated" in the Epistle of St. Paul to the Ephesians.

The words of the great Apostle, referring to Christian marriage as a "sacrament," might well perhaps be taken in a broader meaning were it not for the sense of the the entire context. Christian marriage, as he describes it, is a sacred and mysterious symbol of the union of Christ with His Church; it is a faithful representation of the relations existing between the Divine Bridegroom and His mystic Bride, mirrored in the relations between husband and wife. The marriage of Adam and Eve in Paradise was likewise, as we have seen, a symbol of this union; but Christian marriage was to be something even greater. The rites of the Old Testament were, in the words of the Apostle to the Galatians, "weak and needy elements"; but this is clearly distinct from them, more than they: "This is a great sacrament." Unlike them it is therefore not an empty sign, but an efficacious sign of the life of grace, or, in other words, a true sacrament. Well might Tertullian exclaim in the second century of the Christian era: "How can we describe the happiness of those marriages which the Church ratifies, the Sacrifice strengthens, the blessing seals, the Angels publish and the Heavenly Father propitiously beholds!" (Ad Uxorem.)

The sacramental effect of Christian marriage consists not merely in symbolizing, but in actually causing a realization of the union between Christ and His Church to exist in the union contracted between Christian husband and wife. This is what we mean by saying that Christian marriage efficaciously represents the union between Christ and His Church. Every Christian marriage is to be, as it were, an impression and reproduction, a copy of that Divine union, and for this effect the sacramental grace is given: "This is a great Sacrament, but in Christ and the Church." Christian marriage, it is true, may fall short of its sublime sacramental purpose; but the fault is then with man and not with the Sacrament.

The duties of husband and wife, if they would rightly correspond with the graces God gives them to realize in their holy bond this sublime resemblance of the union between Christ and His Church, are clearly explained by St. Paul. In words replete with tenderness and surpassing in beauty all that poets have sung of the sacred flame of human love, the great Apostle thus describes the obligations of the Christian husband:

Husbands, love your wives, as Christ also loved the church, and delivered himself up for it: that he might sanctify it, cleansing it by the laver of water in the word of life; that he might present to himself a glorious church not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but that it should be holy, and without blemish. So also ought men to love their wives as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife, loveth himself. For no man ever hated his own flesh; but nourisheth it and cherisheth it, as also Christ doth the church: because we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones.

Could there be a closer intimacy, a greater tenderness, a more delicate affection, a sweeter solicitude than that which is here prescribed as the husband's duty towards his wife? Christ loved the Church even to delivering Himself up for her to the death of the Cross; such is the ideal of that love the Christian husband is taught to cherish towards his wife. Her virtue is to be sacred to him as the sanctity of the Church is dear to Christ. He is to aid her to preserve the splendor of her soul in its spiritual beauty that it may flourish in a perennial youth, which the years can never steal away, though her outward charms should wither like the flowers they resemble. To attain to this perfection of devotion, rendered to the creature for the sake of the Creator, the grace of the Sacrament will never fail him. Verily this is a great Sacrament, in Christ and in the Church.

But woman, too, has her duties to perform. As the Church is subject to Christ, so is she to her husband in true love and fidelity. He is "the head of the wife" by the law of creation and by the express will of God, but in such wise "as Christ is the head of the Church." Her subjection is not ultimately to man, but "to the Lord," whom she beholds in her husband as every Christian sees Him in all rightful authority, rendering cheerful obedience for the love of God. Such subjection is the highest glory of the Christian man and woman. Its supreme examples are Christ Himself and His Virgin Mother. Clear and explicit, again, are the words of St. Paul:

Let women be subject to their husbands, as to the Lord: because the husband is the head of the wife, as Christ is the head of the church. He is the saviour of his body. Therefore as the church is subject to Christ, so also let wives be to their husbands in all things.

A great difference is indicated here between the headship of Christ and of the husband. Christ is the "saviour of his body," the Saviour of the Church. Such the husband can never be in regard to the wife. Her soul equally with his is the direct creation of God. His authority extends to the things pertaining to domestic government, and in so far the comparison applies. Only for the pagan wife can subjection become an indignity, in so far as she obeys man alone and not God. Hence the agitation and the clamor of modern paganism for "emancipation" from domestic government. Not such is the subjection of love on the part of the Christian woman, repaid by the devotion of love bestowed on her by her Christian spouse.

Enlightened and strengthened by the Spirit of God, woman must make it her task to preserve and perfect in her husband the image of Christ. She will understand his weakness only that she may save him from a fall. She will perceive the nobility of his soul that she may daily point out to him the opportunities for Christian service and evermore inspire him to mount to the exalted heights of Christian manhood, while she seeks to realize in herself the perfection of Christian womanhood. She will pray with him and watch with him that together they may attain to the ideal made possible for them both by the grace of this great Sacrament. So will the image of Christ stand forth revealed in the souls of both. They will not live now, but Christ in them, that of two there shall be only one flesh, one soul, one Christ, who is above all and in all. The Lord alone will they serve and love. Such is the meaning of the golden wedding ring the Christian bridegroom places upon the finger of the Christian bride.

The Value of Industrial Engineering

WILLIAM D. VANDERBILT, C. E.

THE term industrial engineering might properly be used to include the systematic and economical handling of all branches of commercial endeavor. The sales manager and the accountant of a corporation as well as the superintendent of the factory are all vitally interested at the present time in having their departments run scientifically with the least amount of friction and unnecessary effort, whether such be internal and mental or external and physical.

But it is in the manipulation of the material itself, whether in its raw state, in the manufacturing processes or in the disposition of the finished product that the term reaches its fullest significance. It is along this line that technical and scientific problems are constantly arising and here the engineer's training, both theoretical and practical are of the greatest value both in eliminating waste and in assisting to increase the much-desired profits of the corporation for which he works.

While the value of such expert assistance is now quite generally admitted, only a few years since it was entirely disregarded or looked upon as a most unnecessary expense.

Not much more than a decade ago only a very small number of firms were sufficiently interested in this question to employ regularly any one to study their own peculiar conditions with a view to changing established routine and opening up more economical methods. Some few would consult with efficiency engineers who would study the plant for a longer or shorter period, sending in recommendations as to necessary changes which sometimes were adopted but which more frequently, being criticized by the superintendent or foreman, were given but small chance to prove their value.

In recent years, however, the extreme competition of business, together with the constantly rising wage-rate and the reduction in the length of the working day have made even the least progressive manufacturer see a new light. It has become more and more evident that the methods of yesterday cannot continue simply because they proved sufficient for so long, and that they must give way to modern economics even at large initial expense.

The records of mercantile agencies bear witness to the passing of many once prosperous firms who could not or would not change. To make such changes scientifically and economically successful, the industrial engineer has come into being. And surely his need is great. Go into a large number of our factories, even those with names of national reputation, and the tremendous waste of effort is at once evident even to the layman. Stockrooms are situated in places far removed from the point where the goods are to be used; material is moved and lifted several times before reaching its final destination; expensive motor trucks only partially filled are constantly sent out on poorly planned delivery routes; large numbers of men employed for loading and unloading cars, are standing idle waiting for the man ahead to do his part. All these factors and many others are eating constantly and deeply into the pockets of the stockholders. And there is always complaint from the manager as to the inefficiency and insufficiency of the available labor.

But these conditions are rapidly changing. The work of the industrial engineer is becoming more and more apparent. Stockrooms, in fact the entire plants in some instances, are being relocated to allow a continuous movement as nearly as possible in one direction, from receipt of raw material to shipment of finished product. Mechanical devices for handling material and also for transporting it greater or less distances are being installed and in every way the waste and inefficiency of the past is being eliminated in order to meet the more intensive present.

Thus the best designed shops are in effect those which have been laid out around a transportation scheme, not only as regards proximity to railroad and waterways, but also from the viewpoint of internal convenience and economy.

It would probably be a matter of wonder to most people to know how many thousands of dollars are expended annually by corporations for maintaining expensive departments of engineers and accountants whose entire valuable time is devoted to this question of methods of manufacture or transportation of raw and finished product in order ultimately to effect greater savings. And when such methods are determined upon, no question of initial cost or condition of present plant no longer to be used, although still intrinsically of great value, can prevent their adoption. Nor is the personal prejudice of superintendent or foreman allowed to stand in the way of a fair trial.

It becomes evident, therefore, that the man who can decide on such innovations must be one who knows. An error of judgment on his part may not only result in the outlay of large sums of money for appliances which will not work satisfactorily, but will also have the more important and demoralizing effect of disturbing the routine of the plant to such an extent and for such a length of time that great loss, instead of profit, results. The engineer, therefore, must be as nearly as is humanly possible, 100 per cent efficient. Problems involving all branches of his profession, mechanical, electrical, sanitary and civil engineering, are daily brought before him.

But the capacity for advocating new methods and the knowledge necessary to superintend the installation of labor-saving devices are but part of the equipment of this most modern of engineers.

Not only must he plan the way but he must win the confidence of those holding the purse strings so that the necessary funds may be available to meet the unusual expenditures. This done, his hardest work often lies ahead of him. He must educate the users to the point of seeing the advantages in the new methods. He must overcome the inertia of habit. He must "teach old dogs new tricks." In other words, he must be such a leader of men that he will be able to fill others all along the line with his enthusiasm to the extent of making them see and really believe that the old way is not necessarily the best way.

Another important field for the successful industrial engineer lies along sociological lines. It is becoming more and more apparent that the successful corporations, other things being equal, are those which make a determined effort to attract and hold their employees. The number of new employees, hired each year by the average manufacturing plant, as compared with the number permanently retained on the payrolls, passes all belief. This constant change of personnel is a most serious drain on the economical working of the plant.

It naturally takes a new man some time to do even simple work as well and as easily as one who has grown accustomed to the same thing. A sense of strangeness to his surroundings and associates also prevents the best result and in every way he works for a time under a handicap. All this time his employer, while paying full wages is receiving less than full day's work, so that the monetary loss of these frequent changes is very real and can be easily computed by comparing work-tickets.

It therefore behooves the employers of labor to foster such a spirit of loyalty, by making the working conditions as attractive as possible, that the constant stream of transient work-people may be stopped and all who show signs of promise be retained.

For this reason the most enlightened corporations are spending large sums of money annually for improving the sanitary conditions of factories and workrooms. Modern washrooms, lunchrooms, recreation grounds, baseball fields and tennis courts, are being constructed, while many employers are taking up such matters as the housing of employees and cooperative stores.

All such ideas are of course entirely at variance with those existing heretofore. In our fathers' time the working or living conditions of the employee were given scant attention and the idea that the loss of a more or less unskilled laborer was a monetary loss was never considered.

It is now well understood that any money wisely spent along such lines as will make the employee more content with his position and which will show him that the company really has his interest at heart, is well invested and will be returned again many times over by the more intelligent and hearty work of such a body of contented and loyal employees.

Along all these broad lines, then, the industrial engineer works. It is hardly necessary to say that in a corporation of any size he must have many helpers who will look out for the details of the work and make sure that his instructions are carried out. It is equally evident that such assistants are in a position to obtain experience of the greatest value to themselves, and, if they bring to their work knowledge, energy and faithfulness, they will become of constantly increasing value to their employers and will advance from step to step along a most fascinating and profitable pathway, for new industrial problems will keep occurring, and the clever and efficient engineer will be well rewarded for solving them successfully.

The Humor of the Saints

THEODORE MAYNARD

TO speak of the Saints as possessing humor will seem to many people a forced piece of special pleading. Burglars may be, in their leisure, admirable husbands; and professional politicians, good fellows, but their calling usually precludes them from honesty or a pedantic regard for veracity. In much the same way, while the Saints are easily imagined as humble, or ardent, or mortified, or compassionate, they are not readily credited with gaiety. Sounding brass they may sometimes be, but rarely tinkling cymbals; holy but not hilarious. Anything else but that. Granted

> The courtesy of saints,
> Their gentleness and scorn, steadfastness, charity and a burning courage; but laughter and sanctity do not easily mix. This idea springs from a profound misunderstanding of the nature of holiness of heart, from a feeling that saints are divorced from humanity and carry their lives along alien ways. Their wan, unearthly beauty glows only upon a cathedral window and is lost if brought out into the daylight and the loud streets of the world. Kipling put it forcibly when he boasted that single men in barracks are not plaster saints, though the facts remain that there have been plenty of saints found in barracks, and that even the saints that grew before the Lord outside barracks were made of anything but plaster.

Their infinite variety is astounding; kings and popes appearing at one end of the scale and artisans and servant girls at the other; St. Benedict Labre, who cultivated dirt, standing against St. Theresa, who changed her linen twice a day. But of all it may be said that gaiety was their staff. They went laughing to heaven, for, even more than courage, cheerfulness is the abiding mark of the cloistered soul.

In some cases, of which St. Aloysius is a type, we see only dark eyes alive with mystery. But though we do not catch the personal humor of such across the centuries, we may imagine that they were the cause of harmless merriment in others. The elaborate chilblain plaster of the Jesuit cadet surely was a well of mirth to his companions. And if the nurse of the precocious saint, whose name escapes me, was edified by his refusal to take mammary nourishment on Fridays, we may guess that she, or at least the child's father, was vastly amused. The monumental incompetence, however, of St. Joseph of Cupertino, must have been enjoyed by the saint himself, or why did he name himself "Brother Ass"? And Brother Juniper saw the point of his fantastic and engaging awkwardness. He it was who roared loudest over the affair of the pig's trotters.

Beyond the happy innocence which is the secret of the child, there is the irony which is the secret of the universe, and to both of these every saint comes at last. St. Theresa was a conscious wit, sprinkling her letters and her conversation with pungent mots. And during the intervals of administering impartial justice, writing the Utopia, confuting Tyndall, saying his prayers and being beheaded, Blessed Thomas More conducted a jocular correspondence with Erasmus and composed Latin epigrams. Here is a translation of one made by Thomas Pike and published in 1569:

> None could persuade him Radishes to eat,
> Vertue abhors such kinde of luscious Meat.
> Casting about his dull unpleasant eye,
> He chanc'd fine tender Onions to espie:
> He snaps up those. Though Radishes a'nt good,
> It seems that Onions are a vertuous food.

St. Thomas Aquinas, when he wasn't writing his "Summa," made excellent limericks, and even St. Bernard, that great enigma, a man so rapt in contemplation that at the end of his novitiate, he was unable to say whether his dormitory ceiling was flat or arched; who in so many fields was the first man of his age, as scholar, preacher, poet and man of affairs; of whom Ernest Hello has aptly said that "it is impossible to write the history of his life without writing that of the whole world during his lifetime"—even that prince of monks and of saints loved his little joke. "Ah, Father Abbot," said his muleteer by the lakes of Switzerland, "why do you not admire the scenery?" "My son, I was saying my prayers." "But I can admire the lakes and the hills and say my prayers too." "Come," was the response, "I will make you an offer. If you can say one Pater Noster without distraction you shall have my mule." Down went the man upon his knees: Pater noster qui es in coelis, sanctificetur—and the saddle too, Father Abbot?" "No my son, nothing"!

It is easy to hear the ringing laugh of St. Francis, for in every company he was the merriest man present. There was perhaps something more than good poetry in his personifications of "Brother Sun" and "Sister Moon"; and he may have been as glad in his discovery as was a modern friar I knew, who shook with joy at his jest in speaking of "Brother Bacon" and "Sister Sausage." The early Franciscans were constantly doing and saying unaccountable things, but when St. Anthony preached to the fishes and Blessed Giles dispelled an unbeliever's doubts on the doctrine of free will by playing a fiddle and dancing round the room, the whole cosmos stood still to watch the comedy.

In different vein was the advice of St. Louis to De Joinville, but very good advice nevertheless. "No man except he be a very learned clerk should dispute with a Jew or a heretic; but let him smite with his sword and pierce to the midriff as far as the blade will enter."

One of the richest of the saints in the matter of humor was St. Philip Neri. He who could never finish the words: Cupio dissolvi et esse cum Christo without being snatched away into rapture; he who towards the end of his life said Mass in private so that he might dismiss his server for a couple of hours after the Agnus Dei while he made his Communion, was racy and whimsical to a degree. Did one of the Fathers of the Oratory appear to be in danger of growing puffed up by his eloquence? Then let him walk round the refectory bearing a monkey with a little gun upon his shoulder! Or he must carry Philip's favorite cat on a cushion behind its master through the streets of Rome! Lest anyone should think the fun of the best-beloved saint who ever lived was always at the expense of other people, we should remember his picnics for the Dominican novices, when he urged the young friars to "eat and grow fat."

An almost roguish humor was the natural breath of the Middle Ages and of their saints. It peeped out from the carving of a choir-stall or a capital, from an illuminated letter or a tail piece in a Missal. The same spirit which could inspire the lovely Cornish carol

> When on the Cross hangèd was I,
> When a spear to my heart did glance,
> There issued forth both water and blood
> To call my true love to the dance.

was also in the "Mirror for Monks" where Blosius wrote "Jesus makes a pleasant sauce for a poor and unsavoury dish." It shone in the jeweled gaiety of Fra Angelico's "Dance of the Angels"; it lives and moves still where the boys dance on "Corpus Christi" before the high altar in Seville.

Nor is this remarkable when we apprehend the abysmal depths of laughter in the Faith. The thought of the weak things of the earth confounding the mighty is as fundamentally comic, and comic for the same reason, as the sight of a bishop slipping on a piece of orange peel. And the strange humility of our religion receives its fulfilment in the Incarnation which drew these words from Chesterton:

> Laughter like a lion wakes
> To roar to the resounding plain,
> And the whole heaven shouts and shakes
> For God himself is born again—
> And we are little children walking
> Through the snow and rain.

What saint would not be merry in a world which God created out of nothing and where Christ Himself was happy.

The Democracy of Shakespeare

GILBERT K. CHESTERTON

I HAVE always owed a debt of gratitude to Mr. Shaw for throwing doubts on the anti-democracy attributed to Shakespeare. The truth is that not only Shakespeare but most of the other great poets can only be convicted of anti-popular sentiment by the detestable habit of quoting tags. For instance, Carlyle solemnly quotes Horace about the duty of hating the profane vulgar. But Carlyle does not mention that, immediately after, Horace "proclaims silence" for all the world, like Whiffin the Beadle at the Eatanswill election, and announces, in the best manner of modern advertisement, that he has an entirely new repertoire of songs, especially suited to young people of both sexes. The atmosphere of the ode certainly is not that of the misanthropic artist. Or again, many imagine a faint oligarchic flavor about Gray's expression, "Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife"; especially as it has been used as a title by the intensely anti-popular genius of the author of "Tess of the D'Urbervilles" and "Jude, the Obscure." A crowd more unmistakably madding than Mr. Hardy's suicidal rustics it would be hard to find in any slum. But the feeling in Gray's poem, the tone as distinct from the tag, is distinctly popular. He is praising the social strength and value of hob-nailed louts; and his vision involves a noble recognition of their roughness; though perhaps "the noiseless tenor of their way" is not the best description of their boots. In the same way, because somebody persuaded Shakespeare to write a rather dull play about Coriolanus, critics have talked about poor Will of Stratford, who would often have written a play about the man in the moon for the sake of a job, as if he were a rigid Roman patrician resurrected from the dead. But the general spirit of Shakespeare runs just the other way. It is founded on the popular medieval feeling that Jack is as good as his master, and often better. Whenever Shakespeare's narrative brings prince and clown together, the clown scores off the prince as systematically as Sam Weller scores off Pickwick or Sawyer or Stiggins. Hamlet and Laertes, leaping into the grave and out again, seem, and I think are meant to seem, mere theatrical sentimentalists, compared with the workman who, being as cheerful in the grave as in any other workshop, has some right to ask the grave where is its victory. Moreover, the gravedigger does utter the genuine democratic sentiment; and the only important political sentiment in the play. Mr. Shaw has, by the way, truly pointed out that the man who makes the ultra-royalist speech about the divinity hedging a king, is a ruffian and is killed after all. But I think the case is even stronger than he says. It must surely have been a stroke of savage humor to put the dogma that kings cannot be murdered, into the mouth of the ambitious and successful gentleman who had the best possible private reasons for knowing that they could. The ghastly irony of the words in the mouth, not only of a usurper but of a regicide, cannot be taken as a serious salute to monarchy. But the real philosophy of democracy, right or wrong, is excellently stated by the gravedigger, when he objects to great folk having countenance "to drown or hang themselves more than their even Christian." One could write a whole history of Europe round that phrase "even Christian." Note that broad religious views are brought in to excuse narrow social sympathies; exactly as they are today by Dean Inge and the model employees. Laertes talks a lot of new theology about churlish priests; but the man with the spade knows the truth. "If this had not been a gentlewoman. . . ." This point is important; for nothing is commoner nowadays than to make sentiment the excuse when snobbishness is the motive. And when I watched the old problem plays; and when the faithful old butler, bringing in the liqueurs, heard the young genius shoot himself in the wings; or when the femme incomprise wandered down by the exquisite azaleas and disappeared into the Maeterlinckian lake, something historic in me hardened my heart. And I only murmured: "And the more pity that great folk should have countenance in this world to drown or hang themselves, more than their even Christian." The man who said that was no anti-democrat.

Another difficulty is that geniuses who write unequally and have a ringing talent for melodrama, like Shakespeare, often do not get the credit for their subtlety when they really are subtle. They are credited with performing some stale mechanical trick, when the trick is really too quick or new for the audience to follow it. A strong example is the other great instance of the crowd in Shakespeare, the occasion of Marc Antony's oration. The ordinary version, in our Victorian youth, was that Brutus made a good speech against Caesar, and the mob cheered him very much; then Antony made a good speech for Caesar, and the crowd cheered him even more; and this was another example of Shakespeare's contempt for the inconstant populace. Now this is very bad and careless criticism. It is bad and careless, as it would be to treat Robinson Crusoe as a tale of perils, and complain that the hero had so long to fetch stores from the wreck. This would miss the point; that it is not Crusoe's insecurity, but his security, that puts a silence as of a punishment about his loneliness. It is bad and careless, as it is to say that Stevenson's tale of Jekyll and Hyde shows that man has two natures, one good and the other evil, and that they can exist separately. This misses the point; that the interest of Jekyll is not in the success but in the failure of his experiment. He sincerely tries to saw himself in half; but the spinal cord of conscience still connects the two parts. In other words, it is a vulgar simplification, like most modern religions. It is putting down everything in black and white, because you are color-blind.

Antony's speech is not only sincere but passionate. I cannot prove it. Nor can you prove that Juliet was in love, that ornate blank verse is more likely to be used by a demagogue in a forum than by a girl in the balcony. There is no answer; except that there is a certain kind of blank verse that is not blank. It fills the heart of the reader, and unless we are all mad, it must have filled the heart of the writer.

Marc Antony roused the democracy because he was a democrat. He was addressing the members of a democracy suddenly cowed by the coup d'état of the old aristocrats. He was expressing himself under restrictions; but so were they. He ran great risks in saying anything; but so did they. He did not want to die very much; nor do the London poor. He had mostly to take refuge in irony; so do the poor. But the man who can take such irony for artificial party speaking, ought to have boiling lava in his teacup at afternoon tea. His appeal throughout is to the plainest ideas of the people; death, friendship, tears, blood, money. Caesar cried at sight of suffering; Cato did not cry. Caesar had left the poor hard cash; Cassius probably would not have done so. Caesar's throat was cut; and after all Brutus's wasn't. Antony is the professional politician, being as bold as he dares; but his appeal is to the ordinary man.

And now turn back to what I think is almost the greatest thing in Shakespeare. Shakespeare's type of tragedy was the first tragedy of free will; the first Christian tragedy. "We will call a halt to this business." If these words are properly spoken, the audience really feels that Duncan may have his porridge next morning in peace. It is something more living, original and spiritual than the flattening steam-roller of "fate": it is the villain tempted by virtue. Shakespeare has given us one tremendous picture, very much needed for these times. He has shown us the politician when he is suddenly tempted to be a man. When Antony actually finds the body of Caesar, he asks for death with startling and inspired impatience, knowing he will afterwards be a corpse or a "statesman."

> There is no hour so fit
> As Caesar's death hour, nor no instrument
> Of half that worth as these your swords, made richer
> With the most noble blood of all this world.

Then he utters the rending phrase of revelation:

> Live a thousand years
> I shall not find myself so apt to die.

Most successful statesmen have passed through that heroic instant. And there are none who do not really regret that they have survived it.

Catholic Ideals in Secular Life

E. S. CHESTER

THE Catholic, moving in secular society, should be as a breath of pine or balsam in a windy air, pervasive, tonic, effectual, yet suggestive of its source rather than of itself. Just as one is conscious at Bar Harbor or in the Adirondacks of a sense of physical refreshment which must be referred to the great trees and the mountains, so one experiences, or should experience in the presence of a clear Catholic personality, a social and spiritual influence which, when traced to its source, is found to spring from Catholic belief and practice. No other man conducts himself as does the genuine Catholic, because no other man is in possession of the full content of Christian Revelation or the complete code of Christian deportment. Others enjoy at most only some of the beautiful remnants of these treasures.

There is not one dogma of the Catholic Church that does not react perfectly to the test of Teresa of the Child Jesus, "to make Love more loved." She prayed it, she advised it, she went about singing it. Above all, she flooded every act of her will and body with its supernatural sweetness. She discovered, and would have others discover in all the dogmas of the Faith the source of that air of pine and balsam which every truly representative Catholic gives forth. One may not be able to define this air perhaps, but it pervades the true Catholic's life like a social perfume. A simple example will illustrate how true this is.

Tourists frequently declare that they have found the deportment of a peasant nun or a lay-brother to surpass in actual correctness that of experienced attendants on courts. This is not surprising. What Catholic child is not instructed in court etiquette? He has been a scholar in the court of the Blessed Sacrament. To be anything but reverent in the Royal Presence with which he is so familiar would be difficult to the point of embarrassment. The habitual practice of gentleness in their places of worship becomes a social asset in the lives of even very lowly Catholics, and we often see what is called a well-born child at a distinct disadvantage in this respect with the orphan pupil of a Sisters' school. Even modesty and humility cannot hide themselves under a bushel; for modesty and humility so earnestly taught by Catholic discipline are shining virtues which the most obtuse worldling recognizes.

It was Father Thurston, I think, who wrote the little manual on religious deportment which is used in many schools; and in it he insists upon the motives of Christian deportment rather than deportment itself. It is suggested to young people, for example, that loud and disorderly behavior is not so much vulgar as a sin against charity. It is an infringement of the law binding us to do all things with a view to our neighbor's comfort and convenience. So it is, or so it should be, with all Catholic conduct. Its motive is the very highest. When the garments of cloth of gold were removed from royal saints, it was discovered that the tunic of hair-cloth was nearer their hearts. Similarly, were the trappings of convention stripped from true Catholic conduct, one might see enwrought beneath it the aspiration of Benedict XV: "That the charity of Jesus Christ may prevail."

Not to those in the world is it given to enjoy that community of aims, sympathies and affections that is possible in the Religious Orders. On the contrary, the thistle and the wheat grow side by side, in the social garden. All the strength and wholesomeness of the wheat cannot change the thistle, but the thistle must not be allowed to uproot or weaken the well-planted wheat. Strange and painful are the natural strainings and antagonisms of the social order; yet the end of the thistle is death, while the wheat is to endure unto perfection.

Such is the ideal, and yet society is often disappointed in Catholics. It expects so much from those whose claims are so high. Declaring that we alone have the true life-giving Sacraments, we correspond so miserably to the world's just expectation of us! Society has heard that we dwell in the fulness of the light of revealed truth, symbolized on our altars, at our shrines, and even at our biers; and we give forth only a faint and flickering glimmer! There would be no such journal in the world as the Menace if Catholics practised faithfully our holy Faith. The Menace lives and thrives by our failure to demonstrate individually as Christians the infallible truth of our dogmas in our commonplace secular life.

What is needed is a more easy and natural diffusion of Catholic ideals in secular life. This cannot be done so long as there exists any superior sense of aloofness, or alien sympathies. Certainly it cannot be done by neglect or misrepresentation of our actual belief and practice. The more Catholic a Catholic is, the better, even in the eyes of the enemies of the Church. The world's dislike of lukewarmness and evasion is second only to that of God for the same thing. Never does a Catholic in secular life make so grave a mistake as when he endeavors to conceal, or above all to apologize for his convictions. There is not a function or service of human affairs in the matter of social relationship that is not rarefied, sweetened and invigorated by those celestial airs which breathe from a sincere, urbane and gentle Catholic.

The Catholic may not fail any man, woman, or child who turns to him with confidence and affection; for this is like the sealing up of a spring which the thirsty one had expected to see gush forth in living water. Not the Menace, but the disappointing Catholic is the clog on the chariot wheels of holy mother Church. To radiate the teachings of the Church from our homes, as the holy house of Nazareth radiated them, is indispensable to any career that would escape the just displeasure of our friends, the "Guardians" and the "Patriots."

A prominent Anglican clergyman is reported to have said that if during twenty-four hours Catholics were to lead that perfect life of holiness and purity which their Faith enjoins, the thousands among whom they live would be irresistibly drawn back to the Church of Rome. There may be some exaggeration in the statement, for good example is not the only factor in conversion. But it is certainly true, on the other hand, that the indifferent, worldly and sinful lives of too many who have received the gift of the true Faith and boast of it, are violently closing the doors of the Fold of Christ against vast numbers who are thus driven away from its peace and calm by the startling contradiction they witness between practice and belief. Beyond all doubt such a scandal should quickly disappear.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

College Dramatics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read with interest Mr. Hayden's strictures on "College Dramatics." However true they may be in regard to men's colleges, they certainly do not apply to my Alma Mater, nor to other women's colleges with which I am acquainted. It has been the theory and practice of the Dean and faculty of the College of Mount St. Vincent that college plays [illegible] twofold [illegible]pose of education and [illegible] the French Church?" This stung me because the taunt came to my mind at once.

All praise to the excellent and devoted priests of the "Société des Missions Etrangères" who are working so hard and with so little assistance in this country. We could help them and by our works make it known that there are Catholics in the United States and many good ones who have the interests of the Church at heart.

Chang Song, Korea. ADELRICH BENZIGER.

Ah, Percye!

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Julianne is right, Percye is the problem. The girls, many of hem, are bad enough, but the Percyes are an abomination of esolation. True, many of them are not educated in Catholic lleges but then some of them are. And what a set they are! ey are intellectual enough: that is clear from their success, pite the many obstacles in their way. But are they Catholic? t all the time, and not in all ways. If they are worth $5,000, y are Catholic on Sundays and holydays for half an hour in morning; if they are worth a $1,000,000, they are Catholics Sundays from eleven o'clock in the morning till one o'clock e afternoon, especially when they are engaged to be married pious lady. But few or none of them are really interested Church. As soon as tribulation befalls her, they take to , like frightened bunnies, and from under the palm and ge tree they talk eloquently about the mistakes of the clergy the way they themselves would do things. The Percyes ntime are doing this, showing their lavender socks and king costly cigarettes. There is a problem here for Catholic eges.

ew York. FRANCIS RUSH.

France's Religious Future

the Editor of AMERICA:

nder the above title Henri Merlier has written an interesting cle, printed in the Bloc Catholique of Toulouse. He calls ntion to the prevalence of the impression that France is ergoing a religious awakening, and while not minimizing extent or the reality of the movement of a multitude of ls along the war fronts in the direction of God, he nevertheless points out that the religious renaissance is to be accepted reservations:

> This movement, even if not deep, is none the less sincere nd real. It exists. But what will come out of it after e war? That is the great question. Either this impulsive ovement will be disciplined and purified under the authority of those who are qualified to direct our souls: in hich case we shall see it develop and increase in fruitful sults; or else it will be dominated and maneuvered by men ithout principles and without character, such as, for many ars, be it said to our shame, have laid hands upon all tholic affairs in France and controlled them. In this latter ent, we shall see our great religious awakening become miserable failure, strangled at its birth. And then may e spoken of us the same words that Christ spoke of the an who did not defend himself against a renewed attack f the enemy; the last state of this people shall be worse an the first.

M. Merlier calls attention to what happened when souls rose in horror on the morrow of the Revolution and reverted to holicism, and he quotes Louis Veuillot's famous dictum, "A ple's greatest peril is to be badly saved," with the prayer that cruel truth may not be verified in the case of repentant nce. His warning is a timely one. The religious future of nce is by no means secure. Recent events fill even the hope- with misgivings.

incinnati. MARIA LONGWORTH STORER.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1916

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, FRANCIS A. BREEN.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:

United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y., U
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

The Last Page

ONCE bright and beautiful, it hangs a sorrowful lict upon the wall. It has served us well, calendar for 1916. Now the dust of a twelvem sobers the garish colors that so short a time since, se to cast a cheery radiance of hope over the sheaf o months to come. One last page remains, torn, c faithful to the end. Tonight, it, too, shall go, for wit unknown message, the New Year knocks at the gat the world.

So have they come, the months, and gone agair solemn, steady wheeling down the passage to eter that we call time. But where are the pages of yes month? Where the page that was torn off so carele or happily, it may be, in the sudden gladness of some g that had come into life, or slowly, in the shadow of row? All are gone, gone forever, even as the mor whose days and weeks they faithfully chronicled. T have served their purpose. We number them with things beyond recall; with the snows of January, sp ling under frozen stars; with June's roses, now attar crystal vase; with the crisp leaves, gold and bro swirling in early November paths. Perhaps they left nothing but memories, the memories of days "make a mournful rustling in the dark," that sear cut, or that abide mercifully to console and counsel. cling to what is past as the years creep on, and reach the things that once were. Like little children we tur look back, as with unwearying step, time leads us o our Father's home. We have traveled far, and a sta night has fallen. We grope in the darkness. When the dawn come, and with it the peace of God?

But it is not well to live with the ghosts of the p Our God is a God of the present. Before Him, tim not. With Him, our past may be forgotten, and existence be made in some sense, like His, an ever-present now. For

> We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
> In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
> We should count time by heart-throbs. He most lives
> Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.
> Life's but a means unto an end; that end
> Beginning, mean, and end to all things—God.

Let us forget the things that are past. God has given us [illegible] time for noble thoughts, for nobler aims, sympathies and affections [illegible] to [illegible] ligious Orders. On the contrary, the thistle and the wheat grow side by side, in the social garden. All the strength and wholesomeness of the wheat cannot change the thistle, but the thistle must not be allowed to uproot or weaken the well-planted wheat. Strange and painful are the natural strainings and antagonisms of the social order; yet the end of the thistle is death, while the wheat is to endure unto perfection.

Such is the ideal, and yet society is often disappointed in Catholics. It expects so much from those whose claims are so high. Declaring that we alone have the true life-giving Sacraments, we correspond so miserably to the world's just expectation of us! Society has heard that we dwell in the fulness of the light of revealed truth, symbolized on our altars, at our shrines, and even at our biers; and we give forth only a faint and flickering glimmer! There would be no such journal in the world as the Menace if Catholics practised faithfully our holy Faith. The Menace lives and thrives by our failure to demonstrate individually as Christians the infallible truth of our dogmas in our commonplace secular life.

What is needed is a more easy and natural diffusion of Catholic ideals in secular life. This cannot be done so long as there exists any superior sense of aloofness, or alien sympathies. Certainly it cannot be done by neglect or misrepresentation of our actual belief and practice. The more Catholic a Catholic is, the better, even in the eyes of the enemies of the Church. The world's dislike of lukewarmness and evasion is second only to that of God for the same thing. Never does a Catholic in secular life make so grave a mistake as when he endeavors to conceal, or above all to apologize for his convictions. There is not a function or service of human affairs in the matter of social relationship that is not rarefied, sweetened and invigorated by those celestial airs which breathe from a sincere, urbane and gentle Catholic.

The Catholic may not fail any man, woman, or child who turns to him with confidence and affection; for this is like the sealing up of a spring which the thirsty one had expected to see gush forth in living water. Not the Menace, but the disappointing Catholic is the clog on the chariot wheels of holy mother Church. To radiate the teachings of the Church from our homes, as the holy house of Nazareth radiated them, is indispensable to any career that would escape the just displeasure of our friends, the "Guardians" and the "Patriots."

A prominent Anglican clergyman is reported to have said that if during twenty-four hours Catholics were to lead that perfect life of holiness and purity which their Faith enjoins, the thousands among whom they live would be irresistibly drawn back to the Church of Rome. There may be some exaggeration in the statement, for good example is not the only factor in conversion. But it is certainly true, on the other hand, that the indifferent, worldly and sinful lives of too many who have received the gift of the true Faith and boast of it, are violently closing the doors of the Fold of Christ against vast numbers who are thus driven away from its peace and calm by the startling contradiction they witness between practice and belief. Beyond all doubt such a scandal should quickly disappear.

innocent charges, reflected in all Catholic institutions, should awaken in every heart, not utterly dead to human feeling, deepest respect and admiration; and it is true that in all who know their work, our Sisters and Brothers find devoted friends. But, unfortunately, many of our own people who, by reason of wealth or social position, could do much for our institutions, are quite guiltless of the slightest interest in their Christ-like ministrations. There are notable exceptions; but of too many may it be said in sorrowful truth, "Demas hath left us, loving this world."

The home, the school, and the guaranty to every dependent Catholic child of a Catholic training, are three interests of most vital importance to the Catholic Church today. By legal provision and public opinion, marriage and education have become thoroughly secularized. The next step will be to regard all minors, beginning with the dependent child, as direct wards of a secularized State. With the continuance of Catholic apathy, that day will come soon and unexpectedly. New Year's resolutions are now opportune. One of the best that can be taken by any Catholic is to familiarize himself with the local Catholic child-saving agencies. From this knowledge will grow devotion, and devoted champions are needed in these godless days. The need is particularly acute in New York, where the dreadful sentence of Christ, recorded in the eighteenth chapter of St. Matthew, sixth verse, hangs over many.

The Optimist

LEIBNITZ affirmed that the present world in which we live is the best possible world that God could make. In doing so the great German philosopher imposed a limit to the powers of the Creator. Sound philosophy, on the contrary, teaches that the present world is not the best which God could make. This world however answers perfectly to the end which the Creator had in view and in spite of its evident shortcomings and defects, it may become an abode of peace and happiness. Evil and sorrow will, it is true, visit man during his sojourn on earth, yet in spite of them, he may rise superior to all the blows and burdens of misfortune and find in his own heart the secret of true happiness.

Two types of man divide humanity, the pessimist and the moderate, well-balanced optimist who rejects the exaggerated optimism of Leibnitz. The pessimist believes that this is the worst world which God could make, that everything in it is dark, gloomy and doleful; that it is an abode of tears, of misery, of individual, social and national misfortune. To such a man life is a tragedy closed with catastrophe and ruin. The optimist sees in this world the sorrows of mind, heart and soul which afflict humanity. The arrows of misfortune have riven his breast. A man, he feels all that a man can suffer, but he does not let the wound fester. He has a heavenly balm for the hurts and the bruises which no warrior can avoid in the battle of life. Even though unhorsed in the fray, he does not give up the fight, but, with hope in his heart and with hands again steadied for the onset, he once more faces the foe. Failures do not daunt him. The dangers and the perils of the combat do not hold him back. Optimist that he is, he does his best and leaves the rest to Heaven. There is always a silver and a golden lining to the clouds that roll over the field where he is struggling, and through the rift in the gathering storm, he sees the hand of God stretching out to crown him with victory. He is never beaten, for as the poet says, though he may not command success, he deserves it.

Men such as he do great things for God and for man. No great work in Church or State is accomplished without the trust, the hope, the dauntless energy, the buoyant spirit, the daring, the reckless but knightly courage of the optimist. The Apostles were optimists. They sowed in tears and blood. They knew that in God's own time, the golden harvest would come. For 300 years every Pontiff that sat on the throne of Peter was an optimist. Linus and Clement and Eleutherius and Urban knew that the catacombs would soon be changed into the basilica of the Lateran, and that the hated Cross would glitter above the Capitol. Columbus was an optimist. He knew in his heart that the magic voices which beckoned him to the West were not deceiving him, that out of the shadows of the sunset a new world would emerge to gladden his straining eyes. The Catholic Church ever teaches the noblest and the purest optimism, for she is ever sounding in our ears that martial call Sursum corda, "Lift up your hearts," to thrill our souls with a message of hope, of courage, of trust and love. The optimist takes a cheerful and bright view of life. If this be so the true Christian and Catholic is the genuine representative of the class. For him, life is God's best and noblest gift. Its blessings and its sorrows come from a father's hand. He spends it for His service and His glory. He cheerfully bears its load of suffering and care. He is not daunted by its misfortunes. He confidently and lovingly awaits its reward.

"O Radix Jesse!"

DECEMBER nineteenth is one of those days in the ecclesiastical year with a thrill all its own. It is one of those nine stirring days before Christmas, when the announcement of the Birth of the Prince of Peace sounds louder and clearer, like the strong galloping of horses drawing nearer and nearer from the far distance. It is the third of the days on which the majestic "O" anthems are sung double at Magnificat, and the special anthem of this day is: "O Root of Jesse, which standest for an ensign unto the people, before whom the mouth of kings shall be stopped, unto whom the nations shall seek: come, and deliver us, and make no long tarrying."

Just about the time when many a priest and religious was reciting this most glorious petition of Catholic democracy, there was joy in the heart of the New York Stock Exchange. Brokers, so the daily press informs us, in their jubilation danced about the floor, singing and cheering. But it was not in honor of the Babe of Bethlehem that they were merry: it was in honor of the god of blood and of the god of gold. They were joyful because the news was trickling over the cables that the British Government had turned a deaf ear to Germany's proposals of peace; they rejoiced because there was a sharp advance of from one to seven points in the price of stocks.

Throughout the bounds of war-stricken Europe there is not a wife or a mother but from whose heart, on this day of peace discussions, there were echoed the words of this most beautiful anthem, one of the most poignant cries for peace in the literature of the whole world. And as it seemed that the cry was being choked at its very utterance, so the soul of the stock market waxed more joyful and merry: peace was not wanted at any price, for there is much gold in blood and death.

So they danced, they sang, and they cheered, and the sound of their laughter rose high and loud. It drowned the weeping of mothers and widows; it stifled the groans of dying men in the shambles of the battlefield. And as the stock brokers danced on the floor of the Stock Exchange, the bodies of dead soldiers were trodden beneath their footsteps deeper into the mire of Europe—for America is prosperous, and America is a great lover of peace.

It was only when the British Premier's address had been published in full that the merriment of the bulls and bears waned, and the voice of joy was no longer heard in the land of Wall Street. But the sound of that laughter will echo long, and the chinking of all the gold in the world cannot drown the echoes of that merry rout that took place on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange as the price of blood mounted higher and higher; as suffering humanity cried out piercingly: "O Root of Jesse, which standest for an ensign unto the people, before whom the mouth of kings shall be stopped, unto whom the nations shall seek: come, and deliver us, and make no long tarrying." For the coming of the Prince of Peace cannot long be delayed, and at His coming the profiters of blood and death shall fall into confusion.

"The Unvarnished Truth"

PLAYWRIGHTS and fictionists often make effective use of the ridiculous situations that ensue when a circle of acquaintances suddenly begins to speak the exact truth. Characters are introduced who avoid using such conventional expressions as "not at home," "delighted to see you," and the like, but tell instead "the unvarnished truth." Words are used to express rather than to conceal the speaker's real thoughts, white lies are taboo, and the disastrous consequences of talking "very frankly and sincerely" with a neighbor are amusingly acted or described. Suppose that so great a passion for truth-telling should all of a sudden seize the entire human race that every kind of deception would cease forthwith to be practised. Men would then seem what they are. No one would live below or beyond his means. In words, in manners, in dress, in homes, and in social standing men and women would abandon all pretense. Just as we now know the priest, the postman or the policeman by his dress, the world could then determine at a glance, so to speak, the moral, social, mental and financial standing of every individual. Advertisers could be believed, lawyers would starve and diplomats would find their occupation gone. Life would thus become so simple and sincere that poets would sing the Golden Age's return and the prophecies of Isaias would be declared fulfilled.

However the practice of sincerity in word and deed, the shunning of pretense in life and conduct are by no means strictly millennial virtues. They are very necessary and thoroughly work-a-day ones even now. Civilized society would totter to its fall if throughout the world the written and the spoken words of men could no longer be believed, for the preservation of human relations rests on the confidence we have in one another's veracity. To perfect and extend this spirit of mutual trust is always the Christian's duty, and the practice of greater sincerity and truthfulness is a particularly fitting disposition for the Christmas season. As a striking model of these virtues the Church offers the character of St. John the Baptist, a man who was conspicuous for his sincerity and freedom from pretense. He refused to be taken for what he was not. He promptly set right those who would have honored him as Elias or even as the long awaited Redeemer Himself. The more of the austere Precursor's spirit of humble and fearless sincerity Christians can bring to the Crib of Bethlehem, the warmer will their welcome be. A man tells or acts a lie, as a rule, because he is either cowardly or proud. He desires to seem better than he really is, or else he fears to suffer the consequences of his vices or follies. St. John the Baptist's admirable sincerity was due to the fact that he feared no one but God and that his whole life was as remarkable for its humility as for its innocence.

Socialism After the War?

A LEADING Socialist paper calls attention to what it regards as the fulfilment in the present war of a prediction made by Marx in his "Capital." The fetters of the old mode of production have been broken, it believes, by the appointment of virtual dictators such as Lloyd George in England and Briand in France, and "production for profit" has given way to "production for use," though that use is to be found on the battlefields. The following is the passage wherein Marx makes his often-quoted prediction:

> The monopoly of capital becomes a fetter on the mode of production, which has sprung up and flourished along with and under it. Centralization of the means of production and socialization of labor at last reach a point where they become incompatible with their capitalist integument. This integument is burst asunder. The knell of capitalist private property sounds. The expropriators are expropriated.

While no one would regret the passing of countless abuses existing under the present system of capitalistic business and finance, after the war there will be as little desire on the part of labor to be bound down to a compulsory governmental labor system, or its equivalent, such as is now being enforced in many of the belligerent countries. Patriotism and the dire needs of the warring nations have made such a condition acceptable for the time, though not without considerable friction. That labor will voluntarily submit to an extension of these conditions beyond the war-time is not conceivable. Nor is such a statement founded upon mere theorizing.

The fact is that the workingman may not be in a position to regain even his former independence after the war is over. He has relinquished many of his hard-gained privileges, and the question is whether he will again be able to secure them without a new struggle. The millionaire employers on the other hand have been decidedly strengthened by the war. Concentration of capital into a few hands has been necessary in order to carry on production of war material on a vast scale. Though men may revolt against excessive capitalistic concentration, they will not willingly fly into the arms of labor despotism under any régime, even though it should be labeled "Socialism." It were vain to predict what the final outcome will be. What it should be, for the happiness of labor and capital alike, the Church has abundantly made clear to all men of discernment.

Literature

THE POETS AT THE CRIB

ANGELS sang the first Christmas hymn, the simplest and loveliest carol ever lilted before the Crib, yet so deep and solemn were its harmonies, that their echoes have lingered on earth, and by a mysterious power ever come to life again to commemorate the great event first announced by the heavenly choristers. Nor, must we wonder at this. For no age can be so senseless and so dull as not to feel the pastoral beauty and the regal splendors of that wondrous birth which the Angels heralded on the first Christmas night over the sheepfolds of Bethlehem. A God become man! Omnipotence in bonds! The Lord of Ages and the God of Glory born in a stable! A Crib! A Manger! A Virgin bringing forth a son, her God promised by patriarch and seer! The Eternal and the Invisible clothed in the vesture of our mortality to redeem and to save us! Shepherds thronging to the humble abode where lies the Wondrous Babe, while turbaned princes of the East swing forth on the dromedaries of Madian and Epha to lay at the feet of the newborn King, their gifts of gold, frankincense and myrrh! A cruel tyrant, seeking the life of the Babe, and tender Innocents sacrificing their lives that the Child might be saved, while there is mourning in Rama and Rachel will not be comforted. Poetry itself could devise no theme so sublime, so heart-appealing, so calculated to stir the tenderest and at the same time the deepest emotions of our nature.

And so from the earliest existing English carol "Lordings, listen to our lay," a relic probably of the thirteenth century, down to our own days represented for instance by a poem chosen almost at random like Alice Meynell's "Unto us a Son is given," the splendid mystery has had its singers from the unnamed artists of the carols of the Ages of Faith, through the days of Elizabeth and the troubled period of the Commonwealth and the Restoration to Scott and Wordsworth, Tennyson, Browning, Noyes, Thompson and Chesterton.

Not all of course approach the mystery in the same attitude. All do not manifest towards it the same reverence, the same simple faith and love. The great artists of the days when England was "Merrie England" came to the crib with something of the spirit of the shepherds who first knelt down before the Mother and the Babe. For them Christmas brings first of all the story of the birth of the Man-God. It recalls the great act of redeeming love of the Creator towards his sinful children. No doubt the day means for them joy, happiness, merriment and laughter, for it was the day when all, knight and king and serf, noble-born dame and serving maid, gathered in the hall, to mingle in that common brotherhood and sonship which Christ had restored to earth. They sing perhaps of wine and wassail a little boisterously at times. But the Christ Child and His Virgin Mother are never forgotten. With them, as a rule, the song begins and ends. In greeting the new-born King, their hearts expand and a generous welcome is given to Him and to all His friends and brothers and children. Such is the spirit of the carol "Welcome Yule," the manuscript of which, according to Ritson, dates from the time of Henry VI, the composition of which, however, is much earlier.

And the kingship of Christ is ever recognized together with His Divinity, as in the fine carol of the fifteenth century; "The Three Kings":

> There came three Kings from Galilee,
> To Bethlehem, that fair citie,
> To seek him that should ever be by right-a
> Lord and king and knight-a.

In many of these lays there is a wonderful tenderness and pathos blended with a delicacy and refinement of sentiment, we do not as a rule, associate with those days of iron-clad knights, hardy bowmen and men-at-arms. Thus in one of the most beautiful carols of the fifteenth century "The Virgin and the Child," there is a loving colloquy between the Mother and the Son, which even in its modern rendering, loses nothing of its tenderness. Our Lady says:

> Now, sweet Son, since thou art King,
> Why art thou laid in stall?
> Methinketh it is right
> That king or knight
> Should be in good array.

And the Child answers:

> My Mother, I am thy child,
> Though I am laid in stall.
> Lords and dukes shall worship me
> And so shall kings all.
> Ye shall well see
> That kings three
> Shall come on the third day.
> . . . . . .
> And sing, by by, lullay.

The same spirit of reverence for the great mystery of redemption, so deeply ingrained in the hearts of the people, long remained in their Christmas hymns and songs. "The Sinner's Redemption," one of the most popular carols, going back to the seventeenth century bears witness to the consoling fact:

> The five-and twentieth of December
> Good cause have you to remember;
> In Bethlehem upon this morn
> There was Our Blessed Saviour born,
> And to redeem our souls from sin.
> He is the Saviour of us all.

In the days of Elizabeth, Christmas is not forgotten. It is true that the simplicity, the tenderness and quaint naïveté have departed from the hymns. But the new-born Babe is still the King to be worshiped, loved and served. All are familiar with Shakespeare's noble reference in "Hamlet" to the wonders of the Holy Night. But the poems of the Elizabethan Thomas Tusser, who gives us a good insight into the Christmas manners and customs of those times, may not be so well known. Drummond of Hawthornden's two beautiful sonnets "The Angels' Song" and "The Shepherds' Song" must not be forgotten, while the splendid poem of Bishop Hall beginning with the line: "Immortal Babe, who this dear day" has something of the power and the majesty of an Ambrosian hymn. The age still believed in Christ and Ben Jonson writes "A Hymn on the Nativity of My Saviour," while Robert Southwell composes the well-known "Burning Babe" and another poem "New Prince, New Pomp" where the Divine contradictions of the mystery are brought out with homely directness and power and genuine emotion.

Puritanism itself could not oust Christmas from the hearts of the people, and the great Puritan poet who was to write of the fall of man and the rebel Angels, was only twenty-one when he wrote his ode "On the Morning of Christ's Nativity." The poem is marred by conceits and is overlaid with mythological phraseology and is too much taken up with externals, but no one who has once read it can forget its rhythm, and its organ melodies; and its "helmèd cherubim and sworded seraphim" and "bright-harnessed Angels" will long haunt him. But the man whom Cowley called "poet and saint," Richard Crashaw, the Francis Thompson of the seventeenth century, gets closer to the heart of the mystery than the immortal singer of "Paradise Lost." His poem "In the Nativity of Our Lord God," a hymn composed of a chorus and a dialogue between two shepherds, Tityrus and Thyrsis, may not perhaps be compared to Milton's ode, yet it has some wonderful lines such as:

> Welcome all wonders in one sight!
> Eternity shut in a span!
> Summer in Winter, Day in Night!
> Heaven in earth and God in Man!—

The Christmas tradition thus adhered to in their own original way by Milton and Crashaw, is taken up by Robert Herrick. The religious sentiment is still felt, but to this singer the Child of his "Ode on the Birth of the Saviour" is to a great extent, a human child and Herrick, as Andrew Lang says, was in love with children as he was with roses. Many of Herrick's songs such as the "Come bring with a noise" are still popular. In these as in other poems of the period the festive side of the feast and its social pleasures, thrown into the background by the stern manners of the Commonwealth, are again emphasized. After the death of Herrick, the popular Christmas carol and the old hymns remained in fashion and were sung by high and low alike. But there is a lull and a pause in the great Christmas symphony which had been resounding in England for many centuries. No great Christmas poetry, Tate's "While Shepherds Watched" excepted, was composed in the eighteenth century. The nineteenth was to witness a revival. But our humble Yule-log is burning low, and we must end. Of the Christmas star, Clinton Scollard has said:

> Out of the Past's black night
> There shines one star
> Whose light is more
> Than all the constellations are. . . . .

Since the poets must follow some guiding star, they will find none with a softer, more resplendent beam, with a steadier or a more unerring light than the Star of Bethlehem.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

REVIEWS

Saint Dominic and the Order of Preachers. By JOHN B. O'CONNOR, O. P. New York: The Bureau of the Holy Name Society, 871 Lexington Ave. $0.75; paper, $0.35.

On December 22, 1216, Pope Honorius III., in perhaps the briefest Bull by which any Religious Order was confirmed, gave Dominic de Guzman the following document:

> Honorius, Bishop, servant of the servants of God, to our dear son, Dominic, prior of St. Romain, of Toulouse, and to your brethren who have made, or shall make, profession of regular life, health and apostolic benediction. We, considering that the brethren of your Order will be the champions of the Faith and the true light of the world, do confirm the Order in all its land and possessions present and to come; and We take the Order itself, with all its goods and rights, under Our protection and government. Given at St. Sabina, at Rome, on the 11th of the Kalends of January, the first year of Our Pontificate. HONORIUS.

How the "Watchdogs of the Lord," who were thus authorized by the Holy See to become a new Religious Order have continued from the beginning to be, in the words of the Pontiff, "champions of the Faith, and the true light of the world," Father O'Connor shows in this excellent sketch of St. Dominic's career, of the "genius of the Order," and of "Dominican Achievements." When the first Friar Preacher looked out on the world of his time, he noted, says the author, an absence of the contemplative spirit among men of active life, a lack of reverent, scientific scholarship, and of authoritative, effective preaching. St. Dominic was the heaven-sent person who supplied these needs, for he gave the Church of the thirteenth century the very men she required, for Dominicans are canons by profession, monks by the austerity of their lives, apostles by their office of preaching, and scholars by their success at the universities. As Father Schwertner points out in the admirable preface he writes for the volume, the spirit of the Friars Preachers has been from the beginning essentially democratic. Their influence and example did much to promote representative government in the thirteenth century, and their own internal organization, in the opinion of many learned men, is the most perfect one that the Middle Ages produced. Father O'Connor's popular presentation of his Order's glorious history is very seasonable, for this month marks the seven-hundredth anniversary of the Dominicans' confirmation. W. D.

The Circus and Other Essays. By JOYCE KILMER. New York: Laurence J. Gomme. $1.00.

It is a pleasure to praise this little book. It is just what one would expect from the pen of Mr. Kilmer. Like his poetry, or at least a large portion of it, these essays are the glorification of the commonplace. With persistent kindliness of spirit and quick sympathy for the hidden beauty in the trivial things of life, the author summons up the familiar objects of every one's experience, pointing out what others have seen but never noticed, and revealing unsuspected poetry in what to most people has seemed merely dull prose. The circus, the subway, the commuter, the alarm-clock, the possibilities of adventure in the noon-hour in

New York, the Christmas trees in the windows of the tenements along the Sixth Avenue elevated road, all are made to yield a harvest of reflections, often extremely quaint and always surprisingly true. Mr. Kilmer with conscious optimism simply refuses to let his vision be obscured by the sordid side of life. He knows only the honorable sense of the vulgar; to his mind to be common is not to be contemptible but probably rich in precious human relations. Hence it is that although the subjects of his essays are commonplace, his treatment of them is quite the reverse. He is a painstaking craftsman. All the careful cadence, the chiseling of phrase, and the wealth of literary allusion, which are the acknowledged prerogative of the essay, are at his command; but being in the hands of an artist, though present, they never obtrude. J. H. F.

The Syrian Christ. By ABRAHAM MITRIE RIHBANY. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.50.

The title of this book misled the reviewer. He thought to find here the Christology of those who derive Christianity from the mystery religions of Syria. The author has not that extravagant idea, yet he has another. He is a Syrian, and makes the strange mistake of assigning Our Saviour to the racially mongrel people that now inhabit Syria. Jesus was far from being a Syrian. His race left the ethnological environment of the Aramaeans at the time of Abraham, about 2100 B. C. The Syrians are the result of a much later migration of the Aramaeans westward through Asia Minor from Mesopotamia, and of many racial influences: Byzantine, Arabic, Latin-Teutonic of the Crusaders, etc. The only kinship between Our Lord and the Syrian is that of language. Biblical Aramaic of Palestine at the time of Christ is sister language to Christian Aramaic or Syriac. The fact that Jesus lived in Palestine gives no warrant to call Him a Syrian Christ.

Mr. Rihbany who was a schismatic Catholic in the Orient but is now the pastor of the Church of Disciples, Boston, tells many things about Syrian life that may be used with discretion by a priest. The discretion is called for, because the author is not very scientific. For instance, the star of Bethlehem was probably not a star, but a preternatural light such as blinded St. Paul; and it is a far-fetched fancy to connect this light with the astrologists of modern Syria. It is worse than a far-fetched fancy to group Christianity with Judaism and Mohammedanism, and to say that the last two had their origin in Syria. Here is the stuff the author calls Christianity. Religion is deeds, not creeds; worship, not theology! He blames Greek subtlety and Roman organization for the evolution of Christianity away from worship into theology. This evolution is supposed to have begun shortly after the Crucifixion, and to have progressed by the subtlety of "authoritative creed" and the organization of "scholastic statement." Think of it, scholasticism began its work shortly after the Crucifixion! W. F. D.

The Book of Boston. By ROBERT SHACKLETON. Illustrated by R. L. BOYER. Philadelphia: The Penn Publishing Co. $2.00.

"The requisite possessions of every true Bostonian are a Boston bag, a subscription to the Transcript, and a high moral purpose." "There are more drunken men to be met on Boston streets than one sees in other cities and many of them are well dressed." "If you just sit down anywhere in Boston, a lecture will be poured into your ears." "'Uncheck your horses on going up the hill.'" "In Boston, everyone of the worth while is a descendant." "Throughout all Boston there is a general and amusing treatment of 'r's.'"

In the foregoing quotations are some Boston characteristics that especially struck the author of this charming book. He also points out the chief historical landmarks of the city, describes its architectural beauties, and devotes a great deal of space to descriptions of the homes and haunts of its literary lights. Except two Sisters of Charity whom Mr. Shackleton happened to meet one day, there seem to be no Catholics in Boston now, and though he was impressed by Wellesley's "Elizabethan college buildings," he appears to have missed seeing the "bit of Oxford" out on Chestnut Hill where the new Boston College stands. However, his pleasant book, which prospective pilgrims to "Tri-Mountain" would do well to read beforehand, is to a large extent, a guide to the historical memorials that do adorn the city, particularly those dating from Revolutionary times. The author also gives lifelike sketches of such notables as Paul Revere, John Hancock and Henry Knox, and entertainingly contrasts the Beacon Hill, the Common, the Dorchester Heights and the Charlestown of long ago with those of today. Then to indicate the wide moral and intellectual gulf that separates the faint-hearted Miss Muffet of Mother Goose's time with the little maid's 1916 descendant, Mr. Shackleton quotes these picturesque verses:

> Little Miss Beacon Street
> Sat in her window seat
> Eating her beans and brown bread;
> There came a small spider
> And sat down beside her.
> "You're an Argyroneta," she said.

The numerous photographs in "The Book of Boston" and Mr. Boyer's little pen-and-ink sketches increase the value of the volume. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The last number of the Catholic Mind's fourteenth volume contains Dr. Peter Guilday's sermon on "The Teaching Order of St. Dominic" preached at the Catholic University during the recent seventh-centenary celebration of the Friars Preachers. Archbishop Ireland's plea for greater familiarity, on the part of Catholics, with the catechism then follows and the issue concludes with a list of the papers that have been published in the present volume of the Catholic Mind. The increasing circulation of this little fortnightly, and the popularity many of its numbers have enjoyed with patrons of the church bookrack, show what a strong arsenal Catholics are finding this periodical to be.

The latest volume of the Messenger's series of ascetical books is "On Israel's Hills, Reflections for the Holy Hour" (Apostleship of Prayer, $0.50) by the Rev. John H. O'Rourke, S.J. The sixteen papers in the book describe in the author's vivid manner such scenes as the centurion's prayer, the widow of Naim's happiness, the miracle of the loaves, St. Peter's confession, etc., and then bring home, especially to the humble toilers of today, the lessons of the Gospel mysteries. Like the other volumes of the series, some 100,000 copies of which have now been sold, "On Israel's Hills" is appropriately illustrated.

In "El Supremo" (Dutton, $1.90) Edward Lucas White has found a field of fiction hitherto untilled. El Supremo, the Dictator of Paraguay, Francia, well-known to English readers through one of Carlyle's essays, is the central figure of the book. His undoubted greatness, his cruelty and selfishness, his flashes of generosity, his noble instincts and his craven fears are clearly brought before us. Life in Paraguay a hundred years ago, with all its complex activities and cross-purposes of Spaniard, Creole, Guarani conspirator and tyrant, makes a splendid background for a romantic tale. The book now and then lapses from the realm of romance into the region of biography and history. Its 700 pages would have gained a great deal by condensation. No decided hostility seems to be shown towards the Catholic Church, but the priests and the Bishop who figure in the plot are rather sorry figures. The end of the tale, a marriage between "two heretics," is entirely too romantic. Under the circumstances given a Catholic bishop would not have officiated. A more skilful construction of the plot might have saved William Hawthorne from the unseemly position in which he stands towards the lady who finally becomes his bride.

A perusal of Gamaliel Bradford's "Portraits of Women" (Houghton, Mifflin, $2.50) verifies the Apostolic Delegate's remark that American literature is certainly "plentiful." In the nine sketches in the book, there is little that cannot be gleaned either from the writings of the subjects themselves or from their formal or incidental biographers. The author informs us that his selection is a haphazard one and the subjects chosen bear out his assertion. For the most part, they are neither typical of normal womanhood nor desirable models for imitation. The sketches are in the main sympathetic, but the author has an occasional fling at the Church. Because Eugénie de Guérin laments the baneful effects superficial atheistic culture has had on the French peasant, Mr. Bradford makes her deplore "the general diffusion of book learning and education with the real obscurantism of medieval superstition," and he finds her beautiful character only a morbid compound of "cant and nonsense."

In "Olive Tilford Dargin's "The Cycle's Rim" (Scribner, $1.00), a sequence of fifty-three carefully wrought sonnets dedicated "To One Drowned at Sea," there is a refinement of feeling and a loftiness of aspiration not common in modern American poetry. The author is a tireless seeker for the "inevitable word"; she understands the artistic value of restraint, and is quite successful in her quest for striking and unhackneyed metaphors and similes. She asks:

> Why do I love thee? Thee, my other wing?
> Sweet of the wild? My tree of cinnamon?
> Not for thine eyes where twilights wandering
> Lead me beyond the world past any sun
> Whose arrows query after.

To her "the hills throw back their veils like virgins that have won celestial gates." The Biblical imagery in Sonnet XXXI is finely sustained and there is a noble prayer in Sonnet XLVI, the opening lines of which are these:

> Let not a picture drawn on eyelids shut,
> Fill all my world; but may I, open gazing,
> No symbol lose that liberal God hath put > Before my chastened eyes, their burden raising
> To faith's pure height where burdens winged run,
> An angel breed, to keep our feet from stones.

The following poem, "The Immortal," by Marjorie L. C. Pickthall is from an anthology entitled "Songs and Ballads from Over the Seas." (Dutton, $1.25).

> Beauty is still immortal in our eyes.
> When sways no more the spirit-haunted reed,
> When the wild grape shall build
> No more her canopies,
> When blows no more the moon-grey thistle seed,
> When the last bell has lulled the white flocks home,
> When the last eve has stilled
> The wandering wind and touched the dying foam,
> When the last moon burns low, and spark by spark
> The little worlds die out along the dark,
>
> Beauty that rosed the moth-wing, touched the land
> With clover horns and delicate faint flowers,
> Beauty that bade the showers
> Beat on the violet's face,
> Shall hold the eternal heavens within their place
> And hear new stars come singing from God's hand.

In the December number of the Poetry Journal few of the contributors sound that higher spiritual note which is so lacking in modern American poetry. Free verse so predominates that it seems to be decidedly bad form to make a rhyme. But Father O'Donnell's "Martin of Tours" in the current issue of Poetry has the quality desiderated, and so have these lines, entitled "Enough," by Winifred Webb:

> I was born to those who longed for me
> Ere ever my life began;
> I have glimpsed the soul of a woman,
> And fought the fight of a man;
> I have reared a child, and thought of God.
> Now, Death, do what you can!

BOOKS RECEIVED

The Abingdon Press, New York:
Girlhood and Character. By Mary E. Moxcey. $1.50.

Gabriel Beauchesne, Paris:
La Compagnie de Jesus en France. By Joseph Burnichon, S.J. 8 fr.; Psychologie Pedagogique. By J. de la Vaissiere, S.J., 5 fr. 50; Introduction a l'etude du Merveilleux et du Miracle. By Joseph De Tonquedec. 5 fr.

Benziger Brothers, New York:
The Holiness of the Church in the Nineteenth Century. By Rev. Constantine Kempf, S.J., and Rev. Francis Breymann, S.J. $1.75.

Bobbs-Merrill, Indianapolis:
The Agony Column. By Earl Derr Biggers. Illustrated by Will Grefe. $1.25.

Columbia University Press, New York:
History of the Franks. By Gregory, Bishop of Tours. Selections, Translated with Notes by Ernest Brehaut, Ph.D.

Thomas Y. Crowell Co., New York:
Christus Consolator and Other Poems. By Rossiter W. Raymond. $1.00.

Duffield Co., New York:
Dante. Master Spirits of Literature. By C. H. Grandgent. $1.50.

Laurence J. Gomme, New York:
Verses. By Hilaire Belloc. $1.25.

Houghton Mifflin Co., Boston:
French Etchers of the Second Empire. By William Aspenwall Bradley. Illustrated. $1.50; A. Layman's Handbook of Medicine. By Richard C. Cabot, M.D. $2.00.

The Irish Messenger, Dublin:
Social Action Series. A Series of Twenty-one Pamphlets. One penny each.

Jones & Kroeger Co., Winona:
Minnesota and Other Verses. By Ambrose Leo McGreevy. $0.25.

Alfred A. Knopf, New York:
The Russian School of Painting. By Alexandre Benois. With an Introduction by Christian Brinton. With Thirty-two Plates. $4.00.

John Lane Co., New York:
Further Foolishness. By Stephen Leacock. $1.25; Pencraft. A Plea for the Older Ways. By William Watson. $1.00.

Librairie Felix Alcan, Paris:
Bulletin de la Statistique generale de la France. Paraissant tous les trois mois. Tome V. Fascicule IV. Juillet 1916.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
The Institution of the Archpriest Blackwell. By John Hungerford Pollen, S.J. $1.75; The Reminiscences of the Right Hon. Lord O'Brien. By Hon. Georgina O'Brien. With Portrait. $2.50.

A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago:
Our Fellow Shakespeare. By Horace J. Bridges. $1.50; The Way to Easy Street. By Humphrey J. Desmond. $0.50.

The Macmillan Company, New York:
A Political and Social History of Modern Europe. By Carlton J. Hayes. Maps. Vol. I, 1500 to 1815. $2.00. Vol. II, 1815 to 1915. $2.25; The Early History of Cuba. By I. A. Wright. $2.00; An Apology for Old Maids and Other Essays. By Henry Dwight Sedgwick. $1.50; John Paul Jones. By L. Frank Tooker. $0.50; George Washington. By William H. Rideing. $0.50; The Outlines of Economics. Third Edition Revised. By Richard T. Ely, Thomas S. Adams, Max O. Lorenz and Allyn A. Young, $2.10.

G. & C. Merriam Co., Springfield:
Webster's Collegiate Dictionary. Third Edition. Thin Paper. 1700 Illustrations. $3.50.

Moffat, Yard & Co., New York:
Government Telephones. By James Mavor, Ph.D. $1.00.

The Salem Press Co., Salem:
Witchcraft in Salem Village. By Winfield S. Nevins. $2.25.

The Seemore Co., South Bend:
A War Bride's Adventure. By F. M. Gloria. $0.75; King Dollar. $0.25.

Sherman, French & Co., Boston:
For the Good of the Party. By Herman Hine Brinsmade. $1.25; A Voyage to South America and Buenos Aires, the City Beautiful. By Ida M. Cappeau. $1.20.

St. Mary's College, Montreal:
Martyrs' Hill. The True Site of St. Ignace II. Restatement of Proofs by Arthur Edward Jones, S.J., LL.D., F.R.S.C.

The Stratford Co., Boston:
My Last Friend, Dog Dick. By Edmondo De Amicis. $0.60.

James T. White & Co., New York:
The National Cyclopedia of American Biography. Vol. XV. Illustrated. $10.00.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XVI. No. 13
WHOLE No. 404

JANUARY 6, 1917

$3.00 A YEAR
PRICE, 10 CENTS

Chronicle

The War.—There have been no important modifications in the military situation, except in Dobrudja and Moldavia, where the Central Powers have made further advances. Interest in the war has been centered on developments concerning the peace proposals. The reply of the Allies to the Central Powers, expresses confidence in the superior strength of the Allies; recapitulates the efforts made by them to avert war; insists on the "innumerable outrages committed by Germany and her allies against both belligerent and neutral nations," especially Belgium; criticizes the motives underlying the suggestions of the Central Powers; summarizes, in a general way, the aims of the Allies; and refuses to consider the peace proposals, which are characterized as "empty and insincere." The door is not closed absolutely against the possibility of a conference, but the implication is clear that such a conference is out of the question, until the Central Powers abandon the attitude of victor, and suggest a basis of discussion of "penalties, reparation and guaranties."

Bulletin, Dec. 23, p.m.-Jan. 1, p.m.

The President's note to the belligerent nations has received official replies from the Austrian, Bulgarian, German and Turkish Governments. In substance they are all the same. The Central Powers appreciate the President's "noble initiative" and believe that the exchange of views he advocates is one of the most suitable means of preparing the way for peace. They do not disclose their terms but suggest that a conference of delegates be held at an early date on neutral ground. None of the Allies have answered the President's communication up to the present. They are making their reply wait upon their response to the proposals of the Central Powers. Switzerland, Denmark, Norway and Sweden, have heartily endorsed the President's efforts to further the cause of peace and have sent notes setting forth their attitude to all the Powers. Spain has declined to support the President, on the ground that the time is inopportune for such action.

Austria-Hungary.—An unprecedented throng of sightseers and visitors from all parts of the country witnessed the formal entry of King Charles and Queen Zita into Budapest for the coronation ceremonies. In some instances windows along the route were rented for as much as 5,000 crowns, while in one case 21,000 crowns were paid. The ovation given the royal pair was enthusiastic and the war itself was apparently forgotten amid the splendor and rejoicing. Cardinal Csernoch, with a number of the leading members of the Hungarian Parliament, presented the inaugural diploma which the King returned to the Parliament with his signature. The Parliament then administered the oath amid an impressive ceremony during which the new Crown Guardians were selected by the King. The coronation itself, which took place on December 30, was carried out with great magnificence, enhanced by the splendid national garb of the people and their representatives. The crown was placed upon the head of King Charles by Count Tisza, who had been elected by the King as paladin, with thirty-six members of the Hungarian Parliament who were to act as his assistants in the ceremony. The dress of Queen Zita for this occasion was fashioned after the model of the robes worn by the Hungarian Queens at all coronation ceremonies, and was presented to her by a deputation headed by the Archduchess Augusta. The religious ceremonies were particularly impressive and betokened the living faith of the people to whom King and Queen are giving an illustrious example of sterling Christian virtue and devotion.

Coronation of Charles IV, King of Hungary

Count Czernin von Chudenitz, who has succeeded Baron Burian as Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, has also been named President of the Joint Council of Ministers. He had been Minister to Rumania until the time that country entered the war. One of his first acts was to ask the German Imperial Chancellor for his cooperation in the fulfilment of their annual task.

The New Foreign Minister

"Our alliance," he wrote, "has formed the main pillar of our foreign policy. For more than three score years and ten it has given to our nations and to Europe the blessings of peace and has fostered a prosperous development. Now it has proved its value in our heavy struggle against powerful enemies whose aim is our destruction. The heroic courage of our allied armies, and the self-sacrificing cooperation of the nations will, I am sure, bring final success, and with it a guarantee for our existence and our future."

The old traditions are thus sustained and steps are under way for establishing even closer economic relations with the German Empire. For this purpose a new treaty is to be formed between the two States. "Our alliance," was the reply of the German Chancellor, "creates a firm and unshakable basis upon which our common work, after a victorious peace, will firmly establish the welfare of our nations."

France.—In addition to a decree creating General Joffre a Marshal of France, President Poincaré has signed another revoking the decrees of December 2, 1915, and December 13, 1916. The first of these appointed the present Marshal, Commander in Chief of all the French forces, except those in the colonies and in Morocco. The second said: "General Joffre, Commander in Chief of the French forces, will act as technical adviser to the Government in all concerning the direction of the war."

Marshal Joffre

The high command as formerly announced and now settled finally consists of the War Committee composed of Premier Briand; General H. Lyautey, Minister of War; Rear Admiral Lacaze, Minister of Marine; Albert Thomas, Minister of National Manufactures; Alexandre Ribot, Minister of Finance, and President Poincaré. The duty of the Minister of War is to notify the other Ministers and commanding Generals of the decisions of the committee and to take measures to insure their concerted execution. He is moreover responsible for everything concerning the preparation and the maintenance of the military resources of the nation. There are two Generals commanding, General Nivelle of the armies of the North and the Northeast, and General Sarrail of the army of the Orient. These are directly responsible to the Minister of War. Commenting on this new plan the Paris L'Oeuvre says:

Our readers have explained the difficulties they experience in an endeavor to understand the various texts which have altered the organization of the supreme command. I will come at once to the solution, which appears final. The Government confides the direction of the war to the War Committee. The Prime Minister, who is also Minister of Foreign Affairs, together with the Minister of Finance, the Minister of War, the Minister of Marine, and the Minister of Munitions, form this committee, which excludes all other persons, however high up in the military hierarchy.

The committee has no technical advisers apart from the War Minister. By the intermediary of the War Minister the committee exercises control over the General Commander in Chief of the Armies of the North and Northeast and the General Commander in Chief of the Army of the Orient. These two Generals are completely independent, having over them no other chief than the Minister of War. There is no longer one single generalissimo. Having established this fact, let us wind wreaths, strew flowers, honors, and titles. May those who care for them gather them up. France, with lighter heart, only looks to the future.

The press and public, profoundly grateful for the splendid services of the retired Commander in Chief, are almost unanimous in welcoming the revival of the dignity of Marshal in his favor. Clémenceau strikes a discordant note in L'Homme Enchaîné by declaring: "The technical Generalissimo evaporates unto Marshal of France, whose characteristic mark is to have no function."

M. Georges Goyau has written in the Revue des Deux Mondes a splendid "apologia" of the conduct of the French secular clergy and religious in the war. The article constitutes an eloquent and authoritative reply to certain insinuations made by a small but bold clique of anti-religious politicians concerning the conduct under the Colors of the "monks" and the attitude of the French prelates and their clergy towards the military and civil authorities. In spite of the enthusiasm and the alacrity with which the mobilized priests of France and the members of the dispersed Orders and Congregations hastened to join the army, even from distant lands, and the wonderful heroism they have displayed in the war, they have been the objects of gross slanders. It was said that they sought and obtained posts which placed them in less danger than ordinary combatants, and that consequently the death roll amongst them has been comparatively slight.

M. Goyau's "Apologia" for the Clergy

M. Georges Goyau, fortunately, is an expert on the statistics of the war. These and the "orders of the day" of the various army corps furnish him with the matter for a thorough refutation of the charges. Among other things, after speaking of the priests actually in the trenches and on the firing line, M. Goyau refers to the military chaplains and the priests attached as stretcher-bearers to the Medical and Sanitary Corps. Their story is one of splendid but silent and hidden heroism. One item alone tells its eloquent tale. Already, says the eminent apologist, the diocese of Paris alone counts fifty-nine priests or seminarists possessing the War Cross, and five priests decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor, for heroic conduct during the war.

Germany.—The service rendered to Germany by her fleet of submarines is daily becoming more apparent. The danger of wreckage from storms is apparently the main peril to which they are now exposed, since methods of cutting the nets in which they could formerly be caught have been invented. The Order of Merit has lately been bestowed on the German submarine commander, Captain Valentiner, for having sunk 128 ships of a total tonnage of 282,000, among them a French gunboat, a troop transport, four steamships loaded with war material and a French submarine convoy-ing fourteen coal steamers. The daily average of ship-tonnage sunk by German submarines is said to be gradually rising from 10,000 to 20,000. At present Germany is producing between three and four submarines a week. According to report some of the latest models have a keen, blade-like edge for their prow, which will cut through the thickest nets without difficulty. It is announced by the German postal authorities that the merchant submarine Deutschland and her sister ships will carry special mail on their future voyages. It is to be known as "submarine mail" and will be dispatched to the United States, Central America, South America, the West Indies, China, the Dutch East Indies and the Philippine Islands. A special charge of two marks for a postcard or letter not exceeding twenty grams in weight will be levied in addition to the regular international postage. A similar charge will be made for each further twenty grams up to a maximum weight of sixty grams. It is expected that the submarine post will be in heavy demand, since letters take many months in transit by the ordinary route.

War and Submarines

Civilians Slain by Russians

The number of civilians "assassinated in East Prussia in 1914" during the Russian invasion is officially announced as 6,048, of whom ninety-nine were women. The following are some further details given in the report published by the Königsburg statistical office, indicating the manner in which the "murders" were committed: "338 men and 58 women were shot, 48 men and one woman stabbed, 27 men and one woman beaten to death, 6 men and 5 women burned, one man choked to death, 2 men killed during the 'hold-up' of a train," while "murder" only is written opposite the names of 107 men and 4 women.

The Press and the American Note

In general the press is still rather hostile in its criticism of the American note. However, a kindly tone has been assumed by the London Weekly Nation, which takes the view that the President of the United States performed a duty imposed on him by the Hague Convention. The paper believes:

> It is open to the critics of the note to say that it is inopportune or obscure, but it is impossible for them to deny that behind the note lies the greatest material force that the war has left standing. They may find it harder to realize the entirely reassuring truth that his power is now formally enlisted to secure the world's deepest need. When a prairie fire is raging a planter has the right and duty to look to his own homestead. A conflagration enveloping human society is no domestic broil, as, with all its indirect consequences to mankind, was the American Civil War. This war is a flame which daily devours or deteriorates the world's stock of labor, food, raw materials, and implements of industry, including America's share of these necessities, while at least one of its possible and even early developments threaten her peace.
>
> But we do scant courtesy to Mr. Wilson's presentment if we treat it as a piece of national egoism and write out from its measured sentences their reasoned passion for human welfare.

The Nation pronounces the note entirely inoffensive, and believes that, though the Governments may not be thankful, "if there is a force behind President Wilson to arrest the war at the point of security and fix it there, yet millions of fathers and mothers will call it blessed."

This is in striking contrast to the attitude of the London Spectator, which sets the wildest and most impossible conditions for peace, demanding 1) that the peace parley start from the status quo before the war, Germany evacuating France, Belgium, Luxemburg, Serbia, Rumania, Russia and Montenegro; 2) the restoration to France, of Alsace-Lorraine, to Denmark, of the Danish portion of Schleswig-Holstein; 3) the annexation to the Polish kingdom which the Czar is to create, of Posen, Polish Prussia and the Austrian Poland; 4) the erection of Bosnia, Herzegovina, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc., into a Slav kingdom; 5) the erection of Bohemia into a separate kingdom; 6) the addition of the Rumanian section of Transylvania to Rumania; 7) the cession to Italy, of the Austrian Tyrol, Trieste, Istria and other portions of Austria of Italian blood; 8) the transfer of Constantinople and the straits to Russia; 9) Russian tutelage of the Armenians; 10) freedom for the Arabs; Syria, Asia Minor and Mesopotamia, being placed under external protection; 11) retention of the German colonies by the Allies; 12) a money indemnity for the ruin wrought in Belgium, France, etc.; 13) reparation by Germany for all ships of commerce destroyed, ton for ton, neutral claims to be satisfied only after damages to the Allies have been satisfied; 14) expropriation of the German navy by the Allies; 15) democratization of the German Government; 16) neutralization of the Kiel canal under an international commission from the membership of which Germans will be excluded.

Ireland.—Mr. Swift MacNeil, M.P., an Irish Protestant who represents a Catholic constituency, protests in a letter to the Morning Post against the use in its columns by Mr. Frederic Harrison of the term "Irish Papists." In his remarks Mr. MacNeil points out to Mr. Harrison that he seriously erred in seeming to imply that the insurrection of 1798 was a strictly Catholic movement, for the leaders Wolfe Tone, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, T. A. Emmet, Arthur O'Connor, the brothers Sheares, Oliver Bond and others were all Protestants. Mr. Harrison's object in dragging the religious question into his letter seems unmistakable. He could not but have known that by appealing to religious bigotry he was embittering his attack on the Irish Nationalists, and he appeared to forget that but for prejudice of this kind there would be no Irish difficulty at the present day. Ireland would be exercising her right to manage her own affairs, and amongst the Irish people there would be no dissatisfaction with the policy of Great Britain.

Bigotry Rebuked

Though of late the Irish problem, the great question of Home Rule, with all that it implies, has not loomed so large in political discussions, it is quite evident nevertheless that the delay in solving it is causing acute dissatisfaction in the country. The sober Cork Examiner, one of the least sensational of journals, gives expression to the prevalent feeling in the country in a leading article under the heading "Grave Irish Situation." It says among other things:

Widespread Unrest

> Irish Nationalists cannot be expected to remain docile and subservient under conditions which, if imposed by Germany, would be denounced as unconstitutional and uncivilized; so the Government may be warned that the continuance of martial law, the dilatoriness shown with regard to amnesty, and the treatment of the political prisoners generally, the industrial anomalies, and the laxity in dealing with the food problem are matters upon which extreme dissatisfaction exists in Ireland.

The release of 576 political prisoners interned for participating in the Easter rising has already partially met these just demands of the Cork newspaper.

Rome.—Count de Salis, Sir Henry Howard's successor to the post of British Minister to the Vatican, recently presented his credentials to the Holy Father. In his address to his Holiness, he recalled how the King of England, desirous of strengthening the ties with the Holy See, had sent Sir Henry Howard on an extraordinary mission "With the object of continuing the relations so happily established," added Count de Salis, "my Government decided to appoint a new representative to Your Holiness. I ventured to accept the mission, hoping that it may correspond to the desires of the King's Government, and be a source of legitimate satisfaction to all his Catholic subjects."

Count de Salis Presents Credentials

The Holy Father in reply expressed his satisfaction that King George, in establishing a mission to the Holy See, had chosen as his first Minister Sir Henry Howard, who had "so well fulfilled all expectations." "But today," his Holiness continued, "We must doubly rejoice because His Britannic Majesty has not delayed to appoint a new representative to the Holy See, and because this time again the King's choice has fallen on an eminent diplomatist whose brilliant qualities assure the success of his mission." After the customary visit to the Cardinal Secretary of State, the British envoy expressed great satisfaction at the cordiality of both receptions.

Rome informs us that once again there are rumors about the renewal of diplomatic relations between France and the Holy See, and that M. Bourgeois is mentioned as the future French Ambassador to the Vatican. Rome thus summarizes these rumors:

France and the Holy See

> The addition of three French Cardinals to the Sacred College is taken to be a premonitory symptom of the coming change. Cardinal Gasparri's outspoken remarks on the subject, in a recent interview, would hardly have been uttered were not negotiations being carried on at the time. It is well known that M. Denys Cochin and other influential French Catholics have been working to secure a resumption of relations between France and the Pope, that French Catholics are extremely desirous to see the breach ended, and that even many French politicians, who are anything but Catholic in spirit and tendency, have been long convinced that the best interests of France demand the restoration of these relations. When non-Catholic countries like Russia, England, Serbia and Holland find it profitable or even necessary to have representatives at the Vatican, especially in wartime, the silence and absence of France is surely anomalous.

All this, adds Rome, is very true. But it does not prove the truth of the rumor, and a restoration of diplomatic relations between the Holy See and the eldest daughter of the Church may not take place "until the war is over, when it will be almost inevitable."

Spain.—The sad, even desperate economic position of the clergy, especially in the rural districts, already exposed in AMERICA, seems to be growing worse. The attention of the Government has been repeatedly called to the fact and memorials and petitions have been addressed to it in order to ameliorate the condition of a hard-working and self-sacrificing priesthood. Several of the Archbishops have interviewed the Premier Count Romanones in order to impress him with the fairness and the justice of the demands and have requested him to increase the meagre pittance which the clergy receive from the State. With the Archbishops, the Premier was sympathetic and courteous, but vague. No definite reply was given to their representations. To a parish priest of Saragossa, who wrote to the Count, imploring him to support the efforts being made to secure the rural clergy a living wage, the Premier in his reply seems to have given one at least of the major reasons why these hard-working priests cannot be helped: the Treasury is at fault. The reason alleged by the Prime Minister is a sad commentary on the failure of the Liberal Government in the managements of the public finances.

Economic Plight of the Clergy

But the impoverished and suffering priests have found an unexpected champion. The anti-clerical organ El Liberal has come out strongly in their favor. It maintains of course that it is on the side of the clergy in the matter, not from religious motives, but from a sense of justice and national decorum. Whatever its motives, its action will necessarily influence the public and other sections of the anti-clerical press. The Archbishop of Tarragona has written a letter of congratulation to the editor of El Liberal on his manly attitude. The Archbishop moreover has outlined a plan of campaign to relieve the clergy. When the estimates for Public Worship come up for discussion in the Senate, it is his intention to propose an amendment in favor of an increase in the stipends for the rural clergy. When the matter has been thoroughly exposed in both Houses, it is hoped that these generous workers will not be denied the paltry pittance to which on so many grounds they have the strictest right.

The Modern Dance and Health

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

IT is a matter of common knowledge that the American public is obsessed with the fad of dancing. Young and old dance, as they say, in the morning, in the late afternoon and far into the night; but my own observation in many cities has led me to the conclusion that the term dancing, as applied to the movements in vogue in restaurants and cabarets, is a misnomer. The so-called dancers, as far as I have been able to observe, merely walk about the room, wrapped as closely as possible in each other's arms. They move, it is true, to the accompaniment of music, give occasional wriggles, retard their progress now and then with hesitations, and go through fantastic "gyrations" of the shoulders. But it is only by a gross misuse of the term that such procedures can be called dancing.

Indeed the feature that one who knows the history of dancing would be likely to resent most in this new-fangled development is that it should be called dancing at all. Dancing is a rhythmic series of movements expressive of emotion. Doubtless it can be made a medium of expression quite as valuable as that of the other arts. Some of the most beautiful poetry ever penned, the choric odes of the great Greek dramatists, was meant to be intoned to a rhythmic movement of the chorus, which added greatly to the significance of the words. As these choric odes treat of the profoundest subjects of human interests, life and death, suffering, love and friendship, it is easy to understand what a magnificent, artistic medium the Greek dance must have been.

After reading these choric odes, written, partly at least, to be interpreted by movement, one realizes how much dancing may mean. The study of them makes it easier to understand why it was that David danced before the Ark, and how dancing became a religious ceremony. It was my good fortune, many years ago, to hear the altar boys in one of the old Spanish cathedrals sing a lovely hymn to the Blessed Virgin, while they sounded their castanets and rhythmically swayed in an old-fashioned dance. Witnessing the harmonious blending of sound and movement; I thought I knew why Fanny Ellsler had caught the fancy even of the Puritans in Boston long ago, and why Margaret Fuller, according to the story, was moved to say to Ralph Waldo Emerson, who sat beside her at the performance, "Waldo, this is poetry," only to hear the answer, "Nay, Margaret, this is religion."

One may not agree entirely with the cryptic expression of the sage of New England; but his remark helps one to appreciate how artistic dancing may arouse the highest and deepest emotions that there are in man. No one, however, would think for a moment of ascribing to these modern procedures called dancing the remotest possibility of arousing any emotion, except perhaps the sense of the ridiculous. Dancing a few years ago, though not very artistic, used to be at least graceful and pleasing to watch; not so these modern dances.

The same trivializing tendency has affected music as well. "Ragtime" alone is popular. It furnishes certain recurrent emphases that are distinctly reminiscent of Indian and savage music, of tom-toms and other rude instruments. Rubbed sticks and brushes and curious cacophonies of other kinds are coming back into vogue; and the rule of our day seems to be anything for novelty and anything to attract attention through sense. All sorts of savage elements, Hawaiian, Patagonian, Argentine-Indian, have been introduced into the music. Nor is this strange. The dances are exotic and come from distant barbarous or semi-barbarous sources, and it is not surprising that the music should have come with them.

One of the excuses given for the present passion for dancing is that it furnishes an opportunity for exercise to those who are much in the house and live very sedentary lives. The dancing-exercise, however, as I have seen it, is taken under the worst possible conditions. Where dancing takes place, smoking is almost universally allowed. After an hour or two the air is so thick that one could almost cut it, and occasionally one has the feeling, when the doors for a moment are opened wide, that large blocks of atmosphere are being pushed out by the waiters. At the beginning of the evening there is little dust in the room, but as people come in from the street and scrape their shoes on the floor, they grind the dirt into fine particles, and it floats about, making a very undesirable atmospheric element.

We have wondered why "colds" spread so rapidly nowadays, and mean so much; but any physician will readily understand that the rather rapid breathing induced by the exercise, moderate though it may be, in such an overheated atmosphere, with the inspiration of irritative particles of dust, tobacco-smoke and the like, cannot but cause in the mucous membrane of the lungs a definite congestive irritation that constitutes a predisposition for any infection. If among those present there are any suffering from a cold, and at almost any season of the year in a large group of persons there will be such, an excellent opportunity will be afforded the cold to spread. The conditions of the cabaret are even better for its dissemination than the crowded car or the crowded moving-picture theater, although these two have been thought the most fruitful sources of "colds" in recent years. Certainly for anyone with a predisposition to tuberculosis nothing can be imagined or contrived so deleterious as the conditions of cabaret or supper-dancing.

The dancing is usually preceded by eating and drinking. This adds another element, which, from a physician's standpoint, must be regarded as injurious. I believe that in Uncle Remus the bear suggests to Brer Rabbit that he can eat no more "until he has danced his stomach down," though stomach is not the word that the bear used, for in the woods they are very frank. The bear, however, is the only advocate, so far as I know, of exercise immediately after eating. Such a practice is bad for any one, but especially so for thin, dyspeptic or supposedly dyspeptic people. To make matters worse the present fad puts the exercise between courses; and it is one of the surprises of an evening of this kind, to see how many club sandwiches, with pickles and beets and olives and mustard, interlarded with ice cream and tarts or other pastry, can be eaten by a thin, delicate-looking, little girl, who uses the interval between dances to consume hastily new and unusual forms of food.

When I recall how intent we have been for twenty years on explaining health rules in the schools, in order to teach our people how to care for themselves, the picture of the cabaret and its dancers insistently rises before me. The smoke, the dust, the jarring exercise immediately after eating, or, rather, as an interlude to the eating, the late hours, the glaring lights, the mixture of materials that the stomach is called upon to absorb, for I have not mentioned the fluids, these are, if not the result, at least, the concomitants of our increased knowledge of how to be well, and of the constant reiteration of the rules of health by newspaper, magazine and teachers. It is incredible.

It is a salutary thing for us to "objectivize" ourselves occasionally and laugh at our absurdities. How ridiculous our generation is with its pretense to knowledge and culture, and its weak yielding to the tyranny of passing fads! What others do, we must do. We are like dumb driven cattle, blindly following blind leaders. And yet man is man, mainly by his individuality, by his power to think for himself and to do what he personally judges to be right. Why are we Americans dancing morning, noon, and night? He would be a rash man who would hazard even a guess.

An Effective Peace Plan

J. B. Culemans

WHILE captive Israel, crushed and shattered, sat and wept near the streams of Babylon, it listened in rapture to the Prophet extolling the day when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation: neither shall they be exercised any more to war." (Is. 11:4.) As half the world is engaged in the work of mutual extermination, insistent voices are lifted above the din of battle to picture in glowing terms the beauties of a permanent peace, to advocate means of insuring it, to banish war forever from the face of the earth. Have we any warrant for assuming that the last war is being waged under our eyes?

Political war and peace do not enter directly within the purview of the Gospel, since the Saviour's kingdom is not of this world. (John, xviii:36.) He promised His disciples peace indeed, but a peace which the world cannot give, (John, xiv:27) the inner peace of heart and soul, which does not exclude outward stress and storm. "If the world hate you, know ye that it hath hated me before you." (John, xv:18.)

Put up thy sword into the scabbard, He commanded Peter, ready to defend Him. (John, xviii:11.) Blessed are the peaceful, He says again. (Matt. v:9), and yet almost in the same breath: "I have come not to bring peace but the sword." (Luke, xii:51.) And He warns His Apostles: "He that hath a purse let him take it . . . and he that hath not, let him sell his coat and buy a sword." (Luke, xii:36.) But it is the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God (Eph. vi:17) as the Apostles came to understand in time.

But once does He make an allusion to what we may consider as a war of nations: "Nation shall rise against nation and kingdom against kingdom." (Luke, xxi:10.) "You shall hear of wars and rumors of war, for such things must needs be." (Mark, xiii:7; Matt. xxiv:6.) "For such things must needs be:" in the light of this divine utterance, the words of Jeremias acquire an almost sinister significance: "Peace, peace, and there was no peace. They were confounded because they committed abomination; yea rather, they were not confounded with confusion and they knew not how to blush. Wherefore they shall fall among them that fall: in the time of their visitation they shall fall down saith the Lord." (Jer. vi:14-15.) Scripture then points to the fact that the wars afflicting our race have deeper roots than any combination of human powers can ever eradicate: to banish war we must banish sin from the earth.

What trust can we put in human agencies attempting to decrease at least the frequency of war?

A war to end war, is the slogan of some verbose publicists and worldly-wise statesmen, and they make frantic efforts to call into being leagues of peace, alliances of nations, an international police force whose beneficent duty it shall be to prevent aggression from one state on another henceforth and forever.

People cannot but sympathize with these high aims.

They see the havoc wrought in men and property. Toiler and scientist, high and low, descend into an untimely common grave. The art treasures of centuries are shattered into dust. Progress and discovery are arrested in their normal onward course, and turned aside to help complete the work of destruction. The slaughter and burning have gone on for centuries. The gore and the stench of innumerable battlefields have reeked unto heaven through the ages. Shall there never be an end? No sooner is the question asked than the wish becomes father to innumerable plans to attain so desirable a goal. A war to end war, we hear it said; and the statement is qualified at once: at least all wars not approved by the moral conscience of mankind. But the moral conscience of mankind is so indefinite and unprincipled that it approves of things that clash with all true morality. Witness the world-wide evil of divorce so universally condoned and indulged. And if any nation or combination of nations is to coerce another to accept its view of international morality, we are preparing for another conflict of arms as gigantic as the one we are now witnessing. Can anyone seriously imagine a modern State or a group of States setting themselves up as infallible exponents and keepers of the world's moral conscience? The very claim is its own refutation: international morality is often the merest cant flung out as a cloak over low materialistic motives that cannot stand the light of day. That is why all history shows the fundamental instability of many international alliances, founded as they are, not on justice, but on expediency irrespective of right. When the material advantages bargained for are realized or fail of realization, the alliances crumble.

Others advocate the democratic control of foreign policy, to forestall wars that now, in their view, are largely engineered in secret by diplomats. On August 3, 1914, the London Standard, a conservative organ wrote:

> We do not know what sort of children our grandchildren will be; but if they are at all like ourselves, they will recall with astonishment how Europe went to war in 1914 without passion or hatred or malice; how between two and three hundred million people set out to slaughter one another in a fatalistic way, merely because the diplomatists had arranged things so.

And about two years earlier, on November 23, 1912, the London Times said in the plainest terms:

> Who then makes war? The answer is to be found in the chancelleries of Europe, among the men who have too long played with human life as pawns in a game of chess, who have become so enmeshed in formulæ and the jargon of diplomacy that they have ceased to be conscious of the poignant realities with which they trifle. And thus war will continue to be made until the great masses who are the sports of professional schemers and dreamers, say the word which shall bring, not eternal peace, for that is impossible, but a determination that war shall be fought only in a just and righteous and vital cause.

G. Lowes Dickinson in England is devoting all his energy to the advocacy of a scheme that would permit all questions of foreign policy to be submitted in every land to a vote of the people, taking them altogether out of the hands of the men higher up. Such a democratization of diplomacy seems to offer some relief. Yet, who does not know that a handful of powerful orators, abetted by a few influential journals, and the facilities of modern telegraphic communication may in a day set a country aflame from end to end, and precipitate a fatal decision?

A well known Catholic publicist in Italy, the Marchese Crispolti, has recently endeavored to show that Catholic parties, strongly organized in every land, can, through international cooperation, secure a permanent world-peace. He bases his hopes principally on an agreement by all nations to limit their armaments in proportion to their population. There is of course this difficulty: the States, obedient to the pact, would by reason of their very obedience, deprive themselves of the power to reduce recalcitrants to order. Hence there must be no recalcitrant States. Therefore the Marchese urges Catholics, as internal parties in each State, to use all their power to prevent an increase in armaments beyond what has been allotted to that particular State.

However, in no European country, Belgium excepted, is a Catholic party in power. In some countries it does not exist at all, and in no country is the Catholic party strong enough to carry out successfully such a systematic program against the combined opposition of other parties. Besides, if Catholics do obstruct military preparedness, they will be cried down for disloyalty, unpatriotic conduct, opposition to the best interests of the country, conspiracy against the life of the State, allegiance to a foreign power, and what not. No effective results are to be expected from the concerted action of Catholics banded together in political parties. Wherever we turn for permanent peace plans, we face uncertainty as to results. As long as selfish interests rule statesmen and nations, and international alliances are a barter of material benefits, not a pact to uphold justice, there is no absolutely valid norm by which the interests of various States can be gauged and evaluated aright. There is nothing but a narrow nationalism intent on self-expansion, distrustful of its neighbor, ready to spring to arms when it deems itself endangered and willing to stake all on the decision of the sword.

In this conflict of opinions and schemes only one plan stands out above all clashing claims: an appeal to the Pope as arbiter in international disputes. The plan is far from being advocated openly. The sects are uneasy and apprehensive at its mention. Statesmen instinctively dread to admit God and religion into their councils. Yet the Pope remains the one truly influential head of even a divided Christendom. His right and his ability to act in the capacity of arbiter cannot be gainsaid. Under the present most trying circumstances he has evinced the most remarkable absence of national bias, the most absolute neutrality. A sovereign without a country, he has no territorial ambitions. As the ruler of millions, he commands absolute respect and confidence. Used to view and handle world-embracing questions, he has that breadth of vision, that wide grasp of problems required in the handling of international disputes. The very fact that his subjects belong to all nations urges him to be impartial towards each and all. He has shown that his pity and kindness include all alike, even those not of the Fold. His standards of morality are of the highest: those of Christ himself. Considerations of material national welfare are not excluded from his purview, but subordinated to spiritual values of justice and right, which are the only ones of permanent worth and which no decision of the sword can alter. Let his claim as arbiter be urged in season and out of season. Where all else has failed or seems sure to fail, is it too much to ask that recourse be had to his tribunal before the firebrand is once again thrown among the nations?

If the last war is not being fought, yet, "when you shall hear of wars and seditions, be not terrified." (Luke, xxi:9.) Providence guides the course of nations even though we see its workings only through a glass darkly.

Actors, the People and the Cinema

IRENE WEST

I HAVE noted with intense interest that of late a great deal has been said and written in opposition to the production and exhibition of obscene motion-pictures. As an actress of international experience, now living in retirement, and a convert to the Catholic Church, may I set forth what I believe to be a gleam of hope; at least a partial solution to this deplorable state of affairs?

Today the great motion-picture industry of the world might be classed as an international educator. It effects an interchange of the ideas and ideals of many races. People of various nations, their personal characteristics and customs, are depicted on the screen in a most real and vital way, and the lesson is absorbed by the intelligent and the ignorant. The pictures, if objectionable, are a hundred-fold more damaging than literature of the same character, because those who seldom or never read and the illiterate, are regular patrons of the cinema.

The photo-playhouse is in a position, operating as it does, every day in the week, to destroy more character in boys and girls in seven days than all the Sunday-schools in America can hope to upbuild in as many years. Is it not monstrous, then, that the American people should not only be afflicted at home with motion-pictures that destroy character and create an appetite for crime, but should likewise be humiliated by the knowlelge that bad pictures bearing the trademark of the United States are scattered broadcast?

In some parts of Europe and in the Argentine and Brazil I have seen pictures on the screen so base as to cause me to blush with shame and indignation one moment and feel my blood curdle the next. I have actually heard it said that such films as fail to pass the censors in this country find a profitable market in South America.

It is not my intention to criticize our neighbor, realizing as I do, that we must first sweep clean our own doorstep. I mention this only to show that we, as Catholics, cannot always remain silent or indifferent to so far-reaching and subtle an evil. I am of the opinion that unless we, collectively, as members of Christ's Fold, use every honorable means to suppress the manufacture and exportation of such films, the Church will eventually be obliged to speak, if only to protect and safeguard the morals of her own children. In such an event she would be rendering, as of old, one more service to the world at large, for the good of all.

Who is to blame for this wretched state of affairs, the scenario writers, directors, actors, corporations, exhibitors, or the general public? Each element in the great industry places the blame elsewhere. The scenario writer will tell you that he writes to meet the demand of the times. The director merely produces from the manuscript given him. The actor but plays the part assigned to him. The corporations manufacture simply what their customers demand. The exhibitor says he is displaying what the general public craves and patronizes. Thus it is; and by blaming the general public such unscrupulous parasites hope to continue to infect the people with social and moral venom, with impunity.

It is to be hoped that the depraved taste of a few is in nowise representative of the American mind. The masses are often unconsciously guilty of patronizing such pictures, through misrepresentation or attractive advertising, and we all know that objectionable pictures are to be found not only in the five-cent picture house but elsewhere also. Many questionable subjects are masqueraded as important and vital questions of the day and draw capacity houses at the admission price of a first-class musical extravaganza.

Since we find it so difficult to localize the blame, perhaps we should be more concerned with the remedy than the disease. There is abundant evidence that the boards of censors have proved ineffective to cope with the situation. As I remarked in the beginning, I believe I see a partial solution to the motion-picture evil. I am advancing just a little into the future, when the "Catholic Actors Gild of America" shall be firmly established as a national organization.

Of the many thousands of persons in America who are following the theatrical profession today a full fifty per cent of the number are members of the Church. This fact was first discovered when the Rev. Walter Bentley established in New York City a Protestant organization known as the "Actors' Church Alliance." Out of this discovery grew the "Catholic Actors Gild of America." Although the Gild is less than three years old, it has made steady progress from the beginning and its members now number several hundred. As a member of the organization I have received information from headquarters in New York that the Gild intends to start the new year by reaching out and establishing branches in all the theatrical centers of America. I am consumed with a burning desire to see this movement firmly established and successfully operating. I have personally aroused much interest in the matter among our Catholic actors in the capital of the film world. We are now awaiting orders from the head office to open a chapter here in Los Angeles. With our Catholic actors organized under one banner for their spiritual welfare, it seems reasonable to believe that the salutary influence of such an organization will prove a potent factor in the uplifting of the stage and theatricals in general. As many of our Catholic actors are also members of the Knights of Columbus, that benevolent association of members of Christ's Church feels a kindly interest in the desire and effort of the Catholic actors to unite. There is strength in numbers. Membership in the Gild will not only include the Catholic actor but the playwright as well, and all others in any way connected with the profession.

It may be only presumption on my part, this effort to advance a theory that if the "Catholic Actors' Gild of America," a few thousand strong, raised aloud its voice in protestation against the production of obscene motion pictures a gratifying result would be effected. A protest from the actors themselves would probably call forth the support and cooperation of the religious organizations of all denominations and a great majority of the general public who are in favor of crushing for all time those covetous mongrels who publicly exploit the sensual and criminal side of a debased human nature for their own selfish ends. It is thus they would fill their pockets with filthy lucre at the expense of moral corruption to an amusement-loving people.

Let the stage and the motion picture ever remain one of the greatest institutions of the American republic; and let the actors, who are the theater-going public's pets and idols, save the situation by leading a campaign for the exclusion of all theatrical productions that offend the nation's sense of decency.

Three Great Personalities

JOHN B. KENNEDY

TODAY G. K. Chesterton is one of England's foremost men of letters and his brother Cecil and Hilaire Belloc are two others of like genius and popularity.

Naturally, when interviewed, these three literateurs dwelt mainly upon war topics. Mr. Belloc is an expert on the war, and his conversation on that subject is technical; G. K. Chesterton is the war's English philosopher who has expended a vast amount of mental energy in clearing up popular confusion regarding "Rooshans and Prooshans"; and Cecil Chesterton is the typical London taxpayer who views disaster with equanimity and success with undue elation.

Just previous to the war these three names had recurred in the British press so often that the men were already well known, not only as men of letters, for those laurels were earned years before, but as forceful publicists with a message for England and the world at large, a message startlingly true and unequivocal, that decadence had decayed utterly, and that true faith was returning.

Since the war this specific message has been suspended, and these three men are writing of the conflict, and little else. But while the war, as related to England, will result in the greatly enhanced prestige of Catholicism as a factor in the national life, it will eventually become, like all upheavals, a milestone in the progress of the Faith. So however discerning, however wise, however interesting their dicta on the war, this is less important in the long run, than the personal influence of these three widely quoted thinkers as positive forces in religion.

Some observers among us have expressed doubts regarding the genuineness and permanence of the so-called Catholic literary revival in London. A cynical contempt has been displayed toward the work of writers on both sides of the Atlantic who are said to imitate G. K. Chesterton. This imputation is the rankest injustice to Mr. Chesterton because the chief virtue of his style is that it is inimitable. Anybody can build a paradox, and anybody else can demolish it, and anybody but a professional bigot can see the truth and tell it. Mr. Chesterton does these things extremely well, and in so doing he provides higher intellectual entertainment than any other writer. Therein lies his excellence, and whoso would emulate it has a worthy object and a far goal.

So far as can be detected there are no evidences of a purely Catholic literary revival in London. Several clever English writers, in the natural cycle of experience, have confronted the Catholic record of consistency and truth under all conditions, adverse and prosperous, and these have been honest enough to admit the power of the Church. Also, in a few cases where free thought was not the paramount spiritual tenet, the new impression given by this contact with the first principles of Catholicism has been sufficiently strong to induce sympathetic study, with the usual result of conversion.

In London, as in every other metropolis of art, the cleverest men have very cordial intellectual friendships or very robust intellectual enmities; and where they are the cleverest of the clever they usually manage to have both. By the monthly statistics which the omnivorous multitude seem to revere as the criterion of all values, the brain-power of London's current genius would register Bernard Shaw with 1,000 kilowatts, G. K. Chesterton with 900 and Hillaire Belloc with 850, others following in due gradation.

This is the popular theory, expressed by London journalists who have been "on" Fleet Street long enough to select destinies for all the great names in the universe. Of course it is utterly wrong. Mr. Shaw's brain is neither the biggest nor the best in London. It produces excellent work when stimulated by a theatrical setting of crisis and opportunity; but in all its brilliance it lacks the most dazzling of intellectual attributes, simplicity. Certainly G. K. Chesterton is not inferior to Shaw. Without sensation, without a stage, Mr. Chesterton has so grown in power that his pronouncements are accepted abroad as the essence of the best British thought on things politic.

But so far as mere intellectual ability is concerned it is highly probable that both these noted gentlemen should bow to Belloc. Starting his career with the advantage of correct metaphysics and rigidly avoiding the climacteric doubts of religious discipline that trip the minor grades of genius, Hilaire Belloc has overcome the terrific handicaps of strict sincerity and aristocratic mental endowments, to reach a permanent pinnacle as England's most reliable war writer. Principally because he has never lost sight of the basic truths of economics in his study of the war, and also because he has not permitted himself the journalistic delight of translating public fear or hope into terms of prophecy, he has the most substantial following of intelligent readers. It is a fact that Mr. Belloc's contributions, with subsidiary assistance from a naval expert, have built up one of London's weekly magazines from the status of a trade paper to that of a national periodical, from a circulation of 20,000 to one of about 100,000. What mammonist would require more palpable evidence of a writer's vogue?

Any public library in this country will testify to the place of G. K. Chesterton. Taking one of his volumes of typical essays, "The Defendant," from a shelf in the New York Public Library, and comparing its date card with that in a widely advertised novel, the writer calculated that in six months "The Defendant" had been borrowed by fourteen readers, while in the same period the novel had been read twenty-two times. A similar comparison in an up-state town library, between "Tremendous Trifles" and the same novel, produced practically the same result. This proportion is highly flattering to Mr. Chesterton as a stimulator of American thought, and concretely expresses his position before this country's intelligent class of readers. And it is further interesting because a similar examination at a London suburban borough library gave Mr. Chesterton's volume a proportionately less extended circulation.

Cecil Chesterton naturally shares some of his brother's great prestige; but quite apart from G. K. Chesterton's achievements it is indisputable that Cecil Chesterton would have become a prominent figure, and this not only in British journalism. He came to the front quite dramatically in connection with the Marconi uproar, and he discusses his escape from a penal sentence with a frankness that convinces the hearer of his absolute honesty.

Bernard Shaw extols his fabulous supermen as creatures of gross virtues and heroic vices. But if he would take a good look at one of his own ideals he would not refer to such well-dead characters as Don Juan or conjure up freaks whose utter wit and rationalism bore everybody, including themselves. He would merely leave Adelphi Terrace by taxicab, take train at Paddington for Beaconsfield, and there stop at Overroads and inquire for Mr. G. K. Chesterton. Or perhaps a simpler process would be to go down the Strand to Essex Street and see Cecil Chesterton. For the Chestertons are typical supermen inasmuch as they enjoy indulging the common weakness for tobacco, beefsteak and wholesome liquor. Or he might see Mr. Belloc at the Reform Club, and he would find a man who relishes light wine, and whose clean complexion and robustness shows the admirable digestion of skilfully cooked meats.

Mr. Shaw would find these gentlemen quite as brilliant and interesting in their conversation as any of his characters. They would show him very clearly why the Socialism he advocates is not only impracticable, but immoral; that the servility of the incompetent and ill-born and ill-bred is not only a pernicious gospel to preach, but also an untrue one; that submission to a divinely instituted spiritual yoke is not a comic kow-towing, but a glorious liberty. And they would demonstrate the necessity of religious dogma without employing any of the dogmatism that Mr. Shaw uses to emphasize the necessity of Fabianism.

And after this, if Mr. Shaw were informed that it was one very powerful phase of his own skepticism that commenced the conversion of Cecil Chesterton to Catholicism the versatile cynic might be led to a course of retrospection and research that would lead to final repentance for his many brilliant blasphemies.

Even if all the brilliant writers of the world were Shavian in their outlook upon spirituality and clung to the prescription that a full stomach is the prerequisite of a flowing soul the number of intelligent persons attending Mass, receiving Communion, and gaining Indulgences would not be diminished in the least. But when we have brains just as brilliant as those of the leading materialists, connected with hearts a good deal more charitable than theirs; when we have men of great versatility, catholic wit, and magnificent simplicity, we may say that any battle of brains will go to the side that has simplicity, for this is philosophically a Divine attribute, and even pragmatically a human virtue.

G. K. Chesterton is not yet a professed Catholic, and when the writer made bold to ask him to confirm or deny the rumor of his reception into the Church he politely declined to discuss the matter. But were he a communicant, Mr. Chesterton could hardly be more serviceable to the Church. Some day the world will receive his confession of faith. It may be a posthumous monograph; it may be a brilliant book: but I am quite sure that its central substance will be the "Credo," and its final apostrophe will be the tri-prayer of Pater Noster, Ave Maria and "Gloria," a child's penance.

In the United States the Catholic population is proportionately much larger than in England. We see how Providence is adapting the means to the great end. Here the good fight is being fought by a multitude of zealous men, bishops, priests and laymen, by pen and tongue, press and pulpit. No laymen stand out preeminently as expounders of Catholic philosophy, although all industriously contribute to the general effect. In England they have no Knights of Columbus. Zealous clergy and laity they have; but their condition and their temperament differ from America's. In England giants must champion a cause before that peripatetic pessimist, the man in the street, will halt his running and reading and find time for a little cool thought. England has her giants. And by giants are not meant the colossal, immeasurable intellects that find no repose save between the rubber walls of a mad-house cell; but men whose heads are longer than their opponents', and whose hearts are simpler and kinder to a degree that renders the term appropriate by comparison.

England is only just turning upward from her plunge into the treacherous sea of world-strife. The light glimmers fathoms ahead. She is a strong swimmer, and should reach it. Philosophical schools and religious sections will be thrust to the background by the pressure of political and economic problems once peace is restored. But they will eventually reappear, strong and clamoring for the spiritual allegiance of Englishmen. In that day, when Catholicism, the Establishment, and the sects face the ordeal of a nation's hunger for religious satisfaction, the influence of the Chestertons, Hilaire Belloc and their intellectual disciples will point like a way-post to Rome.

The Women of France and the War

BARBARA DE COURSON

LIKE all trials of unusual magnitude, the great war has brought out the best and worst traits of character in those whom it most deeply touches. Certain characteristics are apt to slumber below the surface in times of peace. They are fanned into flame by an unprecedented ordeal, and possibilities that prosperity left untouched are called into play by the necessities of the moment.

This is the case among the women of France at the present time. They have suffered from a trial that has now lasted over two years, yet they are bravely grappling with it. Their attitude has surprised those who judged the average French woman from the loose plays and novels scattered broadcast through Europe. It did not astonish others, who seeing France from within, know how, in provincial circles especially, there exists, in the home, where the influence of a wife and mother is generally paramount, a deep sense of discipline, respect, and fidelity to tradition. To French women in general, serious or frivolous, the great war has brought new experiences and responsibilities. As a rule they have met them with praiseworthy courage. A woman whom the war has not touched is an anomaly amongst us. With few exceptions, those who have been spared personal loss, devote themselves to bear the burdens of others less fortunate.

We have written already of the courage with which our peasant women faced new responsibilities and tasks. Their sisters of the French aristocracy and bourgeoisie, have discharged other duties. Their attitude is no less admirable than that of their humbler sisters. A large proportion of them have enrolled themselves in one or other of the three associations of the Red Cross, either as nurses or as auxiliaries. Statistics are uninteresting in themselves, but they are the groundwork of any really accurate report. We shall therefore support our statements by a few trustworthy figures.

When the war broke out the "Société de Secours aux Blessés Militaires," the oldest and most important of the three groups of the French Red Cross, placed 20,000 beds at the disposal of the wounded soldiers. This branch of the Red Cross has now 42,000 members and 796 hospitals, representing 70,000 beds. The Society is also responsible for 93 postes de secours or temporary ambulances, established close to the firing-line, for the "hospital Elisabeth," at Calais, for a hospital near Hyères for wounded officers and another for the mutilés de la guerre.

The existence of these hospitals implies the active service, not only of many Red Cross nurses, but of doctors, chaplains, accountants, etc., all volunteers giving their services gratuitously. The nurses alone of this branch now number 15,060. Three thousand of these have been lent to the French military hospitals. To the 15,060 women, who are graduate nurses, must be added 11,480 others employed in humbler tasks, but whose whole heart is in their work and whose generous self-sacrifice has been publicly recognized.

"The Union des Femmes de France," the second Society, has 353 hospitals representing 29,000 beds. Its members are closely affiliated to the Army Medical Service, whose deficiencies they endeavor to supply out of the funds of the "Union." The "Association des Dames Françaises" provides for 368 hospitals and for temporary posts, established at railway stations, for the purpose of assisting our soldiers from the front. The members of the French Red Cross do not confine themselves to nursing the wounded; they have also founded certain centers in Paris, that provide clothes, books and games for the prisoners in Germany and that feed and lodge homeless convalescent soldiers.

When we remember that Red Cross services are given gratuitously, we may realize what thousands of women are doing in France at the present day. But statistics, at the best, are soulless things, unless personal experience gives them life. As I write there rise up before me the faces of some of the women, whom I know, whose humble, persevering, self-sacrificing work I have been privileged to witness. One, over sixty years of age, the widow of a well-known general, has, for more than two years, left her comfortable home, with its refined surroundings, to take up her post in a hospital, where all day she is busy in the lingerie department over which she presides. She lives close to her hospital among most uncomfortable and depressing surroundings. To these material discomforts which the Marquise de X never stops to count, are added the trials caused by the war, the deaths of two promising young soldier sons, the last of their name and race! Yet our Red Cross worker never flags, never takes a holiday. The days come and go, she remains at her post, serving the living, praying for the dead and expending upon our maimed and broken fighting men the love that can no longer be poured out on her own dead soldiers. Another worker, also a widow, has an only son. During tragic weeks and months, the post, where he was stationed, was the spot where the war raged most fiercely and those who lived with his mother, marveled at her courage. Except that her prayers were longer, her devotion to her work more devout, none would have guessed that the fate of her boy was trembling in the balance! So far, his mother's perpetual prayers, for her work was in itself a prayer, have, like angel wings, guarded the young soldier from harm.

Others have had more tragic experiences. At Arras and at Reims, Red Cross nurses have been killed or wounded, others have died of contagious diseases, caught from their patients. In both cases they rank as victims of charity; they fell at their appointed post. Critics will say that a few examples do not suffice to make a complete picture. They may hint that some women went in for Red Cross work from vanity, love of excitement and notoriety. To the first objection, we answer that all those who see France from within, marvel at the attitude of the majority of her women. The frivolous have become self-sacrificing; the idle, industrious; the selfish, generous. The transformation may be noticed in all classes of the nation. The second objection held good at the beginning of the war, but, after two years of continued trial, only the real workers are steady at their post. The others have wearied and abandoned it: they are the minority and their withdrawal leaves no blank.

The Red Cross workers who are in direct touch with our soldiers find certain compensations for their strenuous task. They are brought close to the stern realities of war, to its most heroic aspects. The task of thousands of other women who are also enrolled in the Red Cross societies, is more obscure, but no less worthy. These women, the auxiliaires of every big hospital, write letters, keep accounts, make up parcels, answer questions and supply information or simply, like the charming wife of a general we know, industriously mend tattered uniforms, making the humble task beautiful by the sweetness and gaiety with which it is accomplished. This particular worker lost a son early in the war, but like most of our bereaved wives and mothers, her own loss has widened her charity towards our soldiers. Another form of charity appeals to some young girls and women. They have adopted a filleul de guerre, a war godson, to whom they extend moral and material assistance. The military chiefs and military chaplains are generally responsible for these "godsons." The mere fact of wearing a uniform does not imply that its wearer possesses every virtue, and uncautious "godmothers" may have regretted their too prompt adoption of a fighting man. The godsons vouched for by the authorities or by certain trustworthy newspapers, such as La Croix, are generally soldiers from the invaded districts. Since they joined their post in August, 1914, many of them have received neither letters nor parcels from their families and are left to face a terrific ordeal without the encouragement that comes from home. We know many of these lonely men, whose hardest trial is the absence of news from those whom they love. Their godmother does her best to fill the empty place. She writes encouraging letters, sends little presents and makes her godson realize that some one still cares for him.

Personal knowledge enables us to speak of the extraordinary generosity of some of these godmothers, women of the people who earn their living, young working girls who stint themselves of every pleasure that their soldier may have extra food and warm clothing. And their generosity is poured out, not on a brother or friend or fiancé, but on an unknown fighting man.

We might quote letters that prove the moral effect of the godmother's influence, how her letters and cheery encouragements keep alive the light of faith and the flame of patriotism in the heart of the solitary soldier. We can only add that to the godmothers themselves their generosity brings even greater blessings than those bestowed on their godsons. To these obscure givers, who make no show of their generosity, the war has brought an elevating influence that must ennoble their whole lives.

These are some of the details of a picture that must rejoice the real friends of France. These friends know how French novels and plays were often interpreted as being typical of French society in general, whereas they portrayed but a small section, the least influential and interesting.

It is impossible to present any one type of womanhood as embodying the spirit of a nation. The typical French woman, even in the eyes of those who know and love her best, is, like all other women, made up of lights and shadows. But at present surely the light predominates. It radiates against the somber background and must win respect and sympathy for the women who are generously and bravely carrying the burden of this terrible war and all that it implies.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

The Ethics of a Doctor's Fee

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A current rumor plunges Paterfamilias into a Stygian gloom that not even the joy of Christmastide can dispel. It is to the effect that, owing to the cost of high living, the doctors are considering a united movement to uplift their fees. A sad, dispiriting perusal of old files of checks and receipts had prompted the illusion that the limit had been attained in this direction, but man never is but always to be propitiated.

Apropos of this topic several distinguished medicos have entertained and instructed the readers of AMERICA on a variety of subjects, educational, political, statistical, economic, sociological and what not else. Now could not some theological doctor, learned in the law and the profits, tell us something about the ethics of a doctor's fee? Are there any moral regulations restrictive of that elastic charge; or does it rest only on a basis like that of the famous railroad rating, "All that the traffic will bear"?

Yonkers, N. Y. M. D.

Justice to Huerta

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the communication from John P. Davin, M. D., published in AMERICA for December 16, there appear two very interesting paragraphs, as follows:

> In the pourparlers which ensued early in the Democratic Administration between Mexico and our Government, General Huerta was given to understand that objections to him personally might be waived, if he would give proof that Catholicism would have no power under his Government. He pointed out in reply that the Catholic clergyman in Mexico could not display any outward sign of his calling, while the Protestant clergyman was freely permitted to do so. He was a Catholic himself but he had no friends and only a few acquaintances among the Catholic clergy. With none of these did he ever speak of politics, and rarely did he himself visit a church. The Church was then, and would be thereafter, practically without a vestige of political power or influence.
>
